A Brief Description of the Work of Six Days from the Creation of the World - The Preface

Folio I recto

As it sometimes happens among the most learned and distinguished men who have written of the true nature and history of the creation of the world and the birth of man, that two different accounts exist, so we will begin with those early times and write briefly of those remote matters as far as is possible, considering their age. Some were of the opinion that the world was not born and that it is indestructible; that the human race has existed from eternity and had no origin. Others maintained that the world was born and is destructible, and that man took possession of it from birth. And the highly enlightened Greeks who collected all the histories and accounts subscribed to the theory that before the beginning of all things of heaven and earth and while these things were still together, there was but a single form; that later through separation and division of matter, the world took on the order and structure in which we now see it. They say that because the air and the fiery part of its upper state were constantly in motion, these became lighter, and that the sun and many of the stars are carried about in it. But the dark and substantial part, together with the moist things, were carried to the lowest region by their own weight. After these things were mixed, the sea came out of the mist, and the substantial matter, which was loamy and soft, became the earth. And as the earth first became denser through the heat of the sun, there originated decaying ooze, covered by a thin skin, and out of such marshes and puddles came a variety of living forms. Those who had received more heat became winged creatures and soared into the upper regions; but the drier and heavier ones became crawling and earthly animals. Those which attained to a watery nature were carried into the element intended for their species. Now as the earth through the heat of the sun and the action of the air became dry, there was born a collective mixture of more perfect creatures, male and female. To this testifies Euripides, the tragedian, a disciple of Anaxagoras, the master of natural history. In the same manner they say the people were born in the field, roaming afar, and living a wild and unregulated life, and to whom the herbs and the fruits of the trees offered sustenance. However, as much is taught, old and new, that has been written concerning these matters, not only in Latin and Greek, but also in Chaldean and Hebrew, we will leave these old errors and look at the mysterious Mosaic writings about the creation of the world and of the work of the six days in which the mysteries of all nature are comprehended. For Moses, the prophet, father of God's historians, through the dictation of the holy spirit of the Master of all truth, fully understood all these things, and to his human understanding and experience in all fields of learning, our people and his people, as well as the pagans, have testified. Solomon in his book of wisdom, as an expounder of nature and of living things, acknowledges that he derived his learning of these inmost matters from the laws of Moses. This man (as Luke and Philo, our own brave teachers say) was highly experienced in all the lore of the Egyptians. And, according to Hermippus, Pythagoras also derived much of his philosophy from the Mosaic law. Numenius, the philosopher, states that Plato was a very Attic Moses; [In these sentences Schedel slightly paraphrases the (pp. 170-172) of Pico della Mirandola (1463-1494): "Extat apud Hebraeos, Salomonis illius cognomento sapientissimi, liber cui Sapientia titulus, non qui nunc in manibus est . . . secretiore lingua compositus, in quo vir, naturae rerum sicuti putatur interpres, omnem se illiusmodi disciplinam fatetur de Mosaicae legis penetralibus accepisse. Sunt item, quantum attinet ad nostros et Lucas et Philon auctores gravissimi illum in universa Aegyptiorum doctrina fuisse eruditissimum. Aegyptiis autem usi sunt praeceptoribus Graeci omnes qui habiti fuere diviniore: Pythagoras, Plato, Empedocles et Democritus. Notum illud Numenii philosophi non aliud esse Platonem quam Atticum Mosem." ("There exists among the Hebrews, under the name of the wise Solomon, a book called , not the one we now have, the work of Philo, but another, written in that secret language called Hierosolyma, in which the author, an interpreter, it is thought, of the nature of things, confesses that he got all his learning of that sort from the inner meaning of the Mosaic law. We have the weighty authority, moreover, of both Luke and Philo that Moses was deeply learned in all the lore of the Egyptians. All the Greeks who have been considered the most excellent took the Egyptians as teachers: Pythagoras, Plato, Empedocles and Democritus. The saying of the philosopher Numenius that Plato was nothing but an Attic Moses is well known." English translation by D. Carmichael, from , translated by Charles Glenn Wallis, Paul J. W. Miller, and Douglas Carmichael, [Indianapolis, 1965] p. 68)]. for in the beginning of his works upon nature a wealth of true wisdom lies buried. He speaks learnedly and wisely of all things as emanating from God, of their relationships, their number, and the regulation of their mutations. Wherefore it was a law with the old Hebrews (as Jerome also thinks) that no one, considering the remoteness of the age, should hark back to the creation. But what the most pious men, Ambrose and Augustine, Strabo and Bede, or Remigius, and the younger ones, Aegidius, Albertus, and also the Greek Philo, Origen, Basil, Theodorus, Appollinarius, Didymus, Gennadius, Chrysostom, etc. have written about this book we shall leave untouched. Nor will we make any mention of what the Jonethes or Anachelos, or Simeon the elder, in the Chaldean tongue, have said; nor of what was written by the Hebrews, Eleazadus, Aba, Joannes, Neonius, Isaac, Josephus, Gersonides, Sadias, Abraham, etc, but will briefly write the order of the six days in which, according to Moses, God created the earth.

Now as God created the earth, he placed at the head of his infinite work the first and greatest son, employing him as a counselor and master-craftsman in the planning, beautification and creation of things. For he was sufficiently endowed with wisdom and understanding. It is also asked out of what God made these great and wonderful things, for he made all things out of nothing; and therefore it is more righteous that insensible trifling things be ignored and the eyes directed to the seat, where is the abode of the true God, who endowed the earth with everlasting solidity, hung up shining stars in the heavens, distinguished the clearest suns, surrounded the earth with the sea, caused the rivers to flow, the fields to spread out, the valleys to sink, the forests to bedeck themselves with foliage, and the rocky mountains to rise. But this all Jupiter did not create, for it was created by the Master-craftsman of the world, the fountain-head of the best, who is called God, and whose beginning cannot be comprehended or discovered. Unto man it should be sufficient that there is a God, that he is the creator of the human race and the master-builder of this wonderful work. The ancients spoke of three kinds of worlds: the uppermost, the world of the angels; of the heavenly world; and of the one under the moon, in which we live, and this is the world of darkness, lighted, however, by the lights of heaven in regular course. In addition to these there is a fourth world in which all the attributes of the other worlds are to be found, and this world is man himself. In school we learned the saying that man is a little world in which elements of body and soul are intermixed – the growing spirit of plants, the sensitive faculty of unreasoning animals, and an intelligence and angelic disposition; and therein is seen God's likeness. And all this according to Moses was ordained by the Almighty, as he learned on the Mount. We shall shortly relate what the book of Moses teaches about these six days.

Folio I verso - (first full-page woodcut)

Inscription: IPSE DIXIT ET FACTA SUNT; IPSE MANDAVIT ET CREATA SUNT. Psalm 32.

Translation: Douay Bible version: He spoke and they were made: He commanded and they were created.

King James version (Ps.33): He spake and it was done; He commanded and it stood fast.

NOTE: The woodcutter left the two shields in the lower part of the page blank in order that any owner of the book might insert his family coat of arms, or other indicia of ownership of the book. The illustration shows the Almighty attired in his regal robes, seated upon his throne.

Folio II recto

In the beginning God created heaven and earth. And the earth was void and empty. And darkness was upon the face of the deep; and the Spirit of God moved over the waters. [The Incipit is that of Genesis 1:1-2, according to the Vulgate]. Moses, the divine prophet and historian, who lived almost 700 years before the Trojan War, teaches that when God, the Creator and Ordainer of all things, was about to undertake this work, he first made of heaven a throne for himself as Creator, and raised it on high; and thereafter he established the earth and subordinated it to heaven. He invested the earth with darkness, and it is without light except as it derives light from the heavens; for there he placed the eternal light, the celestial spirits, and the eternal life; but to the earth he assigned darkness, the mundane spirits, and death. When Moses states that God created, etc, he abrogates the errors of Plato, Aristotle, and Epicurus; for Plato held that God and the creatures in his image, and Yle, have existed for all time, and that in the beginning the world was made of this same Yle. The Greeks say that Yle was the first shapeless mass out of which all things were created, and that these visible things were formed of elements that were in harmony with each other; or (as others say) of matter and form, or were made of the finest dust that sparkles in the sunlight. But God created the world without available or previously prepared material; for he is to be regarded as having been a most wise and Intelligent maker before he undertook the Creation, and as a fountain of perfect and accomplished goodness, that springs from graciousness like a brook. Of all beings he first created the angels, and these out of nothing; for by reason of his immortality he is strong, and by virtue of his strength his power is infinite and without end, as is also his life. Therefore, why wonder whether he who undertook to create the world, first provided himself with material from that which was not. This was probably also understood by the Saracens, who say that the angels were brought by God from the darkness into the light, and filled with eternal joy; but some of them did not retain the conception of their divine origin, and through their own errors deserted good for evil, and became devils. The earth was void, that is, (as Jerome and the Seventy ["The Seventy" (also written as "LXX") refers to the Koine Greek version of the Old Testament translated in stages between the 3rd and 1st centuries BCE in Alexandria, Egypt]. interpret it) invisible and chaotic, and because of its chaotic condition it was called an abyss; and this the Greeks called chaos, which consists of a material of three dimensions scattered about in the great deep. Ovid, the poet, gives elegant expression to this in his poems. And the Spirit of the Lord, an instrument of divine art, moved over the waters like the will of a master-builder, who orders all things done; and so the work is of divine perfection and is expressed in the figure six, whose component parts are 1, 2, and 3.

Moses in his account of the six days devotes the first to the creation, the second and third to the order and disposition, and the remaining days to the adornment of the world.

ILLUSTRATION YLE

This woodcut, covering more than half of Folio II recto, represents the first step in the creation of the world, but is a strange confusion of ancient Greek theories with the Bible account. The design, like the succeeding ones, representing the six days of work and the one day of rest is circular in form. The center is a circle within a circle; the inner one, about three inches in diameter, was undoubtedly intended to represent the nothingness out of which the world was created by the hand of God. Apparently the artistic sense of the woodcutter rebelled against this blank space and he inscribed the word "YLE" upon it in large ornamental script of the period of the Chronicle, thereby introducing the ancient Greek theory into the midst of his Christian setting; for "YLE" is surrounded by the angelic hosts of the kingdom of God, acting as witnesses to the act of creation. Above them is suspended a dove with outspread wings and a nimbus, symbolizing the descent of the Holy Spirit. To the upper left, but outside the circular design, appears the hand of the Creator.

Folio II verso

OF THE WORK OF THE FIRST DAY

And God said, Let there be light; and there was light. And God saw the light, that it was good; and God divided the light from the darkness. And God called the light Day, and the darkness he called Night. [Genesis 1:3-5]. With divine and not with human assiduity, Moses wrote a wonderful masterpiece upon all the mysteries of nature—a book which excels all others in utterance and ingenuity; for the glorious God, who is the true light, and who loves the light and made all light-giving things, very fitly began the creation with light. In three days and before the fourth (on which the great lights were formed) he placed the same in their spheres, and thus brought about the natural day. Among all physical things light is the noblest and, next to spiritual creation, the best. Its bounty is most general, and it reaches the smallest places throughout the world. By it all the world is made good and beautiful; for without doing any harm it penetrates all unclean things. God saw that the light was good; for the light is nothing other than a symbol—a tender, thin and hazy image of the initial Goodness. Now, when the Spirit drew up the waters and penetrated the nether matter, light was created by the command of the Architect; and it shone forth like a bright cloud, lighting upper regions with its brilliance, as when the morning sun bursts forth and lights up half the heavens. Thereafter God separated the darkness from the light, and made two hemispheres. Because of its brightness he called the light Day; for it clarifies the darkness. The darkness, which is detrimental to man's sight, he called Night. And thus he created day and night, by which the endless cycle and course of time were to be marked off, and of which the years were to be made up. And it was a day—the first day of the world, but not the first of all days; wherefore it is not called the first day, but a day. On this day God made shapeless matter, the angels, the heavens, the light, the earth, the East (Aufgang, or rise), and the West (Niedergang, decline). The East is ascribed to God; for he is the fountain of light, and an enlightener in all things, who opens up to us eternal life. The West, or decline, is ascribed to the wrathful and those of wicked disposition; for it conceals the light and brings on darkness, and aims to destroy man by sin. As the light emerges from the East, and understanding soars in the light, so darkness comes from the West, and within it death and destruction are comprehended. Thereafter God established other regions, namely the South (Mittag, noon) and the North (Mitternacht, midnight), determined by like means. These are related to the other two regions; for the region which is warmer through the heat of the sun is closely related to the East; but the region which is cold, and suffers eternal frost, is related to the West. Just as light is opposed to darkness, so cold is opposed to heat. Therefore, as warmth is related to light, so South is related to East; while cold and darkness, and North, are related to the West.

ILLUSTRATION

THE FIRST DAY OF THE CREATION

The woodcut is in the form of a square, wherein are inscribed two large concentric circles, apparently intended to represent single band—a day, the first day. There is no attempt to depict light, and except for this linear design, and the creative hand at the upper left, the illustration is entirely blank. The subject may have proved too elusive or abstract, although light has frequently been represented by rays proceeding from a common center or a given point. The woodcut has an unfinished appearance as though the artist had lacked time to work out details.

Folio III recto

OF THE WORK OF THE SECOND DAY

On the second day God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters; and he called the firmament Heaven. [Genesis 1:6-8]. God divided the firmament and made it movable; and he made other sensitive things comprehensible. And the waters that ran together he fixed in the nature of crystals, and he fastened the stars to them. Now the sphere of the heavens, with its fixed stars, is provided with two pivots, one of which is called the north, and the other the south pole, and is revolved from east to west with such speed that the world would be torn asunder if the planets in their counter-courses would not prevent it. The master-craftsman of the world so tempered the heavens with water that the heat of the upper regions cannot ignite the other elements. Some teachers, not only of our own time, but also among the Hebrews and others, believed that above the spheres of the seven planets, and above the eighth sphere, which they call the unerring one, and also over the ninth sphere, which is reached by reason alone and not by perception (and which is the first among movable corporeal things) is a tenth sphere, that is stationery and at rest. Consequently Isaac the Wise, one of the learned men already mentioned, holds that the tenth heaven was identified by Ezekiel through the zaphirum, in the similitude of a throne; and that the color of the zaphirum, the brilliance of the light and the likeness of a throne, indicated immobility. But to return to Moses, who separated the waters from the waters, resulting in a triple division of corporeal things under the moon! Some are in the middle region of the air as the uppermost part of the same element, as the brightest fire, and in itself a pure unmixed and proper element. Others are under the mid-regions of the air, as with us, where there is no pure element, but all elements are mixed, due to the density of the corporeal world. In between is a region of the air, also called the firmament, in which rain, snow, lightning, thunder, comets and the like appear. Therefore this firmament is very fitly distinguished, not alone because of its location, but because of its nature as well—the upper elements from the lower, as the water from the waters. Therefore the upper elements are pure and bright and separated from those below, which are mixed. And he called the firmament Heaven for it covered all susceptible and unseen things.

Schedel's commentary on the work of the second day is very obscure. In medieval times the revolution of the spheres was not supposed to take place, like the motion of the earth in modern astronomy, round an imaginary axis, but round one which had a material existence, which was provided with pivots moving in fixed sockets. According to Vitruvius, architect to Augustus,

The heaven turns continually round the earth and sea upon an axis, where two extremities are like two pivots that sustain it: for there are two places in which the Governor of Nature has fashioned and set these pivots as two centers; one is above the earth among the northern stars; the other is at the opposite end beneath the earth to the south; and around these pivots, as round two centers, he has placed little naves like those of a wheel upon which the heaven turns continually.

Many of Schedel's commentaries are based upon the theories of Greek philosophers concerning the structure of the heavens. Thus Eudoxus, who paid more attention than others to the motions of the planets, gave more than one sphere to each of them to represent or account for variations of movement. According to his theory every planet has a separate part of heaven to itself, which is composed of several concentric spheres, whose movements, modifying each other, produce that of the planet. These concentric spheres were supposed to fit each other, so that the different planets were only separated by the thicknesses of these crystal zones.

In a small work ascribed to Aristotle, entitled Letter of Aristotle to Alexander on the System of the World, is the following passage:

There is a fixed and immovable center to the universe. This is occupied by the earth, the fruitful mother, the common focus of every kind of living thing. Immediately surrounding it on all sides is the air. Above this in the highest region is the dwelling-place of the gods, which is called the heavens. The heavens and the universe being spherical and in continual motion, there must be two points on opposite sides, as in a globe which turns about an axis, and these points must be immovable, and have the sphere between them, since the universe turns about them. They are called the poles . . . The substance of the heavens and of the stars is called ether . . . because it has an eternal circular motion, being a divine and incorruptible element . . . Of the stars contained in the heavens, some are fixed, and turn with the heavens, constantly maintaining their relative positions. In their middle portion is the circle called the zoophore, which stretches obliquely from one tropic to the other, and is divided into twelve parts, which are the twelve signs (of the zodiac). The others are wandering stars.

Another passage of the same work states that,

On the nearer, that is inner, side of this ethereal immovable, unalterable, impassable nature is placed out movable, corruptible, and moral nature. Of this there are several kinds, the first of which is fire, a subtle inflammable essence, which is kindled by the great pressure and rapid motion of the ether. It is in this region of air, when any disturbance takes place in it, that we see kindled shooting stars, streaks of light, and shining motes, and it is there that candles are lighted and extinguished. Below the fire comes air, by nature cold and dark, but which is warmed and enflame, and becomes luminous by its motion. It is in the region of the air, which is passive and changeable in any manner, that the clouds condense, and rain, snow, frost and hail are formed and fall to the earth. It is the abode of stormy winds, of whirlwinds, thunder, lightning, and many other phenomena.

Letter of Aristotle to Alexander on the System of the World

The testimony of Ezekiel to which the text refers, was this:

And I looked, and, behold, a whirlwind came out of the north, a great cloud, and a fire infolding itself, and a brightness was about it, and out of the midst thereof was the color of amber, out of the midst of the fire . . . Ezekiel 1:4

And above the firmament . . . was the likeness of a throne, as the appearance of a sapphire stone; and upon the likeness of the throne was the likeness as the appearance of a man above upon it . . .

As the appearance of the Bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain, so was the appearance of the brightness round about. This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord. Ezekiel 1:26-28.

THE SECOND DAY OF THE CREATION

Again we have a square, and in this instance inscribed with five concentric circles forming four bands, the hand of the Creator at the upper left. This design cannot be reconciled with the work of the second day, whether we regard the design as consisting of five circles or of four bands. It has been conjectured that this woodcut was misplaced, or interchanged with the woodcut on the verso of the same folio, and which has but four concentric circles, making three contiguous bands. However, this being but the second day, neither of these cuts appears appropriate. This illustration, like its predecessor in the series, appears unfinished.

Folio III verso

OF THE WORK OF THE THIRD DAY

On the third day God gathered together unto one place the waters under the firmament; and the dry land appeared. And God called the dry land Earth; and the gathering together of the waters he called Seas; and God saw that it was good, and said, Let the earth bring forth the green grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit trees yielding fruit after their kind. [Genesis 1:9-13]. After the creation of the firmament Moses calls our attention to the completeness, location, and order of the elements. Soon after the gathering of the waters into one place, boundaries were fixed for the sea so that it would not overflow the land. Now, after the submerged land appeared, it became necessary that the waters under the firmament (that is, those which are in the mid-regions of the air and had been stored up there in a common mixture) should be collected in an orderly manner and provided with banks. It is not true that no water is found in certain isolated regions, for the Hebrew Sea comes from the Hyrcanian Sea, the Hyrcanian from the Adriatic, the Adriatic from the Euxine Sea; and there are also countless rivers, springs and lakes, separated by regions far distant from each other. But the waters, it is said, were gathered together in one place, because the sundered waters of lakes and rivers (as Solomon says) flow down to the sea of their origin. When the land is inundated by floods, it is neither visible nor of any use to us; but when it emerges after the floods have subsided, and again becomes more and more visible, it also becomes useful to our people and their cattle as it becomes productive. This is here very clearly revealed by Moses; for as soon as the land appears he brings forth the herbs, shrubs, and trees. After the gathering of the waters, he brings forth the earth, green and in flower. He placed the earth in the center of the world, and endowed it with veins of gold, silver, bronze, copper, zinc, lead, and iron, and with all kinds of seed-bearing herbs, which are very pleasant as soon as they become clad in verdure, and the trees have very sweet fruit. They also say that on this day God made Paradise, the most fruitful and wonderful garden; and he planted it with every species of tree, and set in it a wonderful fountain.

ILLUSTRATION

THE THIRD DAY OF THE CREATION

Again a square, and inscribed with four concentric circles, or three orbits. Otherwise the cut is blank except for the hand of the creator in the upper left hand corner. The creation is still concerned with the elementary universe, consisting of earth (the center) and the three other elements of water, air, and fire (the three contiguous orbits). The ethereal universe will be added on the fourth day when the planets and stars are fixed in their orbit; while the empyreal universe, or zone of rest, will appear on the seventh day.

Folio IV recto

OF THE WORK OF THE FOURTH DAY

On the fourth day God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven to divide the day and the night; and let them be signs, and for seasons, and for days, and years, and shine in the firmament of the heaven and give light to the earth: and it was so. And God made two great lights; the greater to rule the day, and the lesser to rule the night. And the stars separate the light from the darkness. Moses thinks first of the celestial things which God set in the firmament to shine in the heavens and to give light to the earth; as the sun, the moon and the stars with which the upper part of the world is adorned, just like the earth is adorned with the things that grow in it. And after Moses has spoken of the nature of the firmament, he follows with the work of the stars and explains their functions—to what exercise and use they were dedicated and for what purpose they were intended. The heavenly corporeal bodies have two apparent functions to perform in the world, namely motion and to give light. And there are two movements: One of the whole world by which the heaven and the sphere of the air and of fire are moved through the whole area of the world in a complete revolution in twenty-four hours. The other movement is of the stars, and is singular, manifold and various. Among these the movement of the sun is most important, for in twelve months the sun revolves through the circuit of all the signs. The sun makes the day. So this course of the sun through this same circuit makes a year. The movements of the stars occur at various times in the interim. That is why Moses has so ably and briefly reminded us of those things, namely, that the stars were set in the firmament to indicate the days, years and seasons. In addition he has clearly spoken of the other function of the stars, that is, to give light. So he says they were set to shine in the heavens and to light the earth. Therefore the bodies of the moon, sun and stars are fitly constituted for such purposes. And although the sun which rises in the day is alone, yet it gives a real, full and complete light, and with its warmth and clearness reaches everything. Although we see all the stars glitter and shine at once, they do not make as full and strong a light; nor do they give warmth nor overcome the darkness. So two things of quality are found which in various ways have functioned in opposition to each other, namely, warmth and moisture, which God created to sustain and bring forth all things. About these matters many important inquiries could be conducted and a proper book written upon each—what stars are in the firmament and what their size; also what creations rank higher than others in nobleness and worth; what the nature, properties, and functions of these stars, and which of them may be useful in foretelling the future. However, neither time nor space permit us to write about that.

ILLUSTRATION

THE FOURTH DAY OF THE CREATION

The universe is becoming more complicated as the creation proceeds. The concentric circles or orbits have appreciably increased. In the center is the earth, indicated by a landscape, inverted for some unexplained reason, not by the printer, but so designed by the artist. The inverted earth is circumscribed by thirteen concentric circles or orbits. The three immediately adjoining the earth, together with the earth, probably represent the four elements, earth, air, water, and fire. They may have been left blank as already created and not concerned with the work of the fourth day. In the fourth orbit is the moon, in its first phase. In the fifth are two stars, one to the right, the other to the left. The sixth orbit is blank, and in the seventh appears the shining sun. The eighth zone has a single star, the ninth is blank, and the tenth and eleventh have a star each. The twelfth is neatly set with nineteen fixed and equidistant stars. The last or thirteenth orbit is blank. And thus the greater and lesser lights were set in the firmament by the artist. The hand of the Creator appears as usual.

Why the landscape representing the earth appears upside down is not clear. The woodcut would appear to be a single block, and although the landscape is inverted, the sun, moon, and hand of the Creator are upright. The same peculiarity appears in the woodcut for the Seventh Day (Folio V verso).

Folio IV verso

THE WORK OF THE FIFTH DAY

On the fifth day God said, Let the waters bring forth creeping things with living souls, and fowl upon the earth under the firmament of heaven. And God created great whales and every living thing and moving creatures, which the waters brought forth, after their kind, and every winged fowl after his kind. And God saw that it was good. And God blessed them, saying, You shall grow and multiply and fill the waters in the seas; and let fowl multiply on the earth. [Genesis 1:20-22]. And so on this day God adorned the air and the water, the air with fowl and the water with swimming creatures; and there appeared great whales and wondrous aquatic animals, and through the overflow of the sea's moisture greater ones were found. What is born in some divisions of nature, is also (as is generally held) to be found in the sea. Known and manifest are the things which follow when animals bear. And the plants also have certain things in common—movement and sensitiveness, ascribed to them by the Pythagoreans. The creatures are by Moses and Thimeo divided into three classes: those which live in the air, those in the water, and those on land. Though one may say that fowl do not live in the air, we will avoid this disputation, as well as the question as to the state in which the creatures were born of the elements; how God implanted fruitfulness in them; whether life was given to irrational animals out of matter; or whether all life had a divine origin, as Plotinus firmly holds; which doctrine is also to be found in Moses. For he states that the waters were to bring forth the creeping thing with living soul, and then adds that God made all living creatures. Therefore, one would not want to stand alone in the contention that the waters bore at God's behest, and that thereafter God bore also. Furthermore, in the passage where God's pronouncements are recorded, it is written that God created a living creature; but where the waters are spoken of, it is not so stated, but it appears that a creeping thing is to be brought forth. Although Moses on the following day makes note of three kinds of living creatures in the earth, yet most and by far the largest animals are to be found in the Indian Ocean. Many wonderful creatures are to be seen in the region where the solstices occur and the great waves fall from the mountains into the sea and expose its wonders to man's face. And much is to be learned there of the nature of both birds and fish.

THE FIFTH DAY OF THE CREATION

The woodcut is square in outline, and contains a circular illustration. Again we find the hand of the Creator at the upper left. The entire circle is given over to the work of the fifth day—the creation of the fish in the sea, and the fowl in the air. A few of the former appear in the sea. On the bank in the foreground stands a large tree that spreads its leafless branches over the landscape. The birds have come to roost. They have already obeyed the mandate to increase and multiply. But even at this early stage of their existence all is not well. In the center of the tree sits a bird of prey as though dominating the feathered kingdom. Below, two birds are screeching in excitement. On the ground to the left is an owl, attacking a prostrate dove. At the base of the tree struts the symbol of vanity. All this very naively presages the realm of man who is still in the womb of the earth.

OF THE WORK OF THE SIXTH DAY

On the sixth day God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature, cattle, and the creeping thing, and wild beast of the earth, after his kind; and God saw that it was good, and said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let him have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the animals over all the earth. So God created man in his own image and likeness. [Genesis 1:24-27]. Having adorned the upper part of the world, God finally, on the sixth day, provided the earth with species of animals. Moses divides the animals of the earth into three classes: beasts of burden, creeping animals, and wild animals. So he gives us to understand that there are, in general, three kinds of irrational animals. There are wild animals, which as creatures of perfect imagination and fantasy, occupy a middle ground among irrational animals, and yet may not be tamed nor made obedient by man. And so there are creeping creatures of imperfect imagination and fantasy, who occupy a middle ground between animals and plants. And there are beasts of burden, which, although lacking in reason, are in some measure capable of training, and seem to have some measure of understanding. These occupy a middle ground between animals and man. Now God created the large as well as the smaller animals of various species and form, and every species became male and female, and by their seed the air, earth, and sea were filled with them. And for each species he provided sustenance from the earth so they might be useful and serviceable to man, some as food and some as clothing, and the larger ones to help him build up the earth by their strength and power. Up to this time three worlds have been mentioned—the super-heavenly, the heavenly, and the under-heavenly. Henceforth we will treat of man, the fourth world. God having wonderfully ordered all things, and having determined to create an actual empire of countless immortal beings, he now created a sensible and understanding likeness in his own image, a being that could not be more perfect. And he made him out of clay or a clod of earth, after which he was accordingly named. ['Adam' generically means earth, or earth-born (Hebrew, adamah)]. God the creator of all things, also created man; but of this, as well as other heavenly writings of the prophets, Cicero knew nothing. This animal, which we call man, is a circumspect, many-sided, keen being, full of understanding and clear judgment, and born of the supreme God alone. Among all species of natural life, he alone is endowed with that intelligence and reason which all the other creatures lack. Now it is often the custom with kings and princes, when building a mighty, great and noble city, on having completed the task, to erect their own image in the midst thereof, to be seen by all. God, the prince of all things, has done likewise, for after he completed the entire world structure, he finally created man in his own image and likeness, and placed him in the midst thereof. And so, with Mercurius, we may well exclaim, O, Aesculapius, what a great miracle is man! Of this distinguished name mankind may well be proud, and no one should be unhappy in serving him. The earth and the elements, and the irrational animals willingly obey him. The angelic hosts wish him well and heaven urges him on to knighthood. No one should wonder that he is loved by all creatures, for all recognize in him some quality of their own.

THE SIXTH DAY OF THE CREATION

This woodcut is square in outline and circular in design. The four-footed animals have already been created. To the right, under the shade of the trees, reclines a deer, while its doe grazes about in the open spaces. A bear-cub toddles about in the foreground. The mysterious hand of the Creator does not appear in the upper left-hand corner of the square, for he himself participates in the action of the picture. Resting on a hillock, his ample garments fluttering about him, he is extracting our first ancestor from a lump of clay. Adam has already emerged to the waist, and the Creator is blessing him.

OF THE SANCTIFICATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY

The creation of the world having been accomplished by divine wisdom in six days, and heaven and earth having been finished, ordered and adorned, the glorious God fulfilled his task; and on the seventh day he rested from his labors. Having created the entire world and all the things therein, he stopped, not because he was wearied by his labors, but to make a new and immortal creature or likeness out of matter; for he never ceased in his work of creation. And the Lord blessed the seventh day and sanctified it, and called it the Sabbath, which according to the Hebrew tongue means rest, for on the seventh day he rested from all the work which he had done. [Genesis 2:1-3]. The Jews may be known by the fact that on this day they also rest from their labors. Before the time of the Law this same day was also observed as a holiday by certain pagan peoples. And thus we have arrived at the end of the divine works. Therefore we should fear, love and honor him in whom all visible and invisible things are comprehended; and of the Lord of Heaven, who is the Lord of all good, and vested with power over heaven and earth, we should seek like endowments as well as the true blessings of eternal life.

THE SANCTIFICATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY

This is one of the most interesting illustrations in the Chronicle, and covers almost an entire page. It represents the universe according to the Ptolemaic System as amplified by the Fathers of the Church in medieval times. The same concentric circles which appeared in previous illustrations of the Creation series are here again invoked, and developed with considerable detail. In the center is the earth (terra) in the form and size of a small coin. We know this is the earth because it says so and because it is depicted by a landscape, which, however, again appears as inverted. The earth is circumscribed by thirteen orbits:

1. SPERA AQUE – The zone of water or moisture, by which the earth is kept from being burned up by the heat of the upper regions.
2. SPERA AERIS – The zone of the air.
3. SPERA IGNUS – The zone which is all aflame with fire and heat, against which the earth is protected by zone one.
4. SPERA LUNE – in which the moon is shown in its first quarter.
5. SPERA MERCURY - The sphere of the planet of that name; shown as a star.
6. SPERA VENERIS – The course of the planet Venus.
7. SPERA SOLIS – in which the sun is shining forth with all its might.
8. SPERA MARUS – The sphere of Mars, represented as a star.
9. SPERA IOUIS (Jove) – The orbit of Jupiter, also shown as a star.
10. SPERA SATURNI – Wherein moves the planet Saturn, shown as a star.
11. FIRMAMENTI – A band containing the twelve signs of the Zodiac.
12. COELUM CHRISTALLINUM – The imaginary crystal envelope or ceiling of the firmament.
13. PRIMUM MOBILE – Representing the prime moving force (or first mover) by which the universe is kept in motion.

Ptolemy was a native of Egypt and flourished 139-161 CE. As an astronomer and geographer he held sway over the minds of scientific men down to the sixteenth century. He proceeded on a geocentric theory—that the earth is the center of the universe, and that the heavenly bodies revolve about it; that beyond and in the ether surrounding the earth's atmosphere are concentric spherical shells, to each of which a heavenly body is attached, the fixed stars occupying the eighth. According to his Cosmography the world is divided into two vast regions, the one ethereal, the other elementary. The ethereal begins with the first mover (primum mobile) which accomplishes its journey from east to west in twenty-four hours; ten skies participate in this motion, and their totality comprises the double crystalline heaven, the firmament of the seven planets. He placed the double crystalline heaven between the first mover and the firmament. The elementary region, comprising the four elements, earth, water, air and fire, reigned beneath the cavity of the sky, and was subject to the influence of the moon. The terrestrial globe, composed of earth and water, existed motionless in the center of the world, and was surrounded by the element of air, in which was mingled that of fire.

It is the Fathers of the Church that we owe the medieval idea of a crystal vault, a heaven of glass, composed of eight or ten superimposed layers, something like so many skins of an onion. This idea seems to have lingered on in certain cloisters of southern Europe, even in the nineteenth century, for a venerable prince of the church told Humboldt in 1815, that a large aerolite lately fallen, which was covered with a vitrified crust, must be a fragment of the crystalline sky. On these various spheres, one enveloping without touching another, they supposed the several planets to be fixed. While the primum mobile rotated from east to west, each planet and fixed star made an effort against this motion, by means of which each of them accomplished its revolution about the earth in greater or less time, according to its distance or the magnitude of the orbit it had to accomplish.

The heavens, as we have seen, were not supposed to consist of a single sphere, but of several concentric ones, the arrangement and names of which we must now inquire into.

The early Chaldeans established three. The first was the empyreal heaven which was the most remote. This, which they called also the solid firmament was made of fire, but of fire so rare and penetrating in nature, that it easily passed through the other heavens, and became universally diffused, and in this way reached the earth. The second was the ethereal heaven, containing the stars, which were simply formed of the more compact and censer parts of this substance; and the third heaven was that of the planets. The Persians, however, gave a separate heaven to the sun, and another to the moon.

The system which has enjoyed the longest and most widely spread reign is that which places above, or rather round, the solid firmament a heaven of water (the nature of which is not accurately defined), and round this a primum mobile, prime mover, or originator of all the motions, and round all this the empyreal heaven, or abode of the blessed.

In the illustration before us this universe of thirteen spheres is contained in a much larger circumference in the base of which is rests, forming a crescent above the universe. In this crescent or empyreal heaven sits the Almighty on his throne, resting from his labors, and surrounded by a host of rejoicing celestial beings. This is the immobile and fixed region in which the Creator, according to Schedel, established his throne when he was about to enter upon the work of the creation.

Inscribed on the panel of the left in this woodcut are the following names: SERAPHIM, CHERUBIM, THRONI, DOMINACIONES, PRINCIPATES, POTESTATES, VIRTUTES, ARCHANGELI, and ANGELI. According to Roman Catholic theology these nine divisions, choirs or orders of angels make up the celestial hierarchy:

CELESTIAL HIERARCHY

- SUPER CELESTIAL - one head
- CELESTIAL
 - Upper Order
 - Seraphim
 - Cherubim
 - Thrones
 - Middle Order
 - Dominations
 - Principalities
 - Powers
 - Lower Order
 - Virtues
 - Archangels
 - Angels
- SUB-CELESTIAL - Holy Persons

Apparently the artists here combined the ideas of Ptolemy with those of the Church Fathers. In the center we have the immovable earth, surrounded by the three other elements, and thus constituting the elementary world. Enveloping these, and succeeding one another are the orbits of the planets. The eighth orbit represents the firmament, which is followed by the crystalline heaven. Above all these is the primum mobile which rotates the entire machine; and his angelic hosts.

The geocentric theory of Ptolemy was finally supplanted by the heliocentric theory of Nicolas Copernicus, founder of modern astronomy. Copernicus was born on February 19, 1473, just twenty years before the Nuremberg Chronicle was published. His work, De Revolutiōibus Orbium Coelestium, proving the sun, and not the earth, to be the center of the universe, was not completed until 1530. In 1542 Copernicus was seized with apoplexy, and on May 24, 1543, the first printed copy of the work was touched by his dying hands. And thus he escaped the posthumous condemnation passed upon the work, which was placed in the Index by Rome in 1616, notwithstanding its having been dedicated to the pope. Be it said in praise of Copernicus that he was a creator of true astronomy, and that at a time when astrologers, necromancers, and diviners were alone in favor. He inaugurated a new era in the scientific world. As has been remarked by the learned Doctor Hoefer, "Copernicus begot Keppler, and Keppler begot Newton. What a genealogical tree!"

The four corners of the woodcut accompanying the seventh day are filled in with the winds, their distended cheeks blowing from the four cardinal points of the compass: SUBSOLANUS (east wind), AUSTER (south wind), APARCTIAS (north wind), and ZEPHYRUS (west wind).

THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN CELESTIAL AND ELEMENTARY ORBITS

The entire corporeal creation of the world consists of two things, namely, the celestial (ethereal) and the elementary natures (regions). The celestial nature is divided into three parts—the fiery, the crystalline and the firmament. Within the firmament, which is the starry heaven, are comprehended the seven orbits of the seven planets—Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, the Sun, Venus, Mercury, and the Moon. By the crystalline heaven is to be understood the first part of the first material that, according to the learned, was formed into two orbits. The upper of these is called the prime mover (primum mobile). The nature of these orbits is this: They all move except the fiery one, which is at rest. But the elementary nature (region) is divided into four spheres: fire, air, earth, and water. The fiery one has three distinct parts: the upper is fiery, and the middle and lower are light. The air also has three distinct parts: the upper which shines, while the middle and lower are airy. In the upper part are warmth and light because of the proximity of the sun. There is light in the lower part also, but only by reflection from the earth. But the middle part, which this reflection does not reach, is cold and dark, and therein are said to reside the devils, who have been banished to this dark atmosphere. Therein are also to be found such elemental disturbances as thunderclaps, hail, snow and the like. Out of this you may gather twelve orbits that surround the earth and the water, all of which may be said to constitute the heavens. But all these are surpassed by the Heaven of the Trinity, the God who is in everything and over everything. Note also that the distance from the Earth to the Moon is 15,625 miles; from the Moon to Mercury, 7,813; from Mercury to Venus is as much; from Venus to the Sun, 23,436; from the Sun to Mars, 15,625; from Mars to Jupiter, 6,832; from Jupiter to Saturn as much; and from Saturn to the firmament, 23,436. From this it follows that the distance from the Earth to the starry heaven is 108,375 miles. [The distance between planets given by the are entirely out of line with those of today. All the old measurements are based on the assumption that the earth is the center of the universe].

THE DISTINCTION OF THE CELESTIAL HIERARCHIES

In the celestial nature some have made three classifications: super-celestial, celestial, and sub-celestial. The super-celestial is said to be in three persons, as some have erroneously stated; for the term hierarchy, as Dionysius says, in itself implies but one order, and it is ill to speak of this same order as being in three persons instead of one. The celestial consists of the angelic orders, while the sub-celestial consists of the holy persons (saints). The celestial hierarchy is divided into upper, middle and lower. The upper embraces three orders, Seraphim, Cherubim, and Thrones. The first of these three adore God's grace; the second his power, the third his equality. In the first, God loves those who love; in the second he recognizes truth; in the third he sits and administers equal justice. The middle hierarchy embraces the Dominations, Principalities and Powers. The first of these rule the offices of the angels; the second guard the princes of the people; the third restrain the powers of the Devil. In the first of these the Lord reigns as a sovereign; in the second he reigns as a principality; in the third he is considered as the salvation. The lower hierarchy also embraces three orders: angels of virtue, archangels, and angels. The first of these attend the working of great miracles; the second presage great events; the third act as the warders of mankind. In the first of these God operates as a power; in the second he reveals, as a light; in the third he functions as an inspirer. Thus says Gregory. But Dionysius places the angels of virtue in the middle order of the second hierarchy, and the angels of the principalities as the first in the third hierarchy. And mark that, the Trinity of the Divine Person appears in each of the above mentioned hierarchies, upper, middle and lower.

OF TIME OR OF THE AGES

The Ages of the World are analogous to the ages of man. Now there are six ages of the world: The first age is from the Creation of the world to the Flood—a period, according to the Hebrews, of 1656 years; but according to the seventy interpreters, 2242 years, as Isidore fixes it, and many others whom we here follow. So the Hebrews give this age 586 years less; and according to this calculation Methuselah died before the Flood, in the year in which it occurred. The second age is from the Flood to the birth of Abraham, which, according to the Hebrew, lasted 292 years, but according to the seventy interpreters, 942 years; so the Hebrew gives it 650 years less. The reason for this difference I have not been able to find. The third age is from Abraham's birth to the beginning of the Kingdom of David, and, according to the Hebrew, covers a period of 941 years; but according to the seventy interpreters, 940 years. The fourth age is from the beginning of David's Kingdom to the passing of Babylon, and according to the Hebrew, lasted 484 years; but according to the seventy interpreters 485 years. The fifth age is from the passing of Babylon, when Jerusalem was destroyed and the Temple burned, to the blessed Birth of Christ, a period, according to the aforesaid, of 590 years; but concerning this computation there is a great division, for various calculations have been made by sundry persons. The sixth age is from the Birth of Christ to the End of the World, which God alone knows. And this is called the old age, or the last hour. To this may be added a seventh age, that is, the age of those who are now at rest, and which runs parallel with the sixth. The eighth age is that of the Resurrection. Now according to the Hebrew scriptures, there are ten generations in the first age; ten in the second; fourteen in the third; seventeen in the fourth, while Matthew from hidden evidence says fourteen; and in the fifth there are fourteen. The following are the ages of man: the first, infancy, is from birth to the age of seven; the second, childhood, to fourteen years of age; the third, maturity, from fifteen into the thirty-eighth year; the fourth, youth, to the forty-ninth year; the fifth, timely age, from fifty into the seventyninth year; the sixth, the spent age, in which we are reconciled to pass away, is from eighty years to the end of life.

The First Age of the World

Folio VI verso

According to the Hebrew Scriptures the first age of the world, from Adam to the Flood, is a period of 1656 years; but according to the seventy interpreters, Isidore and others, whose views have been adopted in this book, this age has 2242 years.

The Highest Goodness wished to share its good with others, and therefore it created a rational being, which understood the Highest Good, loved it understandingly, possessed love, and so possessing it, was blissful. So God made the first human being and with the aid of the angels formed his body from the clay of the earth in the field of Damascus, [The city of Damascus lies in the northwest corner of the Guta, a fertile plain to the east of Hermon. To the east of the city this is known as el-Merj, the Ager Damascenus. The fertility of the Guta is very great. There are many fields of corn and maize; but groves of poplar and walnut, orchards of apricots, pomegranate, pistachio, and almond, with hedges of underwood, so abound that the distant view of the Guta is as of an almost unbroken sea of verdure. From this the white, smokeless city rises like an island, near the barren limestone hills on the north of it]. and animated it with the spirit of life which is. He created a soul and united it with the body which he had created. And man was made in the likeness of God in physical things, and in his image in qualities of benevolence; and into him the Lord God instilled a wonderful grace and mercy.

Now as God had created the various creatures from the earth and formed the fowl, he brought them forth for Adam to look upon. But for Adam no helpmate was found in his image. And the Lord sent a sleep upon Adam; and he took out one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof. Of the rib God made a woman, whom Adam saw, and said: This is now bone of my bone. She shall be called ISSA, which signifies that she is a woman, for she was taken from a man. [Genesis 2: 19-23]. And the Lord led Adam into Paradise. Of the rib of the sleeper he had made Eve and provided Adam a companion. But he did not make her from his head, for she was not to rule over him; nor from his feet, for she was not to be looked down upon; but he made her from Adam's side, as evidence of a tie of love. No one shall go forth to gather grace because of his noble station alone, nor because of his birth, but through virtue. For although man was created outside of Paradise, and woman in it, nevertheless Adam, who was created in the lower station, has been found to be better than Eve, who was created in Paradise. And so God, the highest artificer, did on the sixth day of the world, on the 25 day of March, after the creation of the animals of the earth and of all creeping things and fowl, finally create the first man out of a ball of red earth or clay in the field of Damascus, and him he gave dominion over all creatures.

ILLUSTRATION

THE CREATION OF EVE

10-1/16" x 8-13/16"

Adam has fallen into a sound sleep on a rugged hillside. Eve is emerging from his right side as a full and complete woman. The Creator half kneels over the pair at the left, and is raising Eve with one hand and blessing his new creation with the other. No rib is being removed, later to be metamorphosed into a woman. No other member of the animal kingdom is present. Although Schedel places the creation of Adam outside of Paradise, and that of Eve in it, this rugged setting is too severe either for the field of Damascus or for Paradise.

Folio VII recto

After the first parents transgressed the Lord's commandment at the instigation of the Devil in the form of a serpent, God cursed the serpent, saying to him, Cursed are you among all cattle and beasts of the earth; upon your breast shall you go, and earth shall you eat all the days of your life. And to the woman he said, I will multiply your sorrows and your conceptions; in pain you shall bear children, and you shall be under your husband's power, and he shall have dominion over you. And to Adam he said, Cursed is the earth of your work; out of it you shall eat. Thorns and thistles shall it bring forth for you. In the sweat of your face shall you eat your bread, until you return to the earth from which you were taken. And after God had made coats of skin for them, he drove them out of Paradise; and he placed before it a cherubim with flaming sword to keep the way of the tree of life. [Genesis 2:14-24].

Now as Adam, the first man formed of the clay of the earth, and apparently thirty years of age when the name Eve was given his wife, ate of the fruit of the forbidden tree which she had handed him, they were driven from the Paradise of Pleasure into the land of the accursed, where, according to the judgment of the Lord, Adam was to till the soil and eat his bread in the sweat of his face and Eve was to live in want and bear children in pain, though the Lord had endowed her with incomparable charm. But the malicious enemy of her bliss deceived her, for in her feminine fickleness she had freely tasted the fruit of the forbidden tree, and had influenced her husband to her will. So, after putting on a garment of leaves, she and her husband were driven from the garden of pleasure into exile in the fields of Hebron. At last, after having several times endured the pangs of childbirth, she passed with weariness and toil into old age, and suffered the death which the Lord had foretold to her.

ILLUSTRATION

THE TEMPTATION AND EXPULSION

The woodcut is centrally divided by a date palm, to the right of which is depicted the temptation, and to the left the expulsion. On the right Adam and Eve stand under a fruit tree, about which is coiled a serpent, an apple in its jaws. Eve has an apple, and Adam has one. And so we have the transit of the apple—from the serpent to Eve, from Eve to Adam, and the apple is one. The original sin is afoot, and already Adam and Eve are holding before them whisks of leaves to cover their nakedness. The scene shifts to the left. An angel with drawn sword is ejecting them from Eden. They still conceal their nakedness with the same whisks of leaves, although according to Genesis God provided them with fur coats on departure. Adam is reconciled to his fate, but Eve tarries to argue with the angel, who doesn't appear at all interested in discussing the situation with her.

Folio VII verso

OF PARADISE AND ITS FOUR RIVERS

The earthly Paradise, which is under the equinoctial line toward the rising of the sun, was planted by God, from the beginning. In the Hebrew and Latin tongues the word means a garden of pleasure; that is, a garden planted with all manner of trees. Therein was also the Tree of Life. They say that this same place is surrounded by a fiery wall reaching to the heavens, and that the angel of God stands before it with flaming sword, barring the way of those who approach it. In this same Paradise Adam and Eve were created, but they were driven from it because of their sinful appetites. [Countless attempts have been made to locate the Garden of Eden. One locates it at the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates, or somewhere between that junction and the Persian Gulf; another in the highlands of Armenia, near the sources of these rivers; and a third, in the far East, in the mountainous highlands of central Asia, near the sources of the Indus, the Helمند, the Oxus and the Jaxartes rivers. But all these theories become worthless the moment we allow that the deluge may have borne the family of Noah far away from the primeval home of man. The notion that the rivers and countries subsequently known as Hikkkel, Euphrates, Havilak, Cush, etc, are identical with the lands and rivers of Eden, is also destitute of any sure foundation, in view of the universal habit of migratory tribes and new colonists to give old and familiar names to new rivers, mountains, and countries which they discover and occupy. There is nothing in that appears sufficient to solve the problem]. In that place Enoch and Elijah live in joyous comfort,

This Enoch is not the son of Cain who founded "Enochis," the first city mentioned in the Bible, but is the son of Jared, and father of Methuselah (Genesis 5:18, 21-24). He is called the "seventh son of Adam" to distinguish him from the son of Cain, third from Adam. Enoch, son of Jared, was in close communion with the Lord, for we are told that he "walked with God after he begat Methuselah three hundred years." (Genesis 5:22). According to Hebrews 11:5, "By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and was not found, because God had translated him; for before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God," – meaning that he should not see death before the judgment of the flood. Concerning his departure from the world we are told that "he was not, for God took him" (Genesis 5:24)—an expression which imports a mere change of residence, without suffering the ordinary dissolution of the body.

Elijah was translated in the same manner. Their mutual status seems to have impressed itself upon the mind of the chronicler, and is again referred to in connection with Paradise (Folio VIII, recto). The translation of Elijah is described in 2 Kings 2:1-11:

And it came to pass as they (Elijah and his disciple Elisha) still went, and talked, that behold, there appeared a chariot of fire and horses of fire, and parted them both asunder; and Elijah went up in a whirlwind into heaven.

And so, at different times, Enoch and Elijah were clothed with immortality by the immediate power of God without the necessity of shaking off their mortal status.

who in the end will die at the hands of the Antichrist. This place is far removed from our own habitation. It is in all respects habitable, has a healthy atmosphere, and is fertile and blissful. From its center flows a spring which waters the whole garden. This spring divides into four rivers, as the interpreters of the Book of Genesis inform us. ["And a river went out of Eden to water the garden; and from thence it was parted, and it became into four heads" (Genesis 2:10). This implies that the river had its source in the garden, and from that place as a center, it parted to become the fountain heads of four different streams. Some suppose the river flowed through the garden as one stream, and after leaving it became divided into four heads or beginnings of rivers].

THE GANGES OR PISON

The first is the Pison, or Ganges, a very large and renowned river of India, and which traverses that entire country. Its course is toward the east, and it is augmented by nineteen large tributaries. Although it finally flows into the ocean by a number of outlets and at a number of places, its narrowest width is 8000 paces, its greatest width 100,000 paces, and its depth nowhere less than 20 paces. It is said that against this river Cyrus, the Persian king, presently forgetting his other undertakings, waged an unprecedented war. For when he selected from among his royal horses the most splendid, best conditioned, and trustworthy steed, to swim through this river, but saw both horse and rider engulfed by a whirlpool and drowned, he became enraged (so it is said); and he determined to make this river, which had swallowed up his horse and its faithful rider, so small and shallow that its waters should hardly reach the knees of women wading in it. And his words were not without action; for he concerned himself with this work for an entire year. Without hindrance he divided the river into 460 streams; and it is said that, like the Nile, the river became enlarged at certain times of the year, fertilizing the fields lying about it. ["The name of the first river is Pison: that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havileh, where there is gold. And the gold of that land is good; there is bdellium and the onyx stone" (Genesis 2:11-12). The chronicler assumes that the Pison (which he calls the "Ganges or Phison") is the Ganges River. The name Pison occurs nowhere else in the Scriptures, and what the basis of the author's assumption may be hard to say. Some claim that Pison refers to the Persian and Arabian Gulfs. The name Havilah, mentioned in the Bible text from which the Chronicle narrative is abridged, occurs in Genesis 10:7, as the name of a son of Ham, and in verse 29 as that of a son of Shem. Nothing would have been more natural than for the sons of Noah to transfer antediluvian names to their children. In Genesis 25:10, and 15:7, the name appears as that of a country southeast of Palestine – probably because settled by the descendants of a patriarch of this name. Bdellium is a transparent wax-like resin now found on the trunks of trees in India. Some render onyx stone as beryl; others sardonix; some as describing any precious stone].

GIHON OR NILE

The Gihon, or Nile, is the second river. It is considered the largest river in the world. By some it is called the Nile, and they say that this is the same river that the teachers of the Holy Scriptures call Gihon, and which flows out of Paradise. ["And the name of the second river is Gihon: the same is it that encompasses the whole land of Ethiopia" (Genesis 2:13). The name Gihon occurs again in the Scriptures only as denoting a fountain near Jerusalem (1 Kings 1:33, 38, 45; 2 Chronicles 32:30), and its identity with the Nile has found some favor of late. But how could the Nile have flowed out of Eden into Asia?] The inhabitants of the country call it the Nile after the earth or silt that the river carries with it, thus fertilizing the fields of Egypt. This Nile comes out of a black river, which the people there call the Father of Waters. It has a swift current, separates all Africa from Ethiopia, and forms many islands, of which the most noted is the island of Meroe. [Meroe, the island, so called, though not entirely insulated, is formed by the Astapus (Blue Nile) and Astaborus, now Athars, and the portion of the Nile valley between their mouths was a district of Ethiopia. Located in a fertile country, rich in timber and minerals, and at the junction of two great rivers, its capital city, also called Meroe, early became a chief emporium between Egypt, North Africa, Ethiopia, Asia, and India, and the seat of government of a powerful state. The government was a hierarchical monarchy, entirely in the hands of priests, who chose a king from among themselves, bound him to govern according to their laws and put him to death at will. At about 300 BCE one of its kings threw off this yoke of the priests, whom he massacred, making his monarchy absolute. See also Strabo's , XVII, 17, 2]. The river is uneven in part and navigable in part, and discharges into a wide area of the sea. After much buffeting on its course, it is confined between the crags of the mountains, and flows on to Ethiopia, the land of the Moors, and into a region called Cattaduppa. It rushes along between the cliffs with such boisterousness and violence, that the great roar of its turbulent waters affects the hearing of the natives almost to the point of deafness. Further on the noise ceases, and the river again becomes quiet and navigable. At the city of Cercasorus, [Probably Cercesura, in Lybia; mentioned by Strabo XVII, I, 30]. the Nile divides into three great branches, one of which veers off toward Delta and Melia, and is again divided. And thus all Egypt is moistened by the annual floodwaters of the entire and much-sundered Nile, and of other rivers. Finally the Nile flows into the Egyptian Sea. The ancients write that the Nile is a great feeder of vegetation and the source of many large aquatic animals, such as the hippopotamus, and of much cane, reed grasses, etc. Annually it provides the fields with additions of fertile soil. Fertilization usually increases when the sun is in the latter part of Leo (the Lion), and continues until it reaches midway into Virgo (the Virgin). Thereafter it decreases as the sun approaches the end of Virgo, or the beginning of the Scales (Libra). Then the Nile recedes to its former banks.

According to Strabo (Geography, XVII, 1, 4.) the water stays more than forty days in summer and then goes down gradually just as it rose; and in sixty days the plain is completely bared and begins the dry out; and the sooner the drying takes place, the sooner the plowing and the sowing; and the drying takes place sooner in those parts where the heat is greater.

Strabo, quoting Aristobulus, says that the Nile is more productive than other rivers, and produces huge creatures, among others the amphibious kind; and that the Aegyptian women sometimes actually bear four children. Aristotle reports that one woman actually bore seven; and he, too, calls the Nile highly productive and nourishing because of the moderate heat of the sun's rays, which, he says, have the nourishing elements and evaporate nearly the superfluous.

Geography Book, XV, Ch. 1, Par. 22

And they say that the waters of this river have such power and effect that they make women fertile.

TIGRIS

The third river, the Tigris, is the swiftest river in Greater Armenia, and is known throughout the world. And (as our people say) it is one of the four rivers that flow out of Paradise. When it reaches the country of the Medes it becomes swift and is called the Tigris, a name given it on account of its swiftness, that word signifying "arrow" in the Median language. But soon the river finds its way into Lake Prethusa, into which it flows with great rapidity, discharging its waters in many colors. After this it rushes to Mount Taurus, disappears in an enormous cavern, from which it emerges through a hidden passage, drawing after it great quantities of seaweed and scum. These it carries to the sea of Zorande, and again becomes a river. Then it disappears again for 25,000 paces, reappearing in the vicinity of Sophone, near Nymphaeum. It then approaches the river Arsanias, in the district of Arrene; but as each river has its own source, each retains its identity. At the Gordyaeon mountains, the river divides itself into two channels, one of which flows on to Seleucia and Mesene, the other flowing in a northerly direction to the plains of Cauchae; and when they run together again, they are still called the Tigris.

Folio VIII recto

Finally the river empties into the Persian Sea, or, as some say, into the Red Sea.

According to Genesis 2:14 "the third river is Hiddekel: That is it which goes toward the east of Assyria." Schedel assumes this to be the Tigris. Yet it is almost universally agreed that the Tigris and the Euphrates (the latter of which is specifically named in the Scriptures) are two of the four rivers flowing out of Paradise. Undoubtedly the chronicler used the following passage from Pliny's Natural History (chap. 31) as a source for his description of the Tigris:

This river rises in the region of Greater Armenia, from a very remarkable source situated on a plain. The name of the spot is Elegosine, and the stream, as soon as it begins to flow, though with a slow current, has the name of Diglito. When its course becomes more rapid, it assumes the name of Tigris, given to it one account of its swiftness, that word signifying an arrow in the Median language. It then flows into Lake Arethusa, the waters of which are able to support all weighty substances thrown into them, and exhale nitrous vapors. This lake produces only one kind of fish, which, however, never enter the current of the river in its passage through the lake; and in a similar manner, the fish of the Tigris will never swim out of its stream into the waters of the lake. Distinguishable from the lake, both by the rapidity and the color of its waters, the tide of the river is hurried along; and after it has passed through and arrived at Mount Taurus, it disappears in a cavern of that mountain, and passing under it, bursts forth on the other side; the spot bears the name of Zorande. That the waters on either side of the mountain are the same, is evident from the fact that bodies thrown in on the one side will reappear on the other. It then passes through another lake, called Thospites, and once more burying itself in the earth, reappears, after running a distance of twenty-two miles, in the vicinity of Nymphaeum. Claudius Caesar informs us that in the district of Arreme it flows so near to the river Arsania, that when their waters swell they meet and flow together, but without, however, intermingling. For those of the Arsani, as he says, being lighter, float on the surface of the Tigris for a distance of nearly four miles, after which they separate, and the Arsania flows into the Euphrates . . . After traversing the mountains of the Gordyaei, it passes round Apamea, a town of Mesene, one hundred and twenty-five miles on this side of Babylonian Seleucia, and then divides into the channels, one of which runs southward, and flowing through Mesene, runs towards Seleucia, while the other takes a turn to the north and passes through the plains of the Cauchae, at the back of the district of Mesene. When the waters have reunited, the river assumes the name of Pasitigris. After this it receives the Choaspes, which comes from Media; and then, flowing between Seleucia and Ctesiphon, discharges itself into the Chaldaean Lakes, which it supplies for a distance of seventy miles. Escaping from them by a vast channel, etc, it empties itself into the Persian Sea, being ten miles in width at the mouth.

EUPHRATES

And the fourth river is the Euphrates, [Genesis 2:14] called the fruit-bearer. It is in great renown among the rivers. Some say that its source was in Paradise; others, that it arises in Mount Paracoathras, in Greater Armenia, not far from the source of the Tigris. And as it receives the waters of its confluent, and gains in volume, it becomes more powerful in its course toward the Taurus mountains. Encountering no resistance there, it continues on its course, developing rapids and becoming stronger; and it leaves Comagene on the right, and Arabia on the left. According to some, it divides into two channels, one of which flows into the Tigris, while the other runs on into Media, Gordyaea, and Mesopotamia, and parts of Babylonia. Although the river was originally large and navigable, it later divides into broad marshes and brooks, to such an extent that its source cannot be identified. Some say it flows into the Red Sea. It is also said that its waters are life-giving; wherefore the ancients call it an augments of years.

Homer says that the whole earth is enclosed by a great sea; wherefore it is also called an island. Wherever the land ends one finds water. The sea flows from the west, passing Europe on the left and Africa on the right. Proceeding through the two sundered mountains, called the Pillars of Hercules, [Pillars of Hercules was the name given in ancient times to the mountains of Calpe (now Rock of Gibraltar) and Abyla (now Jebel Zatout), one on the European and the other on the African side of the straits which connect the Atlantic Ocean and the Mediterranean Sea. The name Gibraltar, also applied to the straits in modern times, is derived from Jeb-el-Taric (or Gebel-Tarik), meaning "Mount of Taric." Taric was the name of the one-eyed Berber or Moorish conqueror who landed there on April 30th, 711 CE. To commemorate his victory he called the giant rock by his own name, which has been retained in the modern Gibraltar. These two great promontories the ancients called the Pillars of Hercules from the fable that they were originally one mountain, which was torn asunder by Hercules]. it flows between Mauretania, the land of the Moors, and Spain, and spreads out as a sea in an easterly direction. And so there are two seas, one that encompasses the earth, the other that flows through it. These two seas bear various names, depending on the countries, islands, regions, cities and communities which they pass or touch. There was once a doubt whether the earth could be circumnavigated. For instance, Strabo contends that neither the southern seas (because of the unbearable heat), nor the northern seas (because of the cold), can be navigated; but Julius Solinus, the historian, states that the entire sea, surrounding the earth from India to Spain, back of Africa, is navigable. Moreover, Pliny of Verona cites several different instances of navigation in these regions. He states that a number of merchants, mentioned in his books and writings, with cargoes of merchandise, were seen, destined from Spain to Ethiopia, the land of the Moors. Concerning the northern sea there has been great controversy, although it is known that under the auspices of the emperor Augustus this sea, which in large part adjoins Germany, was navigated as far as the Cixubri. So also, in the reigns of Seleucus and Antiochus, the Caspian shores were explored by the Macedonian army, and in a short time the entire northern regions were navigated. To this Pliny testifies on the authority of Cornelius, according to information given by the king of the Suevi to a Roman proconsul of Gaul. He speaks of certain merchants of India, who for purposes of trade, sailed from India and were driven to the coast of Germany by tempestuous seas. Otto, the historian, states that during the reigns of the German emperors, merchants sailing from India were captured, having been driven from the Orient to the German coast by violent storms. But, as some maintain, this simply could not have happened because the northern sea was frozen and unnavigable. []

This region, called Damascenus, is a realm of bliss, higher than the earth, tempered with the purest air, and everywhere dressed with flowering plants in good keeping. As Isidore says, it is planted with every species of fruit bearing trees. It is not hot, but has a constant temperate climate. Out of the center runs a spring that waters the woodlands throughout. As the master of history states in his beginning of the world, Paradise faces the east, and is located so high that the waters of the flood did not reach it.

Strabo [Strabo, Greek geographer and historian, was born c. 63 BCE, at Amasia in Pontus, a city which has been much Hellenized. He studied under noted masters, visiting Rome early in life. Although he had seen comparatively small portions of the regions he describes, he traveled much. His is the most important work on that science left us by antiquity. It consists of seventeen books, dealing with the various countries in Europe, Asia and Africa. He chiefly employed Greek authorities, the Alexandrian geographers Polybius, Poseidonius and Theophanes of Mytilene, the companion of Pompey. He probably amassed his material in the library of Alexandria, and made comparatively little use of Roman authorities]. and Bede [Bede (672 or 673-735), English historian and theologian, commonly called "the Venerable Bede," earned for himself the title Father of English History, by his]. say that it extends into the orbit of the moon; but others maintain that it does not. It is a most wholesome place, longer and broader than the earth and sea, and if man had not sinned, God would have enlarged it to accommodate all persons. The trees of Paradise never lose their foliage, and Enoch and Elijah will tarry there unmolested until the Day named by the master historian. As Bede says, the place is so high that no one can reach it; it extends into the upper region of the air. The waters precipitated from it make such a roar that the people who live in the vicinity lose their hearing. According to Basil and Ambrose these waters flow out of a spring in Paradise, giving birth to four rivers, namely, the Pison or Ganges; the Gihon or Nile; the Tigris, and the Euphrates.

Paradise is a well ordered place, and is located in the East, directly below the Scales and the Ram, and therefore the sun passes through the middle of Paradise twice a year. The air is most subtle and quiet, and the nights are always the same. Elijah and Enoch can see both poles. The trees bear twice a year, for each year has two summers and winters. Our longest day and shortest night is the depth of their winter, while our equal days and nights are their midsummer. Marcianus [Marcianus, Greek geographer, was born about 400 CE. Two of his works have been preserved in more or less mutilated condition: , intended as a complete description of the coasts of the eastern and western oceans; and (Mediterranean), a meager epitome of a similar work by Menippus of Perganum]. says that India has two summers and winters. So it appears that this place is the highest point of the earth, the most celestial, most temperate, most regulated, most blissful, and most fertile; and no doubt it also has a garden of all pleasure; for here are verdure, pleasing flowers, herbs agreeable to the taste, fresh spring waters, shade trees, fruit in abundance, and the songs of birds.

For the adornment of Paradise God also planted three kinds of trees, as Isidore and Augustine state, namely, the first, to sustain life, and of which God commanded and said, Of every tree of the garden you may freely eat; the second, planted by God to insure obedience—the tree of knowledge of good and evil, of which God forbade them to eat. [] But our first parents did not keep this commandment, and therefore, after partaking of its fruit, their eyes were opened and their mutual desires were aroused—something to which their eyes had been closed, as Augustine states. And now, as they became conscious of the temptations of the flesh, and of the desires working within them, and realized that they had deprived themselves of grace, they made garments of fig leaves to cover and protect themselves. However, it is not to be understood that the sin of Adam and Eve consisted in the fruit of the tree, nor in its enjoyment, as Augustine states, but in the unlawful desires which contravened the divine mandate. For it is one thing when something is forbidden as sinful, and another when it is sinful because it is prohibited. [This is an elementary legal distinction between acts inherently wrong (mala in se), and acts which are wrong merely because they are forbidden (mala prohibita). Murder is an example of the former, while poaching in violation of game laws, or smuggling, in violation of the revenue laws, are examples of the latter. The first class includes such offenses as we are in conscience bound to abstain from, apart from their being prohibited by statute]. And this was the case here. The tree of knowledge of good and evil was so called because of what ensued upon its enjoyment; for soon after partaking of its fruits they discovered the evils of weakness and illness, and the opposition of the flesh to reason. And they came to recognize the benefits of good health, strength and obedience, just as the doctor recognizes the plague not only by attendance upon the sick, but by suffering from it himself. What he knows of his art, he afterward learns by experience; for he who does not taste the bitter, soon tires of the sweet. The third is the tree of life. It is the noblest, first, because of its strength; for he who ate thereof became immortal and free from all illness and infirmity; not, however, through natural strength, but rather by grace, for a virtuous soul obedient to God is absolutely essential to immortality, as Thomas states. As often as a person became ill, he could have restored himself to health by partaking of the fruit of this tree, and this he could have continued to do until the time of the outer world had been fulfilled, when all persons would have been taken into heaven together. And it is the noblest, secondly, because of its location; for it stands in the middle of Paradise as the most precious and worthy, like the heart of a creature that lies in the middle of its body giving life to the whole, like the Cross of Christ which gives life to the entire world and draws all things unto itself. Thirdly, because of its holy significance. As Augustine says, the tree of knowledge of good and evil represents freedom of will, while the tree of life personifies Christ.

After man's fall the approach to this region was girded about by a fiery wall reaching to the heavens. A cherubim, which is a guardian angel, was stationed on the walls to ward off the evil spirits. The flames bar out mankind, and good angels drive away bad angels; and thus neither flesh nor spirit can gain admittance.

Two distinct elements of the immortality of man are involved in the status of innocence: (1) The internal sustaining strength of the soul which was received from God; (2) the external, which consisted in partaking of the fruit of the tree. This fruit also gave mankind long life, even after his fall, as Augustine states. But this partaking of the fruit of the same tree was prohibited to man after his fall; and for that reason, according to the third chapter of the Book of Creation, the angels are spoken to in the passage where it is said that should Adam eat of the fruit of the tree of life, he would live on forever, which is a very long time. And with this Saint Thomas is in accord.

Adam, the pious man, was illustrious all the days of his long life for his spirit of prophecy and his great works of penance. He enjoined his children to righteousness and to refrain from social intercourse and intermarriage with Cain and his children. Although our first father caused us to be excluded from Paradise by a single sinful act, he set us a good example by his piety and contrition in order that we might be restored to the bliss of the heavenly kingdom. But he who does not follow that example has no just cause for complaint. According to Comestor, [Peter Comestor (the surname 'Comestor' means 'devourer' and was given to Peter in his lifetime because he was a great bookworm) was the author of , written in the twelfth century. It was widely read during the Middle Ages and remained popular into the 15th century. Peter's text utilizes the Bible's texts from Genesis to the Acts of the Apostles, combined with numerous secular authors from the classical and medieval worlds, in his creation of a sacred history]. Adam had thirty sons and as many daughters beside Cain and Abel. Adam was Cain's father and father-in-law, for he took (to wife) Calmana, his sister. Augustine states that Adam died at the age of 930 years, after thirty sons had been born to him, and was buried at the place called Calvary, near Jerusalem. There he rested for some time until his body was taken to Hebron, the soil from whence he came. Anastasius and the Hebrews are also of this opinion. It was proper that Christ should there submit his body to death where the head of the human race was destroyed, and that our mortality should begin where destruction was sown; and so the medicine suited the disease.

Augustine says that God founded the human race on a single individual in order to indicate that he desired unity among many. This observation is very useful to the chosen ones who are to be associated with the holy angels in eternal peace. But mankind has so declined through his cruelty and sin that irrational animals, by comparison, live with one another in greater security and peace. Lions and dragons have never waged among themselves the wars that mankind has. God loves the bond of unity.

Adam and Eve, our first parents, lived 930 years; and they bore Cain, Abel and Seth, and their sisters; and if we recall the Scriptures, thirty other sons were born to them. When Adam finally became burdened with illness, he commanded his son Seth and the rest not to permit their children to intermarry with the children of Cain. And, as they say, Adam sent to Paradise to procure the oil of mercy. Finally Adam passed away. He was buried at Hebron, although others say at the place called Calvary.

ILLUSTRATION (8-7/8" x 10-1/16")

ADAM AND EVE AFTER THE EXPULSION

A rather desolate scene opens before us—a rock-bound valley, through which a rivulet timidly flows. A few sparsely foliated trees raise their heads in the distance. Adam and Eve occupy the foreground, meekly submitting to the divine judgment. Adam, clad in a coat of skin, is wearily and rather ineffectually wringing his daily bread from the cursed ground with a branch of a tree. Beside him on the ground sits Eve, nursing Cain and Abel, born to her in pain and sorrow. Although barefooted, like her husband, and also wearing a coat of skin, though the artist has added a flowing garment of many folds to her wardrobe.

Abel, second son of Adam, and his sister Deborah, were born to Adam in his thirtieth year. Abel was the first martyr; and he founded the church, for he remained in grace and righteousness. Had the church begun with Adam, it would not have endured. But the Holy Gospels make mention of this righteous and pious man (Abel), who from youth learned to love righteousness and to fear God. His calling was pastoral, and of all things he sacrificed the firstlings to God. For that reason God respected his offering and found it acceptable. But Cain, who was present, lowered his countenance in shame, and suffered the sting of envy. And Cain slew his brother Abel. Abel was the first to build the heavenly city, in which he set himself as its first citizen. Over one hundred years after Abel's death, Adam begat another son, Seth.

Seth, third son of Adam, was born in the beginning of Adam's one hundred-thirtieth year, that is, at the end of the one hundred-thirty-first year of the world; and Seth lived 912 years. [] Seth was born in the two hundred-thirtieth year of Adam; but Moses omitted 100 years during which Adam mourned Abel at Hebron, and in which he went to Paradise to secure the oil of mercy. In Cain and Abel two cities had their origin, as St. Augustine says. Two loves created two cities—the first, an earthly one which scorns God—the city of self-love; the second, that of the love of God, a celestial one that disdains self. The first idolizes self; the second deifies God. The first craves honor from individuals; the second, for its greater glory, addresses itself to God, the soul witness of conscience. Cain, the first born, belongs in the first of these—and he built it. Abel, the second son, belongs to the second city, and there he wandered as a pilgrim, for by divine grace he was a respected citizen.

Cain, first son of Adam and Eve, and his sister Calmana, were born in the fifteenth year of Adam in the fields of Damascenus. He was the first tiller of the soil, very covetous, a stranger to salvation, and a very impatient man. He was angry because his gift had been rejected by God, while his brother's offering had been accepted. Moved by envy, he led his brother into a field and slew him. [] Therefore God condemned him to wander about as a fugitive for the rest of his days. And while Cain, now burdened with years, was sitting in the brushwood, he was slain with an arrow by his great grandchild Lamech, who, blind with age, had been guided in the chase by a child, and had mistaken Cain for a wild animal. [. This must be the incident to which the chronicler refers, although Genesis does not substantiate the details as set forth by the author].

I have also here included many things, transactions and narratives of various kings and peoples; also the accomplishments of great cities, as well as eminent persons of whom the teachers of the stars have availed themselves, from Adam to Alphonse.

Enos, the son of Seth, was born in Seth's 105th year, being the 425th year of the world; and he lived 905 years. This Enos was the first to call upon the name of the Lord, possibly through a few words of prayer which came to him. [Genesis 5:6-11].

Cainan, the son of Enos, was born in the 90th year of his father, and, according to the seventy interpreters, in the 625th year of the world; and he lived 910 years. [Genesis 5:9-14].

In the line of the righteous there are three who are endowed with heavenly gifts, namely: Enos, who called upon the name of God; Enoch, who walked with God and was received in Paradise; and Noah, who was full and complete in his generations and preserved the human race against the Flood. In the line of the sinners there are also three, gifted with mundane accomplishments: Jabel, the father of herdsmen and of those who dwell in tents; Jubal, the father of those who sing and play on the harp and the organ; Tubal Cain, a master of the hammer in all metal work.

Folio X recto

Enoch's exact place in the line of Cain is not certain. Cain built a city for him and gave it the name Enochia; and he lived to see it filled with his seed. Josephus says that Cain accumulated his possessions by robbery and violence and incited his sons to highway banditry. Fearing those whom he injured, he gathered his sons about him in the city. And although the Scriptures say there were only four men at this time, yet, as St. Augustine says, it is not unbelievable that Cain built a city; for the Scriptures did not count all those who lived at that time, considering it sufficient to remember those responsible for the things done. [Genesis 4:16-17].

Methusalem (Methuselah), the son of Enoch, and born to him in his 167th year, bore Lamech, a son, and lived 792 years thereafter. And so they say Methuselah lived longer than all the other persons mentioned in the Scriptures. [Genesis 5:21-27].

Mahalaleel at the age of 165 years bore a son named Jared; and he lived 730 years thereafter. [Genesis 5:15-16].

Lamech was the first to introduce dual marriage, contrary to what Adam had said in the spirit of prophecy, namely, that the two should become one flesh. He is the same who with an arrow killed Cain in the brushwood, and with his bow afterwards slew the youth who guided him. And for this murder of Cain, Lamech was punished seventy-fold, for seventy-seven souls which came out of him perished in the Flood. []

Jabal, born to Lamech by his wife Adah, began to make tents and staffs for shepherds, and to change pastures, with nothing to think upon except sexual intercourse and gratification of the belly. He also managed the herds, distinguished them by marks, separated the sheep from the goats, and those of a uniform color from the speckled ones, and the yearlings from the older; and he knew how to mate them in season.

CONCUPISCENCE OF THE EARS

["Concupiscence" appears as part of this and succeeding headings only in the Latin Edition. The term is used by Aquinas and the other scholastic philosophers to define that desire of the senses which seeks only for its own gratification as distinguished from unselfish love, and was held by them to be the cause of the original sin. To us the word simply means an inordinate impulse or desire, prompted by the senses].

Jubal, Lamech's son, born to him by Adah, is the father of those who sing and play the harp and the organ. He is said to have discovered the art of music, though not the instruments themselves; for these were not invented until long afterward. However, he did discover the consonance of voices, to the pleasure of the shepherds, which calling his brother Jubal preferred. Later others discovered the pure consonance of sweet tones and of various instruments. It is said that Moses discovered sweet melodies in the noises made by the waters. However, others say that melody was first discovered in Arcadia through the use of long and short reeds. But Laertius says that it was discovered in the time of Pythagoras the Wise.

One reads that all earthly liberal crafts or natural arts that serve polite society were invented by the children of Lamech; and thus it seems that in the beginning the Hebrew children were more subtle than the rest. They also concerned themselves with the dangers of fire and flood and the means of preventing loss thereby. Tubal-Cain put his own art into clay-tiles and into marble columns. These tiles are still to be found in Syria; and while they have been damaged by the rains, the marble columns have remained and the inscriptions thereon can still be seen.

CONCUPISCENCE OF THE EYES

Tubal-Cain, Lamech's second son by his wife Zillah, worked in implements of war. He discovered the art of smithworks, and the engraving of metals to intrigue the eye (taking the foliage of nature as a model), just as his brother had invented music to please the ear. [Tubal-Cain, one of the gifted sons of Lamech, may be compared with Vulcan of Roman mythology. The Jewish legend of later times associates him with his father's song. "Lamech was blind," says the story,].

CONCUPISCENCE OF THE FLESH

Naamah, the daughter of Lamech by his wife Zillah, and sister of Tubal-Cain, discovered the art of weaving, making yarn of wool and linen, and making it into cloth, a fabric softer and smoother than the skins they formerly wore. [Naamah (Genesis 4:22), sister of Tubal-Cain, is one of the four women whose names are preserved in records of the world before the Flood; all except Eve being Cainites. No reason is given why these women should be singled out in the genealogies; and in the absence of this most of the commentators have sought a clue in the significance of the names interpreted as Hebrew terms. The name Naamah means "the lovely," or "the beautiful," apparently introduced to show the worldly spirit and tastes of the Cainites. According to the of Jonathan, she was the mistress of sounds and songs – a poetess].

Folio X verso

Mahalaleel, the son of Cainan, and whose name means the "planting of God," is in the Christian lineage. He was born in the seventy-fifth year of his father and in the seven hundred ninety-fifth year of the world; and he died at the age of 895 years. Augustine states that before the Flood many persons reached the age of 900 years, but none that of 1000. This longevity was the miraculous work of God, having for his purpose the multiplication of the human race and to allow ample time for the development of the arts. This was natural too, for people then possessed better constitutions and greater strength. Some had larger bones than we now have; and, as Pliny states, the greater the duration of the world, the smaller the creatures which nature brings forth. As the Scriptures state, the size of the giants is not incredible. Pliny states that he saw a wisdom tooth which would make a thousand of our own. Augustine adds that those who say that in these long lives ten years are to be taken as one, and ninety as nine, are not to be believed. According to Pliny there are people in our own day who live two hundred years.

Jared, son of Mahalaleel (Malaleel), and whose name signifies descent, or strength-giver, or one who induces sleep, was according to the Book of Creation, born in the 65th year of his father, and in the 460th year of the world (according to the Hebrew), but in the 976th year according to the seventy interpreters. And he lived 962 years. Augustine says many were born to Seth and Cain whom the Scriptures hurriedly passed over as they approached Noah, where both generations, and the realm of God and of the Devil are distinguished, and where Abraham received the solemn pledge that Christ, who is the beginning and the end, would be born. The Scriptures do not mention all who were born first; for although they say Cain knew his wife and Enoch was born, it is not to be concluded that Enoch was Cain's first born. And so with the others. In these times the children of Seth, who were very pious men and persevered in the commandments of their fathers in the simplicity of their hearts, suffered much at the hands of the evil children of Cain, who had succumbed to all the desires of the flesh.

Enoch, son of Jared, according to the Book of Creation, was born in the 162nd year of his father, and according to the Hebrews in the 622nd year of the world; but according to the seventy interpreters, in the 1122nd year thereof. He lived 365 years. Enoch, seventh from Adam, pleased God, and was drawn up into Paradise. He is called the Seventh Rest to which all will be drawn who are created in the 6th day of the Sixth Age of the World. His body and soul at rest, Enoch lives in Paradise with Elijah, and will do so until the time of the Antichrist, when they will come forth to defend the Faith, finally receiving the crown of martyrdom. The apostle Jude in his Epistle states that Enoch wrote certain things in the time of the accepted Faith that had been rejected by the fathers.

Methuselah (Methusalem), son of Enoch, was born in the 65th year of his father, and according to the seventy interpreters is the 1187th year of the world. He lived 968 years, and was the oldest among those mentioned in the Scriptures. He benefited from his years in various ways. According to the seventy, he lived fourteen years after the Flood; but one does not read that he was in Noah's ark. Jerome says he died in the year of the Flood, and was buried seven days before. Some say he was taken into Paradise with his father Enoch, and so escaped the Flood. Augustine, Rabanus, and Isidore say that it is doubtful that he lived fourteen years after the Flood, for only eight souls were saved.

Lamech, the son of Methusalem, according to the Book of Creation, was born in the 187th year of his father, and according to the seventy interpreters in the 1453rd year of the world. He lived 777 years. Then he was 172 years of age Noah was born to him, and he said, This Noah will comfort us in our labors upon the earth which the Lord has cursed. And in addition to Noah, Lamech bore other sons and daughters; and when he reached the age of 777 years he delivered his principality to Noah and died. At this time there were giants or heroes upon the earth, who were renowned and of unbelievable power and also knew how to battle.

THE LINEAGE OF CHRIST

First Section

The woodcuts as well as the text of the Chronicle faithfully follow the genealogies of the Scriptures. Here, beginning at Folio IX verso and extending to and including Folio X verso, is the first of these, comprehending the generations of Adam as set forth in the fifth chapter of Genesis. It is a sort of family album in which every member has his place. An intricate foliated design connects the generations. At the head of the family tree, firmly grasping its trunk, is Adam. >From this main stem three branches proceed: The first of these indicates the line of Cain and consists of a long series of foliated portraits: Here are Cain and his sister-wife Calmana, and Cain is also depicted in the act of slaying Abel, thus eliminating collateral issue in that direction. This line is continued and completed at Folio X recto, and here we find Cain's son Enoch (and his wife), and Enoch's descendants, Irad (Yrath), Mehujael (Malaleel), Methusael (Methusalem); Lamech, with his two wives Adah (Ada) and Zillah (Sella); Jabal (Jabel) and Jubal (Tubal), Lamech's children by the first wife, and Tubal Cain and Naamah (Noema), his offspring by the second. Some of these portraits have accessory symbols indicating the callings of the subjects of incidents in their lives. As in the central panel of a triptych, the blind Lamech is posed between his two wives. He holds the bow and is pointing the fatal arrow which killed Cain in the brushwood. Strangely enough, the upper part of the bow is about his neck, possibly the artist's naïve way of indicating how carelessly a blind man might handle an implement of the chase (Folio X recto).

At the lower left of the foliated page is Jabal, the father of those who dwell in tents and of such as have cattle. He carries a substantial crook or club in token of his calling. Beside him is his brother Jubal who plays on a portable medieval organ with one hand while he works the bellows with the other; for he is the father of such as made music on the organ and the harp.

At the lower right is Tubal Cain, "the instructor of every artificer in brass and iron." He holds the tongs in his left hand and is wielding a hammer with his right. And what a grim old smith he must have been! Beside him in this dual portrait is his sister Noema (Naamah), working a shuttle in token of her calling as the first spinner and weaver mentioned in the Bible.

We return to the previous page (Folio IX, verso). The brief span of Abel is indicated by a single foliated portrait in the third column. Abel is kneeling in prayer, the sacrificial lamb on the altar beside him. Behind him, also in an attitude of prayer, stands his sister Delbora ("Dalborasorus").

The favored line of Seth proceeds directly down the center column of Folio IX verso and is completed on the verso of Folio X. Here is Seth and his wife Delbora, followed by their descendants Enos, Cainan (Caynan), Mahalaleel (Malaleel), Jared (Jareth), Enoch, Methuselah (Methusalem) and Lamech, who was the father of Noah, with whom the Second Age of the World begins.

There are strong resemblances and contrasts between the lines of Cain and of Seth. Enoch and Lamech occur in both. Note the resemblance between Cain and Cainan, Irad and Jared, Mathuselah and Methusael and Mahalaleel. Yet there is a marked difference in their significance:

CAINITIC LINE (Gen. IV)

1. Adam (man of the earth)
2. Cain (begotten)
3. Enoch (initiating or initiated)
4. Irad (city dweller)
5. Mehujael (smitten of God)
6. Methusael (man of God)
7. Lamech (the strong)
 - o Adah (ornament)
 - o Zillah (song)
 - o Naamah (loveliness)
8. Jabal (wanderer); Jubal (player); Tubal Cain (lance-forger).

SETHITIC LINE (Gen. V)

1. Adam (man of the earth)
2. Seth (appointed)
3.
 1. Enos (weak man)
4. Cainan (possession)
5. Mahalaleel (praise of God)
6. Jared (condescension)
7.
 1. Enoch (initiated)
8. Methuselah (man of the dart, or man of growth)
9. Lamech (the strong)
10. Noah (rest)

The following tabulation, paralleling the Hebrew and Samaritan texts and the Septuagint, is also helpful and interesting in following this first genealogy pictured in the Chronicle. The table is taken from Whedon's Commentary on the Old Testament (Ed. 1899), Vol. I, p. 112. It gives the chronology of the Sethitic line according to three versions of the Scriptures:

1. HEBREW TEXT, the Pentateuch of Moses, in its original form.

2. SAMARITAN TEXT, which in point of age furnishes the earliest external witness to the Hebrew text. This is really not a version but merely the text of the Pentateuch as preserved by the Samaritan community since the time of Nehemiah (circa 432 BCE).
3. SEPTUAGINT, the work of the seventy or more translators, or interpreters, who put the text into Greek for the benefit of the Greek-speaking Jews of Alexandria in the third century BCE. Strictly, the name applies to the Pentateuch alone, but as the translations were gradually extended to include the other books of the Old Testament, it now comprehends that entire work. The existence of the Septuagint as a whole may be assumed for the first century CE, at which period the Greek version was universally accepted by the Jews of the Dispersion as Scripture and from them passed on to the Christian Church.

It will be noted that the following table entirely ignores Cain, whose lineage perished in the Flood, as well as Abel, who was cut off without issue. Ignoring these futile lines, it assumes Adam's third child to have been his first-born. Schedel vouchsafes us the information that Cain was born of Adam and Eve when his parents were only fifteen years of age, and Abel fifteen years later.

The numbers in parentheses are the reading of the Codex Alexandrinus of the Septuagint.

In most instances the chronicler has followed the Hebrew text; in some, the Septuagint. Frequently he refers to both. The Samaritan text is ignored. His references are not in accord with the table in all cases.

The Second Age of the World

Folio XI recto

(a) Building of Noah's Ark 8-13/16" X 7-1/2"

The initial illustration of the Second Age of the World portrays the building of the Ark. On the seashore in the foreground are two carpenters, one a plain workman, the other in tight fitting medieval hose and jacket, a dagger in his belt, and shod in pointed shoes. They are squaring a large timber, of "gopher wood" no doubt, with formidable implements suited to the purpose. At the right appears Noah, a small wand in his hand, directing the work. In the background, but occupying most of the illustration, is the Ark in the course of construction. Several men are engaged upon it. Someone at the stern is drawing water from the sea. Behind this person is a bearded man with a rather doleful expression, who hands over the rail as if, in anticipation of a rough voyage, he already feels peculiar symptoms, although the ship is still firmly fixed in its improvised berth of logs.

The little vessel with its promenade deck and elaborate rails hardly seems adequate for the occasion. Except for its super-structure it resembles a miniature Spanish galleon, built for a pleasurable voyage. Amidship is the door, in which stands a woman gesturing to a man apparently boarding the vessel by way of a ladder (possibly one of Noah's sons and his wife). The door opens into the bilge or "stercoraria," into which dung and other refuse are deposited. On the deck above are the "apotheca herbarum" and "apotheca specierum" – storerooms for the lodgment of food and supplies for man and beast. Amidship on the upper deck is the "habitacio hominum," reserved for Noah and his family. On either side of this are reservations for wild and domestic animals. But the artist has made no provision for fowl, although we know that the Ark housed at least a dove and a raven. Above the uncompleted vessel the dove already returns with the olive branch, signifying that the flood has subsided and the dry land has appeared. And thus by artistic license we quickly span the 150 days of the Flood.

(b) The Rainbow

Below the foregoing is a small woodcut of the Rainbow which God placed in the sky in token of his covenant with Noah, as set forth in the accompanying text.

The notations within the circumference of the rainbow are successively the signs of the Zodiac. Zodiac in astronomy and astrology is the name given to a zone of the heavens within which lie the paths of the sun, moon, and principal planets. It is bounded by two circles equidistant from the ecliptic, about 18 degrees apart. It is divided into twelve signs, and marked by twelve constellations.

In the technical sense of the word the twelve "signs" are geometrical divisions 30 degrees in extent counting from the position of the sun at the vernal equinox. In the time of Hipparchus the signs corresponded fairly closely with the constellations; that is to say, the first sign (called Aries) corresponded with the constellation Aries. Owing to precession there is now a discrepancy amounting to the breadth of a whole sign, so that the sign Aries is occupied by the constellation Pisces.

Folio XI recto

The Second Age of the World begins with Noah after the Flood and continues to Abraham for a varying period of years as described in the beginning of this book. However, for a period of one hundred years before the Flood the Lord had already appeared to Noah.

OF NOAH'S ARK

Noah, the son of Lamech, and a lover of divine honor and of justice, and possessed of ingenuity and perfection, found favor with the Lord; for while men's minds were bent upon evil, he always sought to influence them to the pursuit of righteousness. And as the end of all flesh approached, the Lord commanded Noah to build an ark of gopher wood, pitched within and without with pitch, three hundred cubits [The cubit, being at first a natural measure, like hand or foot, denoted the distance from the elbow to the end of the middle finger, varying from 18 to 21.888 inches. It was generally reckoned at 21 inches, or 1.75 feet. This would make the ark 525 feet long, 87½ feet wide, and 52½ feet high]. (of which one makes six of the ordinary cubits, as Orosius, Augustine, and Hugo say) in length, fifty wide, and thirty high, that is, from the ground to the roof below the eaves, and to be completed in one cubit. And he was commanded to make small chambers in it, rooms in which to eat, a window, and a door below in the side of it. And after 120 years Noah carried into the finished ark all that was necessary to the comforts of life; and of every sort of animal, to preserve its species, he led in two, a male and a female. Thereafter, on the first day of the month of April, he and his sons, his wife and the wives of his sons went into the ark. And although the flood came, and the Lord destroyed all flesh, Noah and his people were saved. And the ark stood on the highest mountains of Armenia; and the place was called Ararat. When they came out of the ark they thanked God and made an altar and sacrificed to him. (And God said) "This is the token of the covenant I give between me and you, and to every creature." The rainbow has two principal colors; some say six or four. The watery one denotes the bygone flood; the fiery one, the future judgment of fire. With the first, one should no longer concern himself, but certainly wait for the other.

In this year of the Flood the first age (from Adam to the Flood) is finally concluded, and the second age begins, and it continues to the birth of Abraham.

Now as Noah and his sons, and his wife and the wives of his sons had gone out of the ark and very soon built an altar, they sacrificed to the Lord of every clean animal and fowl the whole. And the Lord smelled the sweet savor of their sacrifices. Therefore the Lord blessed them and said,

Folio XI verso

Grow and multiply. [Genesis 8:18-91]. And from that moment the earth returned to its former state. And Noah began to be a farmer and to cultivate the soil. And he released all the animals to pasture; and as he (so they say) released a goat on a mountain called Coricus, in Sicily, the goat ate of a grapevine; and he became drunk and began to buck the other animals with his horns. As Noah saw this he noted the strength of the wild grapevine; and he planted the same vine with lion's, swine's, lamb's and monkey blossoms. The vine having been planted in a good vineyard, bore perfect fruit; and Noah picked it, But as Noah drank of the wine and offered a libation, he made a great disturbance; and he became drunk. Like a lamb overcome by sleep, he lay indecently exposed. As Chaz (Ham) his son (the father of Canaan) saw his father's nakedness, he told his brothers about it and showed them their father to laugh at. As Sem (Shem) and Japheth heard this, they were moved by filial affection toward their father and placed a cloak upon their shoulders, and they went backward, and covered the nakedness of their father; and their eyes were backward, and they saw not the private parts of their father. And as Noah learned of this he wished his other sons salvation; and although he did not curse Ham, he did curse his seed. Now as Noah lived 350 years after the Flood (which years he enjoyed in happiness), and had now reached the age of 950 years, he died. [Genesis 9:20-29]. In addition to Shem, Ham, Japheth and Jonicus, other sons and daughters were born to Noah after the Flood, and through these sons other sons, and sons of sons, and he saw his generations greatly multiplied.

After the division of tongues, many races and varieties of miraculous people appeared in various places in accordance with the will of God. For just as the Almighty graced this beautiful world with men of uniform likeness, so he also introduced therein miraculous creatures, some of whom are formed as is stated in what follows. Item: Some have but one eye, and that in the middle of the forehead. Some are a cubit in height, and do not live more than eight years. They live in the mountains of India, near the great sea, in a wholesome and ever verdant region. They conduct an unusual warfare against the cranes. Their wives bear at the age of five years. [] Item: Others have very large feet and legs, but no paunches, and are marvelously fleet of foot. In the summertime, while lying on their backs, they protect themselves against the sun by the shade of their feet. [] Item: Some are without heads, their eyes being in their shoulders. [] Item: Some have the heads of dogs. ["On many of the mountains again, there is a tribe of men who have the heads of dogs, and clothe themselves with the skins of wild beasts. Instead of speaking, they bark; and furnished with claws, they live by hunting and catching birds. According to the story, as given by Ctesias, the number of these people is more than a hundred and twenty thousand." (Pliny, , VII, ch. 2). This account probably originated in a species of monkey, with a projecting muzzle, called, from this circumstance, cynocephalus, or the "Dog's head." This account is repeated by Aulus Gellius, Bk. IX c. 4. The cynocephalus is generally considered to be the baboon]. In addition there are many and various other races of miraculous creatures that will be mentioned later in the text. Histories also record forms of people out of the ordinary course of nature, most of whom live far from the sea, and whom many considered miraculous and beyond belief. Who, without having seen them, would believe that such men as Ethiopians exist? And what person is not surprised when he sees one for the first time? Many things are considered impossible before they are seen. Item: In Scythia, the country to the north, in a district called Geskleithron, are people such as are depicted on the following page, and who have but one eye, and that in the center of the forehead, and who are constantly at war with the Griffins.

"In the vicinity also of those who dwell in the northern regions, and not far from the spot from which the north wind arises, and the place which is called the cave, and is known by the name of Geskleithron, the Arimaspi are said to exist, whom I have previously mentioned, a nation remarkable for having but one eye, and that placed in the middle of the forehead. This race is said to carry on a perpetual warfare with the Griffins, a kind of monster, with wings, as they are commonly represented, for the gold which they dig out of the mines, and which these wild beasts retain and keep watch over with a singular degree of cupidity, while the Arimaspi are equally desirous to get possession of it." (Pliny, Natural History, VII, ch. 2). The figures of the Gryphons or Griffins are found not uncommonly on the friezes and walls at Pompeii. In the east, where there were no safe places of deposit for money, it was the custom to bury it in the earth; hence, for the purpose of scaring depredators, the story was circulated that hidden treasures were guarded by serpents and dragons. There can be little doubt that these stories, on arising in the western world, combined with the knowledge of the existence of gold in the Uralian chain and other mountains of the east, gave rise to the stories of the Griffins and the Arimaspi.

It has been conjectured that these fabulous tales of the combats of the Arimaspi with the Griffins were invented by the neighboring tribes who were anxious to throw a mystery over the origin of the gold, that they might preserve the traffic in their own hands. The Altai Mountains, in the north of Asia, contain many gold mines, which are still worked, as well as traces of former workings. The representation of an animal, somewhat similar to the Griffin, has been found among the sculptures of Persepolis, and is conceived to have had some allegorical allusion to the religion of the ancient inhabitants of the place. Aelian, Hist. Anim. B. iv. c.27, gives an account of the Griffin, and its contests with the Indians, for the gold, similar to that here given.

Item: In Scythia, in a valley of Mount Imaus (here called Timani) [The modern Himalaya range]. there is a vast country called Abarimon, the inhabitants of which are a savage race, whose feet are turned backwards; but they possess wonderful velocity, and wander about indiscriminately with the wild beasts. They cannot breathe in any other climate but their own, for which reason it is impossible to take them before any of the neighboring kings; nor could any of them be brought before Alexander the Great. [Pliny, , VII, c.2. Aulus Gellius also relates this, among other wonderful tales, in the chapter, "On the Miraculous Wonders of Barbarous Nations," IX c.4. He cites among his authorities, Aristeeas and Isigonus, whom he designates as "writers of no mean authority."] Item: In India, and the region of Ethiopia in particular, the largest animals are produced, resembling dogs, but much larger. Also there are trees so high that they cannot be shot over. This is due to the singular fertility of the soil, the equable temperature of the atmosphere, and the abundance of water. The reeds here are also of such great length, that each section of them, between the joints, forms a tube out of which a boat can be made that is capable of holding three men. [Aelian, . XVI.c.11, and XVII.c.26, refers to the large size of many of the animals of India; and in book IV.c.19, he describes the size and fierceness of the Indian dog. The reed referred to is the bamboo cane that frequently grows to the height of tallest trees. The stem is hollow, and the parts between the joints are used for canoes by the natives. Herodotus mentions them (III.c.98). The text at this point is from Pliny, , VII.c.2]. On Mount Nulo (here called Milo) there is a race of men whose feet are turned backwards, with eight toes on each foot. [From Pliny, , VII.c.2]. Item: Among a certain race in India the females are pregnant but once in the course of their lives, and their children age rapidly. [] Item: some people have holes in their faces instead of nostrils. At the very extremity of India, on the eastern side, near the source of the river Ganges, there is a nation of people who have no mouths; their bodies are rough and hairy, and they cover themselves with a down plucked from the leaves of trees. These people subsist only by breathing and by the odors which they inhale through their nostrils. They take neither food nor drink. When they go on a long journey they carry with them only various odoriferous roots, flowers, and wild apples. Should they encounter an odor of unusual strength, they die. [Pliny, , VII.c.2]. Item: In those parts of India where there is no shadow, the bodies of men attain height of five cubits and two palms, and their life is prolonged for 130 years; they die without any symptoms of old age, and just as if they were in the middle period of life. [The cubit is 21 inches; the span, 9 inches; total, 10 feet 3 inches]. Item: In another region of India are people who live 200 years. In youth their hair is white, and it becomes black in old age. [] Item: In the island of Taprobane life is prolonged to a great length, while the body is exempt from illness. ["Artemidorus states that in the island of Taprobane life is prolonged to an extreme length, while, at the same time, the body is exempt from weakness," (Pliny, , VII. c.2). This refers to the island of Ceylon, of which Pliny has given an account in his last book, c.24]. Item: A race of people, the Oritae (hero called Sorite), whom the river Arabis divides from the people of India, know no other food but fish, which they tear apart with their finger-nails, dry it in the sun, and make bread of it. [] Item: In the deserts of Africa a species of human beings men suddenly appears, and then vanishes in an instant. [The reference may be to mirages]. Many Greek historians have written concerning these miraculous and rare beings, and thus have acquainted us with the ingenuity of nature, discovering the powers by which she created such and similar beings for us to marvel at and to meditate upon. Some of these will appear in the illustrations that follow. []

Folio XII recto

Pliny, Augustine and Isidore have written of variously shaped people, of whom mention will be made hereafter. In India are people with the heads of dogs, who bark when they speak. They sustain themselves by catching birds and clothe themselves in the skins of animals. Item: Some have but one eye, which is in the forehead above the nose. Their diet is restricted to animal flesh. Item: In Lybia some are born headless and have mouth and eyes. Some are double-sexed, the right breast male, the left one female. They are indiscriminate in their associations with one another and bear children. Item: Toward Paradise, by the River Ganges, are people who do not eat. Their mouths are so small that they are obliged to drink through a straw. They live upon the odor of fruits and flowers. They quickly die if they encounter evil odors. In this country there are also people without noses, their faces flat. Some have lower lips so large that they cover the entire face. Item: Some have no tongues, and speak to one another in winks, in the manner of the cloister people. Item: In Sicily some people have ears so large that they cover the whole body.

Item: In Ethiopia some wander about with their bodies bent downward in the manner of animals; and some of these live four hundred years. Item: Some have horns, long noses and goat's feet; and these are spoken of throughout the legends of St. Anthony. Item: In Ethiopia, toward the west, are people with but one foot, which is very broad. They are so fleet that they pursue the wild animals. Item: In Soythia are people with hoofs like a horse. Item: And there are some people five cubits in length and who never sicken until death. Item: In the histories of Alexander the Great one reads of people in India who have six hands. Item: Some are naked and rough and live in the water; some have six digits on hands and feet. Others who live in the water are half man and half horse. Item: Women with beards extending down to their breasts, but their heads hairless and bald. Item: In Ethiopia, toward the west, some have four eyes. So in Eriopia are people with necks like those of cranes, and bills for mouths. But it is unbelievable, as Augustine writes, that there are certain people in the region of the earth opposed to us and where the sun rises, who reverse the position of their feet when the sun sets. However, there is much dispute among writers as to just where people in general reside; for round about us people live everywhere upon the earth, directing their footsteps against one another, and standing upon the earth. And yet, they all turn the crowns of their heads toward heaven; and we wonder why we, or they who turn their heels toward us, do not fall. But that is the nature of things. For just as the seat of fire is nowhere than in the fire, that of water nowhere but in the water, and that of the spirit nowhere but in the spirit itself, so the seat of the earth is nowhere but within itself.

ILLUSTRATIONS

Monsters

The illustrations to this subject, (textually treated at Folio XI verso and Folio XII recto), are arranged in three narrow vertical panels, two of which appear at Folio XII recto and one at Folio XII verso. The panels are slightly over 14" in height and exactly 2¼" in width. Each panel contains seven illustrations, making a total of twenty-one various types of freaks described in the text:

FIRST PANEL:

1. A dog-headed man, seated, violently gesturing with his hands, and conversing in empathetic barks.
2. A one-eyed individual, kneeling and holding up one hands in gesture of a blessing.
3. Headless figure, seated; his face in his chest. He gestures with his right hand while he uproots a plant with his left.
4. Seated figure, feet reversed; gesturing.
5. A being, half woman and half man.
6. One-legged man lying on his back in the sunshine, and shading himself with an enormous foot, the only one he has.
7. Man with mouth so small that he is obliged to drink from a tumbler through a straw.

SECOND PANEL:

1. A noseless creature, seated on the greensward, and gesticulating as if in conversation.
2. Kneeling figure, large open mouth, lower lip extended to size and shape of a saucer.
3. Seated figure with elephantine ears extending below the hips.
4. A gesticulating figure, with two long horns, long nose and cloven feet.
5. A fleet individual, pursuing a deer which he grasps by the antlers.
6. Seated figure, talking and gesticulating. He has horses hoofs in place of feet.
7. Man with shield and club attacking a group of protesting cranes.

THIRD PANEL:

1. Kneeling figure, violently gesticulating with six arms.
2. Hairy woman, seated and gesticulating.
3. Man, moving along in a kneeling crouch and gesturing with six-fingered hands.
4. A creature, half horse and half man, gesturing.
5. Kneeling figure of a bearded lady; head bald; gesturing.
6. Four-eyed creature, resting on one knee; one hand extended as if to emphasize speech.
7. Seated figure, long S-shaped neck; beak in lieu of mouth; gesturing with both hands.

As we analyze and compare these twenty-one figures, we find that most of them have one thing in common: gesticulation. And we wonder why so much action was introduced. The artist may have had several motives: (a) To give the figures human attributes, through speech and gesture, to indicate that they are deformed humans and not animals of the lower orders; (b) to exhibit their hands for the same reason; (c) to make the figures attract our attention, as figures in action always do. They are not mere stolid portraits.

General Division of the World

The world is called a circumference because it is formed like a globe. It is divided into three parts—Asia, Africa, and Europe. The divisions are not equal, for Asia extends from the South, through the East, to the North; Europe from the North to the West; and Africa from the South to the West. Asia alone comprehends half of the inhabited world; Africa and Europe, the other half. These are separated by a common sea that runs out of the Great Ocean. Now, if you divide the world into two parts, as the East and the West, Asia will be in one part and Africa and Europe in the other. And so the sons of Noah divided it after the Flood: Shem and his descendants took Asia; Japheth, Europe; and Ham, Africa; as the Scriptures, Chrysostom, Isidore, and Pliny say.

Folio XIII recto

Map of the World

This map extends over two pages. The shape is irregular. The upper and lower bounds are concentrically circular, the sides straight and vertical for a short distance, and then converging at an obtuse angle in straight lines to the circular bounds at the top of the map. The map is held by Japheth, Shem and Ham, the three sons of Noah, who divided the continents between them. They occupy three corners of the woodcut. A wide band or frame surrounds the map, and in this frame appear twelve heads with cheeks distended, blowing from as many different directions toward the world. All the heads are very similar—round faces, pug-noses, and unruly hair—with one exception: the wind-god who blows from the direction of Shem is of a decidedly Semitic type, having a pronounced nose and thick black hair. An exception might have been made to the general design in case of the cold north winds which, by reason of their savage inclemency, are often pictured as rude barbarians with heavy beards; but this was not done.

Ancient superstitions, mythology, and literature have all contributed additional and special names for the winds blowing from the different quarters of the earth. The Greeks personified the winds as divine beings under the control of Zeus and Poseidon (Neptune). The principal ones were Boreas, the north wind; Eurus, the east wind; Notus, the south wind, and Zephyrus, the west wind. All were the offspring of Eos and Astraeus. The character and appearance ascribes to each of these deities was such as to suggest the phenomena of each wind, such as the strength and fury of the north wind, the genial warmth of the south west wind. Some were thought of as male, some as female, and all were winged. Eurus, who brought warmth and rain from the east, was usually represented as holding an inverted vase, as if pouring rain from it Zephyrus, coming from the warm, mild west, was lightly clad, and carried a quantity of flowers in a scarf.

Just as we find Roman names for most of the Greek deities, so with the winds. Among the Latins the north wind was also known as Septentrio (Septentrio, or Septemprio), and as Aparcias; the east wind, also as Subsolanus (erroneously referred to in the Chronicle, folio V verso, as Bubsolanus); the south wind, as Auster; the west wind, as Favonius. Septemprio and its variable forms simply designate direction, as septentrianos venti (north wind). Subsolanus, the designation of the east wind, is simply a personification of subsolar, under the sun; specifically, tropical. Auster is simply a Latin designation of direction and not a personification.

The prevalence in particular districts of winds blowing from this or that point between the chief quarters, gave rise to further names in order to distinguish these special winds: Aquilo or Aquilon, the north or northeast wind; Euronotus (erroneously spelled Euronothus in the Chronicle), Euroauster, and Vulturnus, the southeast wind; Africus, Lips and Libonotus, as well as Apliot, all personifications of the southwesterly; and Caurus, or Corus (Chorus, in the Chronicle), for northwesterly. Aquilo is to be connected with Aquilus, the black stormy one. Euronotus and Euroauster are easily recognized as compounds of Eurus (east wind), and Notus or Auster (south wind); hence southeast. Vulturnus is so called from the Roman Vultur, a mountain dividing Apulia and Lucania, near Venusia, and which is a branch of the Apennines. This mountain is celebrated by Horace as one of the haunts of youth. Africus requires no explanation. Lips, designating the southwest wind, is not to be confused with Libs, the west-southwest wind. Libonotus is easily recognized as a combining form. Apeliot, also a personification of the southwest wind, is represented as carrying fruits of many kinds and not so lightly clad as Zephyrus.

All the winds contained in the border of this map bear names—some single, others in the alternative. Beginning at the center of the upper portion of this border, the winds are designated as follows:

1. Septentrio vel Aparcias, the north wind. Vel is the Latin for the alternative “or.”
2. Aquilo vel Boreas, also the north wind, according to the Latin and the Greek names.
3. Vulturnus (Latin) southeast wind.
4. Subsolanus (Latin) east wind.
5. Eurus (Latin adaptation from the Greek), and also meaning east wind.
6. Euronothus, southeast wind.
7. Auster vel Nothus, the south wind, Auster being the Latin and Nothus the Greek names.
8. Libonotus vel Euroauster. Although the artist considers these names synonymous, they are not the same: Libonotus is a south by southwest wind; Euroauster is a southeast wind.
9. Afficus vel Lips. The former is a southwest wind; the latter, a west by southwest wind.
10. Favonius, Zephyrus, synonyms for west wind.
11. Chorus qui et Agrestes: The northwest wind, which is wild or savage. Correctly spelled Caurus or Corus.
12. Circius (Cercius) vel Tracias (Thracias): Circius has been defined as a violent wind blowing in Gallia Narbonensis; perhaps from circus, on account of its circular motion. To the Romans it meant a west-northwest wind. Thracias (Thracias, or Tracias, as it is spelled in the Chronicle), is the north-northwest wind, and is therefore not exactly synonymous with Circius, a west-northwest wind. The name Thracias probably had its origin in the fact that Boreas and his satellites had their home in Thrace, from whence they blew for better or for worse.

Map Inscription

Japheth, Shem and Ham not being sufficient in number to cover the four corners of the map, the fourth corner was filled with the following inscription in Latin:

Ventorum quatuor cardinales sunt Primum, septentrio flat rectus ab axe, faciens frigora et nubes; huic dexter circius nives et grandines. A sinistris Boreas constringens. Secundus, subsolanus ab ortu temperatus; vulturnus deluctans eurus nubes generans. Tertium, auster humidus fulmineus. A dextris euro auster calidus; a sinistris euro nothus tempestuosus. Quartus, Zephyrus, hiemem resolvens produciens flores; a latere affricus generans fulmins et corpus nubile faciens.

Translation of Map Inscription

The four cardinal winds are: Firstly, Septentrio, which blows straight from the Pole, producing cold and clouds; at its right Circius, snow and hail; at its left Boreas, constricts by freezing. Secondly, Subsolanus, is tempered by its origin; Vulturnus is a dry wind; Eurus produces clouds. Thirdly, Auster is moist and produces lightening; at its right Euro, hot; at its left Euronotus, stormy. Fourthly, Zephyrus, putting an end to winter and bringing forth blossoms; at its side Africus, generating thunderstorms and producing clouds in masses.

respecting its site, but the best geographers concur in placing it at the northwest angle of the present empire of China. The name of Serica as a country was not known before the first century of our era, though there are earlier accounts of the people called Seres. The first silk reached the Greeks and Romans from this region. The words "silk" and "serge" are certainly from Latin Seres ("the Chinese"); a word probably of Chinese origin, notwithstanding the fact that the Chinese do not employ the letter 'r.'

Folio XIII verso

Asia derived its name from a woman who, according to the ancients, was the ruler of the Orient. [The origin of the names of Europe and Asia is lost in antiquity. The Greek writers give two derivations. First, according to their system of referring the names of tribes and countries to a person as eponymus, they tell of a nymph named Asia, one of the Oceanids, daughters of Oceanus and Tethys, the wife of Iapetus, and the mother of Prometheus. In this mythical genealogy Asia is connected with the Titanic deities, and Europe with the race of Zeus. The other class of derivations connects Asia with Lydia, which some of the grammarians distinctly state to have been at first called Asia; an opinion which Strabo (XIII) ascribes to the school of Demetrius of Scepsis. We are told of a city called Asia, near Mount Tmolus, where the Lydian lyre was invented. According to Herodotus, the Lydians derived the name of Asia from their ancient king, Asies, son of Cotys, and grandson of Manes, who also have name to the tribe Asias at Sardis]. Asia has many countries, provinces and districts, and therein lies the earthly Paradise which, according to the Greek and Hebrew tongues, means Garden of Pleasure. Item: In this part of Asia lie the countries and regions hereinafter named: India is so called after the river Indus, which is on the west. It flows from the southern sea [Indian Ocean (Indicus Oceanus)]. to the east, and to the north as far as the Caucasus Mountains. It has many peoples and cities, and an island named Thephana, [Probably the island of Patala, which, according to Pliny, lay at the mouth of the Indus, triangular in form, and 220 miles in breadth (VI. c.23). It is by some supposed to have been Lower Scinde, in the vicinity of Kurrachee, with its capital Potala]. abounding in precious stones and elephants; also the islands of Chryse and Argyre, ["Beyond the mouth of the Indus are the islands of Chrise and Argyre, abounding in metals, I believe; but as to what some persons have stated, that the soil consists of gold and silver, I am not so willing to give a ready credence to that," (Pliny, VI. c.24). Ansart suggests that these may be the Laccadives. Their name means the "gold" and "silver" islands]. rich in gold and silver; and the "tylem" tree, [Probably the linden (Latin)]. which is never without leaves. India has three rivers, the Ganges, Indus, and the Hypanis. [Should be Hypasis, most eastern and most important of the five rivers that water the Punjab. The modern name is Sutlej. It bore various names in ancient and modern times. Pliny calls it Hypasis; Ptolemy, Bibasis; Strabo, Hypanis]. The weather and climate in India are so good, and the soil is so fertile that there are two harvests in the year. The cool winds of midnight take the place of winter. India produces colored people, large elephants, unicorns, parrots, ebony wood, cinnamon reeds, pepper, calamus, the noble liverwort, ivory, precious stones, such as beryl, chrysoprasus, [A precious stone of golden yellow and leek-green color]. diamonds, carbuncles, ligures, fine small pearls, and large individual ones, which the noble ladies passionately crave. There are also mountains of gold that no one dares approach because of dragons, griffins and giants. In Asia are the countries of Parthia, Assyria, Media, Persia, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Chaldea, Arabia, or Sabai, [Now called Yemen, in Arabia. The Sabeans were noted for their enterprise and wealth]. and Syria. Item: Syria comprises many lands, such as Comagene, [The most easterly district of Syria]. Phoenicia, and Palestine, in which lies Judea. In Phoenicia is the city of Tyre. Judea derived its name from Judah, out of whose stock Judea drew its ruling kings. It lies in Palestine, and was formerly called Canaan, after the son of Cain, or after the Cainitic line that was driven from it and supplanted by the Jews with the help of God. In the midst of this country of Judea lies Jerusalem, a land wealthy in possessions and estates, productive of fruits, surrounded by water and endowed with balsams. Item: Samaria lies in Palestine, and the capital is also called Samaria. There the kings of Israel maintained their royal seats, just as the kings of Judea ruled from Jerusalem. Galilee also lies in Palestine. The land of Pentapolis [Pentapolis here refers to the five "cities of the plain," to which the name is applied in the apocryphal (X. 6); namely Sodom, Gomorrha, Adama, Zeboim, and Zoar, all of which (except the last, which was spared at the intercession of Lot) were destroyed by fire from heaven, and the valley in which they stood was buried beneath the waters of the dead sea]. lies in the vicinity of Arabia and Palestine, and has five cities, as Sodom, Gomorrha, etc. Nabathae [The Nabathae were an Arabian people, descended from the eldest son of Ishmael, and had their original abodes in the northwestern part of the Arabian Peninsula. The Nabathaeans of Greek and Roman history occupied nearly the whole of the Arabian Petraea, along the northeast coast of the Red Sea; and here was their capital, Petra. At first a pastoral people, they later became successful traders, and set up a powerful monarchy. Under Augustus they were nominal subjects of the Roman Empire. Under Trajan, Arabia Petraea became a Roman province (105-107 CE). In the fourth century it was considered part of Palestine. The Muslim conquest finally overthrew the power of the Nabathaeans, long on the wane. The country soon became a haunt for wandering Arabs, and their very name disappeared]. lies between Judea and Arabia. Item: The country called Egypt also lies in Asia. There is little rain. Its only river, the Nile, overflows and inundates the land, making it so fertile that it supplies all the world with its produce. Item: Scythia, Hyrcania, [Hyrcania, a province of the ancient Persian empire, on the Caspian or Hyrcanian Sea, and separated by mountains from Media, Parthia, and Margiana]. Albania, Armenia, Iberia, [Iberia (southern Georgia) a country of Asia in the center of isthmus between the Black and Caspian seas; bounded on the north by the Caucasus, on the west by Colchis, on the east by Albania, on the south by Armenia]. and Cappadocia are also in Asia. Item: Asia Minor is bounded on the east by Cappadocia, and the remainder is surrounded by the sea. It comprehends Bithynia, Phrygia, Galatia, Lydia, Carts, Pamphylia, Isauria, Lycia, and Oicilia. Bithynia, which is also called Greater Phrygia, lies to the east of the sea. It has a city called Nicomedia [Nicomedia, capital city of Bithynia]. to which Hannibal fled, and where he afterward died by poisoned drink. In Phrygia, or Dardania, is Troy, [In fact a city founded by Dardanus on the Hellespont, southwest of Abydos; whence its modern name of Dardanelles]. which Tros, [Tros, a king of Phrygia, after whom Troy was named. He was the son of Ericthonius, and grandson of Dardanus. The country and the people of Troy derived their name from him]. the king, named after himself. Now, there are two Phrygias, the greater embracing Smyrna; the smaller, Ilium and Pycaonia. Pamphylia was taken into the country of Cicilia. Selucia is the capital of Isauria. Tarsus is the capital of Cicilia. In Lycia is the marvelous Mount Chimaera, [Chimaera, a fire-breathing monster, the fore part of whose body was that of a lion, the hind part that of a dragon, and the middle that of a goat. According to Hesiod, she was the daughter of Typhaon and Echidna. She made great havoc in Lycia and the surrounding countries, and was at length killed by Bellerophon. The origin of the notion may be sought in the volcano of the name of Chimaera near Phaselis, in Lycia. In works of art discovered at Lycia, several representations of the Chimaera were found, in the simple forms of a species of lion still occurring in that country]. which emits fire, like Mount Aetna in Sicily, and Zwickau, in Germany.

Europe is named after the daughter of Agenor, king of Libya, [Libya is the Greek name of the continent of Africa in general]. whom Jupiter abducted from Africa and carried off to the island of Crete. [Jupiter, in the form of a bull, carried off Europa according to Greek mythology]. One third of the world was named for her. [Opinions vary as to the origin of the name Europe. One is that the appellation is derived from Europa, daughter of the Phoenician king Agenor. This neither satisfied geographers generally, nor Herodotus in particular, who indeed wonders (IV.45) how it should come to pass that the three main divisions of the earth were named for three females—Asia, Libya, and Europa. The connection of Europe with Phoenicia is obvious; for Tyrian and Sidonian mariners were the earliest explorers of the bays and coast of the Mediterranean, and among the first colonizers of its principal islands and its western shores. They were the first also who passed through the Pillars of Hercules, surveyed the coasts of Spain and Gaul, and entered the German Ocean, and perhaps the Baltic Sea. The name Europa bears a close resemblance to the Semitic word Oreb—the land of sunset. Such a name the Phoenicians of Asia might well give to the regions westward of the Aegean, even as the Italian navigators in the Middle Ages, looking from the opposite quarter, called the eastern extremity of the Mediterranean the Levant, or the region of sunrise. Another theory is that the root of Europa is the wife of Zeus, while Asia is the sister or wife of Prometheus. And thus, apparently the line of Zeus and the Olympian divinities is connected with the continent of Europe; and the line of Prometheus, Epimetheus, Atlas, etc, or the Titanic powers, with Asia and Libya]. Europe begins at the river Tanais, extends to the northern ocean, and westward to Spain. The first region of Europe is Lower Scythia, which begins with the sand sea, or swamps, known in Latin as Palus Maeotis, [Now the Sea of Azov]. and extending from the Danube to the northern ocean, reaches westward to Germany; and because of the character and manners of the inhabitants, it is called Barbaria. Of this region Gothia, [Country of the Goths, the greatest northern tribe of Germany]. afterwards Germania, or Germany, is the first part; and therein the inhabitants were mostly of the Suevi. [The Suevi were one of the greatest and most powerful peoples of Germany. The name applied collectively to a great number of German tribes, grouped together on account of their migratory life. The Suevi are described by the ancients as occupying the greater half of Germany. Later this collective name disappeared, and the different tribes were called by their distinctive names. In the third century, however, we again find a people called Suevi, dwelling between the mount of the Main and the Black Forest, whose name is still preserved in the modern Swabia; but it is said, this people were merely a body of bold adventurers, who assumed the celebrated name of the Suevi, because they possessed no distinctive appellation of their own]. Germany, beyond Lower Scythia, is bounded or enclosed by the Danube, between the Rhine and the Sea. This is a powerful country, and it is populated with a great number of earnest people. Because of its fertility and fruitfulness it is called Germania, which signifies the bearing one.

There have been various speculations as to the origin of the name Germania. The reason which the author here assigns, namely, that because of its fertility and fruitfulness, the country was called Germania, “which signifies the bearing one,” I have not found in any other work. As a Latin scholar Schedel would have had the Latin root (germen) for germinate in mind; but the name was not original with the Romans. The name did not become current with the Romans until the time of Caesar, who learned it from the Gauls. It is said that the name is of Celtic origin, and most probably meant woodsmen, or forest-dwellers, which name the Gauls applied to the uncultured people of Celtic or Germanic origin in the region of the Maas and the Lower Rhine, who did not live in cities. Finally the name was confined to the latter, but came to designate collectively the great nation beyond the Rhine—the Germani. The Germanic peoples themselves probably first learned the name from the Gauls, and only applied it to themselves in commerce with foreigners, particularly the Romans. The name never became popular with them; but at a later time the learned seized upon the name, and gave it a wider scope than it originally enjoyed. There are other writers who derive the word from the German ger, gwer, Heer, Wehr, so that the word would be equivalent to Wehrman, Wehrmanner, that is, warriors.

Germania was bounded by the Rhine on the West, by the Vistula and Carpathian mountains on the East, by the Danube on the South, and by the German Ocean and the Baltic Sea on the North. This area the Romans called Germania Magna, or Germania Transrhenana, or Germania Barbara, and this must be carefully distinguished from the Roman province of Germania Cisirhenana, which designated the regions on the westerly side of the Rhine, which was occupied by peoples of Germanic origin. At first these regions were reckoned as part of Gallia Belgica; but under Augustus they were called Germania after the occupants, and were divided into two parts: Germania Superior or Germania Prima, from the Jura Mountains to the Nahe, and Germania Inferior or Germania Secunda, from the Nahe to the sea.

It has precious stones, crystals, and electrum. Now there is an Upper Germany, by the northern ocean, and a Lower Germany, by the Rhine—the land which the Danube divides from the Barbarian Sea to the sea which divides the earth.

Folio XIII recto

Moesia, [Moesia, an ancient Roman province; the modern Bulgaria and Serbia]. Pannonia, [Pannonia, an ancient Roman province between the Danube and the Save rivers]. Rhaetia, [Rhaetia, an ancient Roman province, conquered in 15 BCE, embracing part of modern Tyrol and the Grisons, and later extended to the Danube]. then Thrace, [Thrace, a region of indefinite extent in northeastern Macedonia. Roman Thrace extended as far north as the Balkan mountains]. with Constantinople to the east, and Macedonia to the west—in these countries various people lived: the Moesians, the Getae, [The Getae were related to or identical with the Dacians; a Thracian nation or tribe. Originally occupied the territory between the Haemus and the Ister, but crowded to the north side of the river by the Macedonians]. the Sarmatians, the Scythians, and others. Item: Greece has on the east, Dalmatia, Epirus, Hellas, Thessaly, Macedonia, Achaia, and Illyria. And all Greece and Dalmatia was named after Delim, [Delim, probably refers to Dalminium or Delminium. It was the capital from which Dalmatia derived its name. In ancient times the country nearly corresponded to the modern Dalmatia]. the largest city of these provinces. In Epirus lies Chaonia, formerly called Molossia. Item: Bellas, also called Attica, is the real Greece, and Athens, the city, is the mother of letters and the nourisher of the wise. But Hellas consists of two provinces, Boetia and Thessaly, wherein golden coins were first minted, and the taming of horses was first conceived of. Item: Macedonia, formerly called Emathia, [The original Emathia, as mentioned by Homer, is coupled with Pieria as lying between the Hellenic cities of Thessaly and Paeonia, and Thrace]. is near Media which is to the north. It was the country of Alexander the Great's father. [Philip of Macedon]. It is rich in veins of gold and silver. In it is Mt. Olympus, which is so high that on its peak are found neither air nor clouds. Item: Achaia is almost an island, and in it lies the capital city of Corinth, an honor to Greece. Item: Arcadia, or Sicaonia, has the mineral asbestos, which when once ignited, can never be extinguished. [According to Pliny, "Asbestos is found in the mountains of Arcadia, and is of an iron color," (, XXXVII. c.54). At another place Pliny calls it amianthus, and says that it resembles aluminum in appearance, and that it suffers no diminution from the action of fire (Book XXXVI). And he adds, "This substance effectually counteracts all noxious spells, those wrought by magicians in particular." It is apparent that Schedel had no personal knowledge of asbestos. He states that once ignited, it can never be extinguished. Of course, we know that asbestos does not burn, and we can account for Schedel's misinformation by calling to mind the asbestos wicks of the inextinguishable lamps of the Middle Ages, the existence of which was generally believed in at the time]. Item: Pannonia, so called from the Italian mountains which divide it from Italy, is a powerful country, and a good and happy land. Istria is named after the river Danube, which is also called the Ister. Pannonia is north of the river. Italy was once called Magna Graecia, and later on Latium. Finally it was called Italia, being named after Italus, its king. [Italus, a king of the Pelasgians, after whom, according to Roman mythology, Italy was named. At the time of Augustus the chief divisions of Italy were (1) Upper Italy, (2) Central Italy, or Italia Propria, and (3) Lower Italy, called Magna Graecia. At this time Latium was but one of the five provinces of Central Italy]. This country is most beautiful in every respect; it is fertile, and productive of wholesome and agreeable foodstuffs. It has three seas, Benacus [Lake Garda], Alumnus, [Probably Lemanus Lacus, or Lake Lemano (Lake of Geneva)]. and Lucerne. It also has two rivers, the Eridanus, also called Padus, [Eridanus is the mythical and poetical name of the Po, Italy's largest river]. and the Tiber. Italy produces precious stones, pearls, silks, corals, ligures, and snakes which are called boas. Italy and Spain are also called Hesperia. [Hesperia means Western Land. The name was given to Italy by the Greek poets because it lay west of Greece. In imitation the Roman poets gave the name of Hesperia to Spain, which they sometimes called Ultima Hesperia, to distinguish it from Italy, which they occasionally called Hesperia Magna. Hesperus is the evening star]. Tuscany is a part of Italy, and Umbria is a part of Tuscany; and Tuscany lies on the heights of the Italian mountains in the southern part of Italy. Etruria is a part of Italy. Item: Apulia. Item: Campania is a province of Italy which is verdant in summer and winter; for there the sun is bountiful, the climate temperate, and the air clear. Item: Gaul is protected on the east by high mountains, and it has the sea on the west. To the south are the Pyrenees and Spain; to the north are the Rhine and Germany.

It begins at Belgica, [In Caesar's time Gaul was divided into three parts, Aquitania, Celtica and Belgica, according to the three different races by which it was inhabited. The Aquitani dwelt in the southwest between the Pyrenees and the Garumna, now the Garone; the Celtae, or Galli proper, in the center and west between the Garumna and the Sequana (now the Seine) and the Matrona, now the Marne; and the Belgae in the northeast, between the two last mentioned rivers and the Rhine]. and extends to Aquitania. This region is fertile, produces good food and fodder, and is well watered by rivers and springs. There are two rivers, the Rhine and the Rhone. Belgica is a state in Gaul, from which the country of Belgium derived its name. Hispania was first called Iberia after the river of the same name, and was thereafter called Hispania. [The name in general used among the Greeks during the historical period was Iberia, which was understood to be derived from the Iberus (now the Ebro), the principal river in northeastern Spain. It rises among the mountains of the Cantabri, flows southeast through a great plain, and falls into the Mediterranean near Dertosa, after forming a delta. This Iberia is not to be confused with the ancient Iberia in Asia, conquered by the Arabs in the 7th century, and which is now the country of Georgia. The name Hispania, for Spain, came into use after the Romans began to have a direct connection with the country, and this has remained the prevailing appellation ever since. The genuine form of the name is probably Span or Sapan, the vowel sound being prefixed for easier pronunciation, as is common in southern and eastern languages when an initial "s" is followed by another consonant. The origin of the name is uncertain. One author derives it from the Phoenician and Hebrew word tsapan, which means a rabbit; and arguments are adduced in favor of this etymology from the numerous testimonies of the ancients to the abundance of these animals in the country (Strabo III. pp. 144, 168; Pliny VIII. c. 58, and XI. c. 37), as well as from a medal of Hadrian, on the reverse side of which is seen a female figure, as the personification of Spain, with a rabbit at her feet. W. von Humboldt, in his invaluable essay on the primitive history of Spain, maintains that it was a native name, and that its genuine form, vowel prefix and all, is preserved almost unaltered in the modern native name España, which he derives from the Basque Ezpaña, a border, margin, edge, denoting that the peninsula was the margin of Europe toward the ocean. The old Greek name Hesperia, chiefly used by the poets, was also used in connection with the notion that the world consisted of four parts: Libya, the southern; Asia, the eastern; Europe, the northern; and Hesperia, the western]. It lies between Gaul and Africa, and is bounded on the west by the Pyrenees, and at all other points by the sea. It has a clear atmosphere and good climate, produces all kinds of fruits, and is rich in precious stones and metals. Through it flow the rivers Baetis, Minius, Iberus, and Tagus. [The Baetis is now the Guadalquivir; the Minius is now the Minho, or Mino; the Iberus is the Ebro, while the Tagus has retained its ancient name]. It has six provinces, Tarraconensis, Carthaginiensis, Lusitania, Gallaecia, Baetica, and across the straits in Africa, Tingitana. There are two Hispanias—Hispania Citerior, and Hispania Ulterior. [Spain's provincial constitution under the Romans dates from the year of the expulsion of the Carthaginians in 205 BCE; and at the same time the division of the peninsula into two parts was made a part of the political constitution; so that the peninsula formed, from the first down to the time of Augustus, two provinces, the eastern, called Hispania Citerior, and the western, called Hispania Ulterior, the river Ebro (Iberus) being adopted as the natural boundary between the two. This boundary varied at different times. Polybius, having in mind the old Greek distinction between the country of the Celts and that of the Iberians, calls the eastern province Celtiberia and the western Iberia. Other writers use Celtiberia as a synonym for Hither Spain, as distinguished from Further Spain. Lastly, some late writers used the terms Great and Little Spain as equivalent respectively to Hither and Further Spain. Hispania Ulterior included Baetica and Lusitania].

Some hold that Africa derived its name from the fact that it is favorably situated with reference to the heavens and the sun, and does not suffer through frost. Others say it is named after Affer, a descendant of Abraham. [No authoritative origin has been given for the name Africa. It was first used by Aeneas before the Second Punic War and was applied only to Carthage and its environs. However in the time of the Empire, the name meant the entire continent, which the Greeks had designated by the Semitic name Libya, by which was at one time meant only the northern rim of Africa. According to Genesis 26:1-3, Abraham took another wife named Keturah, and she bore him a number of sons, among them Midian; and to Midian sons were born, among them one Ephraim. Josephus (I. c. 25, s. 1) gives the same genealogy with a variation in the spelling of the names, and calls Ephraim Ophran. He relates that his grandchildren, when they inherited it, called it from his name Africa. Citing other authorities, Josephus says: "Cleodamus the prophet, who was also called Malchus, who wrote a history of the Jews in agreement with the history of Moses, their legislator, relates that there were some sons born to Abraham by Keturah: Nay, he names three of them, Apher, Surim, and Japhran. That from Surim was the land of Assyria denominated; and that from the other two, Apher and Japhran, the country of Africa took its name, because these men were auxiliaries to Hercules, when he fought against Libya and Antasus." It begins at the border of Egypt and extends southerly through Ethiopia to the Atlas Mountains. On the north it is bounded by the Mediterranean Sea. Therefore these lands are called Libyan Cyrenaica, and they are so called from the name of its capital city. [Cyrenaica was the name of the district, which, from the time of the Ptolemies, was called Pentapolis because it included the five cities, Cyrene, the capital, and Apollonia, Ptolemais, Arsinoë, and Berenice]. Item: Pentapolis has been so-called because of its five cities. One of these cities is Ptolemais, and another is Berenice; their names are derived from their rulers. [Pentapolis is a name for any association of five cities and was applied specifically to two groups: The first has already been mentioned (Folio XIII verso, and note). The second group consisted of the five great cities of Cyrenaica in N. Africa, namely, Cyrene, Berenice, Arsinoë, Ptolemeita, and Apollonia. Arsinoë was the daughter of Ptolemy I (Lagi) and Berenice. She married Lysimachus, king of Thrace in 300 BCE; after the death of Lysimachus she married her half-brother, Ptolemy Ceraunus, who murdered her children by Lysimachus; and lastly she married her own brother, Ptolemy II (Philadelphus). He gave her name to several cities. She was exceedingly beloved of him though she gave him no children, and he also named a district of Egypt after her. Cyrene, the chief city of Cyrenaica in North Africa was founded by Battus (631 BCE) over a fountain consecrated to Apollo, and called Cyre, which supplied the city with water. Berenice was named after Berenice, the mother of Ptolemy II and his sister-wife Arsinoë. This Ptolemy built the city. Ptolemeita took its name from one of the Ptolemys, but which one is not known. Apollonia was the harbor of Cyrene and no doubt its name has some connection with the fountain of Apollo over which Cyrene was founded]. Item: Tripoli, Bizacium, Carthago, Numidia and Mauretania, or land of the Moors. Tingitania, and in the heat of the sun, Ethiopia. Tingitania is named after the capital city (Tingis) of the province. [Bizacium, more correctly Byzacium, or Byzacena Regio, was the south portion of the Roman province of Africa. It corresponds to the southern part of Tunis. Carthago (Carthage) was one of the most celebrated cities of the ancient world, and lay N.E. of Tunis on a large bay. In ancient times it stood upon a peninsula surrounded on all sides, except by the west, by the sea. The coast of this part of Africa has been much changed by the deposits of the river Bagradas and the sand driven seaward by the northwest winds. Numidia, a country in N. Africa, lay on the Mediterranean, between Mauretania on the west and the territory of Carthage on the east. On the south it extended to the Atlas Mountains. Mauretania was the most westerly of the principal divisions of Africa. It lay along the Mediterranean and extended like a narrow band from the Atlantic on the west to Numidia on the east]. This region [Tingis is a place of very great antiquity on the south coast of the Straits of Gibraltar. Augustus made it a free city. Claudius made it a colony and the capital of Mauretania-Tingitania]. abounds in wild apes, dragons, ostriches, and some elephants, but at present these are found only in India. Item: Garrania is a province, and therein is a spring, cold in the heat of the day and warm in the cold of the night. [Possibly Garimantes, in the interior of Africa, to the east of the Libyan desert, and inhabited by a powerful tribe. Pliny, in speaking of Cyrenaica (V. c. 5), says: "Beyond it is the desert, and then Talgae, a city of the Garamantes, and Debris, at which place there is a spring, the waters of which, from noon to midnight, are at boiling heat, and then freeze for as many hours until the following noon; Garana too, that most famous capital of the Garamantes; all which places have been subdued by the Roman arms." Ethiopia is so called from the heat [No doubt the chronicler refers to the name Ham, or rather Cham, which is from a single root signifying to be hot, and hence burnt, black. The Hamites are dark-skinned people, dwelling mainly in the torrid zone. The first three sons of Ham settled in northern Africa]. suffered by the people, who suffer by reason of the nearness of the sun; for there the heat is constant. Here are many people of different features and of wonderful physique. The country is full of wild animals and snakes. There are also one-horned animals, cameleopards, basilisks, [Basilisk, a fabulous serpent, lizard or dragon, whose hissing would drive away all other serpents, and whose breath and even look was fatal. Today the term is applied to any of several tropical American lizards of the genus basiliscus]. and great dragons. Gems, iacinctus [Hyacinth, a precious stone of the ancients, of a blue color, perhaps the sapphire]. and chrysoprase, [Chrysoprase, an apple-green variety of chalcedony, of a dull, flinty luster, esteemed in jewelry]. and also reeds of cinnamon are found there. There are two Ethiopias, one to the East, the other to the West, in Mauretania. Now in addition to the three parts of the world above described there is a fourth one within the inner (Mediterranean) sea, which, because of the heat, is unknown to us. There, according to various writers, are said to live the people who turn their feet against us. [Antipodes is a term applied strictly to any two people or places on opposite sides of the earth, so situated that a line drawn from one to the other passes through the center of the globe and forms a globe diameter; derived from the Greek words anti (opposed) and podes (feet). Any two places having this relation must be distant from each other by 180 degrees of latitude, and one must be as many degrees north of the equator as the other is to the south; in other words, the latitudes are numerically equal, but on is north and the other south. At the antipodes the seasons and day and night are reversed, but in calculation of days and nights, midnight on the one side may be regarded as corresponding to noon either of the previous or following day. People living in opposed regions of the earth, like these, are said to have their feet turned toward each other, the zenith of the one being the nadir of the other].

Noah, son of Lamech, the tenth from Adam, was born according to Genesis, in the 182nd year of his father, and, according to the Hebrew, in the 1056th year of the world, but according to the writings of Orosius, [Paulus Orosius, historian and theologian, was born in Spain toward the close of the fourth century, and flourished about 415. His was undertaken at the suggestion of Augustine, to whom it was dedicated. Beside the Old and the New Testament he appears to have consulted Caesar, Livy, Justin, Tacitus, Suetonius, Florus, and a cosmography, attaching also great value to Jerome's translation of the of Eusebius]. Bede, [Bede, or Beda, (673-735), commonly called "the Venerable Bede," was an English monk and known as "the father of English learning." He was the author of an . For his biography see Folio CLVIII verso and note]. and the LXX, [The Seventy, briefly written LXX, or more exactly 72, translators were sent from Jerusalem to Alexandria by the high priest Eleazar, at the request of Ptolemy II (Philadelphus) (288-247 BCE) to translate the Old Testament into the Greek. This was the earliest Greek translation and is called the Septuagint (Latin , LXX.). The king's share in the business was quite secondary, but we know that he was a ruler of eclectic literary tastes, and that he may well have encouraged an enterprise that not only appealed to his own curiosity, but would promote the use of Greek among the large Jewish population of the city. That population had been steadily increasing, and while loyal to the Hebrew faith, had lost its knowledge of the Hebrew tongue. Faced by sheer necessity, the pious Jews of Alexandria were resolved to understand the Scriptures read in their own synagogues, and they overcame the age long prejudice of the authorities at Jerusalem against the writing of Scripture in any language but Hebrew. The early Christians generally accepted the LXX canon]. in the 1642nd year of the world. His name signifies "rest," for under him all things rested after the flood, and he first conceived tillage of the soil with beasts of the field. Accordingly it is written that he will comfort us in our labors, etc.; for at first the people themselves plowed, but afterward the beasts tilled the soil. Noah was a farmer, and Augustine [St. Augustine (354-430), Latin Father of the Church, was born in Numidia, and became bishop of Hippo, Africa. For his biography see Folio CXXXVI recto and note]. elevates farming to a sacred occupation, a labor set up by God above all other handicrafts, dignities and arts. [The name Noah signifies "rest." Noah was the ninth in descent from Adam, according to Genesis 5:3-30].

From Shem, Ham, and Japheth, the three Sons of Noah, seventy-two peoples descended; and to symbolize these, the Lord Jesus sent seventy-two disciples before him. Augustine says that many others were born who are not remembered, for although they exceeded others in the number of their descendants, they did not create nations. The names of some of these people survived, and we know whence they came—such as the Assyrians out of Asshur, the Hebrews out of Heber. Some were changed or altered in the course of time to such an extent that the most learned and informed historians have been able to trace but a few of these peoples to their origin. All things considered, more names were changed than remained.

Jonicus, fourth son of Noah, was born in the third year of the Flood; but as to him Moses is silent. Jonicus first discovered the science of astronomy, and he prophesied future events. After his father had endowed him he went to the land of Etham, and there he lived and originated a people; and this is the land, called the Land of the Sun, to which went a number of distinguished men, Sons of Japhoth. And Jonicus built a city called Heliopolis. [Heliopolis (City of the Sun) was a celebrated city of Syria and chief seat of the worship of Baal, one of whose symbols was the sun which the Greeks identified with Apollo as well as with Zeus; hence the Greek name of the city. Its location made it a place of great commercial importance, being the direct route from Egypt and the Red Sea and from Tyre to Syria, Asia Minor, and Europe. Hence the wealth of the city, to which its ruins still testify. The priests of Heliopolis were renowned for their learning]. It is said that he also advised Nimrod how to rule. He was a man celebrated for his ingenuity and a great observer of the stars, their courses and attributes; wherefore he prognosticated and preached the origin and decline of the four principal empires. His son Cosdron survived him.

Cush was Ham's son, from whom (according to Josephus) sprang the Ethiopians. These were first called Cushites, but later Ethiopians. From them Ethiopia derived its name. This is beyond the country called Mauretania, and there, in the East, lies the Great Desert. Of Canaan, the son of Ham, were born [No mention is made of Sidon, the first born. Heth was the ancestor of the Hittites, who, in the time of Abraham, occupied the hill country about Hebron. They afterwards spread northward and their name became synonymous with Canaanite. The Jebusites, a mountain tribe, dwelt in Hebus, afterward Mount Zion. After countless centuries of independence they were finally subdued by David. The Amorites were the most powerful and widespread of the Canaanitish tribes. They founded powerful kingdoms on both banks of the Jordan, the eastern Amorites being conquered by Moses, and the western by Joshua. The Hivites were a people who lived in Shechem in the time of Japheth. Their chief seat at the time of the conquest of Canaan seems to have been northwestern Palestine, about Hermon and Lebanon. The Girgasites were a tribe of whom, as Josephus says, only the name remains. The Arkites dwelt on the Mediterranean north of Sidon. Their name is still preserved in the modern Arka, famous as the birthplace of the emperor Alexander Severus. Its ruins are scattered about a lofty mound twelve miles north of Tripoli. The Sinites seem to have left their relics in the mountain fortress of Sinna, mentioned by Strabo, and the town of Sini, or Syn, north of Arka. The Arvadites inhabited the island of Arvad or Arad, and the adjacent shore. Arvad was a rocky island fortress, two miles from the shore, north of Arka and Sini. It was colonized from Sidon, and was the mother of Tarsus, ranking at one time next to Tyre. It is still inhabited by a maritime population bearing the name of Ruad, and retains some well preserved remnants of Phoenician walls. The Zemarites have not been identified by any historical or geographical traces. Perhaps the town of Sumra, or Shoumra, at the foot of Lebanon, between Arka and the sea, is one of the memorials of this tribe. The Hamathites inhabited Hamath, or Chamath Rabba, that is, Chamath the Great, a city on the Orontes, now known by the same name, in the great valley between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon. This valley is known in the Old Testament as "the entering in of Hamath," and formed the northern boundary of the promised land. These descendants of Canaan are set forth in Genesis 10:15-18]. Etheus (Heth), Jebusius (Jebusite), Amoreus (Amorite), Gergeseus (Girgashite), Eveus (Hivite). and Archeus (Arkite); and after each of them certain people is named; as for Eteus, the Hittites; for Jebusius, the Jebusites; for Amoreus, the Amorites; for Gergeseus, the Girgasites; for Eveus, the Hivites, or Gabaonites; (for Areheus, the Arkites). Archeus built the city of Arka, below Mount Libanus. From Canaan, the first son of Ham, came the Canaanites; and Canaan had eleven sons, who inhabited the country of the Canaanites, the promised land (now Judea), and called Canaan after him. Cineus (Sinite). Aradius, after whom were named the Arvadites, who possessed the island of Aradus, which is separated from Phoenicia by a small sea. Zemarite, of whom came the noble city of Simyra, which is called Aeolis. Amatheus, after whom the Hamathites are named. Of Phut, the second son of Ham, came Libya, the country; Atlante, the mountain of Mauretania, and after him the country was called Phut. [Phut, progenitor of the African people, was the third son of Ham. In the wide sense of the word Phut is synonymous with Libya, or Libyans. Jeremiah (46:9) associates Phut (Libyans) with Cush (Ethiopians) as rising up against Pharaoh-necho. Atlante refers to Mount Atlas, and is used as a designation of West African Libya. Atlas is a high mountain in Mauretania, on which heaven was said to rest]. Of Mizraim, the third son, came the Egyptians, also called Mizraim, after their prince. [“And Mizraim begat Ludin, and Namim, and Lehehim, and Naphtuhin, and Pathrusim, and Casluhim (out of whom came Philistim,) and Caphtorim,” (Genesis 10:13-14). The descendants of Mizraim formed the Egyptian nation, and Mizraim is the Hebrew name for Egypt and Egyptian. It is a geographical word meaning narrows, a narrow strip of verdure threaded by the Nile]. Lydia and the Lydians were named after Lidin, and there is St. John’s seat. [Lydia is not in Africa nor in Egypt, but in Asia Minor and is out of place at this point of the text. “Lidin” no doubt refers to Lud, fourth son of Shem, and not a son of Ham, and who is probably the progenitor of the Lydians of Asia Minor. The first son of Mizraim was Ludim, and his tribe was a warlike people of Mauretania, associated by the prophets with the Libyans and Ethiopians. John the Evangelist made Ephesus the center of his operations, and it lies in Lydia]. From Anamim came the Anamites; [The Anamites inhabited the Nile Delta]. From Lehabim [The Lehabim were Egyptian Libyans who dwelt on the west of the Nile Delta. Nahum and Daniel associate them with the Ethiopians. All these names ending in im are plurals]. came the Cubarii, and other unknown peoples exterminated by the Ethiopian wars; and their names have been lost. [In addition to the descendants of Mizraim specifically mentioned, Genesis gives the Naphtuhim, or Middle Egyptians; they were the people of Ptah, the name of an Egyptian god, whose dwelling was Memphis; Pathrusim, inhabitants of Pathros, an Egyptian word meaning southern region, Upper Egyptian; Casluhim, Northeast Egyptians, in the region of Mount Casius; Caphtorim, the Copts of modern Egypt]. Mizraim, the second son of Ham, was the progenitor of seven peoples, of whom the sixth were the Palestinians. Their land is Syria, bordering on Arabia, and from the city of Philistia they were called Philistines. [According to Genesis the Philistines came out of Casluhim, the sixth descendant of Mizraim. They are the Palestinians, as Philistia was the original Palestine, a name which afterward came to mean the same as Canaan. Amos (9:7) and Jeremiah (47:4) describe the Philistines as coming from Caphtor. Knobel believes the Philistines to have been descendants of Shem through Lud]. From Sabtah came the Sabatha, by the Greeks called Astabari. [This begins the line of Cush, whose sons were Sebah, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Sabtechah, and the sons of Raamah, namely Sheba and Dedan; and Cush also begat Nimrod (Genesis 10:7-8). The Sebah were the inhabitants of Meroe of the Upper Nile, situated on the peninsula formed by the Astaboras and the Nile]. Raumah (Rhegma) had two sons, and thereafter the Sabatha lost their old name. From them originated Ethiopian races in the West. From Saba came the Sabii—Arabs, and from them Arabia, and they live by the Libyan Mountains. From Dada came Ethiopians. Havilah was the other son of Gush, who was a son of Ham; and after him were named the Havilites and the Getuli, who live in the remote parts of Africa, Nimrod, the other son of Cush, who was a son of Ham, was a giant of great stature, and the most daring of the sons of Noah. He fomented trouble with the Babylonians. [The sons of Ham were Cush, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan. We are here concerned with the issue of Cush, namely, Sebah, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Sabtechah, and Nimrod. The chronicler seems confused in the names, which in some instances are very similar. The sons of Cush were the Cushite Ethiopians and Arabians. The Sebah, as already stated, were the inhabitants of Meroe of the Upper Nile, situated on the peninsula formed by the Astaboras and the Nile. The Havilah were the Macrobian Ethiopians, who dwelt in what is now Abyssinia. There was also a Shemitic Havilah in Arabia. The Sabtah were the progenitors of the Ethiopians of Hadramont in South Arabia, and their chief city was Sabta, Sabota, or Sabotha. The name Raamah still remains in southeastern Arabia, the Rhegma of the old geographers, where, according to Pliny and Ptolemy, dwelt a fish-eating people. The sons of Raamah were Sheba and Dedan (Genesis 10:7). The Cushite Sheba was on the Persian Gulf, traces of which may perhaps be found in the modern Saba, the thoroughfare of the Hebrew commerce with India. Dedan is probably traceable in Dodan on the east coast of Arabia. The Sabtechah are the dark-skinned Carmanians. They had a river and a city called Sabis. As distinguished from the preceding tribal or place names, that of Nimrod is clearly that of a person, a mighty hunter. He was an Asiatic Cushite].

(a) GENERATIONS OF NOAH THROUGH HAM.

These genealogies are of importance, not as family trees, but as histories of the origin and course of tribes and nations, their relations to each other, and the intermingling of populations. The words “father” and “son” as used in these tables seldom represent individuals. To this Noah was probably an exception, as was Nimrod. Many of the Biblical names are personifications of nations, tribes and places, grouped together to convey some idea of the bond by which they were believed to be connected. Gomer, Javan, Tubal, Mesheck, and Tiras, sons of Japheth, were nations, as were many others.

The Hebraic idea of the tables was to demonstrate purity of descent. In the time of Josephus every priest, so it is said, was required to prove his descent, and perhaps from the time of Ezra lists were carefully kept. The genealogies of Jesus at the beginning of two of the Gospels are intended to prove his descent from David. While in Matthew Jesus is traced to Abraham, in Luke he is traced to Adam.

The foregoing analysis is in accord with the progress of the genealogies as given in the Scriptures, Japheth, Ham, Shem, although the order of the three sons of Noah is Shem, Ham and Japheth. The Chronicle, on the other hand, apparently in obedience to a medieval custom of beginning in the middle, selects Ham and his descendants for first consideration.

At Folio XIV verso we find Noah, the patriarch, represented by a woodcut 2¼" x 6-3/8". From him branch off Ham, his second son (portrayed with his wife, Cathaflua), and Jonicus, his alleged fourth son (of whom Moses makes no mention), portrayed as an astronomer, diligently examining a globe. Apparently this star-gazer was without descendants.

On the same page (Folio XIV verso) a branch runs off to Cush (Chus), who is described as the fourth, instead of the first son of Ham (Cham), and is shown in a dual portrait with his wife. The descendants of Cush extend across Folio XV recto: Sabtechah (Sabata); Raamah (Regma) and his spouse, from whom a branch proceeds to their sons Sheba (Sabaa) and Dedan (Dadan); Havilah (Evila), Seba (Saba), and Nimrod (Nemrot). Sabtah is not portrayed.

Although Cush, the son of Ham, and the descendants of Cush symbolize the Ethiopians, none of the portraits in this branch of the family tree show Ethiopian characteristics except in the case of Dedan, who has negroid features and close cropped, kinky hair.

A second branch proceeds out of Ham. It bears a lone leaf—Phut (Phuh), the third son of Ham, who, through the ancestor of the Libyans, remains uncredited with issue in this gallery of portraits.

Immediately beside Phut is his Egyptian brother, Mizraim (Messaraym), second son of Ham, posed in a dual portrait with his spouse. And out of this pair come forth Ludim (Lydin), Anamim (Annanim), Lebahim (Laabun), and Naphtuhim (Thussim), and Casluhim (Celluin). But Mizraim had seven descendants, not five. Parthusim, progenitor of the people of Pathros (Upper Egyptians) and Caphtorim have been omitted.

And now for the upper branch, proceeding from Ham through his son Canaan, ancestor of the Canaanites, here represented with his wife and eleven sons, arranged in two solid horizontal tiers, five in one row, six in the other. Leafing from the upper branch are Sidon (Sydon), Heth (Etheus), the Jebusite (Jebuseus), the Amorite (Amorreus), and the Girgasite (Bergeseus or Gergeseus). In the lower branch are the Hivite (Eveus), the Arkite (Aratheus), the Sinite (Cyneus), the Arvadite (Aradius), the Zemarite (Samarites), and the Hemathite (Amatheus).

The lineage of Noah through Ham is the first branch of the Generations of Noah illustrated in the Chronicle and occupies a good portion of Folios XIV verso and XV recto, to the exclusion of all text on the latter. None of the portraits in this composite are given personal or national characteristics, and even the picturesque giant hunter Nimrod carries none of the accessories of the chase.

Folio XV verso

Shem, the first son of Noah, was born in the 50th year of his father and in the 2244th year of the world, and 2957th year before the birth of Christ; and he lived 600 years, and bore Arphaxad two years before the Flood; and it is said he was Melchisedek, who firstly after the Flood built Salem, that is, Jerusalem. And twenty-seven peoples sprang from him. But Shem bore five sons of whom five separate peoples sprang. The first was Elam, progenitor of the Elamites, the princes of Persia. And Shem in his hundredth year bore Arphaxad and other sons and daughters, and died.

This Aeshur, the second [referring to the accompanying woodcut] of whom the kingdom of Assyria originated, declined to join Nimrod in striving against God in the building of the Tower of Babel. And he fled from the land of Shinar far into an uninhabited region, which from his name was called Assyria. And thereafter he built the city of Nineveh, the capital of the kingdom of Assyria. This people stand accused of great cruelty.

Aram, the fourth son of Shorn, had four sons, and in him Syria originated. Of this Damascus is the capital. Therefore, in the Hebrew Syria is called Aram.

The first son of Aram was Uz of the land of Traconida, which lies between Palestine and Coele-Syria. [“Hollow Syria” is properly the great hollow running N. and S. between the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon ranges]. In this Judean land lay Uz, out of which came Job, the prophet.

Arphaxad, the third son of Shorn, was born in the 2344th year of the world, according to the seventy interpreters, and he lived 338 years and died. Of this Arphaxad came the Chaldaeans, after whom the land of Chaldaea was named. It lies in Asia, borders on Arabia, is level and arid. It was the great Babylonia.

Shem, who is the progenitor of the Semitic or Asiatic branch of the human race, had five sons: Elam, Asshur, Arphaxad, Lud, and Aram. Elam represents the Elymaeans, who originally peopled the country west of Persia, between it and Mesopotamia, Elymaia, stretching from the Caspian to the Persian Gulf. The old geographers called it Susiana; Herodotus calls it Cissia. It became important in the time of Abraham. Asshur is the eponym for Assyria. The name Arphaxad has been interpreted to mean fortress or country of the Chaldees. Others have identified the name with Arrapachitia, a region on the east bank of the Tigris, north of the primitive Assyria and joining Armenia. Lud is supposed to stand for the Lydians, a warlike race that spread westward into Asia Minor, and there founded a powerful kingdom, which was conquered by Cyrus, and swallowed up in the Persian Empire. But the matter is uncertain. The Arabic historians assign to Lud the Amalekites and the primitive Arabs, being younger branches of the nation. It is possible that the primitive Amorites and Philistines were Semitic people of the stock of Lud. Aram represents Aramea, or Syria, especially that part north of Palestine. Mesopotamia is the Aram of the two rivers, that is, Euphrates streams. The Semitic languages, Syraic and Chaldee, originated in Aram.

Uz gave name to the country of Job, in the north of Arabia Deserta. Hul, Gether and Mash are not identified to any degree of certainty.

Noah planted a vineyard, and after he drank of the wine he became drunk and lay uncovered in his tent. Now when Ham saw the nakedness of his father, he told his two brothers about it. But they laid upon his shoulders a garment to cover his nakedness, and turned away their eyes and they did not see their father's nakedness. Now as Noah wanted to curse Ham, whom God had blessed, he cursed Canaan, the son of Ham, because Ham had laughed at his father, as has previously been written. [The narrative is not exactly in accord with the text of Genesis 10:20-26].

(b) GENERATIONS OF NOAH THROUGH SHEM.

This foliated design begins with a dual portrait of Shem (Sem) and his wife. Out of them to the right grows a continuous branch bearing their sons, Elam (the first born), Asshur (Assur), Lud (Luth) and Aram (Aran). Arphaxad (Arfaxat), the remaining son of Shem, is shown on a separate branch. From Aram proceed his sons Uz (Hus), Hul, Gether and Mash (Mel). The long line of descendants of Arphaxad (Genesis 10:24-29) is not shown. The thick branch representing this line has been abruptly cut off by the artist immediately below Arphaxad's waist. In short, the composite represents only the five sons of Shem and the issue of Aram; for room had to be left for

Noah in the Vineyard

This illustration depicts Genesis 9:20-27.

Here we see Noah asleep in the open vineyard. The artist gave no thought to the tent mentioned in Genesis. The vines are burdened with tempting clusters of luscious grapes, too powerful for the unsophisticated farmer. The powerful drink has overcome him, and there he lies to the amusement of his younger son Ham (Chem) who is meddling with his father's garments, and attempting to interest his elder brothers in the action. But Shem and Japheth are horrified and turn away from the scene; but they are not attempting to cover up their father's nakedness, as Genesis says they did.

Folio XVI recto

Japheth, the third son of Noah, had seven sons. He possessed Europe, and for his nobleness of character he was blessed by his father, who also expressed a wish for his enlargement. [Having recovered from his drunkenness, and cursed Ham's son Canaan for his father's filial disrespect, Noah spoke again: "Blessed be the Lord God of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant. God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant," (Genesis 10:26-27)]. From Japheth sprang fifteen peoples, and from his sons seven. Gomer, first born of Japheth, came to Europe and established the Gomerites, whom the Greeks called the Galatians; and after them the country was named Galatia. This country borders on Hispania and Lusitania, which lie to the south. The Atlantic Ocean is to the west and north, and on the east are the Sequana (Seine) and the country of the Germans. [The chronicler appears to refer to those earliest inhabitants of Europe who came from Asia into Gallaecia, the most northwesterly province in Spain. He does not refer to Galatia, a province of Asia Minor, inhabited by the Galatians to whom Paul wrote. He has followed Josephus, who says, "For Gomer founded those whom the Greeks now call Galatians (Galls), but were then called Gomerites," (Josephus, B. 1, c. 6, s. 1)]. The Galatians are from Gomer, first son of Japheth, and from him came Galatia. And Gomer had four sons; the first was Askenaz, of whom came the Sarmatians, a Scythian people who lived in the depths of the swamps of Maeotis, an inhospitable region of poor vegetation. [According to Josephus, "Askenaz founded the Aschanasians, who are now called by the Greeks Reginians." The Askenaz lived in the northwest of Asia Minor, in the region of the Black Sea. The swamps of Maeotis (Palus Maeotis), appear on the Map of the World (Folios XII verso and XIII recto). The Scythians occupied the lands on the shores of Lake Maeotis (Sea of Azov). The Sarmatians were a people who settled an ancient territory in southern Russia, and after them called Sarmatia. From them sprang the present stock of Slavs. Sarmatia is poetically applied to Poland and the Poles]. The second son was Riphath, or Raphaa, of whom came the Paphlagonians and the country called Paphlagonia, in Asia Minor. [Josephus says, "So did the Riphath founded the Ripheans, now called Paphlagonians," (Josephus, B. 1, c. 6, s. 1). Paphlagonia is a rugged country on the Euxine, between Bithynia and Partus]. The third son was Togarmah, from whom came the Phrygians and the country of Phrygia in Asia Minor. It was first called Dardania, and later Troy. [Togarmah is claimed by the Armenians as their founder. This people originally dwelt in Armenia and Asia Minor, but they poured across the Hellespont into Europe before the dawn of history, and spread across the Mediterranean peninsula, even to Spain.] Of Magog, second son of Japheth, came the Scythians, and from them the Goths. [Magog probably means "the place" or region of Gog. The Arabians applied the name to the region between the Caspian and Black Seas]. Of Madar, or Madai, third son [of Japhet], came the Medes, and from them Media, a country near Assyria and Persia. [The Medes were a powerful nation to the south and southwest of the Caspian, and the east of Armenia and Assyria]. Of Javan, fourth (son of Japheth), came the Greeks; and Javan had four sons. And this same Javan made the Ionians or Greeks. Ionia was a region of the Greeks, between Caria and Colia, now called Thurgia. [Ionia, a western province of Asia Minor, was early colonized by the Greeks]. Of Elishah, the first [son of Javan] came Elis, afterward called Aeolia. And the Aeolian Islands are said to be 25,000 paces from Italy. [The Aeolians (Elis), occupied three-fourths of Greece, and spread to the coasts and isles of Asia Minor]. Tarshish, second [son of Javan], made Tarsus, in Asia Minor, formerly called Cilicia, which was St. Paul's fatherland. [Tarsus, birthplace of St. Paul, is a town and seaport in southeastern Asia Minor; chief city of ancient Cilicia (Acts 9:11)]. From Kittim [Cethimus], the third [son of Javan] comes Cyprus, the island formerly called Cithinia. [Josephus says, "Cethimus possessed the island of Cethimia; it is now called Cyprus," (Josephus, I, c. 6, s. 1)]. From Dodanim, fourth [son of Javan], came Burgundy. He came into the island of Rhodes, and wished to be called Rhodius. [Dodanim refers to the Dardanians, or Trojans]. From Tubal, fifth (son of Japheth), came Hispania, a very large country. From Meschech, sixth (son of Japheth), came the Cappadocians and the land of Cappadocia which lies near Greater Asia. [Tubal and Meschech stand for two peoples who are constantly associated together. Josephus identifies Tubal with the Iberians, who once dwelt between the Caspian and the Euxine. The Mosci were the ancestors of the Muscovites, builders of Moscow, and still give Russia its name throughout the East]. Tiras, seventh (son of Japheth), called his people Thracians; and of them came Thrace, in the land of Scythia. [The Thracians dwelt between Mount Haemus and the Aegean, on the southwest shores of the Black Sea].

(c) GENERATIONS OF NOAH THROUGH JAPHETH.

This composite contains eighteen portraits, and, in arrangement and execution, is one of the best in the series. The main stem proceeds downward in the manner of most genealogies, which, for convenience of design, uproot the "family tree" and invert it.

Of the eighteen persons represented, all wear headdresses except Japheth, his youngest son Tiras, and his grandson Elishah. In the case of Japheth the cap was probably omitted to show his venerable bald head. But Tiras, progenitor of the Thracians, has a good crop of kinky hair. However, we see that he is manipulating a "globe," and it may have been assumed that he is in his study where no cranial protection is necessary. The head of Elishah, progenitor of the Aeolians, was left bare perhaps in order to make way for the rather sparse crown of laurels which the artist has bestowed upon him as god of the winds in lieu of an Aeolian harp.

Folio XVI verso

Salah, who is also called Canaan, the son of Arphaxad, was born in the 35th year of his father, and in the 2379th year of the world. He built the city first called Salem, naming it after himself. It was later called Jerusalem. He lived 433 years. [Salah was the son of Arphaxad and the father of Heber, and the name symbolizes sending forth, the gradual extension of the Semitic races. The line of Arphaxad is here continued from Folio XV verso, according to Genesis 10:24-29, as that with which the narrative is chiefly concerned. Arphaxad begot Salah, Salah begot Heber, or Eber, who had two sons, Peleg and Joktan, and in their day "the earth was divided." Peleg begot Reu, while Joktan begot thirteen sons, Almodad, Sheleph, Hazarmaveth, Jerah, Hadoram, Uzal, Diklah, Obal, Abimael, Sheba, Ophir, Havilah, and Jobab; progenitors of tribes peopling southern Arabia, many of whom are clearly identified with historical tribes. These thirteen sons are not mentioned in the text, but are pictorially treated in the genealogy].

Augustine states that from the blessing of the sons of Noah up to Abraham no mention is made of righteous persons, although I believe this period was not without them. However, to recall all of them would take too long, and would involve more historical zeal than prophetic prudence.

Heber (Eber), son of Salah, was born in the 30th year of his father, and in the 2509th year of the world. He lived 464 years, and from him the Hebrews have their name; for after the dispersion of tongues, the Hebrew tongue alone remained in his house. Before the dispersion this was not called Hebrew, but was the language of all mankind. Yet it is also named after Abraham by reason of circumstances which the learned understand. [The last statement apparently refers to Jerusalem and not to Heber. The origin of the name Jerusalem, and the identity of Salem and Jerusalem have been the subject of much controversy. The rabbis state that the name Salem was bestowed on Jerusalem by Shem (identified in their traditions with Melchizedek), and the name Jireh by Abraham, after the deliverance of Isaac on Mt. Moham, and that the two were afterwards combined, lest displeasure should be felt by either of the two saints at the exclusion of the other. Josephus says that Salem and Jerusalem are the same; Jerome, that they are not; but it is natural to identify one with the other, since the Tell el-Amarna tablets show that Urusalim existed as a name for that city even before the Israelite immigration].

Joktan, son of Heber, had thirteen sons, and each created a tribe; but their names, as Jerome states, are unknown to us because they are too remote, or because of the dispersion of the people. [Genesis 10:26-29].

Peleg, the son of Heber, was born in the 2643rd year of the world, and attained the age of 239 years. His name means one who has been divided from the rest; for although in his day occurred the division of the tongues, and he did not remain in the same clan, yet the same tongue continued to be spoken in his house. Augustine states that no small measure of righteousness remained in this house, and consequently it remained free from punishment, not having participated in the wrong. The number of tongues was according to the number of tribes, namely 72. However, the number of tribes increased beyond the number of tongues, and we find many peoples who all speak the same language. [Peleg was the son of Heber, and the brother of Joktan. His name means division, relating, as is generally believed, to the division of tongues, recorded in Genesis 11, immediately following, for “in his days was the earth divided. This does not refer to the general dispersion of the human family after the Deluge, but to a division of the family of Heber himself, the younger branch of whom (the Joktanids) migrated into southern Arabia, while the elder remained in Mesopotamia].

Reu, or Regau, son of Peleg, was born in the 2773rd year of the world, and he lived 302 years. It is said that in his time many temples were first built for the worship of the princes of the people. [Reu was the son of Peleg, and the name is said to correspond with Roha, the Arabic name for Edessa; but a closer resemblance might be found between Reu and Rhagae, a large town of Media].

THE LINEAGE OF Christ

GENERATIONS OF ARPHAXAD THROUGH HIS SON SALAH

This section of genealogies is based upon two chapters of Genesis: firstly, Chapter 10:24-30; secondly, Chapter 11:12-18. In the former the descendants of Joktan are given; in the latter, the descendants of his brother Peleg. At Folio XV verso the composite portrait ends with Arphaxad, and here, at the right of the page, we begin with his son Salah (Sale). The Lord blessed him with a wife and a son named Heber, but the artist forgot the wife. The line proceeds downward to Eber (Heber) and his spouse, and thence to their son Peleg, the father of Reu (or Regau). The severed branch below Reu indicates that we may expect something of him in the future. Here ends the right hand column, or composite of at least seven woodcuts, including four portraits and three intermediate floral ornaments.

From Heber, on the right, a horizontal branch (two woodcuts) proceeds to the left hand column of the page, devoted to Joktan and his descendants. He was the ancestor of the old Arabian tribes as represented by his thirteen sons. This list of “sons” is probably not to be taken as a scientific or geographical classification of the tribes or districts of Arabia, but as an attempt to incorporate in the table such Arabian races as were known.

At the top of this formidable line of sons of the desert (cut from a single block) appears Joktan and his dutiful spouse. We have some difficulty in reading the names on the portraits, which in most instances vary substantially from the names as given in the English Bible. Nor is the Chronicle text of any help, as it speaks only of the line of Joktan’s brother shown on the opposite side of the page. Yet there is a definite order. The sons are arranged in six groups of two each plus a thirteen man at the bottom of the page. The names appear in the same order as they appear in the Bible. We begin with Almodad (Elimodoch), the first born, at the upper left, and follow a left-right order with each pair to the end. This leaves only one case in doubt, that of Hadoram, whose place is filled by one “Jareth”—a far cry to Hadoram. There is nothing in any one of these portraits to remind one of the Arabs or their country, in feature, costume, or accessories. Of the thirteen sons seven wear head dresses, the rest do not; nine are bearded, four not. All appear to be worried about one thing or another.

Folio XVII recto

Jerusalem, located in the land of Palestine and the capital city of the Jews, was first called Jebus, later Salem, thirdly Hierosolima, and finally Helia. [The Jebusites were a Canaanite tribe, and Jebus was their chief city. And so, it is said, Jerusalem was called at the time of the Israelites’ conquest under Joshua. The Jebusites were not entirely driven out of the land until c. 985 BCE when David took the city and made it the capital of the kingdom of Israel. By the erection of the temple of Solomon it also became the permanent center of the Jewish religion. After the division of the kingdom, it remained the capital of the kingdom of Judah until it was entirely destroyed and its inhabitants were carried off into Babylonian captivity (588 BCE). Fifty-two years later Cyrus permitted the exiles to return, and they rebuilt the city. In 332 BCE Jerusalem submitted to Alexander and it remained under Greek rule until the conquest of Palestine by Antiochus the Great of Syria, 198 BCE. In 70 CE the Jews rebelled against the Romans, who put them to the sword or sold them as slaves and razed their temples to the ground. Having revolted again, Hadrian resolved to destroy the last vestiges of their national and religious peculiarities. To this end he established a new Roman colony on the ground where Jerusalem had stood; and he named it Aelia Capitolina. This is the Helia to which the chronicler refers. In 135 CE Hadrian built a temple to Jupiter on the site of the temple of Jehovah. Jerusalem was not restored to its sacred character until Rome itself accepted Christianity. The origin of Jerusalem is shrouded in obscurity. The first reference that may be connected with it is the incident of the mysterious Melchizedek, king of Salem (Genesis 14:18). But there is no ancient authority for applying this name to Jerusalem. The name Jebus as an alternative name for the city, as suggested in certain biblical passages, is also shrouded in obscurity and remains unverified]. The city’s first builder was Canaan, who was called a righteous king, and his name was Melchizedek, a priest of the Most High God. In course of time he built a temple there, and he called it Solimas. The Solymi were a people living in the mountains by the land of Lycia. [Lycia is a small, but interesting district in the southern part of Asia Minor, jutting out into the Mediterranean. The mountains, called Solyma, are on its eastern border. Lycia was colonized by the Hellenic race (probably from Crete) at a very early period. Its historical inhabitants were Greeks, though with a mixture of native blood. The earlier names were preserved in the district in the north of the country called Milyas, and in the mountains called Solyma. Josephus (VII, c. 3, 2) states that under Abraham, Jerusalem was called Salem or Solyma. Some say that Homer mentions it by the name of Solyma; for he named the Temple of Solyma, according to the Hebrew language, which denotes security. Some copies of Josephus here have Solyma, or Salem, and others, Hierosolyma, or Jerusalem]. They called Hierosolima after themselves. The city was inhabited by the Canaanites up to David’s time. Joshua, the Jewish ruler, did not expel the Canaanites and Jebusites. When David rebuilt the city, after driving out the Jebusitea, he called it Hierosolima, that is, the most secure one. Its location is rocky, and it was fortified by a triple wall, a surplus of water within, but entirely dry without. It was surrounded by a moat, cut out of the rock 40 feet deep and 250 wide. With the rock thereby secured, the pinnacles and walls of the most renowned temple were built. This most celebrated of all the cities of the East was built upon two hills. And as one hill was higher than the other, so was one part of the city more elevated than the other. The other hill was called David's Citadel. It contained a lower city, and this was lower in all respects. The valley in the middle belonged to Siloam, the sweet spring. The city was greatly beautified through the industry of David, Solomon, and other kings. Agrippa also added to city and enlarged it. [About 465 acres are said to have been enclosed in the Holy city during the period of its greatest extent, after the third wall had been built by Agrippa; but the old walls of Solomon and Zerubbabel included a small area of but 155 acres]. And so from time to time, as the population increased, it extended beyond its walls. The addition was called the New City. The whole city was 33 furlongs in circumference. Although the whole city was wonderful, the third wall was even more so, particularly because of its towers, standing in an angle toward the north and west. From these could be seen Arabia and the sea as far as the region of the Hebrews. And there was much costly shining marble in and about the king's hall. But the death of Christ sanctified this city, for there is the temple of his teachings; the place of his bitter suffering for our redemption; the grave of his most sacred body; the mount of his ascension to heaven from whence he will return for the Judgment. Item: There the Lord selected the poor uneducated fishermen to capture emperors and kings with their lines and nets. There he made the blind to see, cured the leper, made the lame to walk, awakened the dead, and performed many other divine miracles; and, all this so that the world might come to recognize the light of truth and virtue.

CITY OF JERUSALEM Size 7-7/16" x 9-7/8"

This woodcut occupies over half a page. It represents the city of Jerusalem, a fact made known to us by the inscription in ecclesiastical Latin, Hierosolima. The city is securely and very compactly lodged in the confines of three successive circular walls, perfectly concentric and giving it the appearance of the labyrinth. The whole is dominated by the prematurely introduced Temple of Solomon (Templum Salomois). Its oriental architecture is rather out of harmony with its medieval setting.

The whole is represented as a very much overbuilt medieval city of Europe—no standing room, except on the temple steps—not a soul in sight. Not a tree or shrub shows its head within the walls.

The fortifications of Jerusalem are more fully described in the Nehemiah than elsewhere. Starting at the head of the Wady er-Rabadi, or Valley of Hinnom, is the southwest corner of the wall. Then comes the Valley Gate, half way down the valley. At the bottom of the valley where it joined the Kedron was the Dung Gate, outside of which has been found what appears to have been a cesspit. Turning northward, we come upon the Fountain Gate; and the Water Gate on Ophel, over the 'Virgin's Fountain.' The gates on the northeast and north side of the wall seem to have been in order the Horse Gate, the East Gate, the Gate Hammiphkad, after which came the corner of the wall. Then on the north side the Sheep Gate, the Fish Gate, and somewhere on the north or northwest side, the Old Gate. Probably the Ephraim and Corner gates were somewhere in this neighborhood.

Beside these gates the Temple was provided with entrances, some of whose names are preserved. Such was the gate Sur and the Gate of the Guard, the Shallecheth Gate at the west, Parbar and the East Gate. The Beautiful Gate was probably the same as the Nicanor gate, between the Women's and the Priests' Court.

The gates named on the woodcut are those leading into the city. The artist has given the city but six of these, although Nehemiah mentions at least twice that number.

Folio XVII verso

The three princes, Joktan (Jectan), Nimrod (Nemroth), and Suphena, as well as their people, feared that the Flood might come again and drown them. So they assembled in the field of Shinar [The region where the people, after the Flood, made bricks and used slime (bitumen) for mortar (Genesis 11:2-3). It was probably the Hebrew name for the plain of Mesopotamia, on the Euphrates and the Tigris. It would seem originally to have denoted the northern part of Babylonia, as Chaldea denoted the southern; but subsequently, like Chaldea, it was sometimes used for the whole]. and decided to build a tower that would reach to heaven, etc. But as God saw that they would not abstain from carrying out this foolhardy plan, he divided or confused their tongues so that the people were scattered throughout the world.

Babylon was the beginning of Nimrod's kingdom. After the confusion of tongues he gave his realm to his son Belus and moved on to Persia. But Augustine says that Nimrod was driven from there, and that the sons of Aashur ruled the kingdom for 1305 years.

Belus is said to have ruled in obscurity, for he had but a small dominion. He was the first who through the error of mankind was regarded as a god. Different people called him by various names, such as Bel, Baal, Baalim, Beelphegor, and Beelzebub.

Many kingdoms now sprang up: Firstly, that of Sictarum (Scythia), which, although the oldest, is not reckoned among the most renowned, because of the coarseness of its people as hereafter stated. It is the first part of Europe. Secondly, the kingdom of the Masungetharum (Massagetae). [A Scythian people to the east of the Caspian Sea, in the modern Sangaria and Mongolia]. The third, Sichiomorum (Sicyonia), of which Varro [Marcus Terentius Varro (116-27 BCE) was an antiquarian and a man of letters, and not only

“the most learned of the Romans,” but also the most voluminous Roman writer. The scope of his endeavors may be gathered from Cicero’s tribute: “You have revealed to us the age of our fatherland, its chronology, the laws of its religion and priesthoods, the plan of our home and foreign administration, the position of our territories and districts, the titles and descriptions of all things divine and human, with the duties and principles attaching to them, and you have shed a vast amount of light on our poets, and on Latin literature in general, and on the Latin vocabulary,” etc. Sicyon was an ancient city, near Corinth, Greece]. wrote in ancient times, and which extended to Athens and afterwards to the Latin countries. The fourth was the kingdom of the Egyptians. Of all those and of others more will be said on the following page.

Among other kingdoms, as Augustine says, there are two principal ones—the Assyrian and the Roman empires. The kingdom of the Assyrians was the first to originate in the East; that of Rome, in the West. When the Assyrian empire ended, the Roman began. Now the other king of the Assyrians and first sole ruler was Ninus, who through greed to rule, made war upon his neighbors and created disturbances among them. Because of their lack of skill in war, he soon subjugated them, and so the whole of Asia. And he conquered half the earth, and enlarged the great city of Nineveh, which Asshur had built, and gave it his own name. Ninus was the first inventor of idolatry. He made an image of his deceased father Belus in order to ease his sorrows. And to all evildoers who fled to it he granted security and freedom. In this way the image came to be worshipped. After it, others also made statues of the dead, into which the devil entered and gave answers from them. Through these images they endeavored to secure divine favor. This same idol and its temple were afterward destroyed by Daniel the prophet when he was led captive to Babylonia.

BUILDING OF THE TOWER OF BABEL

This illustration, very tall and narrow, is well suited to its purpose. The tower of Babel shown under construction. Four stories have been completed, each with a balcony and receding toward the top. A building block is being raised, and one of the workmen is signaling, apparently to the operators of the crane below. A second man reaches for the stone to put it into place. Two or three other workmen are seen on top of the structure. The sharp tongs that grip the suspended block seem ill suited to the purpose. A large blooming plant has already reared itself at the base of the tower.

Folio XVIII recto

OF THE TOWER OF BABEL OR BABYLONIA

Nimrod, a man with a strong hand, was, after the death of Noah, his lord, fired with a desire to rule. His kingdom had its beginning in the field of Shinar. There this same most indigent and talkative man held a meeting. And in order to draw the people away from their fear of God, he advised them to bake bricks and to erect a tall tower whose steeples should touch the sky, so that they might ascend to heaven thereby. Now, as they were building the tower and thus raising themselves against God, the Lord struck down their folly and pride with a single punishment, whereby the seventy-two peoples who had gathered together there, and who descended from the three sons of Noah and spoke one tongue, were divided into as many tongues; and they could no longer understand one another. And so the assembly was dissolved, and the people were scattered upon the face of the earth. Where this tower once stood is clear to but few people. They say that in the beginning, a noble commercial or manufacturing city of the Chaldeans, called Baldach, stood upon the banks of the Euphrates. Its inhabitants say that not far from this city is to be seen a large rock pile, inaccessible because of the sharp rocks and poisonous animals. And there they say the tower stood, and from hence all things were carried out of Babylonia into their city. Bede says that this tower was 1174 paces high. And it was called Babel, that is, division or dispersion; for although there was one language throughout the world until then, the Lord thus scattered the people through all parts of the earth. [The Tower of Babel is named in the Bible but once, and is then referred to as incomplete (Genesis 11:4-5). It was apparently built of burnt bricks and bitumen was used for mortar. Jewish traditions and early profane writers say that the tower was destroyed. The captive Jews at Babylon thought they recognized it, however, in the famous Temple of Belus, which some would identify with the temple of Nebo at Borsippa, the modern Birs Nimrud. The Birs Nimrud is one of the most striking ruins on the plain and is six miles southwest of Hillah, on the Euphrates. This great mound is about 2300 feet in circumference and 250 feet high, and was built of burnt bricks, each 12 inches square and 4 inches thick. Several of these bear the inscription of Nebuchadnezzar. The tower is represented as in the form of a pyramid, built in seven receding stories, each of the first three being 26 feet high, each of the last four being 15 feet high. On the seventh story was a temple or ark, perhaps with a statue of the god Belus. The Birs Nimrud is most probably the Tower of Babel of , and seems to have been a temple dedicated to the heavenly bodies].

The kingdom of Scythia (Scytharum) had its beginning in the region toward the north. There first ruled Tanai (Thanay), after whom was named the great river, Tanais, which flows into the swamps called Palus Maeotis. And this region is divided by that same river. A portion of the region is in Europe, while the rest extends into Asia. [The river Tanais rises in the north of Sarmatia Euopaea (about the center of Russia) and flows to the southeast till it nears the Volga, when it turns to the southwest, and falls into the northeast angle of the Palus Maeotis (Sea of Azov) by two principal mouths and several smaller ones. It was usually considered the boundary between Europe and Asia]. The European part ends at Thracia. [Thracia, in early times, was a vast space of country bounded on the north by the Danube, on the south by the Propontis (Sea of Marmora) and the Aegean, on the east by the Pontus Euxine (Black Sea) and on the west by the river Strymon and the most easterly of the Illyrian tribes. It was divided into two parts by the Haemus mountains (Balkans) running from east to west. At a later time the name Thrace was applied to a more limited area]. It contains but a small amount of animal life and is uninterrupted by water-ways. But the part which stretches eastward into Asia is inhabited by various peoples. In general all Scythians use the bow, ride horses, and sustain themselves, not with the plow, but by the chase. Although this land is the oldest, yet as its people are coarse, it is not reckoned as one of the four principal and more advanced countries. Yet these Scythian people never allowed themselves to be subdued in battle. They drove off Darius, the king of Persia. They killed Cyrus. They destroyed Syphirionas, the general of Alexander the Great; repulsed and drove to flight the king of Egypt and his army with all its implements of war. They defeated Asia three times and compelled it to pay tribute for many years. Out of these Scythians came many who accomplished great things. Firstly, the Amazons, the highly celebrated women, who apparently performed great deeds in battle. Bactria and Parthia came out of them; also the great Attila (and others), who subjugated Pannonia, and sacked Aquilaeia, and committed much waste in Germany, also descended from them. Zeliorbis, the Hungarian king, who rose up against Emperor Justinian, had his origin in Scythia. The Hungarians, Catalauni, and all the Goths also had their origin there, as did the Dani and the Turks. The country had its beginning in Magog, the grandson of Noah. Its people are coarse and have no regard for justice or equality. They worship snakes and are idolatrous, and are involved in many indecent cravings. [Scythia is a name applied to very different countries at different times. The Scythia of Herodotus comprises the southeastern parts of Europe between the Carpathian mountains and the river Tanäis (Don). Herodotus believed these people to be of Asiatic origin, and his description of them leaves no doubt that they were a part of the great Mongol race who wandered from unknown antiquity, over the steppes of Central Asia. He further states that they were driven from Asia by the Massagetae. The Scythians were a nomadic people (shepherds or herdsmen), with no fixed habitation. They roamed over great areas living in covered wagons. They kept large troops of horses and were extremely skilled in cavalry exercises and archery. When Darius invaded their country he found it almost impossible to act against them due to their shifting tactics. Their government was a sort of patriarchal monarchy or chieftainship].

The kingdom of the Assyrians, in the East, had its inception in the 25th year of the life of Baruch [The amanuensis of Jeremiah (Jeremiah 36:4)]. (as Eusebius states), [Eusebius, surnamed Pamphili, to commemorate his devoted friendship for Pamphilus, bishop of Caesarea, was born in Palestine about 264 CE, was himself made bishop of Caesarea in 315, and died about 340. He was a man of great learning. His of five volumes from the creation of the world, which he places at 5499 BCE to 221 CE, has been lost. This first volume of Eusebius gives lists of kings and other magistrates, with short accounts of remarkable events from the creation to his own time. The second book consists of synchronological tables, with similar catalogues of rulers and striking occurrences, from the time of Abraham to the celebration of Constantine's Vicennalia, 327-8 CE, held in commemoration of the twentieth year of his reign. The Greek text of the is lost, but a Latin translation of part of it by Jerome survived. It was published at Leiden in 1616, and an enlarged edition at Amsterdam in 1658. There is also an Armenian translation, discovered at Constantinople, and published at Milan in 1818. Eusebius wrote other important works, such as his , in 15 volumes, a collection of facts and quotations from old writers, and by this it was supposed the mind would be prepared to receive Christianity. This book is almost as important in the study of ancient philosophy, as the is with reference to history, for in it are preserved excerpts from the writings of every philosopher of note whose works are not now extant. Eusebius supplemented this 15-volume work with his in 20 books (of which only 10 remain). It was addressed principally to the Jews. He also wrote an Ecclesiastical History in 10 books, containing the history of Christianity from the birth of Christ to 324 CE. His is an account of the persecutions under Diocletian and Maximin from 303 to 310]. and among all others, it was the most eminent and renowned. The time from Belus, its first king, to Sardanapolis, its last one, is 1302 years. During this period it had 37 kings. Assyria lies in Asia. The Euphrates is on its east, and it extends west to our (Mediterranean) sea and Egypt. To the north are Armenia and Cappadocia. On the south is Arabia. And this is Syria.

Folio XVIII verso

The Amazonian kingdom of the women had its origin (as they say) in the time of Regau (Reu) between Scythia and Albania. And these were Scythian women. They first lived by the river Tanais (Don), and later came to the river Termodonta; [The Thermodon, a river of Pontus, in the district of Themiscyra, the reputed country of the Amazons. It rises in a mountain called Amazonius (and still Mason Dag) near Phanaroea, and falls into the sea about 30 miles east of the mouth of the Iris, after a short course, but with so large a volume of water that its breadth, according to Zenophon, was three plethra (more than 300 feet); and it was navigable. At its mouth was the city of Themiscyra Pontus, the most northeasterly district of Asia Minor, along the coast of the Euxine or Black Sea, having no specific name. It was spoken of as the country on the Pontus (Euxine), and so acquired the name Pontus]. and after them some have called this region Amazonia. They afterward moved forward and succeeded in subjugating a large part of Asia. Their first two queens were Marthesia and Lampedona, who said they were descended from Mars, the god of war. Now as they proceeded from Europe into Asia and conquered much Asiatic territory, they built Ephesus, Smyrna and many other cities. They neither associated nor intermingled with men until spring, when they cohabited with them until they found themselves pregnant. If the child was a boy, they killed it. If it was a girl, they seared and cut off the right breast, and brought her up and trained her in the art of war. From this custom they derived the name Amazons, for according to the Latin, this means without a breast. Hercules and Bellerophon, the king of Corinth, fought with these women and defeated them. Concerning this Justinus and Diodorus Siculus have written accounts.

Mythology describes the Amazons as a race or nation of female warriors on the northerly coast of Asia Minor, and with whom the Greeks repeatedly warred. Bellerophon, the Greek hero who slew the Chimera and perished in the attempt to scale heaven on the winged horse Pegasus, engaged the Amazons during his career. Hercules and Theseus each conducted battled with them; while Achilles slew their queen Penthesileia, when the Amazons came to the aid of the besieged Trojans. It is considered that the temple servants of the great Anatolian goddess may have originally been armed women and so have given rise to these Greek legends. Although the Amazons did not tolerate men among them, they were in touch with a neighboring tribe for the purpose of propagating their race. The boys who were born to them they killed or sent back to their fathers; the girls they retained. From these they removed the right breasts, as these interfered with the drawing of the bow and the hurling of the spear. In consequence the name Amazon (a or ab [without] and mazos [breast]) is given to them in the mythology of the Greeks.

Justinus, whom the chronicler cites, is a historian, of uncertain date, but who did not live later than the fourth or fifth century of our era. He is the author of an extant work, Historiarum Philippicarum Libri XLIV. It is taken from the Historiae Philippicae of Trogus Pompeius, who lived in the time of Augustus. The title Philippicae was given the work because its main object was to give the history of the Macedonian monarchy, with all its branches; but Trogus indulged in so many excursions that the work formed a kind of universal history. The work of Justinus is a selection of such parts of Trogus as seemed worthy of being generally known. The original work of Trogus, which was one of great value, is lost.

Diodorus Siculus, of Agyrium in Sicily, the chronicler's second authority, was a contemporary of Julius Caesar and Augustus. He traveled over a great part of Europe and Asia, and spent thirty years upon his work entitled the Historical Library. It embraced the period from the earliest mythical ages to the beginning of Caesar's Gallic wars. It was divided into three great sections and into forty books. It is constructed upon the plan of annals, the events of each year being placed one after the other without internal connection. The author simply collected what he found in his different authorities, resulting in a mixture of history, myth and fiction. He frequently misunderstood authorities, and often contradicts himself. However, the compilation is of great importance because of the great mass of materials he collected from writers whose works have perished.

Egypt had its beginning in the time of Regau (Reu). According to Eusebius its first king was Soros. [As Menes was the founder of the first Egyptian dynasty, and therefore its first king, this note probably refers to the mythological Horus (or Horos, here erroneously called Soros), the sun-god, from whom the historical kings of Egypt claim to have descended]. This country (as we read) was affected by manifold and various changes and uprisings, of which the Holy Scriptures make frequent mention. This continued to the time of Augustus Octavianus. [Born September 23, 63 BCE; died August 29, 14 CE, at the age of 76]. Mizraim, son of Ham, was the first to take up residence there. Egypt lies in Africa and derived its name (as some would be pleased to have it) from Aegyptus, the brother of Danaus. [Belus had two sons, the twin brothers Aegyptus and Danaüs. To the former he assigned Arabia; to the latter Libya. But Aegyptus subdued the country of the Melampodes, which he called Aegypt after his own name. Aegyptus by his several wives had 50 sons, and his brother Danaüs 50 daughters. Danaüs had reason to fear the sons of his brother and fled with his daughters to Argos in Peloponesus. There he was followed by the sons of Aegyptus, who demanded his daughters for their wives, and promised faithful alliance. Danaüs complied and distributed his daughters among them; but to each he gave a dagger with which to kill their husbands on the bridal night. All the sons of Aegyptus were thus murdered with the exception of Lynceus, who was saved by Hypermnestra. The Danaides buried the heads of their murdered husbands in Lerna, and their bodies outside the town, and were afterwards purified of their crime by Athena and Hermes at the command of Zeus. According to the poets the Danaides were punished in Hades by being compelled to everlastingly pour water into a sieve. From Danaüs the Argives (people of Argos or Argolis, as their country was called) were called Danaï, which name like that of the Argives was often applied by the poets (especially Homer) to the collective Greeks]. According to Pliny it borders on Ethiopia on the south. To the north is the Egyptian [Mediterranean] Sea. It seldom rains there, but the land is watered and made productive by the river Nile, as has been earlier told.

The kingdom of Sicyonia had its beginning in Achata in the seventy-fourth year of the life of Nachor [Nahor, grandson of Reu and grandfather of Abraham (Genesis 11:21-26)]. (as Eusebius states), and there Aegilaeus first ruled. After him it was called Aegilaea. It was afterward named Danaa, and later Achaia. In the same country was the highly renowned city of Corinth. The region (as Pliny states) abounds in oil orchards or oil vegetation. So also was Lycaonia called. Augustine writes that this country was very small once upon a time. Varro and other ancient writers have also said much about it. It was taken over by the Athenians, later by the Latins, the Romans, and finally by the Turks. It endured for a period of 826 years under twenty-five kings, to the time of Heli the priest. [Eli (1226-1128 BCE), a high priest and judge (1 Samuel 4, 13-18)]. After him the priests were called Carni. [Sicyonia is a small district bounded on the east by the territory of Corinth, on the west by Achaia, on the south by the territory of Philius and Cleonae, and on the north by the Gulf of Corinth. The area was probably less than 100 square miles. The land was fertile and produced excellent oil. Its almonds and fish were also prized. Its chief town was Sicyon, one of the most ancient cities of Greece. It is said to have been originally called Aegialea or Aegiali after an ancient king, Aegialeus, and finally to have been named Sycion from an Athenian of this name].

A CHAPTER ON ISLANDS IN GENERAL

Islands are so called according to the Latin Tongue because they lie in the sea. The following are the most notable and the largest, namely, Britain, generally called England. It lies off France and opposite Spain, and has many rivers and warm springs; also coal, and many metals and valuable minerals. Item: Thanathos, an island in the Great Sea, is separated from Britain in many places by the Gallic Sea. [Probably the Isle of Thanet, or extreme northeastern portion of Kent, England, insulated by the two branches of the river Stour. Its name is said to have been derived from the Saxon tene, a beacon or fire, probably from the number of watch-fires maintained on this easily ravaged coast]. Item: Thyle [Tile], the last island of the Great Sea. [Probably Thule, according to ancient geography, the most northern land of the world; so named by the voyager Pytheas Massilia, and variously identified by moderns with Norway, Iceland, and the Shetland and Orkney Islands; often called Ultima Thule, or farthest Thule]. Item: Tylos is an island in India, [Tylos is the modern island of Bahrain, according to Brotier, still famous for its pearl-fisheries. It is mentioned by Pliny (, vi.c.32; xll.c.21). Bahrain is really an archipelago named from its chief island, in the gulf of the same name, occupying the angle formed by the Qatar peninsula and the Hasa coast of Arabia. Bahrain island is 27 miles long and 10 miles wide. The archipelago is the headquarters of the Persian Gulf pearl trade, in which over a thousand sailing boats are engaged, and employ some twenty-thousand men]. as Solinus says, [C. Julius Solinus was the author of a geographical compendium, containing a brief sketch of the world as known to the ancients, diversified by historical notices, remarks on the origin, habits, religious rites, and social conditions of various nations, together with details regarding the remarkable productions of each region, animal, vegetable, and mineral. The material is derived almost exclusively from Pliny's , although the writer nowhere indicates his source. There is no information with reference to Solinus himself, nor to what country he belonged. His time is also doubtful. He is quoted by Jerome, Ambrose and Augustine, who belong to the end of the fourth century. Solinus was much studied in the Middle Ages, and many editions appeared in the infancy of printing. The first came from the press of Jenson (Venet. 1473)]. which has palms, oil, and vineyards; and it exceeds the wonders of all other lands in the single fact that its trees are never without leaves. There also are the Caucasus Mountains, which with their loftiness and peaks penetrate the greater part of the world. There are also pepper trees similar to juniper bushes. Item: The Orchades [Probably the Orkneys, an island group north of Pentland Firth, Scotland]. are islands of the Great Sea, and they lie in Britain. Of these ten are wastelands, and ten are habitable. Item: Scotland, or Hibernia (Ireland), an island, lies near Britain. Although it is a limited territory, it is very productive by reason of its location. It stretches from Africa on the left in a northerly direction. [Apparently the author thinks Scotland and Ireland to be identical, and he appears to not know the legend of St. Patrick]. There are no snakes or bees, and seldom a bird.

Item: The island of Gades lies at the end of the country of Baetica, and divides Europe from Africa. Therein are the Pillars of Hercules. [Gades, the Cadiz of our day, is a very ancient town in Hispania Baetica, west of the Pillars of Hercules. It was founded by the Phoenicians and was one of the chief seats of their commerce in the west of Europe. It was situated on a small island of the same name (I. de Leon), separated from the mainland by a small channel. Gades gave its name to the Fretum Gaditanum , which we know as the Straits of Gibraltar]. Item: Certain islands are called the Fortunate Islands, which means the Islands of the Blessed, because of the abundance of their fruits. Through a mistake of the pagans they are considered to be Paradise. The first is called Membronia; the second, Minona; the third, Capraria; the fourth, Thoodé; and the fifth, Vinaria. [The early Greeks, according to Homer, placed the Elysian Fields into which favored heroes passed without dying, at the extremity of the earth, near the river Oceanus. In later poems an island is clearly spoken of as their abode. It was placed beyond the Pillars of Hercules. Hence, when, just after the time of the Marian civil wars, certain islands were discovered in the Ocean off the west coast of Africa, they were called Fortunatae Insulae ('The Fortunate Islands'). As to the names of the individual islands and the exact identification of them by their modern names, there are difficulties. But it is safe to say that the Fortunatae Insulae of Pliny, Ptolemy and others, are the Canary Islands, and probably the Madeira group. Quoting Juba, Pliny says that the first of these islands is Ombrios; the second, Junonia; the third, Capraria; the fourth, Ninguaria; and another, Canaria, which, he says, contains vast multitudes of dogs, of very large size. While all these islands abound in fruits and birds of every kind, this one produces in great numbers the date palm, which bears the caryota, also pine nuts. Honey too abounds here, and in the rivers papyrus, and the fish called silurus are found. These islands are greatly annoyed by the putrefying bodies of monsters, which are constantly thrown up by the sea (Pliny, , vi. c. 38)]. They lie in the Great Sea to the left of the country of Mauretania.

The Gorgodes [Gorgondes] are islands in the ocean. [Probably refers to Gorgon or Urgo, the Gorgona of Ptolemy, a small island in the Tyrrhenian Sea between the coast of Etruria and Corsica, and distant about twenty miles from the mainland. It is only about eight miles in circumference, but elevated and rocky, rising abruptly out of the sea, which renders it conspicuous from a distance]. Item: Espidum, Crise [Probably refers to Crisa, an ancient town of Phocis, on the sea, now Crissa]. and Argire [This may refer to Argyre, the capital of the large island of Jabadiu, which Ptolemy places south of the Malay Peninsula, and supposed by some to be Sumatra, and by others Java]. also Taprophana. [Taprobane is the ancient name for Ceylon, a great island of the Indian Ocean, opposite the southern extremity of India intra Ganges. The Greeks first became acquainted with it through the researches of Onesicritus in the time of Alexander, and through information obtained by residents in India. Information was also obtained from an embassy sent from the island to Rome in the reign of Claudius. Ptolemy makes it very much too large, and the peninsula of India too small]. So in the ocean lie other islands from the Hellespont [The Dardanelles]. to the Gorgodes. Firstly, Cyprus, also called Paphos, highly celebrated for its wealth, particularly in minerals, for there ore was first found and used. [Cyprus is the largest island in the Mediterranean. It has born a multitude of names. Its mountains contained copper (Pliny XII, 60, and XXXIV, 20) as well as gold and silver. Its precious stones were famous in antiquity (Pliny XXXVII, 15), and the land is described as flowing with wine, oil, and honey (Pliny XI, 14)]. Item: Crete, the island of Greece, a great part of which lies against the Peloponnesus. It has about 100 cities, for which reason it is also called Centopolis, after their number. It is wealthy in shipping and weapons. It first reduced the law to writing. It first taught horsemanship. It discovered certain forms of poetry. It is full of moun-tain goats, but lacking in deer. It does not produce the wolf, fox, or other destructive wild animal; nor snakes, nor night owls. And when they are taken, they soon die. It is also generous in vines and trees. There the root diptannus grows, and large poisonous spiders are found there.

Crete has been known by various names, Cretaeus, Cretanus, Cretensis, Creticus, Cretis, and Kriti. The common European name of Candia is unknown in the island. The Saracenic "Khandax" became in the Venetian writers Candia. The city is situated in the Aegean basin of the Mediterranean. Mt. Ida, connected in an ancient story with metallurgy, was, as its name implied, covered with wood, which was extensively used in forging and smelting. The forests boasted of the fruit-bearing poplar trees, the cypress, palm, and cedar. According to Pliny everything grew better in Crete than elsewhere. Among the medicinal herbs for which it was famed was the "dictamnion," (here called diptannus) so celebrated among physicians, naturalists, and poets. Dittany is a plant of the rue family, as the dittany of Crete, or the bastard dittany, named after Dikte, a mountain in Crete. The name also applies to a small American perennial of the mint family. Rue is a small bushy shrub with bitter acrid leaves, formerly much used in medicine for its stimulating effects. It was formerly also an emblem of bitterness or grief.

The ancients frequently speak of Cretan wines. The island of was free from all wild beasts and noxious animals (Pliny VIII, 83), a blessing that it owed to Hercules. But the Cretan dogs could vie with the hounds of Sparta, and the Cretan wild goat is the supposed origin of all our domestic varieties.

Item: Abydos, an island, of Europe. [Abydos is an ancient town of Mysia, Asia Minor, on the Hellespont, here scarcely a mile broad.

Originally it was probably a Thracian town, afterward colonized by Milesians. Here Xerxes in 480 BCE crossed the strait on his bridge of boats when he invaded Greece. The city is celebrated for its resistance to Philip V of Macedon, in 200 BCE, and is famed in story for the loves of Hero and Leander. In later years its importance was transferred to the Dardanelles. I have found no mention of it as an island, except here]. Item: Cos, [Cos (or Stanko) is an island not far from the southwestern corner of Asia Minor, off the Gulf of Ceramus. It was settled by Dorian colonists who worshipped Aesculapius, whose sanctuary became a health-resort and the first school of scientific medicine. In the Hellenistic age Cos owed its prosperity to the friendship of the Greek dynasty of Egypt, who valued it as a naval outpost. As a seat of learning it was adopted for the education of the Ptolemaic princes; among its most famous men were Hippocrates, the most celebrated physician of antiquity (born 460 BCE), the painter Apelles, and the poets Philetas and Theocritus. The temple of Aesculapius, a sanctuary, was anciently the greatest object of interest in the island. A school of physicians was attached to it, and its great collection of votive models made it almost a museum of anatomy and pathology. Strabo describes the temple as standing in the suburb of the town; but the site has never been positively identified]. an island which lies off Attica, and where Hippocrates, the physician, was born; and here (accord-ing to Varro) spinning was first invented as a feminine adornment. Item: Fifty-three islands lie in the Great Sea, which some Greeks call the Cyclades. [A group of islands in the Aegean Sea]. Among these Rhodes is the principal one.

In the midst of these islands is another called Delos, which in the Greek tongue means revealed; and it was so named because when the flood occurred in the time of Ogygys the king, and the world was in continual darkness for many months, this was the first land to receive the light of the sun, and therefore it was the first to be revealed. [Ogygys, or Ogyges, is said to have been the first ruler of the territory of Thebes, which was called after him Ogygia. In his reign the waters of Lake Copais rose above its banks and inundated the whole valley of Boeotia. This flood is usually called after him the Oxygian. The name of Ogyges is also connected with Attic mythological history, for in Attica an Ogygian flood is likewise mentioned, and he is described as the father of the Attic hero Eleusis, and as the father of Daira, the daughter of Oceanus]. This island was also called Ortigia. There the partridges were first seen.

Item: Rhodes is the first among the above mentioned islands; after it Carpathos. [Carpathos lies between Crete and Rhodes. Its chief towns were Posidium and Nisyrus]. Item: Cytherea. Item: Ycharia. [Ycharia, probably Icarus or Icaria, an island of the Aegean Sea; one of the Sporades, and west of Samos. Its name was derived from the myth of Icarus].

Item: Samnia, [Samnia, probably Samos, one of the principal islands in the Aegean Sea, lying in that portion of it called the Icarian Sea, off Ionia, from which it is separated by a narrow strait. The Samians obtained great power at sea and founded many colonies. Their commerce extended to Egypt and the interior of Africa. They were members of the Athenian Confederacy until 440 BCE, when Pericles reduced them to subjection and deprived them of their fleet. Samos was one of the chief centers of Ionian manners, science and art. Its pottery was celebrated throughout the ancient world. It was illustrious in painting and literature. In the time of Herodotus, its capital Samos was reckoned one of the finest cities of the world, filled with works of art, which were plundered first by the pirates in the Mithridatic war, then by Verres, and lastly by M. Antonius. Nothing is left of it but traces of the foundations]. in which earthenware was first made. Item: Sicilia [Sicily] was named after Sichanus, the king of Sicania; and thereafter it was called Sicilia from Siculus. But before that time it was called Trinacria or Trinacia, after its three mountains. This is-land is separated from Italy by a small sea. The land is productive and windy and full of sulphur. For that reason Mt. Aetna was ignited. In the Sea of Sicily are a mountain and a whirlpool, which are very dangerous to shipping, caus-ing damage and loss by shipwreck. Sicily was the fatherland of those who had one eye in their foreheads, and was the sup-orter of tyrants. The capital is Syracuse. Its sea bears corals; and it produces the agate. Its circumference is three thousand furlongs. [Sicily was supposed by the ancients to be the same as the Homeric island Thrinacia, and it was therefore frequently called Thrinacia, Trinacia, or Trinacris, a name which was believed to be derived from the triangular form of the island. Its more usual name came from its later inhabitants, the Siceli, whence it was called Sicelia, which the Romans changed to Sicilia. The sea besides the island was called Mare Siculum . Sicily originally was part of Italy, it is said, but was separated from it by volcanic eruption. Its most important mountain is Aetna. It was so celebrated even in early times for its grains that it was held sacred to Ceres. It also produces excellent wine, saffron, honey, almonds and other fruits. It was the birthplace of the philosophers Empedocles, Epicharmus, Dicaearchus; of the mathematician, Archimedes; of the physicians Herodicus and Acron; of the historians Diodorus, Antiochus, Philistus, and Tamaeus; of the rhetorician Gorgias, and the poets Stesichorus and Theocritus]. There are nine islands off Sicily. Those were for-merly called Solie [Aeoli] after Aeolus the former ruler of these islands. The same Aeolus could by his arts prophesy winds and storms out of the mists and damp. For that reason the vulgar folk looked upon him as a ruler of wind and weather. The same island is also called Vulcan [now Volcano]. There are nine islands which have names of their own, namely, Liparis [Lipara], Trafia, Aeoliae Insulae (Lipari Islands) lie northeast of Sicily, where Aeolus, the god of the winds, reigned. Homer mentions only one Aeolian island, and Virgil speaks of only one Aeolia where Aeolus reigned, supposed to be Strongyle or Lipara. These islands were also called Vulcaniae, because Vulcan was supposed to have had his workshop in one of them called Hieria. They are also named Liparenses from Lipara, the largest of them. The names of these islands were Lipara (Lipari); Hieria (Volcano); Strongyle (Stromboli); Phoenicusa (Felicundi); Ericusa (Alicudi); Euonymus (Panaria); Didyme (Salina); Hicesia (Lisca Bianca); Basilidia (Basilizzo); Osteodes (Ustica). Pliny the following observation (Natural History, III, c. 14): "On this side of Sicily, etc, are seven islands, called the Aeolian, as also the Liparaean islands; by the Greeks they are called the Hephaestides, and by other writers the Vulcanian Isles; they are called 'Aeolian' because in the Trojan times Aeolus was king there."

There are now eleven of these islands instead of seven, some of which are supposed to have risen from the sea since the time of Pliny. The name Vulcanian originated from Vulcan, a god of fire, the Greek Hephaestus. Referring to Lipara, Pliny says: "Lipara is so called from Liparus, a former king, who succeeded Aeolus, it having been previously called Melogonis, or Meligunis . . . Between this island and Sicily is another, Therasia, now called Hieria, because it is sacred to Vulcan (now Volcano); it contains a hill which at night vomits forth flames. The third island is Strongyle (now Stromboli), lying one mile to the east of Lipara; it differs only from Lipara in the superior brilliancy of its flames. From the smoke of this volcano it is said that some of the inhabitants are able to predict three days beforehand what winds are to blow; hence arose the notion that the winds are governed by Aeolus.”

etc. Item: Sardinia, the island, is named after Sardus, the son of Hercules, who came from Libya with an army and conquered Sardinia. It produces neither snakes nor wolves. It has warm springs which give health to the sick, and the thieves who use its waters are blinded. [Sardinia is the largest island in the Mediterranean. As the chronicler states, the ancients derived its name from Sardus, the son of Hercules, who was worshipped in the island under the name of Sardus pater ('Father Sardus'). Among the products of the island one of the most celebrated was the Sardonica herba, a poisonous plant, which was said to produce fatal convulsions in the person who ate of it. These convulsions agitated and distorted the mouth, so that the person appeared to laugh although in excruciating pain; hence the well-known risus Sardonicus (sardonic laugh). No plant possessing these properties is now found in Sardinia]. Item: Corsica, the island, has its origin from its inhabitants, the Luginians, who call themselves after their duke. Aebosus [Ebusus (Iviza) is the largest island of the Pityusae Insule, off the east coast of Spain, reckoned by some writers among the Baleares. It was celebrated for its excellent figs]. is an island of Hispania. Item: There are two other islands in Hispania, called the Baleares. Here the throwing of stones by means of a sling was first invented. [The Baleares, or Balearic Islands, are off the coast of Spain. There are two, distinguished by the names Major and Minor, whence their modern names of Majorca (Mallorca) and Minorca. Their inhabitants were celebrated as slingers, as the chronicler states, and were employed as such in the armies of the Carthaginians and Romans. In consequence of their piracies they provoked the hostility of the Romans, and were finally subdued 123 BCE by Q. Metellus, who assumed accordingly the surname Balearicus]. And there are many other islands; but as they are uninhabited they are not counted.

Amazonia, the country that lies partly in Asia and partly in Europe, near Albania, was so called after the Amazons. These were the wives of the Goths who came out of lower Sircia (as Isidore states) [Isidore. There were a number of men of learning by this name. Isidorus of Aegae, a Greek poet who wrote epigrams; Isidorus of Charox, a geographical writer, who probably lived under the early Roman emperors; Isidorus of Gaza, a neo-Platonic philosopher; Isidorus of Pelusium, a Christian exegetical writer, a native of Alexandria, who died about 450 CE; Isidorus of Miletus, the elder and the younger, eminent architects in the reign of Justinian. But the chronicler probably refers to Isidorus (better known in English as Isidore), Bishop of Hispalis (Seville), from 600 to 636 CE, one of the most learned men of his age, and an ardent cultivator of ancient literature. A great number of his works are still extant, but by far the most important is his . It is an encyclopedia of Arts of Sciences, and treats of all subjects in literature, science and religion that were studied at that time. It was much used in the Middle Ages]. and were betrayed and put to death. The wives took up their husbands' arms in just revenge. They slew all male persons with the sword, kept the women, and divided the booty of the enemy. After taking counsel they decided to live without association with men, and as their husbands had been ruled by two kings, they now elected two women to rule over them, namely, Marsepia and Lampeta. The one took it upon herself to fight against the enemy with her troops, while the other looked after the general welfare at home. In a short space of time they became such powerful warriors that for almost one hundred years they held in subjection and ruled over the greater part of Asia. And they allowed no male person to live among them. However, in order to bear children they selected men from a neighboring people. With these they had intercourse at certain times; and when they conceived, they forced the men to leave them. Boys which were born to them they put to death, or sent them to their fathers at the proper time. The girls they kept and reared to shoot and hunt. At the age of seven they seared off the right breast of the girls, so they would not be hindered in their military practices. Hercules, and later Achilles, tamed these women in their barbarous cruelties. But they accomplished this rather through friendship than by force, as may be learned from the histories of the Greeks and of these women. But Isidore states that through Alexander the Great they were completely wiped out. However, Alexander's history does not say so, but states that when Alexander demanded tribute, the queens replied: O king, your wisdom in daring to strive with women is a matter of wonderment; for if luck is with us and we succeed in overcoming you, you will be justly debased as one defeated by women. But if the gods are unfavorable to us and we do not succeed in overcoming you, it will be small honor to you that you have prevailed over women etc. The high-born king was amazed at this reply, and concluded that women are not to be won over by the sword and by wrath, but with love. Therefore he left them their liberty, and made them obedient to his wishes not by force but by friendship.

It is said that the Amazons once a year met the Gargareans in Mount Caucasus for the purpose of propagation. The Greeks believed in the existence of the Amazons as a real historical race down to the late period; and hence it is said that Thalestris, their queen, hastened to Alexander, in order to become a mother by the conqueror of Asia.

The following are the chief mythical adventures of the Amazons: They are said to have invaded Lycia in the reign of the Iobates, but were destroyed by Bellerophon, who happened to be staying at the king's court. They also invaded Phrygia, and fought with the Phrygians and Trojans when Priam was a young man. The ninth of the labors imposed upon Hercules was to take from Hippolyte, the queen of the Amazons, her girdle, the ensign of her kingly power, which she had received from Ares (Mars). In the reign of Theseus they invaded Attica. Toward the end of the Trojan War, the Amazons under their queen, Penthesileia, came to the assistance of Priam, but she was killed by Achilles. The Amazons and their battles are frequently represented in the remains of ancient Greek art.

(A) The Amazons (Size 3" x 4").

A triple bust portrait of three of these women. Each wears a turban, but is otherwise clad in medieval armor. One bears a sword, another a battle-axe, the third a dagger. The central figure lifts a finger of warning. The expressions are serious but not warlike.

(B) Themiscyria (Size 5-7/16" x 8-11/16"):

Here, by suggestion of the text and a long stretch of the imagination we have the ancient city of the Amazons, located a short distance from the Black Sea, at the mouth of the Thermodon. Diodorus states that it was built by the founder of the Amazon kingdom. After the retreat of Mithridates from Cyzicus, Themiscyria was besieged by Lucullus. The inhabitants on that occasion defended themselves with great valor, and when the walls were undermined, they sent bears and other wild beasts, and even swarms of bees, against the workmen of Lucullus. Notwithstanding their gallant defense, the town seems to have perished on that occasion.

Nobility originated at this time, and it became established for many reasons. To begin with, it was a necessity; for as people multiplied and became addicted to evil, it became necessary to protect the pious against the evildoers. Therefore a pious man of righteous counsel was chosen by the rest as the head of the community, to give preference to the virtuous, to protect the middle classes, and to punish the evildoers. A nobleman, therefore, is one who is distinguished by his virtues; and for that reason, as Jerome says, the nobility should not allow itself to be diverted from its privileges. The second reason is that the vulgar were not competent to form a correct judgment, for they were too benighted to comprehend matters of greatness and courage beyond the ordinary public welfare. So, to preserve the peace among them, it was necessary that there should be princes of noble birth. The third reason was certain strength; for when at times certain communities were harassed by enemies, they caused it to be proclaimed that he who would relieve them should be vested with the rights of nobility for himself and his heirs forever. And in this manner they were ennobled. The fourth reason was the possession of abundant wealth; for in time many persons became so impoverished that they gave themselves up with their possessions to some wealthy person to mitigate their need. And they came to recognize him as noble, and as their lord. In certain cases nobility was also the result of divine grant; and with some this nobility remained, as in the case of David, while in others it lapsed, as with Saul, Rehoboam, etc. Frequently, nobility was the result of conquest and tyranny. Of these some were completely destroyed, while others remained. According to ancient historians the noble lineages of pagan times were seldom or never perpetuated because of the arrogance and tyranny of the nobles themselves. But this was also true among the Christians for like reasons; for the Scriptures say that the Lord broke up the seats of the haughty and on them placed the gentle. Item: No one every scorned nobility, for in itself it is a desirable estate; but many pious men fled from it because of the burdens and dangers concealed in it. This appeared in the case of the holy prophet David, whom God himself selected for humble service.

Nineveh, a great city of three days' journey, was built by Ninus, the Assyrian king, after the death of his father, and he made it the capital of this kingdom. He led a restless life, and in his passion for novelty and new possessions, he changed all the ancient and pagan customs. He warred on his neighbors and soon subdued these untrained people. And as his power increased by these conquests and the subjugation of his neighbors, he also overran other peoples; and as each new conquest became an instrument for further acquisitions, he finally brought all the people of the West under his domination. He warred with Zoroaster, the king of Bactria, but when the latter was slain, Ninus died also, leaving him surviving his wife, Semiramis, and Ninyas, a son. To this city Jonah, the prophet, was sent; and as he interpreted the prophecy to mean that the sinners of the city would receive God's mercy in the end, he was loath to appear untruthful in making known the city's doom; and so he decided to flee from the face of God. For this he was drowned in the sea and swallowed by a whale. [According to the Book of Jonah, the prophet was commanded by God to go to Nineveh and cry out against its wickedness and to announce its impending doom. The fear that God would repent of his purpose and spare the city caused him to seek escape from his immediate jurisdiction. He went down to Joppa, and took passage on a ship. A violent storm came up. The prayers of the sailors to their gods were of no avail, and they concluded that some one on board had offended some deity. They cast lots to discover the culprit, and the lot fell to Jonah. He admitted his guilt and at his own request they reluctantly cast him into the sea. The storm at once subsided, but Jonah was swallowed by a fish appointed to the purpose by God. There he remained for three days and nights. His prayers while in the belly of the fish fill the greater part of the book. The fish then cast him upon land, and he was commanded to discharge his neglected duty. He went to Nineveh and spread his message over one third of the city. The king and the people repented, fasted and prayed. Their prayers and penitence were accepted, much to Jonah's disgust].

The most vicious sin, that of idolatry, which is the root of all evil, had its origin in these times; and this from three considerations, which (as we may gather from ancient writings) influenced the people in that direction, namely, fear, flattery, and the industry or art of producing images.

CITY OF NINEVEH 5-5/8" x 8-7/8"

The pictures of cities and towns in the Chronicle may be divided into two classes: (1) those which were made to actually represent some particular municipality, like Nuremberg, Rome, Florence, etc, and which can be readily identified; and (2) those which are purely imaginative, and were used to represent any city, one woodcut often being used to represent various places.

We have here a typical fortified medieval city of Europe, with its grim walls and turrets. The approach is by the usual tower gate, surmounted by a statue of a medieval king in his robes of state, crowned, and holding a scepter in his extended right hand. The figure is large and out of proportion to the architecture about it. Within the walls and to the left on an elevation is the castle or burg, resembling that which towers over the city of Nuremberg. To the right is a huge structure, apparently a church, provided with towers, without spires, but terminating in domes of various proportions. The circular walls of the city sweep inward toward the recessed city gates, giving those on the battlements at either side full command of the approach.

Folio XX verso

Nahor, the second son of Terah, and Melcha his wife, begot eight sons in all. Of these the last was Bethuel, who begot Rebecca, a daughter, and Laban, a son. Hus was the first son of Nahor, and Job was the son of Jus. The second son of Nahor was Bus, and Bus had two sons: the first, Beor; the second, Balaam. Bethuel, the third [Should be the eighth]. son of Nahor, had one son and one daughter. [Laban and Rebecca]. Laban had two daughters, whom he gave as wives to Jacob, the son of his sister, Rebecca, after fourteen years service. Leah, the first daughter of Rebecca, [Should read, "the first daughter of Laban."] and who had running eyes, begot six sons and one daughter.

Laban was Rebecca's brother, with whom Jacob served for these two daughters, Leah and Rachel. The second daughter, Rachel, Jacob's wife, who had been barren, begot two sons, but died in childbirth, and was buried at Bethel. Rebecca was the first wife of Isaac. With her consent she was brought by Eliezer, Abraham's servant, from Haran, Mesopotamia, to Isaac in the land of Canaan. From this arises the custom of asking brides for their consent. Camuel was the fourth son of Nahor; Caseth, the fifth; Aran, the sixth; Pheldas, the seventh; Bela, the eighth. [This does not agree with Genesis 22:20-23, where the descendants of Nahor are given thus: Huz, Buz, Kemuel (Camuel), Chesed (Caseth), Hazo, Pildash (Pheldas), Jidlaph, and Bethuel].

This section of the genealogy, beginning with Saruch (Serug), son of Regau (Reu; whom we left at Folio XVI verso), spreads itself over two pages, beginning at the left of Folio XXI recto and proceeding right and left over this and the opposite page (Folio XX verso). It contains seventeen single portraits and eight double ones of husbands and wives. Outside of two minor connecting ornaments only three woodblocks were used to represent this total of thirty-three portraits: One comprehending Saruch, Nachor (Nahor), and Thare (Terah) and his spouse; the second, consisting of the descendants of Haran, the first son of Thare, being eight portraits, including two spouses; and a third, which includes the descendants of Nachor, the second son of Thare, consisting of twenty-one portraits, including spouses.

The Chronicle illustration agrees with the Chronicle text, but both vary from the account given in Genesis as far as the heirs of Nachor are concerned:

Genesis	Chronicle
1. Huz	1. Hus (Huz)
2. Buz	2. Bus (Buz)
3. Kemuel	3. Batuel (Bethuel)
4. Chesed	4. Camuel (Kemuel)
5. Hazo	5. Caseth (Chesed)
6. Pildash	6. Aran
7. Jidlaph	7. Pheldash (Pildash)
8. Bethuel	8. Bela

Compare and observe:

1. That Camuel (Kemuel) appears in Genesis as the third son; in the Chronicle as the fourth.
2. That Batuel (Bethuel) according to Genesis is the eighth and last son of Nachor (Nahor); but he is the third according to the Chronicle in one passage, and the eighth according to another.
3. Hazo and Jidlaph, mentioned in Genesis, do not appear in the Chronicle; while Aran and Bela, who are mentioned in the Chronicle, do not appear in Genesis.

Folio XXI recto

Saruch, the son of Regau, was born in the 2905th year of the world, lived 230 years, and died.

Nachor, the first son of Saruch, was born in the 3035 year of the world, lived 148 years, and died.

Thare, the son of Nachor, was born in the 3114th year of the world, lived 205 years, and had three sons, Abraham, Nachor, and Haran.

Haran, the third son of Thare, had a son and two daughters: Sarah, Abraham's wife; Melcha, Nachor's wife; and Lot, who had two sons: Moab, the first son, and father of the Moabites; and Ammon, the second son, father of the Ammonites.

After Haran bore Lot, his son, and Sarah and Melcha, his daughters, he died among the Chaldeans, in the Chaldean city of Ur; and his brothers took his daughters as wives: Nachor took Melcha; and Abraham took Sarah. Now Thare despised the land of the Chaldeans because of its idolatry (for they worshipped fire) and also because of mourning for his son Haran. Therefore he migrated with his people to Haran, a city in Mesopotamia. And there he finally died at the age of 205 years; for now the term of life among the people began to decline, and gradually decreased to the time of Moses.

Sodom and Gomorrah and other cities (as the Scriptures state) were fired by the Lord in his wrath against their shameful and unbridled sins. Lot and his two daughters and his wife alone were saved. The conduct of these cities toward all persons who came to them was disgraceful. So God decided to destroy this entire region. Abraham was now ninety-nine years old, and he had accepted circumcision; and the birth of Isaac had been foretold to him. At this same time Lot, while standing at the city gate of Sodom, saw two angels approach in the persons of two young men. And he took them into his house for lodging. And as they went in, the people of Sodom surrounded the house of Lot, and demanded the young men, that they might abuse them. And although Lot offered them his daughter, they were not satisfied. As they were about to break down the door, the angels led Lot back into his house; and they blinded all the Sodomites so that they could not find the door; and they predicted the overthrow of the city. And although Lot made this known to the husbands of his daughters, they disregarded the warning. The angels led Lot, his wife, and his two daughters from the city, with the injunction that they stay in the mountains and do not look back. But Lot's wife disregarded the injunction of the angels and saw the catastrophe that befell the city; whereupon she was changed into a sea of salt, called the Dead Sea. And up in the mountains the daughters of Lot caused their father to become drunk, and they had intercourse with him. The larger bore him a son, Moab, and the smaller one a son, Ammon; and from these came the Moabites and the Ammonites, the same two people who lived in the valley of Syria. [Genesis 19:1-38].

DESTRUCTION OF SODOM AND GOMORRAH 5-1/16" x 8-7/8"

This illustration concludes the Second Age of the World. One of the angels who had been the guest of Lot at Sodom is leading the old man by the hand and pointing to the distant mountains. Lot's two daughters follow closely behind, but his wife has tarried, and contrary to injunction, has turned about to witness the catastrophe. And here just outside the city gate she has been changed to a pillar of salt. Her body has become a well-rounded cone, while her head and even her headdress remain unchanged. Within the walls fire and brimstone are raining down upon the city as from a bursting sun. Medieval steeples are falling from their foundations, and the city is in flames.

The Third Age of the World

Folio XXI verso

The Third Age begins with the birth of Abraham and continues up to David—according to the Hebrews 292 years, but according to the seventy interpreters 940 years. Here begins the history of our patriarchs, who worshipped the true God. Abraham, the father of many people, born of Terah in Ur of the Chaldees, was a wise man and a godly one, and the best informed in human affairs. He was the first to proclaim God as the Creator of all things, and compelled him to wander forth from Chaldea. He was led forth by his father from Ur of the Chaldees to Haran. And there he lived. And the Lord commanded Abraham, saying, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, and come into a land that I will show thee. [Genesis 12:1]

When Abraham returned from the slaughter of the five kings of Assyria, who had made Lot a prisoner, Melchizedek, king of Salem and the highest priest of God, came to meet him; and he offered bread and wine. And to him Abraham gave tithes of all the booty he had taken. And Melchizedek blessed Abraham for having subjugated his enemies. The Hebrews say that this Melchizedek was Shem, the first son of Noah, and who lived to Abraham's time.

This mysterious stranger here suddenly emerges from the dim past, without ancestors and without descendants, "having neither beginning of days nor end of life." (Hebrews 7:3). His name and title are significant, "first being by interpretation, king of righteousness, and after that also king of Salem, which is king of peace." (Hebrews 7:2). From the earliest times there have been strange speculations as to this mysterious man. Some, like the chronicler, have identified him with Shem, supposing that survivor of the flood to have lived to Abraham's time. But if so, why should his name have been changed to Melchizedek, and how could it be said of Shem, with Genesis 11:10-27 before us, that he was without pedigree? Perhaps the better view is to regard him as an exceptional instance in that early time of venerable Hamite, or perhaps, like Abraham, a Shemite, who had kept pure from the prevailing idolatry of the world, and was a worshipper of the true God.

Melchizedek has been held a suitable type of Christ as High Priest because (1) he was a king-priest, (2) his name means righteousness and he was king of Salem, which means "peace," (3) his birth and death remain unrecorded, and (4) he was not made a High-Priest by human appointment.

After this the Lord appeared to Abraham and foretold to him the birth of a son whom he would multiply to the number of stars in the heavens.

The beautiful Sarah was long barren, but when she attained the age of ninety she bore Isaac. Keturah, Abraham's second wife, bore six sons, endowed with wisdom and industry. Abraham married her after Sarah's death. The names of the sons are Zamram (Zimran), Jectan (Jokshan), Medan, Madian (Median), Jesboth (Ishbak), and Shuah (Sue). Hagar, the concubine of Abraham, was an Egyptian and Sarah's handmaid; and by her Ishmael was born to Abraham. From Ishmael descended the Ishmaelites, later called the Hagarites, and finally called the Saracens. He and his mother were cast out of his father's house, for

(A) Abraham and Melchizedek

Abraham (in a woodcut 5" x 8-3/8") is returning with his forces from the slaughter of the five kings. Melchizedek comes forth from his royal city to meet him, grateful for ridding the land of its invaders and oppressors. He is bringing forth bread and wine, general terms for food and refreshments, in token of his gratitude and of his appreciation of the services of the noble Hebrew. Abraham has stepped forward and already has the bread in hand. He is about to receive the wine. The abode of Melchizedek is represented as the typical medieval fortified city, and the king himself is coming forth in regal robes and wearing a crown. Although Abraham is not in fighting armor, his men, who stand back to the left, are accoutered head to foot in medieval helmets and armor, bearing shields, swords, lances and banners. They look upon the occasion with pride and watchful eyes.

(B) Lineage of Christ

The genealogies of the Third Age of the World begin with Abraham, third son of Terah, whom we left at Folio XXI recto. There and on the opposite page his descendants through his other two sons, Haran and Nahor, were portrayed. The branch representing Abraham was cut immediately below Terah's portrait; and now that branch is presented.

Abraham himself is portrayed on Folio XXII recto by a panel 9-3/4" x 2-1/4", and from him to the opposite page proceed the branches of his family tree. And here we find the beautiful Sarah (Saray), Abraham's first wife, but she is still barren, and Isaac will not appear until we reach Folio XXVI recto. At the opposite extreme of the main trunk appears Hagar (Agar), the handmaid of Sarah, and whom Abraham probably brought back with him after his sojourn in Egypt. From her proceeds Ishmael (Ismahel), ancestor of the Arabs, who is portrayed in a dual portrait with his wife. Much importance seems to have been attached to certain numbers in the ancient days, such as 3, 5, 7, 12, 40, etc. The number 12 was not uncommon in the development of tribal descents. According to Genesis 25:12-15, twelve little Arabs were born to Ishmael and his wife: Nebajoth, Kedar, Adbeel, Mibsam, Mishma, Dumah, Massa, Hadar, Tema, Jetur, Naphish and Kedemah. Of these, only two examples are given in this genealogy, namely, Nebajoth (Nabaioth) and Kedar (Cedar).

Between the branches running to Sarah and Hagar appears a third one representing the issue of Abraham by Keturah (Cethura), whom he took to wife after the expulsion of Hagar and the death of Sarah. Of this marriage six children were born, all of whom are here portrayed: Zimran (Zamram); Jokshan (Jectan); Medan; Median (Madian); Ishbak (Yesboth), and Shuah (Sue).

Occasionally one encounters difficulty in identifying the names on these portraits. There are three general comparisons that may be made, involving the Chronicle itself, the King James Version of the Bible, and the Douay Version of the Vulgate. The Chronicle, written when it was, is Catholic in tendency and lore, and the inscriptions are often from the Vulgate. For purposes of investigation and identification, the course should be from Chronicle to Vulgate, and from Vulgate to King James Version. Of course the text of the Chronicle itself is also helpful in deciphering woodcut inscriptions that are often almost illegible.

This illustration, which comprehends fourteen portraits, is made up of three woodcuts: (1) the large portrait of Abraham, (2) a small woodblock of connecting branches, and (3) a woodcut measuring 7-1/8" x 8-13/16", containing Abraham's issue through three channels, with the limitations already mentioned. The full length portrait of Abraham in oriental headdress and flowing robes is very striking and venerable. There is nothing distinctive about the minor portraits. However, one cannot help but marvel at the ingenuity and invention of the artists in cultivating, shaping and guiding these genealogical vines so as to comfortably accommodate the membral status of every family or tribe within the confines of the text page.

We are also struck by the manner in which these artists have solved the problem of presenting these portraits as individual parts of the family tree. All are bust pictures, produced by the interesting contrivance of placing each subject within the calyx of a flower in full bloom. And what a variety of flowers! In these floral pulpits stand the heirs, like so many preachers. In most cases this impression is accentuated because the incumbent is gesturing as if addressing a congregation.

Folio XXII recto

he incited Isaac to idolatry and to worshipping idols that he had made. Sarah saw this and said, Cast out this handmaid and her son. After Ishmael was born and attained his twelfth year, his father had him circumcised, and Sarah loved him as her own son. But when Isaac was born she ceased to love Ishmael, and caused Abraham to send him to another country. And when Ishmael became of age, his mother provided him an Egyptian wife, by whom he had sons who inhabited the entire earth from the Euphrates to the Red Sea.

Now Sarah, Abraham's wife, bore him no children; and she had a handmaid, an Egyptian, whose name was Hagar. And Sarah said unto Abraham, Behold now, Jehovah hath restrained me from bearing; go in, I pray thee, unto my handmaid; it may be that I shall obtain children by her . . . And he went in unto Hagar, and she conceived . . . And Hagar bore Abraham a son. And Abraham was fourscore and six years old when Hagar bore Ishmael (Genesis 16:1-15).

And Ishmael, his son, was thirteen years old when he was circumcised in the flesh of his foreskin. And the self same day was Abraham circumcised, and Ishmael his son (Genesis 17:23-26).

And Sarah conceived and bore Abraham a son in his old age, etc. And Abraham called the name of his son that was born unto him, whom Sarah bore him, Isaac . . . And Abraham made a great feast on the day Isaac was weaned. And Sarah saw the son of Hagar, the Egyptian, whom she had born unto Abraham, mocking. Wherefore she said unto Abraham, Cast out this handmaid and her son; for the son of this handmaid shall not be heir with my son, even with Isaac . . . And Abraham rose early in the morning and took bread and a bottle of water, and gave it unto Hagar, putting it on her shoulder, and gave her the child, and sent her away; and she departed, and wandered into the wilderness of Beersheba . . . And God was with the lad, and he grew; and he dwelt in the wilderness, etc. And his mother took him a wife out of the land of Egypt (Genesis 21:1-21).

And Abraham took another wife, and her name was Keturah. And she bore him Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Median, Ishbak, and Shuah. . . (Genesis 25:1-8).

Now these were the generations of Ishmael by their names according to their generations: Nebaioth, Kedar, Adbeel, Mibsam, Mishma, Dumah, Massa, Hadad, Tema, Jetur, Naphish, and Kedemah; and these are their names by their villages, and by their encampments: twelve princes to their nations (Genesis 25: 12-16).

The Chronicle and the text of Genesis do not agree as to the reason why Sarah wished Hagar and Ishmael expelled from the home: (1) The Chronicle states that it was because Ishmael encouraged Isaac to idolatry, and to the worship of idols he had made. (2) The Douay Version of the Bible says that she saw "the son of Hagar the Egyptian 'playing' with Isaac her son" (Genesis 21:9), while (3) the King James Version says that she saw Ishmael 'mocking,' an expression which commentators have interpreted to imply carnal or lascivious indulgence on Ishmael's part. However, the real reason is given in the tenth verse: "Cast out this bondmaid and her son; for the son of the bondmaid shall not be heir with my son Isaac."

Because they would not worship fire in Ur of the Chaldees, Abraham and his brother Haran were thrown into the flames. Haran was suffocated, but Abraham was liberated by God, who wished him to bring up Haran's son Lot, as his own. [According to Genesis 11:28 Haran died before his father Tereh, in the land of his nativity, the Ur of the Chaldees, but the manner of his death is not given. Abraham and his father Tereh lived at Ur before they were called to the land of Canaan. A number of places have been suggested as the site of this old city, such as Orfah, or Urfa, in northern Mesopotamia, some twenty miles north of Haran; Warka, in southeastern Mesopotamia, 120 miles southeast of Babylon; and Mugheir, a ruined site about six miles west of the confluence of the Euphrates and Tigris. And it was a Jewish tradition that the descendants of Terah were driven out of Chaldea because they refused to follow the prevalent idolatry. They left the ways of their ancestors and worshipped the God they knew. So the Chaldeans cast them out from the face of their gods, and they fled to Haran, where they sojourned until they received the call to depart for the land of Canaan]. And Abraham took to wife Haran's daughter, Sarah. Thereafter Abraham, together with his father Terah, and his brother Nahor, and the kindred of his brother Haran, wandered from Chaldea to Haran, in Mesopotamia. When his father Tereh died, Abraham, at the age of seventy-five years, in obedience to the command of the Lord, migrated with Lot, Sarah, and all his kindred, and all his good to the land of Canaan; and he lived in Shechem. There the Lord appeared to him and said, To your seed will I give this land. Thereafter Abraham came to the five cities where the Dead Sea now is; and there he also wandered; and he lived in Damascus. But as there was famine in the land, Abraham went down into Egypt, and back from there to the valley of Mare, near Hebron. The Lord appeared to Abraham in his sleep and told him that his seed would be sojourners in Egypt 430 years; that the fourth generation would return with him to the land of Canaan, and that kings would come out of him. [] In accordance with the Lord's command Abraham circumcised himself, his son Ishmael, and all his house and kindred. [Genesis 17:23-27]

Memphis, now called Cairo or Alkeyro (Alcairo), the royal city in Egypt, was built by Ogelous, [Probably refers to Aegialeus.] the king of Egypt, and was named Memphis after his daughter. It is 150 times one eighth of a mile in circumference, [That is, 150 furlongs. A furlong is a measure of length derived from a furrow in an ordinary field; theoretically the side of a square containing ten acres; one eighth of a mile. A furlong is now legally one eighth of a statute mile; that is, 40 rods, or 220 yards (201.16 meters). A square furlong is 10 acres. The area of Memphis, according to Diodorus occupied a circuit of 150 stadia, or at least 15 miles. This included much open ground laid out in gardens and courts for the barracks of the garrison in the quarter called the "White Castle," and which was successively occupied, under the Pharaohs, by the native militia]. and is the most celebrated city in Egypt. It is located in the most convenient part of the region where the river Nile divides into many branches, in the form of the letter d, [The reference is to delta, the fourth letter of the Greek alphabet, which is a triangle and which corresponds to the English and German letter d. For that reason a delta is a triangular alluvial deposit at or near the mouth of a river]. and almost surrounds the city, giving access to shipping. But navigation farther up is prevented by the overflow of water that has deposited large mounds of earth to the south. In other regions it has created large seas that make the city secure and inaccessible. For this reason later kings established their residence there; and they called the city Babylon in Egypt, or Cairo. Osiris was worshipped at Memphis. [Osiris was the greatest Egyptian divinity, and the husband of Isis. Osiris is described by Plutarch, in his treatise , as a son of Rhea and Helois. His Egyptian name is said to have been Hysiris, which is interpreted to mean "son of Isis," though some have said that it meant "many-eyed;" And according to Heliodorus, Osiris was the god of the Nile, as Isis was the goddess of the earth. As he taught the people the use of the plow, so she invented the cultivation of wheat and barley that were carried about in the processions at her festival. She was the goddess of the earth, which the Egyptians called their mother. Being married to Osiris, Isis is the land fertilized by the Nile]. When Osiris inherited the kingdom of Arginorum (Argos) from his forefather, Phoroneus, Phoroneus, son of Inachus and the Oceanid Melia or Archia, was a brother of Aegialeus and the ruler of Argos. He was married to the nymph Laodice, by whom he became the father of Niobe, Apis and Car. According to other writers his sons were Pelasgus, Iasus, and Agenor, who, after their father's death, divided the kingdom of Argos among themselves. Phoroneus is said to have been the first to offer sacrifices to Hera at Argos, and to have united the people who until then had lived in scattered habitations, into a city which was called after him. The patronymic Phoronides is sometimes used for Argives in general, and especially to designate Amphiarus and Adrastus.

Apis, the son of Phoroneus and Laodice was also a king of Argos, and from him Peloponnesus was called Apia. He ruled tyrannically and was killed by Thelxion and Telchis.

he sailed over to Egypt in order to enhance his glory. He conquered it; and he married Isis. After he taught the barbarous people many useful things, they honored him as a god; and they changed his name and called him a bull.

ILLUSTRATION 7" x 6-9/16"

There are two woodcuts at Folio XXII recto—one of Abraham, already described, and the other of "Memphis or Cairo," our present subject. Here we have another general landscape doing special service, as occurred in the previous cases of Themiscyra (Folio XIX verso) and Nineveh (Folio XX recto). There is nothing 'eastern' about this scene, and certainly nothing Egyptian. The artist has selected his favorite promontory as a civic site. The town is securely girded about, with the usual battlements, turrets, towers and gates. To the left is a stream, which we must assume to be the Nile. On its bank grows an iris, or other member of the lily family; but we see no reeds or rushes in which a little Moses might be concealed.

Within the walls the usual gothic church is prominently silhouetted against the sky.

Folio XXII verso

And from this arose the custom that when a beautiful bull unexpectedly appears to them, they detain him and for a time they worship him. [The reference is to Apis, the Bull of Memphis, worshipped with the greatest reverence as a god among the Egyptians. They believed him to be the offspring of a young cow impregnated by a ray from heaven. There were certain signs by which he was recognized to be a god. It was necessary that he be quite black, have a white square mark on his forehead, on his back a figure similar to that of an eagle, have two kinds of hair in his tail, and on his tongue a knot resembling an insect called cantharus. When all these signs were discovered, the animal was consecrated with great pomp, and was conveyed to Memphis, where he had a special residence, containing extensive walks and courts for his amusement. His birthday was celebrated every year and was his most solemn festival. It was a day of rejoicing for all Egypt. The god was allowed to live only a certain number of years, probably twenty-five. If it had not died before the expiration of that time, it was killed and buried in a sacred well, the location of which was unknown except to the initiated. But if the bull died a natural death, there was a public and solemn burial; and as his birth filled all Egypt with joy and festivities, so his death threw the whole country into grief and mourning. The worship of Apis was originally nothing but the simple worship of the bull, but in course of time he, like other animals, was regarded as a symbol, and Apis is hence identified with Osiris or the sun]. The Nile, one of the largest rivers in the world, flows by the city of Memphis. Every year, when the sun is in the Crab, it overflows the entire land of Egypt. Memphis now belongs to the Saracens. [After the foundation of Alexandria, Memphis sank into a provincial city. But the Saracen invaders in the seventh century confirmed the wisdom of Menes' choice, for they built both Old and New Cairo in the neighborhood of Memphis, only changing the site from the western to the eastern bank of the Nile, because their natural alliances, unlike those of the Pharaohs, were with the Arabians and the Syrian Khalifates]. It is a fine, well populated city, and possessed of rich estates. There, in a large castle, lives the all-powerful Sultan. The city is divided into two parts, called New Babylon and Alcairo. Here once lived Pharaoh, the king of Egypt. To this country came the glory deserving Virgin Mary, with the child Jesus and Joseph. And here are the foremost balsam gardens. To this place many men of learning have journeyed, as Pythagorus and Plato, &c. Here is to be found the wisdom of the Babylonians. In this country many columns have been erected to the memory of the dead, and other monuments to matters worthy of remembrance, concerning which many from far and wide have written.

Memphis was the first capital of the entire kingdom of Egypt, after the Deltic monarchy at Heliopolis was united to the Thebaid capital at This or Abydos. It stood on the western bank of the Nile 15 miles south of Cercasorus. Its foundation belongs to the earliest age of Egyptian history. It is ascribed to Menes, the first mortal king; (2) to Uchoreus, a monarch of a later dynasty; and (3) to Apis or Epaphus. The latter two are doubtful. The motives that induced the founder to select the site of Memphis as his capital are obvious. Not far removed from the bifurcation of the Nile at Cercasorus, it commanded the south entrance to the Delta, while it was nearer to the Thebaid than any of the Deltaic provincial cities of importance, Heliopolis, Bubastis and Sais. He placed it on the western bank because he had little to apprehend from the tribes of the Libyan desert; whereas the eastern frontier of Egypt was always exposed to attack from Arabia, Assyria, and Persia, and it was not beyond the reach of the Scythians. It was important, therefore, to make the Nile a barrier of the city. This was accomplished by placing Memphis to the west of it. However, before Mendes could lay the foundations of his capital, an artificial area had to be provided for them. The Nile, at that remote period, seems to have had a double bifurcation; one at the head of the Delta, the other above the side of Memphis, and parallel with the Arsinoite Nome. Of the branches of its southern fork, the western and the wider of the two ran at the foot of the Libyan hills; the eastern and lower was the present main stream. Between them the plain, though resting on a limestone base, was covered with marshes, caused by their periodical overflow. This plain Menes chose for the site of Memphis. He began by constructing an embankment about 100 stadia south of its site, that diverted the main body of the water into the eastern arm; and the marshes he drained off into two principal lakes, one to the north, the other to the west of Memphis, which thus, on every side but the south, was defended by water.

Athotis, styled a son of Menes, is said to have built the palace, and thus stamped the new city as a royal residence. In the reign of Kaiechos, second dynasty, the worship of Apis was established at Memphis.

In Abraham's ninety-ninth year the Lord appeared unto him and assured him that a son would be born unto him by his wife Sarah. And he called him Isaac. When Isaac was twenty-five years of age, the Lord in order to test Abraham's obedience, commanded him to sacrifice his son. Abraham hastened to fulfill the command. And as he approached the altar and was about to slaughter his son, God recognized the man's obedience, and called out, Abraham! Lay not thy hand upon the lad; for now I know that thou fearest the Lord. And soon thereafter the Lord unexpectedly brought forth a ram. And as Abraham was obedient to God, the sweet promised of Christ came unto him. And God said to him, In your name will be blessed all the people, for you were obedient to my voice. [This is a rather severe abridgement of the biblical narrative (Genesis 22:1-19), which should be read to fully appreciate the illustration].

Zoroaster the wise, was (as Isidorus states) a king of Bactria, from whom king Ninus slew in battle, and who ordered his books to be burned. Of him Solinus thus writes: Although the first sound given off by newly born children is that of crying, and their sense of joy is postponed for forty-two days, yet we know of one, called Zoroaster, who laughed on the day he was born. He was the first wise man or magician (Magi); and he studied the stars, and made twenty times one hundred thousand verses. This same accomplishment Democritus [Democritus, a celebrated Greek philosopher, was born about 460 BCE. He spent a large inheritance on travels that he undertook to satisfy his unusual thirst for knowledge. He journeyed over a large part of Asia, and spent some time in Egypt. His diligence was incredible, and he lived exclusively for his studies. He died in poverty in the year 361, but highly esteemed by his fellow-citizens. He lost his eyesight probably through severe application to his studies, but this did not disturb the cheerful disposition of his mind, which prompted him to look, in all circumstances, at the cheerful side; and for this reason later writers took to mean that he always laughed at the follies of men. His knowledge was very extensive, his style lively. He and Leucippus, another philosopher, were the founders of the theory of atoms. In order to explain the creation of all things, Democritus maintained that in infinite space there are an infinite number of atoms or elementary particles, homogeneous in quality, but heterogeneous in form; that these items combine, and that all things arise from the infinite variety of form, order and position of these atoms in forming combinations. The cause of these combinations he calls 'chance.' He does not use the word in its ordinary sense, but to signify the necessary succession of cause and effect. In his ethical philosophy he considers the acquisition of peace of mind as the end and ultimate object of our actions]. long thereafter enlarged upon. Zoroaster flourished in the time of Terah, father of Abraham.

Zoroaster, or Zoroastres, the Zarathustra of the Zend-Avesta, and the Zendusht of the Persians, was the founder of the ancient Magian or Persian religion. The religion of Zoroaster, held by the modern Parsees, was known to antiquity as the religion of the Magi. The religion was probably of Bactrian origin. The statement that he laughed on the day he was born is from Pliny (Natural History, VII, 15).

The accompanying illustration of a king with crown, orb and scepter, has no particular application to Zoroaster, except as indicated by the inscription.

Abraham About To Sacrifice His Son Isaac 5" x 8-7/8"

The Lord is testing Abraham's obedience by ordering him to sacrifice his son as a burnt offering upon one of the mountains. Abraham rose early in the morning, and saddled his ass, and took with him two of his young men, and his son Isaac, and prepared the wood for the burnt offering. And he went up to the place of which God had told him. As he saw the place, afar off, he told his young men to stay with the ass, while he and his son would ascend the mountain and worship.

The artist has made the best of the space allowed him within the confines of the woodcut. He has portrayed several successive actions in this single illustration. The picture falls into two divisions, separated by a narrow trail leading to the place of sacrifice. To the right the stern old patriarch dashes into the picture, a pot of fire in his hand, and the sacrificial sword under his arm. He is rushing his son, upon whose shoulders he has placed the wood of the burnt offering. The little lad is stooping forward under his burden. He certainly does not appear the twenty-five years which the Chronicler has placed to his credit. In vain he looks about him for the lamb that is necessary to the offering; but his father assures him that the good God will provide a sacrifice. And so they went together, and with them we cross the trail to the other side of the picture, where the diligent father has already built an altar and has laid the wood in order. And now to the sacrifice!

Little Isaac is kneeling on a low dais supported by squat little legs or columns. He is not lying on the altar, nor is he bound as the Bible describes. His hands are outstretched, and his father, who stands behind him, holds him by the hair with his left hand, while with a huge broadsword (not a sacrificial knife), held aloft in his right hand, he is about to deal the fatal blow. The angel of the Lord swoops down upon the scene and suspends the action, uttering the injunction of the Lord that the lad is not to be harmed; for the test is complete. And, according to Genesis, "Abraham lifted up his eyes, and looked, and behold behind him a ram caught in a thicket by his horns." The ram of Genesis had conveniently ensnared itself for the sacrifice; but not so the ram of the woodcutter! It is doubtful whether Abraham sees it behind him, free and vigorously rampant, and apparently about to buck the old patriarch from the rear, as if to second the efforts of the angel in checking the bloody work. It is a relief to know that soon the heavy broadsword will find its way back to the scabbard, which lies beside the executioner, and that the blazing caldron in the foreground will shortly be extinguished.

The kaleidoscopic character of this illustration portraying a number of successive actions at the same time was common to this as well as far earlier periods and repeats itself in our own day in the moving picture film. On one hand the victim is being driven to the block; on the other the fatal drama is being enacted.

Another thing that strikes us in these woodcuts is the lack of proportion in the figures, the head being too large for the body, giving a rather juvenile appearance to the characters, in spite of their somber and aged visages. This proportion is a characteristic of children and hence this impression arises naturally.

According to Josephus, Isaac was twenty-four at this time, but there is no indication of his age in Genesis.

Trier (Treves) is an old city. It came into being 1947 B.C, in Abraham's time. It was founded by Trebeta Ninus, the king's brother, who was driven out of Assyria by Semiramis, the queen, and settled in the neighborhood of Germania, the land of the Germans. For when Ninus the Great died, Semiramis fostered a suspicion against his brother, and she became his enemy. [Semiramis and Ninus were the founders of the Assyrian empire of Ninus or Nineveh. Ninus was a great warrior who built Nineveh about 2182 BCE and subdued the greater part of Asia. Semiramis was the daughter of the fish-goddess Derceto of Ascalon in Syria by a Syrian youth; but being ashamed of her weakness, she made away with the youth and exposed her infant daughter. But the child was miraculously preserved by doves, who fed her till she was discovered by the shepherds of the neighborhood. She was brought up by the chief shepherd of the royal herds, whose name was Simmas, and from whom she derived her name of Semiramis. Her beauty attracted one of the king's generals, who married her. He subsequently sent for his wife to join him where the Assyrians were engaged in the siege of Bactra, which they had long endeavored in vain to take. Upon her arrival in camp she planned an attack upon the citadel of the town, mounted the walls with a few brave followers, and obtained possession of the place. Ninus was so charmed with her beauty and bravery that he resolved to make her his wife; whereupon her unfortunate husband put an end to his life. By Ninus, Semiramis had had a son Ninyas, and on the death of Ninus she succeeded him on the throne. Her fame overshadowed that of her husband, and later ages loved to tell of her marvelous deeds and heroic achievements. She built numerous cities and erected many wonderful buildings. Besides conquering many nations of Asia, she subdued Egypt and a great part of Ethiopia, but was unsuccessful in an attack upon India. After a reign of 42 years she resigned the sovereignty to her son Ninyas, and disappeared from the earth, taking her flight to heaven in the form of a dove. Probably Semiramis was originally a Syrian goddess, perhaps the same who was worshipped at Ascalon as Astarte, or Aphrodite, to whom the dove was sacred. Hence the stories of her voluptuousness, which were current even in the time of Augustus].

After the entire country beyond the Rhine had been subjugated by Emperor Julius, he appointed a proconsul and a collector of taxes or tribute, who remained there during the Roman rule. The city of Trier was always wealthy and rich in its possessions, and a venerable and honored principality among the five Belgian cities. Its archbishop holds high rank among the seven electors of the Roman Empire. There are many proofs of its antiquity, among them a Latin inscription discovered in our time, which mentions the above named Trebeta and Semiramis. There also may be seen a place of wonderful construction, resembling Babylonian masonry, made of baked tiles so strong that even now it is invulnerable to the enemy, and cannot be broken by any kind of implement. The citizens of the city are universally respected for their manners, elegance, and laws by the merchants who constantly come there to trade and to establish commercial relations. In consequence of the proximity of Trier to Germany, the people speak the German language, and in taste, conduct, and seriousness in war there is but little difference between them. Among the Gauls they are considered exceptionally powerful, and are esteemed for their cavalry and infantry. Here also may be seen a gate made of incredibly large stones, fastened together with iron; also the body of St. Simeon, and that of the worthy Bishop Popionus, in the church he founded. This city first received the gospel of Christ from Bishop Valerius, St. Peter's disciple, and it was later enlightened by St. Paulinus, the holy man, also a bishop there, who was afterward exiled by Emperor Constantius for his Christian faith; and he suffered in exile to the time of his death, finally receiving the crown of martyrdom in Frisia. There also flourished Bishop Maximus, by whom Pope Anastasius was honorably received when pursued by the Emperor Constantius. Here also flourished Bishop Nicenus, a man of perfect holiness, and many others &c.

Trier or Treves (respectively the German and French names) is a cathedral city on the Moselle River in western Prussia. It was originally a Roman colony, named Augusta Treviorum after the emperor Augustus. It became an imperial free city in the sixteenth century. The ancient city stood on the right bank of the river, and, under the later empire, was one of the most flourishing Roman cities north of the Alps. It was the capital of Belgica Prima. The Belgae were one of three great people into which Caesar divided the population of Gaul. They were bounded on the north by the Rhine, on the west by the Ocean, on the south by the Sequana (Seine) and Matrone (Marne) and on the east by the territory of the Treveri. They were of German origin, and had settled in this country, expelling or reducing to subjection its former inhabitants. They were subdued by Caesar after courageous resistance.

After the division of the Roman world into four districts by Diocletian (292 CE) Trier became the residence of the Caesar who had the government of Britain, Gaul, and Spain. Here dwelt Constantine Chlorus and his son Constantine the Great, as well as several subsequent emperors. The modern city still contains many interesting remains. The most important of these is the Porta Nigra, or Black Gate, a large and massive building in an excellent state of preservation. There are also extensive remains of Roman baths, of the amphitheatre, and of the palace of Constantine. The piers of the bridge over Moselle are likewise Roman. The Treveri were a powerful people in Gallia Belgica.

ILLUSTRATION The City of Treves 7-9/16" x 8-7/8"

This landscape, entitled "Trier," appears here for the first time; but it will do service for other cities and towns in the future. It is located on a sea or a river, which we may assume to be the Moselle. Although it has all the earmarks of a well-fortified European medieval city, the huge dome at the right, surmounted with a crescent, tends to confuse this first impression. Are we really on the Moselle, or is this the Bosphorus? To the right of this structure is a pillar-shaped tower surmounted with a strident figure carrying a staff, or it may be a fork; for the figure itself appears to have horns. It is a comfort to assume that this is a statue, for another step or two would be suicidal. To the left of the dome, and hugging it rather closely, is a Catholic church, whose many-storied bell tower vies with the crescent in its aerial aspirations. From this part of the city a road leads upward to a fort or castle whose upper reaches are made accessible by a ladder. Although we see no one about except the lively figure on the pedestal, the town must be well populated, for it is well supplied with residences, all gabled. There is also a generous supply of city gates. Over one of these is a shield, but its field is blank, adding to the general utility of the woodcut. To the extreme left, beyond the formidable city wall is open country, suggesting the fields from which the citizens no doubt receive their sustenance. The principal gate, flanked by towers is made accessible by a rather precarious and meager plank bridge. Two other gates give access by water.

Damascus is the first city and a principal one of Assyria. Of all the cities of Asia it is about the oldest. According to the Holy Scriptures, it is supposed to have been founded by the servants of Abraham. It has fields. By nature its soil is dry and unproductive. It is supplied with water by means of aqueducts. By this means the soil is irrigated and made very productive, and where shaded by foliage, it is most excellent. A lone small river flows by the walls and battlements. A small tongue of land, extending behind the battlements, is covered with a growth of most luxuriant vegetation. This estimable city is removed from Jerusalem by a six days journey. In it the apostle St. Paul received baptism. Near by is the place where he saw a strong light from heaven, and heard a voice, 'Saul (Paul), why do you persecute me?' After his baptism he preached the Lord Christ in the Jewish synagogues. Because of the secret animosity of the Jews he escaped over the walls in the night by means of a basket. [The journey to Damascus was the turning point in Saul's life. Until then he had been a zealous Jew, determined with all the ardor of youth to uphold the traditions of his fathers. As a young man he acquiesced in the stoning of Stephen, holding the clothes of those who murdered him. He persecuted the Christians in Jerusalem, and thereafter secured authority from the high priest to go to Damascus to arrest all the disciples, and to bring them bound to Jerusalem. As he approached the city he was struck by a blinding light, and he heard the voice of Christ as stated by the chronicler. He was led into Damascus and there instructed and baptized by Ananias. Immediately he confessed Christ in the synagogues of Damascus and retired into Arabia for spiritual preparation. He returned to Damascus while the deputy or ethnarch of the Nabataean king Aretas held the city, and Paul was persecuted there, making his escape over the walls of the city as the Nuremberg chronicler has already stated.] And there is still to be seen to this day the house of Ananias from whom St. Paul received baptism. This city suffered much by opposition and attack. At last King Conrad undertook a crusade into Asia, and he brought three Christian princes, a cardinal who was also a legate, and the Patriarch of Jerusalem, and many bishops, before Damascus. Our princes, pursuant to wise counsel, laid siege to the city; but it was fortified by high and stout battlements so that it could not be taken by force. Yet, in a short time it might have been captured; for had the water required by the inhabitants been cut off, they would not have been able to sustain the cattle and horses which they may have taken into the city for defense and sustenance; and the city wells would have proven inadequate for so large a population. Now as the inhabitants feared that the secret ducts and hidden drains that supplied them would be cut off, and the wells become polluted, there came among them an Assyrian of arch cunning. He received money from the Damascans, and he advised the Christian kings to remove their forces to another place, and to besiege it if the inhabitants resisted. And as this change took place, the Damascans were again able to use their water supply; and they so fortified themselves that the river was again in their power and its use denied our people. In consequence it was no longer available for bringing up supplies, resulting in a shortage of scarcity of food and sustenance. Thereby the siege was broken up and the kings, Conrad and Ludwig, led their forces into Europe and came home in the year of our Lord one thousand and fifty-two. [Damascus is an exceedingly ancient city, being first mentioned in the history of Abraham's pursuit of the defeated kings (Genesis 14:15), for which reason, no doubt, the chronicler had introduced it in his Third Age of the World, which begins with Abraham. It was also the birthplace of Eliezer, the old patriarch's steward (Genesis 15:2). Josephus ascribes its foundation to Uz, a grandson of Shem. It was the capital of Syria during the Hebrew monarchy, and the Syrian king is called the king of Damascus. In the annals of Christianity it is noted for the conversion and first preaching of Paul. It is situated about 60 miles from the Mediterranean and at the extremity of the great desert of El-Hauran. It is surrounded by a wall, which is, however, in a ruinous state of decay, and scarcely defines the limits between the city and its suburbs. The Crusaders never succeeded in firmly establishing themselves at Damascus. The bulk of the city is set along the main stream of the Barada River. On its approach to the city walls the river has much of its water drawn off through channels, by which it is conveyed to every corner of the city. Despite various drawbacks, her rich streams, bursting, as they do, on the very edge of the desert, and creating a delicious verdure, have won for Damascus the name of the earthly Paradise of the Arab world. It is an indispensable harbor of refuge in the desert; the market of the nomads, the outpost of the Mediterranean world. She has survived wars and changes of empire that have overthrown or reduced to poverty every other great city of that part of the world. This is due to the combination of a rich fertility with a position so forward on the desert].

The City of Damascus 5-5/8" x 8-7/8"

Another medieval city, located on a promontory, and surrounded by a wall. There is nothing about it that shouts 'Middle-Eastern'. It might pass for Nuremberg, but never for Damascus. The salvation of this little town is well provided for in the two large churches. The first is provided with a single tower and two crosses; the second, with two towers, but no denominational symbols. In spite of its frowning walls, it seems a more cheerful place than the landscapes that have gone before. The artist was here surer of his architecture. There is no confusion of building styles. There is considerable vegetation.

Hispania had its origin after the time of Tubal, from Peleg, his son. [According to Peleg was not a son of Tubal, but of Heber, the ancestor of the Hebrews. Tubal, on the other hand, was a son of Japheth. Josephus identifies Tubal with the Iberians, who once dwelt between the Caspian and Black Seas. Some of the Iberians settled in the east, some in the west]. For he went out of Armenia and established a seat there. Before that Hispania was also called Iberia. It is the region that begins at the Pyrenees and proceeds about the Pillars of Hercules and reaches up to the northerly sea. Everything within this circumference is considered as belonging to Hispania. Its size is unbelievable (as Apianus, the historian, states), for it is 10,000 eighths of a mile [10,000 furlongs]. wide, and almost as long. Various peoples of different names have lived there. This region also has many navigable waters, and is productive and rich in wheat, wine, oil, metals of all kinds, and animals that are serviceable to man. In particular, it produces an over-abundance of swift and sturdy horses. For three hundred years Hispania was warred upon by Scipio, Gracchus, Albinus, Cato, Metellus, Pompey the emperor, and others, and was by them added to their country. [The Cantabri were a people in northern Spain. The Romans originally gave this name to all the people on the north coast of Spain; but when they became better acquainted with the country, the name was restricted to the people bounded on the east by Astures and on the west by the Autrigones. The Cantaberi were a fierce and warlike people, and were only subdued by Augustus after a struggle of several years (25-19 BCE)]. And finally the people called the Cantabri were warred against by Augustus. But as Hispania appeared obedient to the Romans and gave them assistance, the latter never conducted a war of note against the Hispanic knights. And to this day there are still to be seen in Hispania many indications of the presence of the Romans. Many cities in Hispania were garrisoned by the Romans from time to time. From this country we have not only received Quintillian, Seneca, Lucan, Lucius Florus, Pomponius Mela, Silius, Italicus, Martial, Orosius, [(1) Quintillian, Marcus Fabius (c. 35-95 CE), Roman rhetorician, was a native of Calagurris, Spain, and for 20 years head of the foremost school of oratory in Rome. His greatest work, , is a manual on the training of public speakers. (2) Seneca, Lucius, Annaeus (3 BCE-65 CE) Roman philosopher, statesman and author, and his father, M. Annaeus Seneca, were both natives of Cordova, Spain. (3) Lucan, M. Annaeus, was also born at Cordova, 39 CE His father, L. Annaeus Mela, was a brother of Seneca, the elder. Lucan was a roman poet. His only extant production is a heroic poem in ten books, entitled "Pharsalia." He was sentenced to death by Nero at the age of 26, but followed the example of his uncle Seneca, opening his veins. Both died 65 CE. (4) Lucius (Annaeus) Florus, Roman historian of the time of Trajan and Hadrian, compiled, chiefly from Livy, a brief sketch of the history of Rome to 25 BCE, entitled Ab Urbe condita. It is a rhetorical panegyric of Rome's greatness. Although not accurate, it was much used in the Middle Ages. Florus was of the family of Seneca and Lucan. (5) Pomponius Mela was the author of the first Roman treatise on geography, De rebus belicis, a mere compendium of less than a hundred pages, dry in style and deficient in method, but of pure Latin and occasionally relieved by pleasing word pictures. It is the only treatise on the subject in classical Latin. He divides the earth in five zones, only two being habitable, and asserts the existence of indigenous peoples, who inhabit the southern temperate zone, inaccessible to the people of the northern temperate regions by reason of the unbearable heat of the intervening torrid zone. Nothing is known of him except name and birthplace—the small town of Tingentera of Cingentera, Spain. (6) Silius Italicus, Roman poet, was born about 25 CE, but where is not known. His great work was a heroic poem in 17 books, entitled Punica, which has descended to us in its entirety. It is a dull, heavy work, treating of the second Punic war. (7) Martial (M. Valerius), the epigrammatical poet, was born at Bilbilis, Spain, 43 CE. His extant works consist of a collection of short poems, all included under the general appellation Epigrammata. They are a copious source of information on Roman customs and habits during the first century of the empire. (8) Orosius, Paulus, was a Spanish presbyter and Latin historian (c. 390-430 CE). His Historia contra paganos, and Adversus, are still extant. The pagans having been accustomed to complain that the ruin of the Roman Empire must be ascribed to the wrath of the ancient deities whose worship had been abandoned, Orosius composed his history to demonstrate that the world always has been the scene of calamities as great as the Empire was then suffering. [the teachers and writers, but also such most useful and brilliant rulers as Nerva, Trajan, Hadrian, and the Theodosii in pagan times. But to the honor of Christ, Hispania gave birth to St. Lawrence [St. Lawrence (Laurentius) was one of the Christian martyrs. The basilica reared over his tomb is still visited by pilgrims. Deacon of Pope Sixtus II, he was called upon by the judge to bring forth the treasures of the church committed to his keeping. So he produced the church's poor people. Seeing his bishop being led to punishment, he cried: "Father! Where do you go without your son? Holy priest! Where do you go without your deacon?" Sixtus prophesied that Lawrence would follow him in three days; and so he did, being burned alive on a gridiron. In the midst of his torments he addressed the judge with these ironical words: "Assum est, versa et manduca" (I am roasted enough on this side; turn me round and eat). So says the legend. The date of the martyrdom is usually put during the persecution of Valerian in 258. The punishment of the gridiron and the speech of the martyr are probably a reminiscence of the story of the Phrygian martyrs as related by Socrates (III, 5). But even the fact of the martyrdom is questioned]. and St. Vincent, [St. Vincent (or Vincentius) was also a deacon and martyr. He is said to have been born of noble parents in Spain and educated by Valerius, bishop of Saragossa, who ordained him to the diaconate. Under the persecution of Diocletian, Vincent was arrested and taken to Valencia, tortured and thrown into prison. There the angels visited him, lighting his dungeon and relieving his suffering. Seeing this, his warders became Christians. He died while new tortures were being prepared. His body, exposed to the wild beasts in vain, was thrown into the sea, but was recovered and buried]. Valerius' deacon, and at almost the same time to Eulalia and other martyrs without number. Ferdinand, the king, and Elizabeth, the queen, have followed in their footsteps, and in the year 1491, in the end of that year, they brought the great city of Granada, called Ilipula, to the worship of Christ and to Christian obedience. [In 1482 Boabdil deposed his father and became the last Moorish sultan of Granada. However, the gradual advance of the Christians under Ferdinand and Isabella (not Elizabeth) forced him to entrust the task of defense to the more warlike hands of Muley Hassan and Ez Zagal (1483-86). Finally in 1491 Boabdil was compelled to sign away his kingdom, and on January 2, 1492, the year before the Nuremberg Chronicle was published, the Spanish army entered Granada and the Moorish power in Spain was ended].

The kingdom of Bohemia had its origin in the Wendic people, [The term 'Wendic' is here used by the chronicler in the sense of Slavic, that is, to designate a class of the northern division of the Aryan family, embracing the Lettic and Slavonic branches or groups. Wends is an early German name applied to the Lusitanian branch of the Slavic race dwelling in Saxony and Prussia]. who left the plain of Shinar and migrated from Asia to Europe. Among them was one Cechus, a Croation of no mean birth, and he made a nation of the Bohemians. At that time Bohemia was not built up, but still consisted of forests and coarse vegetation better suited to wild animals than to man. But as his brother Lech, a companion to misfortune, saw that his brother had become rich in lands and cattle and had grown powerful, he migrated eastward and established his residence in a large open plain. And he called the region Poland. [Cech and Lech were brothers and the original ancestors of the Bohemians (Czechs) and the Poles (Lechs). Bohemia is the Latin name for Cechy]. As their progeny increased they acquired a large amount of territory. After the death of Cechus the people chose Crok as a prince. He built a castle at Stenna, and when he died he left three daughters, Libussa, Brela and Therba. Libussa, the oldest daughter, ruled the land after her father's death, and she fortified the castle called Vischerat (Wyschehrad). Brela was a physician, learned in herbs and medicines. Therba was a seeress and mistress of good fortune. But the Bohemians thought it unreasonable that so much power and might should be vested in a woman. On a certain occasion Libussa spoke to a large assembly of her people. 'I have ruled considerably and wisely, and now you shall be free. I will give you a man who will be of service to you. Go and lead my horse into the fields. Follow it where it may go. At least the horse will stop before a man who is eating from an iron table. He shall be my husband and a lawful prince.' Now as the horse was released, it finally stopped before a plowman, called Primislaus. He had reversed his plow and was eating his meal of cheese on the iron plowshare, which was the iron table. They made him a duke and set him upon a horse. And he took with him his shoes made of flax. When they asked him why he took these with him, he replied and said, 'I am taking them with me and will keep them at Vischerat so that my descendants may know who, among the Bohemians, received the principality.' For a long time thereafter this country was ruled by dukes. And thereafter, since the time of the Emperor Frederick the First, of great glory among kings, and until the outbreak of heresy, this country flourished under various kings and emperors.

The early history of the Czechs is very obscure and confused with that of the Slavs in general. Cosmas of Prague (1045-1125), not to be confused with Cosmas of Alexandria, was the earliest Bohemian historian. His Chronica Bohemorum libri III, which contains the history and traditions of Bohemia almost to the time of his death, has earned him the title of the Herodotus of his country. He relates that Cechus, a noble of Croatia (probably White Croatia or Galicia), having committed a homicide, fled with his followers to Bohemia, and first settled on the Rip Mountain, near Roudnice; that Libussa, the youngest (our chronicler says the oldest) of his three daughters, became ruler of Bohemia, founded Prague, and married a plowman, who became the founder of the Premyslides, or first native dynasty.

It is probable that the Slavs arrived in Bohemia, which was then inhabited by Germanic tribes, not later than the seventh century CE, or perhaps earlier. They are first mentioned in 805 CE, and the first certain historical state in these provinces is the kingdom of Great Moravia, destroyed by the Magyars in 904-905. While Slovakia now passed under Magyar rule, the Czechs founded the kingdom of Bohemia, which for centuries was among the most powerful and glorious in Europe. During this early period the religious movement among the Czechs, under the leadership of John Huss, influenced all Europe.

Babylon was a celebrated city in Chaldea. Although Belus, the son of Nimrod, reigned in Babylonia for many years, the kingdom remained small. Yet the Greek and Roman historians, as well as the poets, say that the city was built by Semiramis, the queen, and enlarged and fortified with a wall made of baked bricks cemented together with sand, pitch and lime. The earth there contains these materials. This city was so noble that all Chaldea and Mesopotamia were named after it. The wall (as Philostratus [Philostratus (170-245) was a Greek sophist and rhetorician of Rome. He is the biographer of Apollonius of Tyana, a Greek philosopher of the Neo-Pythagorean school, born of a few years before the Christian era. The narrative of the travels of Apollonius, as given by his disciple Damis and reproduced by Philostratus, is so full of the miraculous that many have regarded him as an imaginary character. On his return to Europe from his Asiatic travels, Apollonius was received with reverence as a magician. Finally he set up a school at Ephesus, where he died, apparently at the age of 100 years. His life by Philostratus is generally regarded as a religious work of fiction. Very little is known of the career of Philostratus. He was probably born at Lemnos, studied rhetoric under Proclus and taught at Athens, and settled in Rome. He wrote a number of works in addition to his , upon which his fame chiefly rests. His is not really biographical, but consists of picturesque impressions of leading representatives. The contains matters of interest concerning the Olympian games and contests. The breathe the spirit of the New Comedy and the Alexandrine poets. Portions of 33 are almost literally translated in Ben Johnson's Song to Selia, "Drink to me only with thine eyes."] states) is 380 times one-eighth of a mile [380 furlongs]. in circumference; but Pliny says its circumference was 64,000 paces, its thickness 50 elbows, [An obsolete measurement of length; same as cubit, being the length of the forearm measured from the elbow to the end of the middle finger, and varying from 18 to 21.888 inches; generally reckoned at 21 inches]. and its height four times as much. With its battlements, pleasure gardens, temples and towers, the city was wonderful indeed. Semiramis also brought Ethiopia under her sway; and she made war upon India, against which only she and Alexander had conducted a campaign up to that time. How Babylonia was destroyed is recorded hereafter in its proper place. The first king of the Assyrians (as Eusebius writes) was Ninus, the son of Belus. Ninus reigned 52 years, and his wife Semiramis 42 years after him; then for 38 years Sameus, [Should be Ninyas]. the son of both; and thereafter one king after another up to Sardanapalus, the 36th king, who was totally inclined to carnal excesses and audacity. Then the kingdom of Assyria was destroyed by Artus, the Mede, and added to Media in the fourth year of Azariah, the king of Judea. The duration of the kingdom of Assyria, from the first year to the last king is reckoned as 1240 years. [Sardanapalus, the last king of the Assyrian empire of Ninus or Nineveh, was noted for his luxury, licentiousness and effeminacy. He passed his time in his palace unseen by any of his subjects, dressed in female apparel, surrounded by his concubines. At length Arbaces (whom the chronicler refers to as Artus), satrap of Media, and Belesys, the noblest of the Chaldean priests, resolved to renounced allegiance to such a worthless monarch, and at the head of a formidable army advanced against Nineveh. Suddenly the effeminate prince threw off his luxurious habits, and appeared an undaunted warrior. Twice he defeated the rebels, but was at length worsted and obliged to shut himself up in Nineveh. Here he sustained a siege of two years, till at length the Tigris having undermined part of the city wall, and finding it impossible to hold out any longer, he collected all his treasures, wives and concubines, and placing them on an immense pile, set it on fire in his palace and thus destroyed both himself and them. His enemies then obtained possession of the city. The death of Sardanapalus and the fall of the Assyrian empire is dated to 876 BCE. Modern writers have shown that this narrative is mythical and must not be received as genuine history. The legend of Sardanapalus, who so strangely appears at one time as sunk in the lowest effeminacy, and immediately afterwards as an heroic warrior, has probably arisen from his being the same with the god Sardon, who was worshipped extensively in Asia, both as an heroic and as a female divinity. The name Sardanapalus is derived from that of Assur-danin-pal, the rebel son of Shalmaneser II, whose reign ended with the fall of Nineveh in 823 BCE. His character is that ascribed to Assur-bani-pal]. Item: Concerning Semiramis, Valerius Maximus [Valerius Maximus, a Latin writer, flourished in the reign of Tiberius. His narratives are loosely and irregularly arranged, and are from Roman history; but each section includes extracts from the annals of other peoples, principally the Greeks. The author's chief sources are Cicero, Livy, Sallust and Pompeius Trogus. He often used sources now lost, and affords us some glimpses of much debated and imperfectly recorded reign of Tiberius. He intimates that this book is to be used as a commonplace book of historical anecdotes for use in the schools of rhetoric. The collection was very popular in the Middle Ages]. relates that once upon a time, when she was having her hair dressed, and it was announced to her that Babylon was defeated or repulsed, she ran with her hair half braided, to again give battle for the city; and she paid no further attention to her coiffure until she again had the city in her power. The column in the illustration shows her statue.

Jupiter, the first in heaven, and (as they say) Diei Filius, [He was not called Dieus Filius (the Son of Heaven) but Diespiter, of which Jupiter (more correctly Jup-piter) was a contraction; originally identical with divum (heaven) and pater (father). Jupiter literally means "the heavenly father." The German translation "sun of the day," is clearly incorrect.] and otherwise called Lysania, [A corruption of Lycaeus, a certain local deity, referred to in a subsequent note (on Jupiter), being known to the Greeks as Zeus Lycaeus]. was at these times greatly esteemed in Arcadia. Because of his virtue he was given the highly renowned name of Jupiter. He traces his origin to the son of Heber, namely, Jerari, [Heber was a descendant of Shem (one of the three sons of Noah) and the father of Peleg (the ancestor of Abraham) and Joktan (the ancestor of the thirteen tribes of Joktanite Arabs). One of these thirteen sons was Jerah, and no doubt it is his stock to whom the chronicler refers as "Jerari." The chronicler's claim that the supreme Greek deity traces his origin along Semitic lines is wrong. The Greeks traced their ancestry through Javan, one of the sons of Japheth, representing the Aryan branch of the human race. On a previous page the chronicler himself stated that of Javan came the Greeks and the Ionians (Folio XVI recto). See also Genesis 11:26]. and since he was a man of great intelligence, and observed that the Attic people were uncouth and lived almost like animals, he gave them laws and prescribed a formula of correct living and human conduct. And when he had succeeded in bringing them to observe good morals, he admonished them to worship gods and to institute altars, temples and priests. He taught them to observe the institution of lawful marriage, whereas theretofore they all had wives in common; and many other useful matters they learned from him. Now as the forest folk observed these things, and wondered therat, they came to consider him a god, called him Jupiter because of his resemblance to the planet Jupiter, which (as the astronomers say) is by nature warm and moist in due proportions, virtuous and patient, and by reason of his patience, fearless in the presence of danger. And so, because of his qualities, he was adjudged the equal of the planet and named after him. They say he is not a mundane, but celestial being. The ancients credited him with many children such as, Minerva, Apis, Sol, Diana, Mercury and seven others.

Jupiter, so called by the Romans, and the Zeus of the Greeks, was originally an elemental divinity. Being the lord of heaven (Diespiter), he was worshipped as the god of rain, storms, thunder and lightning, as well as the prince of light. The Greek Zeus was the greatest of the Olympian gods. When he and his brothers distributed the government of the world among themselves by lot, Poseidon (Neptune) obtained the sea, Hades (Pluto) the lower world, and Zeus (Jupiter) the heavens and the upper regions; but the earth became common to all. According to Homer, Zeus dwelt on Mt. Olympus, in Thessaly, which was believed to penetrate heaven itself with its lofty summit. He is called the father of gods and men, the most high and powerful among the immortals, and whom all others obey. Such was the Olympian Zeus. But mythology originally and at various places created such a god: (1) The Arcadian Zeus, who according to legend was born in Arcadia, either on Mt. Parrhasium, or on Mt. Lycaeus. Lycaon, a son of Pelasgus (heroic ancestor of the Pelasgians, the earliest inhabitants of Greece), erected a temple to Zeus Lycaeus on the mountain of that name, and instituted the festival of Lycea in his honor; (2) the Dodonaean Zeus, who possessed the most ancient oracle in Greece, at Dodona in Epirus, from which he derived his name. He was a prophetic god; (3) the Cretan Zeus, of whom Hesiod gives an account. He calls Zeus the son of Cronos and Rhea. Cronos was in the habit of swallowing his children immediately after birth, but when Rhea was about to bear Zeus, she applied to Ouranus ("Heaven") and Gaia ("Earth") for advice as to how the child might be saved. They sent her to Lyctos in Crete, requesting her to bring up her child there. Accordingly she concealed the infant in a cave of Mt. Aegaeon, and gave Cronos a stone wrapped up in cloth, which he swallowed in belief that it was his son. There Zeus was brought up on the milk of the goat Amalthea, and the honey provided by the bees of the mountain; (4) the National Hellenic Zeus, whose temple was at Olympia in Ellis. Here also Zeus was regarded as the father and king of gods and men.

In the course of time the local divinities became united in the minds of the people into one great national divinity, which is apparently not the one whom the chronicler had in mind in this narrative. What he says refers to a local one, not Roman, as his use of the name Jupiter instead of Zeus might indicate—the Arcadian god; for he gives him the alias, 'Lysania,' a corruption of 'Lycaeus.' It was this god who was surnamed Lycaeus.

Certain traditions concerning one Lycaon are here enlightening. It was he who established the worship of Zeus Lycaeus in Arcadia. Some describe him, and not Zeus Lycaeus (as the chronicler would have it), as the first civilizer of Arcadia and builder of the town of Lycosura. More often he was represented as an impious king, with a large number of sons as impious as himself.

The claim of the chronicler that Jupiter was named after the planet seems improbable. It is more likely that the planets were named after the gods than that the latter were named after the former. Moreover, the very etymology of the name, as already given, would contradict such a claim. The name refers to and implies attributes of a god, and not of a planet.

Babylon and Babylonia 5-1/2" x 8-3/4"

This, according to the inscription, is the city of Babylon. Moreover, the Chronicle itself assures us that the serious young lady standing on the high pillar in the heart of the city, clad in regal robes, scepter in one hand and sword in the other, is none other than the warlike Semiramis herself—builder, ruler, and defender of that ancient and powerful city. These walls may not be fifty feet wide and four times as high (reckoning to every foot three fingers' breadth beyond the ordinary measure of our foot) as Pliny states, but they do look somewhat formidable nevertheless. The stream at the right must be the Euphrates, which flowed through the ancient capital. The dome to the right of the mighty queen is probably the temple of Jupiter Belus, son of Nimrod and father of Ninus. There are other imposing structures, medieval castles, dome-shaped buildings, a watchtower with spacious timbered super-structure, two churches, etc. Note the peculiar tree, aspiring to the dizzy heights of Semiramis, and read Mark 11:12-21.

Jupiter 2" x 2"

Jupiter is differently portrayed in the Latin and German editions of the Chronicle; but in neither case is the great god portrayed according to the classical ideal and traditions.

The portrait in the German edition is that of an elderly bearded gentleman, with the proverbial cap and gown. He emerges from a floral decoration, and strangely enough makes the apostolic sing of blessing.

The portrait in the Latin edition is also not a very happy selection. This "Jupiter" is a little beyond the prime of life and heavily dressed in cap and gown suitable to a medieval merchant, rhetorician or doctor of philosophy.

Classical portraiture is entirely absent from the Chronicle.

Folio XXV recto

Semiramis, wife of Ninus the Great, king of Assyria, assumed the throne upon the death of her husband in the 12th year of Abraham. She reigned 42 years. When Ninus died he left him surviving Semiramis, still a young woman, and their only son, Ninyas, who was still a child. She did not consider it wise that so young a son should rule over so great a kingdom. Although reluctant to entrust the kingdom to a minor, yet, being a woman, she did not herself dare to rule over so large a people, who were hardly obedient to a man. So, being a magnanimous woman, able and cunning, she held herself out as the son, and the son as herself; for both were persons of medium stature and of tender voice, and resembled one another in other respects. Covering her arms, limbs and head, she stepped forward according to the custom of men. In order that she might not attract too much attention in her new garb, she commanded her people to assume the same manner of dress. And so, by the disguise of her sex and through the childlike confidence of her son, she attained to royal majesty. And thereafter she accomplished great things, and feared not to disclose her practiced concealment to anyone; and everyone wondered how a woman was able to function as such and yet excel in strength as a man. But when at last she tried to tempt her son to cohabit with her, he killed her. [See earlier note on Semiramis and Ninus under Trier, Folio XXIII recto].

Ninyas, son of Ninus the Great and Semiramis, his wife, was the fourth king of Assyria. He began his reign after that of Semiramis, his mother, in the 53rd year of Abraham; and he reigned 38 years. He silenced the wars that had wearied the kingdom during the reign of his parents. And likewise, as he had exchanged his appearance with his mother and was seldom seen by men, so he aged amidst a multitude of women.

Arius, the fifth Assyrian king, began his reign in the 21st year of Isaac, and he ruled 30 years. During this period Ishmael was born to Abraham in his 86th year, by Hagar, the Egyptian, who was his and Sarah's maid; and from him came the race of Ishmaelites, who were thereafter called Hagarians, and finally Saracens. As Sarah, Abraham's wife, was without children (as the Holy Scriptures say), she spoke to Abraham and said, Go in to my maid Hagar, for you may bear children by her. And as this happened, she soon conceived and thereafter bore Ishmael. At first Sarah lived him as her own son and heir of the principality. But her love waned as soon as her Isaac was born. Therefore, by her advice Ishmael and his mother were sent to another region. And when his mother provided him an Egyptian wife, he bore twelve regal sons who occupied all the earth from the Euphrates to the Red Sea.

The succeeding kings of the Assyrians gave replies to their people by messengers, in the manner of their forbears. The Assyrians, afterward called Syrians, had the kingdom 1300 years. Their last king was Sardanapalus, a man debased by effeminacy. [See earlier note on Sardanapalus, Folio XXIV verso].

Sol was the first son of Jupiter and a brother of Minerva. As Tullius says, he was an eminent and brilliant person of dignified disposition, and the pagans, by reason of his great powers, gave him a name indicating light. For the ancients, misled by Nimrod, believed that fire was the first element of creation. Therefore they gave him the name Sol, which is translated 'sun.' By reason of his mysterious and ingenious ways, they considered him a celestial being, or a lord who had come down from heaven. [Helios, called Sol by the Romans, was the god of the sun. He was the son of Hyperion and Thea, and a brother of Selene and Eos. From his father he is frequently called Hyperianides, or Hyperion. Homer describes Helios as giving light both to gods and men. He rises in the East from Oceanus, traverses the heaven, and descends in the evening in the darkness of the West and Oceanus. The manner in which Helios during the night passes from the western into the eastern ocean is not mentioned by Homer, but later poets make him sail in a golden boat, round one half of the earth, and thus arrive in the East at the point from which he has to rise again. The island of Thrinacia (Sicily) was sacred to Helios, and there he had flocks of sheep and oxen, which were tended by his daughters. Temples of Helios existed in Greece in very early times. The worship of Sol was introduced at Rome, especially after the Romans had become acquainted with the East, though traces of the worship of the sun and moon occur at an early period].

Diana, the first sister of Sol and the daughter of the first Jupiter, was held in esteem at this time. Tullius frequently mentions her in his book on the nature of the gods. But they say that she is not the one to whom the poets attribute eternal virginity. [Diana is an ancient Italian divinity, whom the Romans identified with the Greek Artemis. Her worship is said to have been introduced at Rome by Servius Tullius, who dedicated a temple to her on the Arentine; and she appears to have been originally worshipped only by the plebeians. At Rome Diana was the goddess of light, and her name contains the same root as the word dies. As Dianus (Janus), or the god of light, represented the sun, so Diana, the goddess of light, represented the moon. The attributes of the Greek Artemis were afterward ascribed to her].

Ceres was in vogue among the Sicilians, and she was a confidant of their king. She was of such ingenuity that she was the first to introduce husbandry among the Sicilians, tamed the oxen and plowed the earth into furrows, sowed it with seed, separated the grain from the ears, ground it with millstones, and taught the making of bread. Before that time the people subsisted on acorns and wood apples. And so they called her Ceres, the Goddess of Grain. [Ceres, under the name of Demeter, one of the great divinities of the Greeks, was the goddess of the earth, and her name probably signified 'Mother-Earth.' She was the protectress of agriculture and of all the fruits of the earth. She was the daughter of Cronus and Rhea, and sister of Zeus, by whom she became the mother of Persephone (Proserpina). Zeus, without the knowledge of Demeter, had promised Persephone to Aïdoneus (Hades). Demeter having learned of the abduction, which had taken place with the consent of Zeus, in her anger avoided Olympus, and dwelt upon earth among men, conferring blessing wherever she was kindly received, and severely punishing those who repulsed her. As the goddess continued to be angry, and did not allow the earth to produce any fruits, Zeus first sent Iris and then all the gods to persuade Demeter to return to Olympus. But she refused to return and to restore fertility to the earth until she had seen her daughter again. Zeus accordingly sent Hermes into Erebus to bring back Persephone. Aidoneus consented, but gave Persephone part of a pomegranate to eat. Hermes then took her to her mother at Eleusis, who received her with great joy. The earth now brought forth fruit again. The meaning of the legend seems to be aetiological. Persephone, who was carried off to the lower world, is the seed-corn that remains concealed in the ground part of the year; Persephone, who returns to her mother, is the corn that rises from the ground and nourishes men and animals. The seats of the worship of Demeter and Persephone were Attica, Arcadia, and Sicily. The Athenians pretended that agriculture was first practiced in their country, and that Triptolemus of Eleusis, the favorite of Demeter, was the first who invented the plow, and sowed corn. The Romans received from Sicily the worship of Demeter, to whom they gave the name of Ceres. Her worship acquired considerable political importance at Rome. The property of traitors against the republic was often made over to her temple. The decrees of the senate were deposited there for the inspection of the tribunes of the people].

ILLUSTRATIONS

The illustrations on this page may be divided into two classes: (1) Three individual portraits, each approximately two inches square arranged in a column at the left; and (2) a composite 2¼" x 14" consisting of six portraits representing a portion of the lineage of the kings of Assyria.

(1) The series to the left is devoted to three mythological gods of ancient Greece: Sol, the sun, or king of light; Diana, the goddess of the hunt, and Ceres, the goddess of grain. All three are pictured as medieval characters, and none carry the symbols of their divinity.

(2) The Assyrian royal lineage began at Folio XVII recto, with portraits of Nimrod, Belus I, and Ninus, respectively the first, second and third kings, and is here continued in a panel of six sovereigns—Semiramis, Ninyas (Ninia), Arius, Mamylas, Sparetus and Amytatas. The queen, in order to show her war-like disposition, holds a formidable sword in her right hand, and a silhouetted object resembling an ornamental 'D' in her left. This symbol is a mystery. Possibly the woodcut was used or to be used elsewhere as an initial letter. Semiramis is spoken of at length in the text opposite the illustrations, as well as in other parts of the Chronicle. Ninyas and Arius are given brief mention. Mamylas, Sparetus and Amytatas are not referred to in the text at all. The kings all carry orb and scepter and are crowned. There is nothing special to be said about any of these portraits, except that oddly enough the beard of Arius is braided.

The Assyrian royal lineage is continued further on in the Chronicle, and most of the portraits here shown are repeated to represent other rulers.

Folio XXV verso and XXVI recto

[NOTE: The text of Folio XXV verso and XXVI recto as given in the Chronicle has required rearranging in order to keep the subject matter in proper sequence. In the Chronicle the illustrations to the genealogies begin on a right hand page and extend from there to the left, and the text follows the same order, as the editor apparently set himself the task of keeping text and illustrations in juxtaposition. We will therefore begin at the right (Folio XXVI recto):]

Isaac, son of Abraham, beloved of God, lived for a long time after his father. When Isaac was 60 years of age, twins, namely Jacob and Esau, were born to him by his wife Rebekah, daughter of Bethuel. Said Isaac was a very virtuous man. He died at the age of 185 years and was buried at Hebron by his sons.

Esau, the hairy huntsman, first born, sold his birthright to his brother Jacob for a portion of lentils. Without the consent of his parents he married a Canaanitish wife. [According to Genesis 26:34-35, Esau at the age of 40 took to wife Judith, the daughter of Beeri, the Hittite, and also Bashemath, the daughter of Elon, another Hittite]. His brother defrauded him of his father's blessing; and for this Esau determined to slay his brother. But he (Esau) lived in Edom, called Idumea, and later Mt. Seir. And as Jacob returned from Mesopotamia, his brother came to him peaceably with 400 men. [This is a rather unsatisfactory abridgement of the biblical narrative. It omits the wily advice of Asenath, the wife of Isaac, that Jacob flee from his brother until Esau's wrath had cooled (Genesis 27:42-45); Jacob's flight to Haran (Genesis 28:10), and hence to Mesopotamia (Genesis 29:1); the fraud practiced on his father-in-law, Laban (Genesis 30:37-43 and 31:19-23); how in fear of Esau he made extensive arrangements to appease his just wrath with 200 she-goats and 20 he-goats, 200 ewes and 20 rams; 30 milch camels with their colts; 40 kine and 10 bulls, 20 she-asses and 10 foals, and had his servants drive these to Esau with fine presentation speeches (Genesis 32:13-23); how he cunningly arranged his caravan should Esau give trouble (Genesis 33:1-3), etc. What wonder that the guileless and forgiving Esau ran to meet and embrace him! Either the chronicler held a brief for Jacob, or space was too precious to tell the whole truth].

Jacob was born in the 3394th year of the world, and lived 147 years. He had four wives, Leah (Lya), Rachel, Zilpah (Zelpha) and Bilhah (Bala).

Rachel, Jacob's wife, was barren for a long time, but finally she had two sons and died in childbirth. She was buried near Bethlehem.

Jacob, the patriarch and most holy man, was born to Isaac, and thereafter, in this 90th year, Joseph was born to him by Rachel. He lived 56 years thereafter, and died in Egypt.

(End of Genealogical Text on Folio XXVI recto) and (Continuation of Genealogical Text on Folio XXV verso):

Levi was the father of all the Levites, from whom all the priesthood sprang.

Chore (Korah), son of Izhar, quarreled with Aaron concerning the priesthood, because he was the firstborn of Izhar; for which reason he and 250 men were destroyed by fire from heaven. [Korah (Chore) was the son of Izhar, grandson of Kohath, and great grandson of Levi. He was a proud and ambitious ringleader, together with others of the tribe of Reuben, against his cousins Moses and Aaron. It was a widespread political rebellion against Moses, who held the leadership, to which the tribe of Reuben, the firstborn, aspired, and from which they had been excluded. With 250 men prominent in the congregation they went to Moses and Aaron, charging them with usurpation. Moses appealed to the Lord and Korah and his men were destroyed by fire from above].

Maria (Miriam), the sister of Moses, was a prophetess, and she made a beautiful song of praise, which she sang. She was leprous for seven days because of her murmurings against Moses. She died in Kadesh in the wilderness and was buried there. [Miriam, the sister of Moses and Aaron, after the passage of the Red Sea, led the choir of the women of Israel in the sublime song of deliverance (Exodus 15:20); but afterward, having joined Aaron in murmuring against Moses, she was smitten with leprosy, and restored only in answer to the prayers of Moses. She died and was buried at Kadesh, in the wilderness (Numbers 12:1-15; 20:1)].

Jacob had six children by Leah [Actually Jacob had seven children with Leah, all of which are named in the rest of the paragraph], namely: Judah, of whom came the kingly order, and thereafter our Lord, Jesus Christ; Reuben, who lost the rights of the firstborn, Simeon and Levi, of whom came the priestly order; Issachar; Zebulun; and Dinah, who was compromised by Shechem. [Jacob on his return from Padan-aram to Canaan, halted at Shechem. Here Dinah was wronged by Shechem, son of the Prince Hamor. His offer of marriage was accepted on condition that he and all the other men in the town be circumcised. But while they were recovering, Dinah's brothers killed all the men, pillaged the place, and made prisoners of the women and children].

As the evil city of the Sodomites was destroyed by fire, Abraham centenarian, by divine command knew his wife, and she conceived, and when the year was full she bore him a son, whom according to divine command she called Isaac, a name meaning that many people would come of him; and he was circumcised on the eighth day after birth.

Folio XXVI recto

As previously stated Aegialeus reigned in Sicyonia as its first king. [Sicyonia is a small district in the northeast of Peloponnesus, bounded on the east by the territory of Corinth, Phlius and Cleonar, and on the north by the Corinthian Gulf. The area was probably somewhat less than 100 square miles. Its chief town was Sicyon, one of the oldest cities of Greece. It is said to have been originally called Aegialea after an ancient king, Aegialaus, but was finally called Sicyon. Because of its limited territory, it never attained much political importance. In the Persian war the Sicyonians sent ships to Salamis. They took part with the Spartans in the Peloponnesian war. Under the Romans it gradually declined, and in the time of Pausanias in the second century of the Christian era many of its public buildings were in ruins. Sicyon was for a long time an important seat of Greek art. It gave its name to one of the great schools of painting which was founded by Eupompus, and which produced Pamphilus and Apelles. It is also said to have been the earliest school of sculpture. The town was also celebrated for the taste and skill displayed in the various articles of dress made by its inhabitants, among which we find mention of a particular kind of shoe that was much prized in all parts of Greece]. The country was called Aegialia after him; now Peloponnesus. After him reigned Europs, [The name of two mythical personages, one a son of Aegialeus and king of Sicyon; the other a son of Phoroneus]. the second king; and the third was Telchin (Selchim) twenty years. [Perhaps this final clause should read: "and the third was Telchin (Selchim), [who ruled] twenty years].

Apis, [Apis ruled tyrannically, and was slain by Telchin, his father, and Thelxion, his son]. the fourth king of Sicyonia, began his reign in the 45th year of Abraham and 35th year of Semiramis. He ruled twenty-five years. After him the country formerly known as Aegialia, was called Apia, and is now known as Peloponnesus.

Artus was the fifth king of the Assyrians. Under him (As Augustine writes) Isaac was born.

Thelxion, or Thessalion, was the fifth king of Sicyonia. In his reign the times were prosperous and happy; so after his death he was honored as a god, with scarifies and games. After him reigned Thauriacus, Tiramachus, at whose grave they also made sacrifices.

Xerxes (Xerses) is the ancient king of Assyria, also called Baleus, or Balancus. Under him Jacob was born. The above named Thauriacus reigned at the same time.

As one reckons 3430 years, a great flood occurred in Achaia in the time of Jacob and King Ogygus. [Ogygys, or Ogyges, sometimes called a Boeotian autochthon, and sometimes son of Boeotius, and king of the Hectanes, is said to have been the first ruler of the territory of Thebes, which was called after him Ogygia. In his reign the waters of Lake Copais rose above its banks and inundated the whole valley of Boeotia. This flood is usually called after him the Ogygian. The name of Ogyges is also connected with the Attic story, for in Attica an Ogygian flood is likewise mentioned].

ILLUSTRATIONS

(A) THE LINEAGE OF CHRIST (Cont. from Folio XXI verso)

The continuation of the biblical genealogies (as resumed from Folio XXI verso) here extends over two opposite pages. It begins with Isaac and his wife, Rebekah, shown by a dual portrait at the head of Folio XXVI recto, to the left. From them a branch passes to Esau, the long hairy hunter at the right.

Another branch passes downward to Jacob, shown in a triple portrait with Leah (Lya) and Rachel, his two wives. The line proceeds through Rachel on the right to her sons, Benjamin and Joseph. And with Joseph is his wife, Asenath, and beside them their two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim; but the ten children of Joseph's brother, Benjamin, are not shown.

Let us now follow the third or left branch, which proceeds from Jacob through Leah. There were seven children born to Leah by Jacob: Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun and Dinah. They are all portrayed, except Judah, who is mentioned in the text, but has been omitted from the family album.

And there are others to be accounted for. Leah had a handmaid, Zilpah (Zelpha), and when Leah left off bearing, Jacob had sexual relations with Zilpah, and through her added Gad and Asher (Aser) to his progeny. This ancillary transaction is shown unconnected and by itself in a triple portrait at Folio XXVI recto; and there the name of Gad and Asher appear; but their mother is erroneously designated as Zelpha "ancilla Rachel." She was not the ancillary or handmaid of Rachel, but of Leah.

In like manner, when Rachel proved barren, Jacob went in unto her handmaid, Bilhah (Bala), and in time Dan and Naphtali made their appearance. She and her two sons by Jacob are shown in a disassociated triple portrait at Folio XXV verso, over which are the following inscriptions:

Naphtali also makes a race.	Bilhah, the maid of Leah (Jacob's wife), bore two sons.	Dan made a people of whom Samson was born.

(B) THE PRIESTLY LINEAGE (Beginning)

On the left of the Folio XXV verso, commences the priestly lineage of Levi. He is shown at the top of the line in his high pontificals, while below him are his three sons, Merari (Merary), Gershon (Gerson), and Kohath (Caath), in that order. Kohath has four sons, Izhar (Ysura), Amram, Hebron and Uzziel, but only the first two appear. The first, Izhar, was married and had three sons, Korah, Nepheg, and Zichri; but Korah (Chore) alone is portrayed.

To Amram, the second son of Kohath, three children were born—Miriam, Moses and Aaron, all of whom appear and complete the family tree up to their time.

There is nothing individual about these portraits. In these times no general conception seems to have been formed of any particular person, with the exception of God and Christ. Many of these portrayals are somewhat out of tune with the characters for whom they stand. The most unfortunate selection, however, is the portrait of Moses, shown in a tight-fitting garment, as of a page, with a conical cap whose terminus is carried out like a pennant to the nth degree. Moreover, the general conception of Moses is that of a man with the head of a thinker, ample locks and the flowing beard of a Jupiter. This man is clean-shaven.

(C) THE LINEAGE OF SICYONIAN KINGS (Beginning)

At the lower left of Folio XXVI recto begins the portrait gallery of the kings of Sicyonia—Aegialeus and Thelxion (Thessalion) respectively the first and fifth kings, according to the Chronicle. The second and third kings, Europs (Europes) and Telchin (Selchim) respectively, are referred to in the text, but not portrayed. Telchin was a son of Europs, and father of Apis. Pausanius calls Thelxion a son of Apis. From this we gather that the crown passed from king to king during this period as follows: (1) Aegialeus, (2) Europs, (3) Telchin, (4) Apis and (5) Thelxion.

The Assyrian line of kings was begun at Folio XVII verso, where (1) Belus and (2) Ninus were shown. On Folio XXVI recto, this was continued with (3) Semiramis (4) Ninyas and (5) Arius, making a line of five kings who were there portrayed and described. Three other mysterious celebrities appeared in the line (Folio XXV recto), entitled respectively, Mamylas, Sparetus and Amytitas; but are left without text to clear the mystery.

And now we are to resume (at Folio XXVI recto) with Artus, who being here also called the fifth king, must be identical with Arius. Only one other Assyrian king is added. He is called Xerxes, alias Baleus, or Balancus.

Folio XXVI verso

While Sela (Shelah), the son of Judah, was still a child, Judah did not give him Tamar, who had been the wife of Er and Onan; but he sent her back to her father's house as a widow. But after Shelah grew up, he was concerned to provide him a wife, so that he would not be killed as his brothers had been. Tamar disguised herself as a common woman and sat at the crossroad; and she conceived by Judah, and bore Pharez and Zarah. [According to Genesis 38, Judah went down from his brethren and turned in to a certain Adullamite, named Hirah. And there he saw the daughter of a certain Canaanite, and he took her, and she conceived; and she bore him three sons, Er, Onan and Shelah. He took a wife for Er, his first born, and her name was Tamar. Er was wicked and the Lord slew him; whereupon Judah gave Tamar to Onan for wife, and asked him to marry her and to raise up seed for his deceased brother. Onan did not approve, and spilled his seed on the ground. This displeased the Lord, who slew him. This left Judah but one son, Shelah. He asked Tamar to return to her father's house and remain a widow until Shelah should become of age, lest Shelah should also die as his brothers had. And she did so. After some time Judah's wife, who had born him these three sons, died; and he went to his friend Hirah, the Adullamite. Tamar heard of his proposed journey, disguised herself and sat in an open place on the way. Judah saw her and thought her a harlot, because she had her face covered. He went inside with her and in consequence Pharez and Zarah were born to him by his daughter-in-law. This is the point to which the chronicler has carried the story].

Vincentius in his history, tells a good story about Asenath—how beautiful she was, and how honorable, but also, nevertheless, proud and arrogant, disdaining all men. Although she did not want Joseph as a husband at first, yet, after observing his wisdom and discretion, she fully desired him. But he would not accede to her unless she would give up her idolatry. As this caused her much grief, she was finally converted by angelic instruction. [Asenath was the daughter of Poti-phaera, priest of On. She is the heroine of a remarkable Jewish and Christian romance (dating at least back to the fifth century CE), in which she renounces her false gods before her marriage with Joseph].

Rhodes, the city on the island of Rhodes, off Lycia, from which it derived its name, was built in 740 B.C, in Joseph's time, by the Telchines and Carians, who soon thereafter were conquered by Phoroneus, the king of Argira. It is one of the islands called the Cyclades for reasons known to the learned. Those who first came there from the East, while the city was being built (as Pomponius writes) and the ground was being dug up, found there a rosebud, after which the city and the island were called Rhodis; for, according to the Greek tongue, Rhodis means a rose. The island is 900 furlongs in circumference. Among other wonders it contained a statue 70 cubits high, built by Lindus, a disciple of Lisippus. The city suffered much through wars, and finally at the hands of the Turks. It was finally relieved and protected by the Order of the Kings of St. John.

Rhodes is the most easterly island of the Aegean, or more specifically, of the Carpathian Sea, and lies off the south coast of Caria. According to mythology it was first peopled by the Telchines, the children of Thalatta (the Sea). Homer mentions three Dorian settlements, namely, Lindus, Ialysus and Camirus, formed the Dorian Hexapolis, which was established from a period of unknown antiquity, in the southwest coast of Asia Minor. For centuries the island of Rhodes was the constant seat of war. During the Peloponnesian war, Rhodes was subject to Athens. Later it joined the Spartans. It was subjugated by Athens and Sparta in turn, till the end of the Social War of 355 BCE, when its independence was acknowledged. There were frequent internal dissensions. At the Macedonian conquest they submitted to Alexander, but upon his death expelled the Macedonia garrison.

The city of Rhodes, successfully endured the most famous siege by Demetrius Poliorcetes, who at length in admiration of the valor of the besieged, presented them with the engines he had used against them, from the sale of which they defrayed the cost of the celebrated Colossus by the artist Chares of Lindus in Rhodes, the favorite pupil of Lysippus, who flourished about 290 BCE. This, his chief work, a statue of the Sun, was celebrated as one of the Seven Wonders of the World, under the title "The Colossus of Rhodes." Its height was upwards of 105 feet, and it was twelve years in the making. It stood at the entrance of the harbor of Rhodes, but there is no authority for the statement that its legs extended over the mouth of the harbor. It was overthrown and broken to pieces by an earthquake 56 years after its erection in 224 BCE. The fragments remained on the ground 923 years, until they were sold by the general of the caliph Othman IV to a Jew of Emesa, who carried them away on 900 camels in 672 CE.

The Rhodians were at length deprived of their independence by the Roman Emperor Claudius, and their prosperity received its final blow from an earthquake which laid the city of Rhodes in ruins in 155 CE. In the Middle Ages Rhodes became the seat of the celebrated Knights of St. John.

The City of Rhodes 7" x 8-3/4"

The kingdom of Rhodes early became a flourishing one by reason of the skill of its settlers in astronomy and navigation, and other sciences and arts. And here we have its capital jutting out into the sea. The harbor is indicated at the left, and a chain is stretched across its mouth. Three galleons are in evidence, two at sea, under full sail, the third at anchor in the harbor. A pier or wharf leads off to the right. No doubt all these crenellated walls and towers are the ideas of the artist, rather than of Hippodamus of Miletus, the architect who laid out the city in the fourth century CE. At any rate, the absence of incongruous gothic spires and steep gabled roofs is a relief. Towers there are in abundance, it is true, but they are square and flat. The roof of every building is flat. All this seems in keeping with the geographical location of the island, the easternmost in the Aegean Sea, and just off the coast of Asia Minor.

But why all these squat little windmills with their sugar-loaf caps? We see two on the pier in the foreground, four by the harbor, and one in the background. These mills are not mere figments of the imagination. No doubt they had their use in harnessing the winds as sources of power, and were specially adapted to such a location as this where the winds blow from the west, often with violence, for nine months of the year. Other artists have testified to their presence by pictorial records. And where is the great Colossus of Rhodes, 105 feet high, which was 12 years in building and one of the seven wonders of the ancient world? The text mentions it hazily, but the pen of the artist is entirely silent.

N.B. The genealogical portraits on this page, which branch from the opposite one (Folio XXVII recto) will be considered in the connection with the succeeding text.

Judas, in the year of the world 3434.

All the kings of Egypt were at this time called Pharaoh. However, this was not their own name, but one of royal distinction, just as with us all Roman emperors are called augmenters of the empire. Ever pharaoh has his own name. [Pharaoh was adopted into Hebrew from the later Egyptian title Pero-o, 'Great House.' Originally designating the royal establishment in Egypt, it gradually became the appellative of the king, which from the 22nd dynasty (c. 950 BCE) onwards, was regularly attached to the king's name in popular speech. The Hebrew Pharaoh-neco and Pharaoh-hophra, and as here—Pharaoh-Mephres, are thus precise renderings from the Egyptian].

Pharaoh-Mephres elevated Joseph because of his interpretation of Pharaoh's dream, and he placed a ring upon Joseph's hand, arrayed him in a vestment of fine linen, put a golden collar about his neck, and caused him to be driven through Egypt, and a crier to proclaim that all were to bend the knee to him; and he named him preserver of the world. [Not so, according to Genesis 41:45: "And Pharaoh called Joseph's name Zaphnath-paaneah," which in the Coptic signifies 'a revealer of secrets,' or 'the man to whom secrets are revealed.'] He gave him a wife, Asenath, the daughter of Potiphar, the priest of On (Heliopolis), by whom he had two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim.

Phares, in the year of the world 3445.

Pharaoh-Amenophis did not know Joseph, and he ordered the children (of Israel) to be oppressed. Under him they were in great distress and severe bondage. [Exodus 1:8-22].

Pharaoh-Anefre, the ninth king, refused to hear the voice of the Lord, commanding him to release the children of Israel. [Exodus 5:1-2]. For that reason the Lord punished him with the ten plagues [The Plagues: Exodus 7:14-25; 8:1-15, 16-19, 20-32; 9:1-7, 8-12, 13-35; 10:1-20, 21-29; 11:1-10 and 12:29-36]. and drowned him and his men in the Red Sea. [Exodus 14:27-28].

To Joseph, the most chaste patriarch and a man of zeal, two children, Manasseh and Ephraim, were born by his wife, Asenath, daughter of Potiphar, the priest. From youth Joseph had been a lad of fine stature, and superior to his brother in moral conduct. Because of this his father loved him more than the rest. In consequence his brothers envied him, and at the age of 15, they sold him into Egypt. At the age of 30 he stood before Pharaoh. But the king's wife was fired with passion for him, and said, Joseph, lie with me. He replied, The king has given me power over all, except you. And so that she might entice him, she represented herself to be ill because of her love for him; and she caught him by his garment. But he left it in her hand, and fled from her. Then she spoke to her husband, the king, 'A Hebrew servant came to me to mock me;' and she showed the king the garment. The king believed her and caused Joseph to be put into a prison. [Joseph was brought down to Egypt, and Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh, captain of the guard, an Egyptian, bought him from the Ishmaelites, who had brought him to this place. . . And Joseph found grace in his sight, and he served him; and he [Potiphar] made him overseer over his house, and all that he had he put into his hands. . . and it came to pass that his master's wife cast her eyes upon Joseph; and she said, Lie with me, etc. (Genesis 39:1-7). So it was not the king's wife, but the wife of Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh, who tried to entice him]. But as Joseph thereafter interpreted his dreams, and prophesied the seven fruitful and seven unfruitful years, the king released him from prison and placed him over all Egypt. And after Joseph had ruled Egypt for 80 years, and had attained the age of 110 years, he died in Egypt. When the Hebrews finally left Egypt, they took his remains with them to Canaan, the Jewish land. To this they had pledged themselves in case of Joseph's death.

Here the Lineage of Christ begins with Judah, fourth son of Jacob by Leah, and who was not shown in the last genealogy (Folio XXV verso). The present section of the tree begins at the upper left of Folio XXVII recto. Here appears Judah and beside him his first wife, Shuah (Sue) a Canaanite, who bore him three children, Er (Her), Onan (Onam), and Shelah (Sela), who branch off to the opposite page.

It will be remembered that Judah caused his first born to marry Tamar. Upon the death of Er she was passed on to Onan, Judah's second son; and when he, too, suffered death, she was reserved for the third son, Shelah, then still a minor. But in the meantime Tamar, in the guise of a harlot, beguiled Judah, her father-in-law, and by him she bore Pharez (Phares) and Zarah (Zaram). And so from Judah a branch proceeds downward and to the left to a portrait we find noted "Thamar wife of Er and concubine of Judah;" and to either side are her sons Pharez and Zarah.

(B) THE EGYPTIAN KINGS

To the right of Folio XXVII is a panel 2.25" x 7" portraying three kings of Egypt—Pharaoh-mephres, Pharaoh-amenophis, and Pharaoh-anefre. The first has a sword and orb; the second, both orb and scepter. Each wears a crown. There is nothing about any of them in face or feature, dress or accessories, that suggests 'Egypt.'

(C) JOSEPH INTERPRETING PHARAOH'S DREAM

By a single woodcut (5-1/16" x 8-15/16") at Folio XXVII recto, two important incidents in the life of Joseph, far removed in point of time, are depicted. Joseph holds the center of the stage, standing before Pharaoh (at the left) interpreting his dream; while at the right is the wife of Potiphar (labeled as the wife of Pharaoh) still clinging to his flowing mantle, as she gestures him to her medieval bed-chamber. The king sits on his gothic throne in a flowing robe, wearing his crown and holding a scepter in his extended left hand. He is listening intently to Joseph. His robe is trussed up a bit exposing the action of his feet. He seems nervous and appears to be scratching the ankle of one foot with the heel of the other. On the window seat in the background sits a portly gentleman in an ample robe with a fur collar, and wearing a cap. His gesture indicates that he is introducing Joseph to Pharaoh. This must be the king's chief butler, who apprised his master of Joseph's ability to interpret dreams. To perform this office Joseph was brought forth from prison, and not from the bedchamber of Potiphar's wife.

Folio XXVII verso

Esrom, in the year of the world 3496 / Aram, in the year of the world 3544.

Here begins the kingdom of Greece (the Argives), where Inachus, a son (as they say) of the sea and the earth, began to reign in the 60th year of Isaac, as the first king of the Greeks in Thessaly. [Inachus, son of Oceanus and Tethys, and father of Phoroneus and Aegialeus, was the first king and most ancient hero of Argos; whence the country is frequently called the land of Inachus. The ancients made several attempts to explain the stories about him. Sometimes they looked upon him as a native of Argos, who, after the flood of Deucalion, led the Argives from the mountains into the plains; and sometimes they regarded him as the leader of an Egyptian or Libyan colony, which settled on the banks of the river, to which this first king also gave his name]. This kingdom endured 544 years. However, Cecrops, the Egyptian, left the kingdom in the 94th year of the Hebrew bondage, and ruled for 50 years as the first king of the Athenians. [Cecrops, a hero of the Pelasgic race, is said to have been the first king of Attica. His son, Erysichthon, succeeded him as king of Athens. In his reign Poseidon and Athena contended for the possession of Attica, but Cecrops decided in favor of the goddess. Cecrops is said to have founded Athens, the citadel, which is called the Cecropia (Acropolis) after him. It is also said that he divided Attica into twelve communities and introduced the first elements of civilized life. He instituted marriage, abolished bloody sacrifices and taught his subjects how to worship the gods. Later Greek writers describe him as a native of Sais in Egypt, who led a colony of Egyptians into Attica, and thus introduced Egyptian art and civilization].

Athens was a celebrated city in Attica. Cicero says it was first built by Abalandus. Plato says Amasis, the Egyptian king, built it, and that according to the Egyptian tongue he gave it a name, which in Greek is Athena. Some say that king Cecrops built it, and after the miraculous appearance of an olive tree, called it Minerva, whom the same tree symbolizes, and in the Greek tongue is called Athena. But others say it was not built by him, but came about of its own accord with increase in the population, during which time Athena was worshipped as a goddess among the people. This city was a fosterer of the liberal arts, and of many philosophers and lovers of wisdom; but through the spawning of the devil, she was a worshipper of idolatry. Augustine, in his City of God, book 18, writes sundry things about it; for instance, that while King Cecrops was building the city, water burst forth in one place, and at another an olive tree appeared. Now when Apollo, the idolatrous god, was consulted as to the meaning of this miracle, he answered that the olive tree meant Minerva, and that the water meant Neptune; and that the citizens were free to call the city after either. So the people assembled, and the men favored Neptune, and the women, Minerva; but the women succeeded, and so the Greeks called the city Athena, which in Latin is equivalent to Minerva. This enraged Neptune, and he despoiled the land with a flood. In making their peace with Neptune the Athenians were compelled to inflict a triple punishment upon their wives: Firstly, that they should never again be present in the common councils; secondly, children born thereafter should not be named after their mothers; thirdly, no one should name his daughter Athena. Their seventeenth and last king was Cordus, in the time of Samuel. And although this city was once upon a time very mighty and celebrated, it is now a little city without distinction, which a Florentine surrendered to Mohamed; for although he long sought the aid of Italy, he did not succeed in getting it.

(A) INACHUS

A small portrait of Inachus, about 2 inches square, appears in the upper lefthand corner. He wears a crown and has his scepter in hand. There is nothing distinctive about it; but then, who can say how a mythical Greek king should look?

At Folio XXVII recto, Pharez, the fourth son of Judah, was cut off without issue. But as already noted, Pharez (or Perez) had two sons, Hezron and Hamul. The importance of Pharez lies in the fact that he was the ancestor of David through Boaz and Ruth, and then of Christ. His descendents were in all probability the most numerous among the families of Judah; hence the blessing of the elders on Boaz: 'Let thy house be like the house of Perez' (Ruth 4:12). From Hezron, his first son, came Jerahmeel, Ram and Caleb, and through Ram was traced the line of the royal house of David.

So now, to continue the lineage of Pharez, we have here (Folio XXVII verso) Esrom (Hezron), his first born, and Aram (Ram), the first born of Hezron. Hamul, the second son of Pharez, has been discarded; as have also Jerahmeel and Caleb, the other sons of Hezron.

(C) ATHENS

The City of Athens is here represented by the same woodcut that has already done service for the city of Themiscyra, the capital of the Amazons (Folio XIX verso); and of course we look in vain for the Acropolis, and the numerous temples, buildings and monuments that reflect the splendor of the ancient city.

Folio XXVIII recto

Minerva, most celebrated of women, appeared on Lake Tritonitis in the 58th year of Isaac. She was also called Pallas after Pallante, an island of Thrace, where she was reared; or after Pallas (Pallante) the giant whom she slew. She was Jove's eldest daughter, and among the barbarous Africans made many discoveries until then unknown; for which reason, not only the Africans, but the Greeks as well, believed Minerva to have been born without a mother out of the head of Jove, for her ancestry was unknown. She was the first to invent spinning in wool, then unknown to man; and how to cleanse the wool and to comb it with an iron comb; and she taught them how to spin it. In this manner she invented weaving, and the wool-makers, cloth-makers and weavers (as Ovid testifies) set aside a holiday in memory of the time when Minerva flourished. She also discovered and taught the use of oil, then unknown to man. She is also (as Cicero says) called the goddess of wisdom and the discoverer of the arts. As her renown and reputation spread far and wide, a number of temples were erected to her, particularly at Rome, near the Temple of Jove. [Athena, or Minerva, as the Romans call her, was one of the great divinities of the Greeks. She was surnamed Triton or Tritogenia, which is explained in different ways. Some derive it from Lake Tritonitis, in Libya, near which she is said to have been born; others from the river Triton in Boeotia, where she was worshipped, and where according to some, she was born. Pallene is a township in Attica, a few miles southwest of Marathon. It possessed a temple of Athena, surnamed 'Pallenis' from the place. Later tradition relates that she sprang from the head of Zeus with a mighty war-shout and in full armor. Another tradition regarded her as the daughter of Pallas, the winged giant whom she afterward killed when he attempted to violate her chastity. According to another story she was carried to Libya and called the daughter of Poseidon and Tritonitis. These legends vary, but by general belief she was the daughter of Zeus. As protectress of agriculture Athena is said to have invented the plow and rake, created the olive tree, taught husbandry, and the taming of horses. She was the patron of science, art and industry, inventing numbers, the trumpet, chariot, and navigation. She was believed to have invented nearly every kind of work in which women were engaged. Tiresias lost his eyesight for having seen her in the bath. For this reason, the ancient traditions always describe her as clothed].

Armaniter (as Augustine states) was the eighth king of the Assyrians, at the time when God appeared to Isaac and promised him the things that he had also promised his father Abraham.

Prometheus flourished at this period in Arcadia—a man of keen intelligence and great experience, who taught the awkward and uncouth people refined customs and manners. He was the first to form images of people out of the earth, and he made them so real that a spirit seemed to move within them. And as he lived in the highest mountains of the Caucasus and learned astronomy, he first taught it to the Assyrians. He was the first to strike fire from rock; and he originated the custom of wearing a ring (but of iron) on the fourth finger, in honor of the arteries of the heart. But after the lapse of time the Romans promulgated a law to the effect that freemen and citizens wear rings of gold; the children of freemen, rings of silver, and the servants rings of iron.

Ancient legends relate that Prometheus had created man out of earth and water, either at the very beginning of the human race, or after the flood of Deucalion, when Zeus is said to have ordered him and Athena to make men of the mud, and the winds to breathe life into them. Prometheus is said to have given to men a portion of all the qualities possessed by all the other animals. For a trick that Prometheus attempted to play upon Zeus, the latter punished mortals by withholding fire from them, but Prometheus stole it in and gave it to men. Thereupon Zeus chained him to a pillar, where an eagle consumed his liver in the daytime, and it was restored in each succeeding night. Another legend is to the effect that Prometheus ascended into heaven, and there secretly lighted his torch at the chariot of Helios in order to bring the fire down to man. Prometheus had a sanctuary in the Academy, from whence a torch race took place in his honor.

From Asia legends concerning rings and ring lore were introduced into Greece. The classical derivation of the ring was attributed to Prometheus who, having incurred the wrath of Zeus, was compelled to wear on his finger an iron ring, to which was attached a fragment of the rock of the Caucasus.

In the reign of Belocus, the ninth king of Assyria, the Lord talked to Jacob and promised him the things which he had promised his forefathers, namely, possession of the land of Canaan, and blessing of all the people that were his seed, which is Christ. Belocus reigned 36 years.

Atlas was a great stargazer and so learned in astronomy that it was said that he carried the heavens on his shoulders. [Atlas was a brother of Prometheus, and with the other Titans made war on Zeus. Being conquered, he was condemned to bear heaven on his head and hands. The myth seems to have arisen from the notion that lofty mountains supported the heavens. Later traditions metamorphosed Atlas into the mountain. Thus Ovid relates that Perseus came to Atlas for shelter, which being refused, Perseus, by means of the head of Medusa, changed him into Mt. Atlas, on which rested heaven with all its stars. Others represent Atlas as a king who possessed great knowledge as to the courses of the stars, and who was the first to teach men that heaven had the form of a globe. Hence the expression that heaven rested on his shoulders was regarded as figurative speech. At first the story referred to but one mountain; but as geographical knowledge extended, the name of Atlas was given to others, and so we read of Mauretanian, Italian, Arcadian and a Caucasian Atlas. The general opinion, however, was the heaven bearing Atlas was in northwestern Africa, the range that covers the surface of North Africa between the Mediterranean Sea and the Sahara Desert].

Baleus was the 10th king of the Assyrians, under whom Isaac died; and he reigned 52 years during the time of Mesapus, the 9th king of the Sicyonians.

Apollo invented the harp and conceived the art of medicine, which his brother Aesculapius later enlarged upon. He vanished in a flash of lightning. Apollo, also called Delphi, was regarded as an enlightened and highly respected man, and after his death was considered a god. He was called a god of prophecy and wisdom; and he was a discoverer of the art of medicine, and the first to know the power of herbs, as Ovid writes of him. [Apollo was one of the great divinities of the Greeks. He was a twin brother of Artemis, the Roman Diana. Although all sudden deaths were believed the result of his arrows, he was also able to deliver men, if duly propitiated. From being the god who affords help, he is regarded as the father of Aesculapius, the god of healing. As the god of prophecy he had different oracles, especially at Delphi. He was the god of music and is said to have invented the flute and lyre.]

Annichus was the 12th king of the Assyrians, and under him Joseph died while Plemmius the 11th king of the Sicyonians reigned.

Jupiter was also proclaimed as a god, and in his honor the foolish people sacrificed an ox. He was the first of the upper element of fire, and (as they say) a sun by day. His personal name was Lisania (Zeus Lycaeus) and he was highly honored in Arcadia at this time. By reason of his virtuous conduct he was given the very celebrated name of Jove. He was of a noble race in Arcadia. They say he had been at Athens and was a man of great intelligence; that he provided wholesome laws and rules of moral conduct for the coarse people of the country, who lived under beastly conditions. And he influenced them to worship gods, and set up temples and priests. And he taught them many other useful things. This barbarous primitive people marveled at his accomplishments and worshipped him as a god. And they called him Jupiter, and soon made him a king. [A repetition of what was said at Folio XXIV verso]

Saffeus was the 19th king of the Assyrians, and under him Moses was born in Egypt, while Orthopolis was the 12th king of Sicyonia and Criseus reigned as the 5th king of the Greeks.

ILLUSTRATIONS

(A) GODS OF GREECE AND ROME

In the first panel, at the left, are some of the pagan gods of Greece and Rome: Minerva, with her weaving implement; Prometheus, with his ring of iron, set with a stone, but large enough for a bracelet; Atlas, "the giant" holding a quarter section of a circle inscribed with numerals, probably emblematic of his astronomical accomplishments; Apollo, strumming on his lyre, and Jupiter without symbols of any kind, except a few mysterious signs inscribed on the collar of his hairy coat. He is certainly not the same god to whom we were introduced at Folio XXIV verso. He also posed for us once before as "Jareth, Enoch's son" (Folio X recto). This may or may not be his farewell appearance.

(B) ASSYRIAN LINEAGE (Continued)

Another line of Assyrian kings—Armaniter, Belocus, Baleus, Annichus and Saffeus. Each one has an orb and a scepter. All but one wear crowns. Baleus wears a plumed hat. All look aggressive except the weary Armaniter, who portrays the old adage that "Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown."

Folio XXVIII verso

Lacedemonia (Lacedaemon) was a city in the land of Litaonie (Laconia, Laconica, or Loconice), in Achaea, and it was built by Lacedaemon, the son of Jove, of which Greece has its name. The same city was also called Sparta. But Herodotus states that Lacedaemonia was a country, and Sparta was a city in it; yet the names have been used interchangeably. Justinus states why it was called Sparta and he says the people called Spartans had their beginning in the 50th year of King Ozie, after the death of Althumenis, [Probably Althemenes, son of Catreus, king of Crete. In consequence of an oracle that Catreus would lose his life at the hands of one of his children, Althemenes left Crete and went to Rhodes. There he unwittingly killed his father, who had come in search of his son]. the king of the Lacedaemonians, and after the destruction of their kingdom. And Cicero writes of the Spartan virgins, who were more assiduous in the development of their bodies for the action of knighthood, than in the acquisition and birth of children. Therefore (as Virgil states), they were also to be distinguished from others by the manner of their dress. The first king of the Lacedaemonians was Eurystheus, [Legendary king of Argos]. a Greek, in the 98th year of Abraham. Agesilaus [Agesilaus I, was the sixth king of the Agid line at Sparta, excluding Aristodemus. According to Apollodorus, he reigned forty-four years, and died in 886 BCE. Pausanias makes his reign a short one, but contemporaneous with the reign of Lycurgus]. was their 6th king, and he, by reason of his exemplary conduct is worthy of immortality. He descended from Hercules and conquered the land in his youth. He was a man of fidelity and faith. Lycurgus [Lycurgus was the reputed founder of the Spartan Constitution. About him it is not possible to make a single statement that is not called into question. Many scholars, indeed, suppose him to be in reality a god or hero. If this is so, he is probably to be connected with the cult of Apollo Lycius or that of Zeus Lycaeus. Tradition agrees in placing him in the 9th century]. was a prince and lawgiver of the Lacedaemonians, and a highly enlightened man. Among the learned he was looked upon as a man of high esteem. Concerning him, Plutarch, Valerius, Justinus and Aristotle have written much.

Laconia, Laconica, or Lacedaemon, in the southeastern part of the Peloponnese, is referred to by Homer only under the latter name, which is its most ancient one. He applies it to the city as well as to its capital. The usual name as found among the Greek writers, was Laconica, though the form Lacedaemon also continued to be used. The Romans called the country Laconica, Laconice, and Laconis. These names are applied to the whole free population of Laconia, both to the Spartan citizens and the Perioeci, old Achaean inhabitants who had become tributary to the Spartans and possessed no political rights. The Helots were also a portion of the old Achaean population; but they had been reduced to a state of slavery.

The Lacedaemonians are said to have derived their name from a mythical hero, Lacon, or Lacedaemon, their progenitor. The plain of Sparta is the very heart of the country, and accordingly, it was at all times the seat of the ruling class; and from it the whole country received its name. The city of Sparta was located on the right bank of the Eurotas (Iri), about twenty miles from the sea. The nearest modern town in the neighborhood is Mystra. During the flourishing times of Greek independence Sparta was never protected by a wall, since the bravery of its citizens, and the difficulty of access, were supposed to render such defenses unnecessary. Walls were not girded about it until the time of the Romans.

Sparta is said to have been founded by Lacedaemon, son of Zeus and Taygete, who married Sparta, the daughter of Eurotas, and called the chief city after the name of his wife.

From various causes the Spartans became distracted by internal quarrels, until at length Lycurgus, who belonged to the royal family, was selected by all those involved to give a new constitution to the State. This document laid the foundation for Sparta's greatness; for she soon became aggressive and extended her sway over the greater part of the Peloponnese. Within later years this supremacy passed to Athens, then back to Sparta, then to Thebes, and finally to Philip of Macedon.

Mercury was experienced in many arts. These he taught the people, and was regarded as a god. All the poets write that he was the first messenger and interpreter of the gods. He was also the god of eloquence and the patron of merchants. He was also the messenger of thieves and the interpreter of the gods. He discovered the lyre of seven strings, and was highly learned in all the sciences, particularly in the natural sciences; for (as they say) he waked the dead by means of his plants and herbs. For these reasons he was considered one of the gods after his death, and the star Mercury was named after him.

Bacchus first discovered wine in Greece, and he was held to be a god. He also introduced wine into other regions, and taught the Germans how to brew barley.

Omagirus was the first to introduce the use of oxen in plowing and husbandry.

In this third age the women, called Amazons (Scythian women), ruled for 100 years, and concerning them we have in this book before written. With cruel wars they brought many cities of Asia and Europe under their sway. Their queens were Marsepia and Lambeta, Sinope, Anthiopa, Ipolite, Orothia and Penthesilea, who slew Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles before Troy.

(A) LACEDAEMONIA

The city of Lacedaemon (or Sparta) is illustrated by a general landscape, here used for the first time. It is a walled town, consisting largely of defensive structures, showing that the citizens are not relying for security on their bravery alone, as did the ancient Spartans. To help out the application of the illustration let us assume that the time is after the advent of the Romans, who walled up the city. But there are other difficulties; for over the gate of the castle, at the left, we see a coat of arms, apparently displaying an eagle with wings outspread; while to the extreme right a gothic spire is outlined against the sky. In the foreground is a circular structure with a balcony, apparently a watchtower. Behind the city walls we see rows of gabled houses, packed side by side, like barracks. The vegetation consists of a few blasted leafless trees. On a high hill in the background is another defensive structure—a castle or fort.

(B) AMAZONS

The same triple portrait of Amazon warriors, first introduced at Folio XIX verso, is here repeated, with a small amount of additional text naming the queens of the Amazons.

(C) MERCURY, BACCUS AND OMAGIRUS

Mercury, Bacchus and Omagirus: The small portrait of Mercury does not have the slightest relation to the messenger of the gods—not a symbol, not an attribute is introduced. We have here just a wizened old man, selected for want of something else to fill the space.

Below him is Bacchus, who would at least make a good signboard to direct the thirsty traveler to a good glass of port. He wears a crown of leaves and holds forth a bunch of grapes.

Omagirus looks like a sturdy old husbandman, and in his hands he holds a yoke, a symbol of his calling.

Folio XXIX recto

And so at this time the kingdom of Greece sprang up under Inachus; and it endured through fourteen reigns, up to the time of Baroch (Barak) [Barak lived at a time when the Canaanite kingdom of Hazor, having recovered from its overthrow by Joshua, was taking vengeance by oppressing Israel. He is called from his home by Deborah to deliver Israel. He gathers an army of ten thousand men from the tribes of Naphtali and Zebulun. With this force, accompanied by Deborah, without whom he refuses to go forward, he encamps in Mt. Tabor, while the enemy under Sisera lies in the plain on the banks of the Kishon. At the word of Deborah, Barak leads his men down to battle, and completely defeats Sisera. The latter flees; Barak pursues him, but on reaching his hiding place finds that he has already been slain by Jael, the wife of Heber. The glory of the victory, therefore, does not lie with Barak, but with Deborah, who was the guiding spirit, and with Jael, who slew the enemy's leader. (Judges 4:5)]. and Delbore (Deborah), [Deborah is the fourth of the leaders or "judges" of Israel. The term "judge" had a special significance among the Israelites. The judicial authority was primarily administered by the elders, and by the heads of families. There were also others called "judges," whose history is given in the book of that name, but they were a class of persons raised up in special emergencies. Deborah was such a judge. She was also called a prophetess, that is, an inspired woman—one of the four mentioned in the Old Testament. Her home was between Bethel and Ramah in the hill country of Ephraim. She had her judgment seat under a palm tree, which from this circumstance, is spoken of as "the (well-known) palm tree of Deborah." Here the Israelites came to her for counsel and guidance. She was the real deliverer of the Israelites who had sunk into a state of feebleness under the oppressive bondage under Jabin, a Canaanitish king of Hazor. Deborah was a personality of great power and was looked upon as a 'mother in Israel.'] a judge of Israel. And as at this time Criseus (Acrisius) was unwittingly slain, Perseus through fear left Greece and turned the kingdom over to the Mycenaens; so thereafter Aretius Acreus ruled.

Perseus, the famous hero of Argos, was a son of Zeus and Danae, and a grandson of Acrisius. Having no male issue, Acrisius consulted the Pythian oracle and received the answer that if Danae should give birth to a son, he, Acrisius, would perish at his hands. So he shut up his daughter in a subterranean apartment of brass or stone. But Zeus, having metamorphosed himself into a shower of gold, came down upon her through the roof of the apartment, and became by her the father of Perseus. When Acrisius discovered that his daughter had given birth to a son, he threw them both into a chest, and put them out to sea; but Zeus caused the chest to land on the island of Seriphos, one of the Cyclades, where Dictys, a fisherman, found them, and carried them to his brother, King Polydectes. This king made Danae his slave, and courted her favor, but in vain. In order to obtain the undisturbed possession of her, he sent off her son, Perseus, in the meantime grown to manhood, to the Gorgons, to fetch the head of Medusa. Another account states that Polydectes married Danae, and caused Perseus to be brought up in the temple in Athens. When Acrisius learned this he went to Polydectes who, however, interfered on behalf of the boy, and the latter promised not to kill his grandfather. Acrisius, however, was detained in Seriphos by storms, and during that time Polydectes died. During the funeral games the wind carried a discus, thrown by Perseus, against the head of Acrisius and killed him. Immediately thereafter Perseus proceeded to Argos and took possession of the kingdom of his grandfather.

According to the common tradition, Perseus brought back the head of the Medusa in a bag, and on his return visited Ethiopia, and there married Andromeda. His adventures concluded, he returned to Argos to visit his grandfather; but Acrisius, remembering the oracle, fled to Larissa. Perseus followed, intending to persuade him to return. The common tradition relates that when the king of Larissa celebrated games in honor of his guest Acrisius, Perseus took part and accidentally killed his grandfather with a discus.

At this time also Phoroneus first gave laws to Greece, and ordained that matters in controversy between the parties should be handled and decided by a single judge. Therefore the jurists say that the court in which legal matters were considered (in Latin called the 'forum') was named after Phoroneus. Item: Isis, his sister (as they say) was married to his son, named Apis. He was also regarded as a god by the Egyptians.

Inachus, the first king of Greece, began to reign in the 60th year of Isaac; and he reigned 50 years. At his death he left behind Isis, the queen of Egypt, and Phoroneus his son, who ruled after him. [Inachus (See earlier note to Folio XXVII verso)]

Isis, the daughter of Inachus, was first called Io (Juno). She went to Egypt, invented the alphabet, or writing, and taught the laws. There she was called Isis, which, in the Egyptian tongue, is equivalent to 'earth.' Because of her noble ways, great virtue and learning, she was held in great esteem and honor, and the Egyptians believed that she had fallen from the sky. They considered her a goddess, for she taught the crude people how to till the soil, plant seed, and to make bread from the grain. [Io, or Isis, daughter of Inachus, king of Argos, was loved by Zeus, but on account of Hera's jealousy he metamorphosed her into a white heifer. The goddess was aware of the change, obtained the heifer from Zeus, and placed her under the care of Argus Panoptes; but Zeus sent Hermes to slay Argus, and to deliver Io. Hera then tormented Io with a gadfly, and drove her, in a state of frenzy, from land to land, until at length she found rest on the banks of the Nile. Here she recovered her original form, and bore a son to Zeus, called Epaphus. The wanderings of Io were very celebrated in antiquity, and were extended and embellished with the increase of geographical knowledge. The Bosphorus is said to have derived its name from her swimming across it. According to some traditions Io married Telegonus, king of Egypt, and was afterward identified with Isis. Her connection with Egypt seems to have been an invention of later times, and was probably suggested by the resemblance which was found to exist between Argive Io and the Egyptian Isis].

Phoroneus, as already stated, established courts in Greece, and he wrote its laws. He had a brother who taught the people how to observe the months and years. To the honor of the pagan gods he erected temples and altars. For these reasons he was considered a god, and oxen were sacrificed to him. He was also known as Phegeus. [Phoroneus, son of Inachus and the Oceanid Melia or Archia, was a brother of Aegialeus and the ruler of Argos. He was married to the nymph Laodice, by whom he became the father of Niobe, Apis and Car. According to other writers his sons were Pelasgus, Issus, and Agenor, who, after their father's death divided the kingdom of Argos among themselves. Phoroneus is said to have been the first to offer sacrifices to Hera at Argos, and to have united the people, who until then had lived in scattered habitations, into a city which was named for him. The patronymic Phoronides is sometimes used by Argives in general].

A great flood occurred in Thessaly. It was called the Deucalion Flood because in that kingdom it was the most severe. [Deucalion, king of Phthia, in Thessaly, was a son of Prometheus. When Zeus, for the treatment he received from Lycaon, resolved to destroy the degenerate race of men, Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha, were, on account of their piety, the only mortals saved. On the advice of his father he built a ship in which he and his wife rode out the nine-day flood in safety; but all the other inhabitants of Hellas were destroyed. When the waters subsided, Deucalion offered up a sacrifice to Zeus and consulted the oracle at Themis as to how the race of man might be restored. The goddess told them to cover their heads and to throw the bones of their mothers behind them; which they interpreted to mean the stones of the earth. And so they did. The stones thrown by Deucalion became men; those thrown by his wife Pyrrha became women. By his wife, Deucalion became the father of Hellen].

In the flourishing days of King Serapis a bull came out of the river and ascended into the air. And he came down again into the water and disappeared. The foolhardy people considered him to be a god.

Serapis, the third king of Greece, sailed to Egypt. He died there, and the benighted people made him the greatest god of Egypt. [Serapis or Sarapis, was an Egyptian divinity, whose worship was introduced into Greece in the time of the Ptolemies. His worship was introduced into Rome with that of Isis]. At this time they also worshipped a garlanded bull of various colors, whom they called Apis; and when he died, the Devil put a calf in his place, thereby to deceive the people. [At Folio XXII recto (see Memphis) the chronicler stated that Osiris was worshipped at Memphis; that when he inherited the kingdom of Argos from his forefather, Phoroneus, he sailed to Egypt, and married Isis; that after he taught the people many useful things, they honored him as a god, and changed his name and called him a bull and that from this arose the custom that when a beautiful bull unexpectedly appeared, they detained him, and for a time worshipped him. See also at the same folio, notes on Osiris, Phoroneus, Apis his son, and on the Bull of Memphis. Compare also with text at Folio XXVI recto where Apis appears in the . And now, in conclusion of that lineage, we here find another reference to the Bull of Memphis, but none to Apis, son of Phoroneus. We are told that 'when the bull died the Devil put a calf in his place in order to deceive the people, this being the reason why the children of Israel worshipped a calf at Horeb.' What a confusion of Egyptian and Greek mythology, and Genesis thrown in for good measure! In the pictorial we have Inachus, Phoroneus, Serapis, and Argus. And finally, in the account of the Deucalion Flood, we come upon another bull story to the effect that a bull came out of the river, ascended into the air, returned and disappeared; as a result of which the foolhardy people regarded the bull as a god]. Following this custom, the children of Israel, in their folly, also worshipped a calf in Horeb. There is nothing more pitiable than a sensible being discovered in such a folly.

Argus was the fourth king of the Greeks, and after him the kingdom of Argos was named. After his death he was held to be a god and was honored with temples and sacrifices. In this period the Greeks commenced to grow grain, for seed was brought there from other regions. [Argus, son of Zeus and Niobe, is generally called the third king of Argos, and from him the place is said to have derived its name. In reckoning him as the third king we count Inachus and Phoroneus, his son, as his predecessors, omitting Serapis, to whom the chronicler assigns third place. The descendants of Inachus, who may be regarded as the Pelasgian kings, reigned over the country for nine generations, but were at length deprived of the sovereignty by Danaus, who is said to have come over from Egypt].

Job, a very holy man and praiseworthy example of patience, was born to Zareth, his father and Bosra, his mother, in the regions of Judea and Arabia. He was just, upright, kind, intelligent and brave, useful to his times, moderate and wisely patient. Among those who lived in his time in the East he was regarded a very rich man. He owned 7000 sheep, 3000 camels, 500 oxen, 600 asses, and had many servants. By his wife he had six sons and three daughters, and the Lord protected him against the temptations of the Devil. His estates and his wife and children were taken from him, and he was laden with sores. But in spite of all he did not sin, but said, The Lord gave it, and he has taken it away. However, the Lord made him two-fold restoration, and he lived thereafter 140 years, and saw his children multiplied to the fourth generation. He died old and full of years.

ILLUSTRATIONS

(A) LINEAGE OF THE GREEK KINGS

Here beings the Lineage of the Kings of Greece, portrayed in a panel about 2" wide and extending for almost the full length of the page. They appear in the following order: Inachus, Phoroneus, Serapis and Argus. Crown, orb and scepter are present in each case, and the regal robes are medieval.

(B) ISIS, QUEEN OF EGYPT

Isis is the usual type of medieval woman, and she appears in the bonnet and veil, without royal attributes or Egyptian characteristics. The woodcut is 2" x 2.5".

(C) THE DEUCALION FLOOD

The Deucalion Flood is represented by a sort of cloudburst, in consequence of which large drops of rain are precipitated. This woodcut is about 2" square.

(D) JOB AND THE DEVIL

Here sits Job, the famous patriarch of Uz, whose sorrows are recounted in the book of his name. He lived in very primitive times, unacquainted with the Mosaic Law and the Jewish worship—a holy outsider, who was yet, like Melchizedek, a worshipper of God. He was a prince of great wealth, piety, integrity and happiness; but now he appears before us with no other possession than a loose mantle that barely covers his nakedness. His hands are held together in an attitude of prayer. By God's permission Satan tested him, destroying his property, his children and his healthy, and visiting him with the most loathsome form of leprosy. And here the Devil is at him again—a horned demon, with a long tail, curled into the form of a figure 8, and with ornate flaming wings and long claws. He is fluttering about the old patriarch with devilish glee, tormenting him and making a vigorous effort to disturb his meditations.

And these pious meditations continued. Job remained faithful to the Lord, who reversed the sentence of the Devil, and restored to Job all he had lost and more. With daughters renowned for their beauty, with sons to perpetuate his name, with fullness of days and abundance of honor he passed away, 140 years after his great trial. Hales places him before the birth of Abraham, Usher about 30 years before the Exodus (traditionally dated to 1521 BCE).

Folio XXIX verso

Moses, true and highest prophet, prince of historians, and a serene man, released the people of God from Egyptian bondage; and he reigned forty years in the wilderness. He was beloved of God and man. God remembered Moses in his blessing, and decided to admit him to the presence of his glory on Mt. Sinai. So while Moses was attending the flocks of Jethro, his father-in-law, grazing in the wilderness, God appeared to him in a burning bush; but the bush was not consumed. And the Lord commanded Moses to depart for Egypt to release the people of Israel. This Moses is the man by whose praise heaven and earth are illuminated. He clearly saw God face to face, and this the Scriptures do not record of any other being of mortal flesh. So says St. Paul among the heathens, gave witness and taught the existence of one true God, to be believed in and worshipped.

Aaron, brother of Moses, was a holy man and endowed with the gift of eloquence. By divine command he deservedly accepted the highest priestly office, which he bequeathed to his sons in perpetuity. Aaron died at the age of 133 years and was buried at Mt. Horeb. Eleazar, his son, was bishop after him; for upon him Aaron, before his death, placed the stole of the priesthood. Eleazar died at the age of 123 years, in the 36th year of his priesthood, on Mt. Horeb, in Arabia.

These three (referring to the illustration accompanying the text), namely Nadab, Abihu and Eleazar, were Aaron's sons; but Nadab and Abihu offered strange fire; wherefore they were punished by God and destroyed.

ILLUSTRATIONS

(A) MOSES AND THE BURNING BUSH

(A) By a woodcut 8-7/8" x 5" the artist has faithfully portrayed the incident of Moses and the burning bush:

Now Moses kept the flock of Jethro, his father-in-law, the priest of Midian, and he led the flock to the back side of the desert, and came to the mountain of God, even to Horeb. And the angel of the Lord appeared to him in a flame of fire out of the midst of a bush; and he looked and behold, the bush burned with fire, and the bush was not consumed. And Moses said, I will now turn aside, and see this great sight, why the bush is not burnt. And when the Lord saw that he turned aside to see, God called to him out of the midst of the bush, and said. . . Do not draw near to this place; take off your shoes from your feet, for the place on which you stand is holy ground. . . Moses hid his face; for he was afraid to look upon God. . . I will send you to Pharaoh, so that you might bring forth my people the children of Israel out of Egypt.

Exodus 3:1-10

And so here we find ourselves on Mt. Horeb. The flock of Jethro, consisting of a few sheep, are huddled together at the right, a number of goats in the distance. At the extreme left is the burning bush, from which God himself appears (with a halo), addressing Moses. The cautioning words have already been spoken, for Moses is kneeling and removing his shoes, while his faithful watchdog is seated before him and complacently looking on. He is not the kind of dog a shepherd would use—just a s good sleek little dog, with a lion's tail and a neat collar. Note also that Moses is portrayed with "horns of honor," as we generally find him pictured. The bush is burning, as the flames above it indicate, but its lower leaves show that it is not being consumed. The landscape is rugged and mountainous. The woodcut may be crude and quaint, but it tells the story far better than the Chronicler.

(B) THE PRIESTLY LINE (Continued)

(C) THE DEATH OF NADAB AND ABIHU

Folio XXX recto

Aminadab was the first who in full faith followed Moses into the Red Sea, while the rest doubted. For this he was rewarded as the origin of royal lineage. In the year of the world 3644.

Balaam, the prophet, son of Beor, and a celebrated man, lived by the river in the land of the children of Amon. To him Balak, the king of the Midianites, sent his trusty messengers with the request that he come and curse the Israelites. And although Balaam sought the counsel of the Lord in the matter, and God forbade him to comply, nevertheless he saddled his ass, and accompanied his messengers. As he approached a narrow defile along the road, the angel of the Lord intercepted him and with a drawn sword barred the way so that Balaam could neither pass on the right nor on the left. The ass sank down under him; and, as he beat the animal on its sides, the Lord opened its mouth. At the same time Balaam saw the angel of the Lord, who punished him. So Balaam wandered away and at the command of the angel, made this prophesy: 'A Star shall arise out of Jacob and a Sceptre out of Israel.' [Balaam was a soothsayer of Pethor on the Euphrates, and was engaged by Balak, king of Moab, to curse the Israelites, who were encamped in the Jordan valley in great numbers. Balaam encountered great difficulties in undertaking the task, for the Lord repeatedly intervened, commanding him to bless and not curse Israel. To fully understand the story of Balaam and his ass, it is necessary to read 22-24].

Naason (Nahshon), in the year of the world 3688. [Nahshon was a brother-in-law of Aaron and a descendant in the fifth generation from Judah. He is also mentioned as one of the ancestors of David, and of Christ. The German edition replaces the Latin text's "Naason (Nahshon), in the year of the world 3688." with "Naason (Nahshon) was a prince of the tribe of Judah in the wilderness."] Joshua, the son of Nun, was, after the death of Moses, appointed a judge over Israel by the Lord and instructed to parcel out the lands. [Joshua 1:1-6]. He sent out men to spy upon Jericho. Rahab, a harlot, lodged and hid the spies. They promised immunity to her and her house, and to her servants, provided she would place in her window a bloody or red sign. And she let them go forth secretly. [Joshua 2:1-21]. The Israelites miraculously crossed the Jordan, the Levites proceeding in advance with the ark. Joshua ruled over the people of the Lord for 27 years. He and Caleb were the only ones out of the 600,000 men who left Egypt to reach the promised land. [Numbers 13:1-33; 14:1-7, 14:30, 37, 38]. Joshua died at the age of 110 years and was buried in the mountains of Ephraim.

Otoniel (Othniel), a brother of Caleb, released the people from the oppression of the king of Mesopotamia and slew him. At this time the angel of the Lord appeared and punished the children of Israel for transgressing the law. He reminded them of the blessings with which God had favored them, and thus he brought them to tears, for they had often wandered from the Lord and suffered bondage in consequence. When they repented, they were relieved of their punishments by various judges; but as often as they did so, they again succumbed to evil and transgressions.

Ahoth (Ahoah) slew Eglon, the king of the Moabites and freed Israel. He was a strong man and used both hands in furtherance of justice. [According to Judges 31:2 ff. Ehud, the father of Ahoah, slew Eglon, and brought the Moabite ascendancy over Israel to an end].

Sangar (Shamgar), son of Anath, slew 600 Philistines who attempted to enter his land with plowshares. Thereafter they (the Israelites) sinned and fell into the hands of Jabin (Jabin) king of Canaan. The captain (of Jabin) was Sisera, who fought with Barak. Deborah, the prophetess, advised Barak to give battle, and helped him. She was given the honor of judging Israel. [Shamgar smote these 600 Philistines with an ox goad, a light wooden pole shod at one end with an iron spike with which to prick the oxen, and having at the other a small spade with which to clean the plowshare. See Judges 3:31]

The Lineage of Christ is resumed from Folio XXVII verso. It there ended with Aram (Ram). We now begin with Amminadab, son of Ram (which some have assumed to be a contraction of Aram). Below him is a portrait of his son Nahshon. Although the panel is 2 and ¼" wide and 12-5/8" high, it contains no other portraits. The remainder of the space is filled in with floral designs. There is nothing distinctive or particularly significant about either of these portraits.

(B) LINEAGE OF THE JUDGES

The Lineage of the Judges of Israel begins with Joshua (Josue) successor of Moses as leader of Israel. In one hand he holds a grapevine, while with the other he makes a gesture as if to call attention to something. He is followed by Othniel (Othaniel), Ahoah (Ahoth), and Sangar (Shamgar). They are grouped in a panel 2-1/8" x 7-1/8". Why Joshua exhibits a vine is not clear. On the other hand Shamgar at least might have been given the ox-goad for a symbol.

(C) BALAAM AND HIS ASS

The story of Balaam and his Ass is depicted in a small woodcut 6.5" x 4-3/8". The soothsayer of Peor is enroute to curse Israel at the behest of the Moabite king. He is mounted on his faithful ass and beating the animal with a stick. As he approaches a narrow in the road, and the animal has sensed danger for a third time, further progress has apparently become impossible. After the third belaboring the ass turns back his head reproachfully and remonstrates with its master:

Am I not your ass, upon which you have ridden ever since I was yours up to this day? Was I ever in the habit of doing such a thing to you? And he said, No.

And at the same time the Lord who had opened the mouth of the ass, also opened the eyes of Balaam. And he sees the Lord's angry messenger barring the way. His sword is raised; and a formidable weapon it is! The angel upbraids Balaam for already having smitten the faithful animal three times, and warns him that had the ass not turned aside on each occasion, the rider would certainly have been slain. Balaam contritely surrenders: "If it displeases you, I will return." And Israel was not cursed.

Folio XXX verso

When Moses and the children of Israel had been in Egypt for 440 years, he received the law from God and gave it to them. After God had visited the Egyptians with ten plagues, the Israelites wandered through the wilderness in the direction of the Red Sea. They were preceded by an angel in the form of a pillar of a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night. But Pharaoh regretted that he had permitted them to go forth; and he hastened after them with his army and his chariots in order to bring them back to Egypt. After Moses in accordance with the ordinances of God had eaten the paschal lamb with his people, they saw the Egyptians approaching; and they murmured against Moses because he had led them out of Egypt. Then Moses, in accordance with God's command, put forth his rod over the Red Sea, and the waters parted and left a way in between; and the children of Israel passed through freely. As Pharaoh's army pursued them over the same way, Moses again stretched forth his rod over the Sea, and it flowed together again, drowning Pharaoh and his army in its midst. Therefore Moses and the people rejoiced with Maria (Miriam) his sister. [Exodus 14:5-30; 15:20-21].

Now as the children of Israel proceeded from Raphidin (Rephidim) and came to Mount Sinai, the Lord commanded them through Moses to sanctify themselves, and to wash their clothes on the second day, and to go to the mountain on the third. But neither man nor beast was to come near it. And the mountain smoked, and thunderclaps and the sound of a trumpet were heard, and lightening was seen. A very dense cloud covered the mountain, and Moses went into it to receive the law. And so the Lord gave his people the laws on Mount Sinai in the third month of their exodus from Egypt. [Exodus 19 and 20]. The laws are divided into three classes, namely moral, juridical and ecclesiastical. The moral are the ten commandments which God (as stated above) gave the people through Moses. And although a number of other moral laws have been prescribed at various places, yet they are all comprehended within these ten commandments. These commandments all persons and peoples are bound to obey. The first three concern our obligation to God, while the remaining seven set forth our duties to our neighbor. But the juridical ordinances are prescribed to maintain the peaceful relations of the people and to preserve civic order.

ILLUSTRATIONS

Each woodcut is 5-1/8" x 8-7/8" and covers the full width of the page.

[The order of these two woodcuts are out of chronological sequence in the Latin edition of the Chronicle].

(A) MOSES ON MOUNT SINAI

The children of Israel having successfully effected passage of the Red Sea, are now encamped in great numbers and in comfortable, spacious medieval tents at the foot of Mount Sinai. The horned Moses has climbed up into the mountain and is just receiving the stone tablets containing the Ten Commandments from the hands of God. The whole scene is very quaint. The tents are higher than the mountain and are rather close to the scene of action considering the warnings that were sounded and the precautions which were taken for the occasion.

(B) PASSAGE OF THE RED SEA

Moses and his people, a motley gathering of panic stricken men, women and children, have just passed over the Red Sea and are huddled together on the farther side. Moses, equally excited, is in their midst. He has appealed to the Lord, and in accordance with his command, again raises his rod, and the pursuing hosts of Egypt are being swallowed up by the closing sea. It is apparent that not only many lives are being lost on Pharaoh's side, but that a substantial amount of medieval armor, cross bows, lances, battleaxes, and other military equipment are finding their way to Davy Jones's Locker.

Folio XXXI recto

During these times the children of Israel made a molten image of a calf, according to the customs of the Egyptians (who worshipped Busiris, their king). [Busiris, king of Egypt, son of Poseidon and Lysianassa, is said to have sacrificed all foreigners who visited Egypt. Hercules on his arrival there, was likewise seized and led to the altar; but he broke his chains and slew Busiris]. This occurred while Moses was detained up in the Mount with the Lord. The people asked Aaron to make gods for them to worship and to go before them. And as Hur opposed them, he was (as the Scriptures state) suffocated with spittle.

According to Josephus, Hur was the husband of Miriam, sister of Moses. Exodus makes no mention of Hur's protest and fate on this occasion. At a previous time he and Aaron held up the hands of Moses in order that by continual uplifting of the sacred staff Israel might prevail over Amalek (Exodus 17:10). And with Aaron he was left in charge of the people when Moses ascended Mount Sinai (Exodus 24:14). But there is no further reference to him.

When Moses returned from the mountain the situation of his people and the depravity (in his eyes) into which they had fallen astounded him. It was natural that he should demand an explanation of Aaron. And Aaron replied, "Let not the anger of my lord grow hot; you know the people, that they are set on mischief (Exodus 32:22). There is no reference to Hur's fate, although this, according to the chronicler, influenced Aaron to give way to the people. Neither Vulgate nor the King James Version of the Bible attest the death of Hur at this time.

So Aaron was afraid, and said, Take the golden earrings of your wives and of your children; and as they took them, he made a molten calf thereof. And the people said, 'Israel, these be they gods which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt.' And Aaron built an altar and proclaimed a feast for the following morning. And the people rose up early and offered the Host; and they sat down to eat and drink, and then rose up to play (that is) to idolize. Then the Lord said to Moses, 'Depart, thy people have sinned with idolatry. Let me destroy them.' But Moses said, 'Lord, allay thine anger, so that the Egyptians may not say, For deceitfully he brought them out to give them the land which he promised them.' And as the Lord repented of his wrath, Moses departed with the stone tablets inscribed by the finger of God. And Joshua ran to meet him, saying, 'There are lamentations of war in the tents.' But Moses said 'It is the noise of singing.' And as Moses came near he saw the calf and the ring of dancers, and he was very angry. And he cast down the tablets, and they were broken. Having reprimanded Aaron for setting up the calf, and having heard his explanation, he burned the graven image and ground the fragments to powder, which he cast into the water and gave it to the children of Israel to drink. And this same powder appeared in the beards of the idolaters. And Moses asked the people to take swords and to slay all the guilty thus identified. Many thousand men fell on that same day. [Neither nor authenticates these latter details. True, according to the Scriptures, Moses burnt the calf in the fire, ground the fragments to powder, strewed the powder upon the water, and made his people drink (Exodus 32:20); but what followed was this: "Then Moses stood in the gate of the camp and said, Who is on the Lord's side? Let him come to me. And all the sons of Levi gathered themselves together to him. And he said to them, Thus says the Lord God of Israel, put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate, throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbor. And the children of Israel did according to the words of Moses" (Exodus 32:26-28). There is no mention of beards polluted with the powder of idolatry. The whole people are put to their choice].

THE CALF OF God - Size 8-3/8" x 10-5.8"

Forty days and forty nights Moses sojourned with the Lord on Sinai, securing the fundamental law written by the finger of God, voluminous instructions governing the holy service to be observed by the children of Israel, as well as minute plans for the Tabernacle (Exodus 25-31). But matters were moving too slowly for the idle hordes encamped below. "Up, make us gods which shall go before us," they demanded of Aaron. Knowing their temper he made them a molten calf from the golden earrings that they broke from the ears of their wives and children. And here, on a high pedestal, isolated from the world in the manner of St. Stilus, the first flagpole sitter, is the precious little calf. The morning of the feast proclaimed by Aaron on the day before is at hand. The sacrifices and offerings have been made, and the people have partaken of the feast. So now they rise up 'to play.' Out of their tents they come, and the dance of men, women and children about the calf of gold is in progress. The artist, in his modesty, has not depicted the temper of the people as Moses saw it. He introduces us to a very sedate performance, participated in by a handful of fully appareled and serious people. "Stiff-necked,"

to use the language of the Bible, they do appear, and by no means exuberant with festive joy.

And so here, as we look again, we feel that all is under a heavy cloud, as though a storm were approaching. And not without reason, for the Lord has observed this stiff-necked people, and his wrath has grown hot against them. Seeing his divine plans for his chosen people frustrated by corruption, he orders Moses down from the mountain in order that he may be alone in carrying out their doom. Except for the intercession of the horned one, his congregation would have been consumed before now.

And as we give the work further study we see Moses himself coming down from the mountain. Joshua has rushed up to meet him, for there is much to be explained. By word and gesture he indicates that there is a noise of war in the camp, but the wise Moses recognizes it as the hilarity of song. And as he sees the handiwork of Aaron, high up on the stile, and his people dancing about it in idolatrous worship, his patience is exhausted. He casts the precious tablets upon the ground and there they lie in fragments. Soon the precious little calf will also succumb to his wrath, and the dance will come to an end, and three thousand idolaters will bite the dust.

In the background of the woodcut are two mountains, Sinai (Sinay), the taller, to the right, and Horeb (Oreb), the lesser, to the left. Moses has apparently come down from Horeb, although according to the Scriptures, he received the law on Sinai. And so we become puzzled. But Mount Sinai, whose name connects it with the old Babylonian moon god Sin, is also known as Horeb (I King 8:9; Mal. 4:4, etc.); and not only is the site disputed, but it is possible that there were originally two mountains, which later harmonizing tradition has combined. There is no genuine pre-Christian tradition on the subject. The chief authority from the ancient sanctity of Mount Sinai is Antoninus Martyr (end of the 6th century CE), who tells that the Arabs (before Mohammed and Islam) in his time celebrated a moon-festival there. As Sin was a moon-god, the feast has been connected with the name of Sinai. Some authorities are of the opinion that Horeb is the name of the whole range, Sinai for a particular peak. Apparently the artist knew of the two names but not of the probable identity of the mountain. On the other hand, he may have had different views on the subject.

Opposite the peak of Sinai is the inscription 'Sepulchru(m) S. Katherine.' The female saint here referred to is St. Catherine of Alexandria, not to be confused with St. Catherine of Siena. Catherine of Alexandria was beheaded after a wheel equipped with blades for her torture broke up and would not do its work. The broken wheel is her symbol. According to legend angels carried her body over the desert and the Red Sea, and deposited it on the summit of Mt. Sinai. There it rested in a marble sarcophagus, and in the eight century a monastery was built over her remains. On the summit of Horeb is a house, probably a hospice or monastery, inscribed 'S. Salvatoris.'

Folio XXXI verso

Now as Moses, three months after the exodus, ascended Mount Sinai, and there fasted and attended for forty days and forty nights in order to obtain the law of the Lord, the Lord at the same time ordered him to make an ark of undecayed shittim wood, [Acacia wood, a hard wood tree common in the Sinai peninsula], two and one-half cubits in length, and one and one-half cubits in width, and in height the same; and entirely covered inside and out with purest gold; and above it, a crown (cornice) of gold; and a lid of the same breadth and length as the ark, so as to cover it, called a mercy seat. And lengthwise of the ark on either side of it, two golden rings, which passed through the wood, and through them gilded staves of shittim wood with which to carry the ark, and these were never to be removed. And at each end of the mercy seat was to be placed a golden cherubim, and each was to face toward the mercy seat, and they were to face one another; and their wings were to be outspread over the ark and toward each other, and to touch one another. And this was to be placed in the sanctum sanctorum (holy of holies). But within the ark were placed the golden bowl and the showbread, the rod of Aaron and the two tablets containing the Ten Commandments. [For a more accurate description of the ark and its contents, see Exodus 25:10-21].

And the Lord said to Moses, You shall also make a table of shittim wood overlaid with gold plate, and supported by four feet, and a golden ring in each foot, and through the rings golden staves by which the table may be carried; and finally, round about it, as on the ark, a golden crown (cornice), four fingers in breadth, so that half of it projects above the table, in order that the things placed on it may not fall off; the other half to hang down as an ornament. On this table were placed twelve cakes of unleavened bread, six to the right and six to the left, and upon each stack a golden bowl or cup was placed, provided with incense each morning. On the Sabbath they placed fresh warm cakes on the table, which remained untouched until the following Sabbath, when they were taken from there, and the priests alone ate them. These cakes were known as priestly bread, because the priests made and baked them, placed them on the table, and removed them from it. They were called the bread of the offering; for they were laid before the Lord as an everlasting memorial of the Twelve Tribes of the children of Israel. [See Exodus 35:23-30].

ILLUSTRATIONS

(A) THE ARK OF THE TESTIMONY

The first of these illustrations (8-3/4" x 5-1/4") shows two arks, both placed on a tessellated floor, side by side, apparently for purposes of comparison. The ark at the left shows the construction according to the Rabbi Solomon; the one at the right, according to the 'Catholic doctors.' The arks themselves are identical in construction, but in the former the cherubims stand on the ark in opposite corners, while in the latter they stand beside the ark, lifting its lid or mercy seat.

(B) THE TABLE OF THE SHOWBREAD

The second illustration (8-3/4" x 3-13/16") is of the Table of the Showbread (one version only). The table rests on a tessellated floor. On either side is a stack of six cakes, surmounted by a bowl of burning incense. On the right and left appears the open country, no doubt to indicate that the table was not placed in the holy of the holies, but 'without the vail.'

Folio XXXII recto

The Lord also caused to be made a candlestick of pure gold. The shaft or stem was fastened to a base of iron, and was ornamented with golden rods or pipes joined together; and where the heads of the rods came together, there were two knops or cups in the form of a nut; and out of the knops came bent flowers like lilies; and in the same field between the knops and the lilies was a circular knop; and likewise on the shaft or stem there were five rods, joined together in like manner, resulting in four grooves. And each had two knops, joined together, and the knops were beside each other; and so the lilies. But the standard went straight up, and it had three feet. And up above were six rods coming out of the stem, three to one side and three to the other, bent upward, one over the other, and reaching to the height of the stem. And on the stem or standard were four knops, resembling a nut, which some call little apples; that is, two knops were set, one against the other, and together they formed a little apple. Rabbi Solomon writes that these knops were elongated, and so constituted that the rods went through them, and that the purpose of the knops and the lilies was merely to ornament the candlestick. And this candlestick was (as Josephus says) made of seventy parts, assembled as a standard; and it was always made with seven heads of equal height.

Folio XXXII verso

And on each head was to be a golden lamp resting on the last or highest knop of each branch. And so there were seven vessels of gold with which the oil was poured into the lamps. There were also at the hand snuffers of pure gold, with which the lamps were trimmed and extinguished and the burnt matter removed; and there were vessels with water into which this burnt matter was thrown so that it would not smoke. Together these implements were to be of the weight of one pound of gold; but the Hebrews say a hundred weight. No one knows the exact weight; but no doubt a large quantity of gold was required to create so great a work. And the candlestick was placed to the south, over against the table, not directly but to the side. [The candlestick is to be thought of as an elaborately constructed candelabra, with places for seven lamps or lights. Like the cherubim it consisted of beaten work, elaborately wrought by some hand process. It had a main stem or shaft, rising up from a triangular pedestal or base. The main stem and branches were ornamented with flower-shaped cups into which the spherical knops were set, and both the knops and cups were further connected with flowers, or blossoms, all together serving the purpose of ornamentation. Three branches came out of the main stem to either side. These, with the stem, furnished at their tops the places for the seven lamps. The entire candlestick was to be wrought out of one piece of pure gold, so that the completed work should form one solid piece. It was to be placed so that it would throw light to the opposite side of the room. The description (Exodus 35:31-40) is obscure. The exact form of the shafts, or branches, and of the knops and flowers is left to conjecture. No dimensions are given for the whole or any of its parts. A conspicuous object among the spoils of Jerusalem, pictured on the Arch of Titus at Rome, is a figure of a candlestick, with its central shaft and six arms. It is not certain that this is an exact copy of the one captured at the fall of the temple, for the Roman artist may have modified some of its parts; but in its main outline it probably represents the original. The exact form of the snuffing tools and dishes is nowhere described].

THE CANDLESTICK

By two woodcuts (9.5" by approximately 11") the artist has visualized the lighted candlestick, firstly according to "the other doctors," (Figura Candelabri lum(in)us, Secundum Doctores aliquos), and secondly according to the Rabbi Moses (Figura Candelabri luminus, Secundum Raby Moysen). The first appears at Folio XXXII recto, the second at Folio XXXII verso. From the inscriptions it would seem the two plates should have appeared in the inverse order, that is, the Jewish version first, and then the version "according to the other doctors." The general construction is the same in both cases, the only difference being in the ornamentation.

Folio XXXIII recto []

And the Lord stood by Moses and told him to give the holy priesthood to his brother Aaron, and indicated how the priestly robes were to be made. There were four garments, common also to lesser priests, namely a linen shirt; a coat of white linen, double throughout; a girdle four fingers wide with various beautiful designs; and a mitre pointed at the top. Over these garments the high priest wore his own clothing. The first was a blue coat, the lower seams of which pomegranates and small bells were attached. The second was a shoulder dress (habergeon) without sleeves, and reaching down to the hips, and embroidered roundabout with various designs. The third, a breastplate, foursquare and doubled, and set with twelve precious stones. Fourth, a girdle of five colors. Fifth, a mitre made of white linen; and sixth, a golden plate, formed in the shape of a halfmoon, graven with the name of the great God, written Tetragrammaton [The groups of four letters representing the name of the Supreme Being in Hebrew texts, consisting of the four consonants JHVH, JHWH, YHVH, or YHWH. From reverence and for other reasons the word JHVH was almost never uttered in later Jewish traditions (predating the Christian era), the vowel sounds of 'Elohim,' or of 'Adonai' being used instead, accompanying the Tetragrammaton in the text. The true pronunciation of the word was in this way lost, though the form 'Yahweh' is that on which most scholars agree]. to be worn on the forehead and reaching from ear to ear. []

And again the Lord spoke to Moses, saying, Thou shalt make a laver of brass, and his foot also of brass and it shall be put between the tabernacle and the altar; and with the water poured in it the priests shall wash their hands and feet when about to don the holy garments and to go in and out of the tabernacle, as did Aaron and his sons while carrying the blood of the sacrifices to atone for the sins of the people, and when they went to the altar and offered incense. The laver was made of the mirrors of the women who watched at the entrance to the tabernacle. These mirrors were placed about the upper rim of the laver so that the priests could look in it and ascertain whether their faces and garments were without blemish.

The Lord also commanded Moses to make a tabernacle in this form. The tabernacle was a house consecrated to God, four-cornered and rectangular, with three closed walls toward the north, south and west. The entrance from the east was open, so that it might be lighted by the rays of the rising sun. The length was thirty cubits, the width was ten cubits, and its height ten cubits. On the south side were twenty erect boards of shittim wood, each ten cubits in length, four fingers thick, and a cubit and a half wide. These boards were made to fit together and were gilded on both sides, and each was set upon two silver perforated posts. The north wall was made in the same manner. But to the west there were six boards, all

(A) THE ALTAR OF THE BURNT OFFERINGS

Of the Altar of the Burnt Offerings two versions are given: one according to the Latin ('Altare holocausti secundum latinos'), the other according to the Hebrew ('Altare holocausti secundum hebreos'). Between these two woodcuts a third is inserted, showing a landscape, no doubt to give the idea that these altars were used in the open. The composite extends across the page to a height of 2-3/4". The Latin altar follows the description in Genesis very closely. The Hebrew altar is more elaborate, probably according to specifications worked out by some Rabbi. The structure was also known as the "brazen altar," and it stood directly in front of the principal entrance. Translated into our own measurements, it was 7 feet and 6 inches square, and 4 feet and 6 inches high. The fire used on this altar is said to have been kindled miraculously and was perpetually maintained. The altar was a place of constant sacrifice.

(B) THE VESTMENTS OF THE HIGH PRIEST

The Vestments of the High Priest are illustrated by a woodcut 7-3/4" x 3-3/4". In order to fully demonstrate the various points of his apparel, the high priest is made to stand with his feet apart in sailor fashion and his hands uplifted, his arms being crooked at the elbows. He wears his pointed mitre with its crescent-shaped emblem, the Tetragrammaton, or group of four letters inscribed on it, referring to the Deity; his breastplate with its twelve jewels, emblematical of the twelve tribes of Israel; his embroidered girdle; his sleeveless habergeon extending to the hips and highly embroidered; his coat, ornamented on the lower seams with alternating bells and pomegranates, and below this his long white coat. The bells were designed to assure those out and about that their officiating minister was about his holy work, and when the sound was heard they knew that he was performing his duties in proper attire. The sound indicated both when he entered and when he came out of the holy place. A failure to wear this robe would have been a wanton contempt to the holy place and its service, and would have exposed him to the judgment of death. The breastplate was a piece of embroidered work about ten inches square and made double, with a front and lining so as to function as a pouch or bag.

(C) THE LAVER

The Laver is represented by a woodcut 5" x 4-3/4". Elevated above its rim are twelve circular mirrors. These were not of glass as in our day, but the brazen mirrors of the women who assembled at the door of the tabernacle court (Exodus 38:8). The use of these reflectors has already been explained in the text. The laver has been conceived as a circular bowl, supported by a pedestal, giving it the appearance of a squat chalice, and here the woodcutter has added four water spouts equidistantly placed about the rim of the laver and taking on the form of animal heads.

Folio XXXIII verso

alike. In the middle of the temple and for its width the Lord commanded a beautiful veil (or dividing curtain) to be suspended against four pillars, and a quadruple ceiling of skins, with various colors interwoven, and of haircloth, of red skins, and blue skins. The other details are set forth in the Book of Exodus. [The chronicler has given us an abridgment of the tabernacle specifications, given with elaborate detail in Exodus 26:1-36. A clearer idea of the whole structure is given in Exodus, and may be further clarified by consulting commentaries, many of which contain illustrations].

In the first year Moses constructed a tabernacle for the Lord. Completing the work in seven months, on the first day of the first month of the second year he erected it. The Jews also through Moses began to keep their law at the same time with their letters. [The translation provided above ("The Jews also through Moses began to keep their law at the same time with their letters.") of the Latin phrase Judei quoque per Moysen lege(m) sil(=simul?) cu(m) l(itte)ris h(abe)re ceperu(n)t is very uncertain. Perhaps the meaning (if the translation is at all correct) is that the Jews began to write down the Torah when they first received the Hebrew letterforms from Moses]. Once again the Lord said to Moses, When you will count the sons of Israel, each one will give a price to the Lord for his own soul so that no plague comes to them, half a shekel according to the measurement (of a shekel) of the sanctuary. And a shekel is worth twenty obols. And this money was paid back for the use of the tabernacle. [Cf. Exodus 30:12-16]. And when these speeches had been completed, he gave to Moses two tablets of stone, written with the finger of God. [Cf. Exodus 31:18]. A divine work, not human, the Decalogue was written on both sides (of the tablets). And as the Hebrews pass down in their tradition, on one side there were figures like the figures on the opposite side, which was ascribed to a miracle. Others were speaking that the figures were carved in repeated letters. Furthermore, Catholic theologians, in particular the divine Augustine, place three commandments on the first tablet of the testimony; these govern man in relation to God. On the second (tablet) seven are written which are ranked next in importance. However, Rabbi Solomon and the Hebrews separate the commandments into five on one tablet and five on the other. Afterwards, when it appears to the man in the figure of a calf [The translation provided above ("Afterwards, when it appears to the man in the figure of a calf") of the Latin phrase Postea vo (vero? viro?) ut i(n) figura vituli videt(ur) is very uncertain], Moses, descending and seeing the calf and the dancers, growing angry, threw the tablets down, and they were broken. [Cf. Exodus 32.19. This entire paragraph has been deleted from the later German edition].

(A) TABERNACLE DETAILS

The architectural details show: (1) The individual boards of which the tabernacle was built, how they were tenoned, how held together and set in to place; (2) a view of the boards set and locked into position; and (3) a full view of one side of the tabernacle assembled.

(B) THE TABLETS OF THE LAW

Of the Tablets of the Law there are two versions: (1) according to "other doctors"; and (2) according to the Hebrew doctors. In both cases the form is the same, namely, that of a hinged or folding diptych, such as the Greeks and Romans were accustomed to write upon with a stylus. The tablets are rectangular in general form, but each leaf is rounded at the top. The commandments are inscribed in Latin.

Folio XXXVIII recto

Apheros, the king of Crete, was the first to discover the gathering of honey. His daughter conceived through sinful intercourse, and of her some unfavorable things are said. After him (Apheros) his son Anidis reigned. He also made laws and invented plowing with oxen. Erichonius [The reference is probably to Erichthonius or Erechtheus I, son of Hephaestus and Atthis, the daughter of Cranaus. Athena reared the child without the knowledge of the gods, and entrusted him to Agrauros, Pandrosos and Herse, concealed in a chest. They were forbidden to open it, but they disobeyed. On opening it they saw the child in the form of a serpent, or entwined serpent; whereupon they were seized with madness, and threw themselves down the rock of the Acropolis, or, according to others, into the sea. When Erichthonius grew up he expelled Amphictyon, and became king of Athens. He was the first to use a chariot with four horses, for which reason he was placed among the stars as Auriga ('Charioteer'), a large northern constellation. He was buried in the temple of Athena, and was worshipped as a god after his death. His famous temple, the Erechtheion stood on the Acropolis], a prince of the Athenians, was the first to introduce the use of the wagon.

Fenix (Phoenix) reigned in Tyre and Sidon and taught the use of the alphabet, and invented the use of Phoenician or red color with which capital letters are made. [Phoenix was a brother of Cadmus, and he, like Cadmus, was sent by his father in search of Europa, his sister, whom Zeus had carried off. Phoenix settled in the country, which was later called after him Phoenicia, of which Tyre and Sidon were the most important cities. Purple red was obtained from a sea snail on the Phoenician coasts and was a celebrated article of Phoenician commerce. The name Phoenicia is first found in Greek writers as early as Homer, and is derived by some from the abundance of palm trees in the country; by others from the purple red color, just mentioned; besides the mythical derivation from Phoenix, the brother of Cadmus]. A B C D Alpha vita (Beta) Gamma Delta.

At this point, the German edition includes the following text: "Cadmus (Cadmus) built the city of Thebes in Boeotia, and reigned there himself. He invented the Greek letters, Alpha, Beta, Gama, Delta." The Cadmus here referred to is probably the son of Agenor, king of Phoenicia, and Telepassa, and the brother of Europa. When Zeus carried off Europa to Crete, Agenor sent Cadmus in search of his sister. Unable to find her, he settled in Thrace; but having consulted the oracle at Delphi, he was commanded by the god to follow a cow of a certain description, and to build a town where the cow would sink down with fatigue. Cadmus found the cow in Phocia and followed her into Boeotia, where she sank down on the spot on which Cadmus built Cadmea, afterwards the citadel of Thebes. Athena assigned Cadmus to its government. He is said to have introduced into Greece an alphabet of 16 letters from Phoenicia or Egypt, and to have been the first to work the mines of Pangaeon in Thrace. The story of Cadmus suggests Phoenician or Egyptian immigration into Greece, by means of which the alphabet, the art of mining and civilization, came into the country. But many modern writers deny the existence of such a colony, and regard Cadmus as a Pelasgian divinity. Following this missing text, the German edition also includes the following two short paragraphs:

Under this (referring to the opposite illustration in the Latin edition called Amynthas) Amictus, the 18th king of the Assyrians, Joshua died. At the same time King Corate reigned as the 16th king of Sicyonia.

This Lompares (referring to the opposite illustration named Bellothus in the Latin edition) was the 23rd king of the Assyrians, under whom the history of Deborah (as Augustine states) was written and the kingdom of the Greeks ended.

Corinth, the city in the land of Achaia, was quite celebrated. It was first named by Sysiphus [Sisyphus, son of Aeolus, is said to have built Ephyra, afterwards Corinth. For his avarice and deceitfulness in life he was severely punished in the lower world, being obliged to roll a huge block of marble up a hill, which, when it reached the top, rolled back down again]. in the 80th year of Moses, and was built on Mt. Ischmon. It was first called Cerchira, and afterward Ephyra. For this reason Virgil writes of Ephyrian bronzes; for the Corinthians were much praised for their most beautiful and artistic vessels. But the city was thereafter destroyed. It was rebuilt by Corinthus, son of Orestes, and after him it was named Corinth. It was finally set in flames by the Romans, and since then it has never returned to its former prestige. The first ruler of the Corinthians was Athletes [Corinth was originally inhabited by the Aeolic race, and here ruled the Aeolic Sisyphus and his descendants. When the Dorians conquered the Peloponnese, the sovereign power passed into the hands of Heraclid Aletes, whom the chronicler calls Athletes. The conquerors became the ruling class, and the Aeolian inhabitants their subjects. After Aletes and his descendants had reigned five generations, royalty was abolished and followed by an oligarchical form of government confined to the powerful families of the Bacchiadae], a Greek, and a most successful warrior. Corinth was governed by twelve kings over a period of 323 years. Thereafter it became a government of the citizens. Peloponnesus, the country which the Latins call Norea (Noreia) was a protector and defender of all Greece. But when the Turkish power commenced to oppress Europe, the Greek rulers built a wall from one sea to another through the narrows, and thereby Peloponnesus was separated from the rest of Greece. The holy apostle Paul, with understanding, taught and did wonderful works, drawing the Corinthians from their idolatries to the true Christian religion. [Corinth, which Homer calls Ephyra, was located on the Isthmus of Corinth, and this is what the chronicler may mean when he refers to "Mt. Ischmon." Its territory embraced the greater part of the isthmus. In the north and south the country is mountainous, but in the center it is a plain with a solitary steep mountain rising from it, called Acrocorinthus, which served as the city's citadel. Corinth was built on the north side of this mountain. Its favorable location raised it to great commercial prosperity and importance, and it became a great sea power. The city was adorned with magnificent buildings, and the fine arts were practiced with vigor and success. With great wealth came luxury and a reputation for licentiousness. The worship of Aphrodite prevailed, and in her temples a vast number of courtesans was maintained. Corinth maintained its independence to the time of the Macedonian supremacy. In the year 146 BCE the city was destroyed by the Romans in a most barbarous manner. Its inhabitants were sold into slavery, and such of its works of art as the soldiery did not destroy were carried off to Rome. Its buildings were razed to the ground, and for a century the city lay in ruins. In 46 BCE it was rebuilt by Caesar, who people it with a colony of veterans and descendants of freemen. It was now called Colonia Julia Corinthus. It became the capital of the Roman province Achaia, recovering much of its ancient prosperity].

(A) FOUR DISTINGUISHED KINGS

At the top of Folio XXXIII recto, by a horizontal panel 6-3/4" x 2.5", we are introduced to a gallery of four kings:

1. Aptheros, king of Crete, who first conceived the idea of gathering honey from the bees. He is represented as any king might be, scepter in hand, and without symbols.
2. Erichthonius, king of Athens, who holds as symbol the wheel of the chariot, indicative of his invention of that vehicle in his own country.
3. Phoenix (Fenix), who carries a scepter in one hand and gestures with the other.
4. Cadmus (Cadinus), the builder of Thebes (in Boeotia) carries the scepter and orb. The text on Cadmus—in which he is described as introducing Phoenician letters to Greece—was inadvertently left out of the Latin edition (a problem fixed in the German edition six months later).

By a vertical panel 2-1/4" x 8.5" on the left side of Folio XXXIII recto, the Lineage of the Assyrian Kings is continued from Folio XXVII recto as follows:

1. Ascades (in the German edition called Astades), a king who is not mentioned in the text, appears in royal form with crown, scepter and orb.
2. Amynthas (in the German edition named Amictus), appears in royal form with crown, scepter and orb.
3. Bellothus (in the German edition named Lomperes), appears in royal form with crown, scepter and orb.

This Carmentis (referring to a portrait opposite) was a daughter of Evander (Euandri). She invented the Latin alphabet. A b c d e f g h i k l m n o p q r s t v x. [The Carmentis, Camenae, or Casmene, were prophetic nymphs, who belonged to the religion of ancient Italy, although later traditions represent their worship as introduced from Arcadia. Some accounts identify them with the Muses. The most important of these goddesses was Carmentis, or Carmenta, who had a temple at the foot of the Capitoline Hill. Evander was a son of an Arcadian nymph, Themis, or Nicostrata, and in Roman traditions Carmenta or Tiburtis. About 60 years before the Trojan War, Evander is said to have led a Pelasgian colony into Italy, and there to have built a town on the Tiber, which town was subsequently incorporated with Rome. He taught his neighbors milder laws, arts of peace, and social life, and especially the art of writing, with which he himself had been made acquainted by Hercules. Such is the general tradition, but it differs from the in these respects: (1) Carmentis was not the daughter but the mother of Evander; (2) he, and not she, introduced the alphabet].

Salmon, the son of Naasson, was born, according to the seventy interpreters, in the 3725th year of the world, which is the 1474th year before the birth of Christ. He was prince in the tribe of Judah. With Joshua he went into the Promised Land and took for wife Rahab, a common woman. [Rahab was a woman of Jericho who kept a public house. She had heard of the Israelites and of their favor with God (Joshua 2:8-11); so when Joshua's spies came to Jericho to explore the land of promise, she favored them as has been told in a previous note, and she and her family were preserved. It is supposed that she married into a noble family of the tribe of Judah. Under the name of Rachab she is mentioned in the genealogy of Christ. "And Aram begat Aminadab; and Aminadab begat Naasson; and Naasson begat Salmon; and Salmon begat Boaz of Rachab; and Boaz begat Obed of Ruth; and Obed begat Jesse; and Jesse begat David, the king," etc, (Matthew 1:4-6)].

Italus, the king, built a city on the river Tiber, and reigned there. On the same site Rome was built in later times. All Italy was afterwards named for Italus. [Italus was one of the ancient kings of the Pelasgians, Siculians, or Oenotrians, and it is from him that Italy was believed to have derived its name].

From this Rechab (referring to a portrait opposite) sprang a very spiritual lineage, which is said to have existed at this time. He descended from Jethro, the friend of Moses, and was converted to the Jewish faith. [Rechab, father of Jehonadab, appears in II Kings 10:15-28, as a fervent supporter of Jehu's attack on the house of Ahab and his endeavor to root out the idolatry which that dynasty had allowed. Neh. 3:14 reports that a son of Rechab assisted in re-fortifying Jerusalem. It is to be noted that later Rabbis found the fulfillment of Jer. 35:19 in those marriages of Rechabite maidens into priestly families from which later priests sprang. Hence the statement of the chronicler that from Rechab sprang a spiritual lineage].

Tiberias, or Tiberiadis, formerly called Zenreth or Cynaroth, lies in the coast regions, between the east and south, about two miles from Bethulia [Bethulia was a city of Samaria. It is the scene of the Book of Judith], the mountain, where Judith slew Holofernes. After the city was rebuilt by Herod, the ruler of Galilee, it was named Tiberiadis in honor of the emperor, Tiberius; and now it is called Tiberias. [Tiberias is a city on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee. The ancient city was south of the modern one. Herod made it his capital. The town was built on an ancient site, probably Rakkath (Joshua 29:35) and in the course of construction a graveyard was disturbed. In consequence the Jews, fearful of uncleanness, refused to live there, and Herod was forced to use compulsion in order to people his town (Joseph, . XVII, 2, 3). No mention is made of Tiberias in the gospels, except casually in John 6:23. The city was of too recent date and too Hellenistic in outlook to invite attention. It is unlikely that Jesus ever visited it. Christianity found no congenial soil there and made no headway until the 4th century. The Arabs came in 637. When the Crusaders established their kingdom in Jerusalem, Tancred was appointed ruler in Galilee. Tiberias became his capital and was in part rebuilt on the new site farther north. In their advance on Damascus, British troops seized it in October 1918]. Here Christ made an apostle of Matthew, the toll gatherer. At one time there was here a bishop whose jurisdiction comprehended the Sea of Galilee. Near this city (as it is said) are natural warm springs. Here also ends the region called Decapolis [Decapolis was a district of Palestine, so named from the ten cities contained within its limits. The cities are variously given by different writers. According to Pliny there were Damascus, Philadelphia, Rhaphana, Scythopolis, Gadara, Hippos, Dios, Pella, Galasa (Gerasa?) and Canatha], so called by reason of its ten distinguished cities. In this same region, not far removed from Tiberias, is the sea of Asphaltides, Asphaltites Lacus. Of all the natural phenomena of Palestine, the Dead Sea is that which has attracted the notice of geographers and naturalists both in ancient and modern times, as exhibiting peculiarities and suggesting questions of great interest from a geological point of view. The earliest reference to it is in Genesis (14:3), where it is identified with the vale "of Siddim," and denominated "the Salt Sea." Its common name among the classical authors, first found in Diodorus Siculus, and adopted by Josephus, is "Asphaltites Lacus." The name by which it is best known among Europeans is "Mortuum Mare." Its modern native name is Bahr Lot,— "The Sea of Lot"—therein perpetuating the memorial of the catastrophe to which legend ascribes its formation. Its waters are very salty and of an extremely noxious odor, so that neither fish nor any of the other marine animals can live in it. Through fresh-watered rivers flow into it, yet by its odor it counteracts their effect. From its center there arises every year a large mass of bitumen. The bitumen floating on the surface appears at a distance like an island. About twenty days before the material rises to the surface its odor spread about the sea with a noxious air, and all the silver, gold and brass in the neighborhood loses its natural color. This returns when the bitumen is ejected. This bitumen is carried off by the inhabitants on large rafts of reeds that they launch in the lake. There is no danger of drowning because the waters support all weight capable of expansion, or which contains air, but not solid substance, which have a density like that of gold, silver, lead and the like.

The dismal associations of the name of the Dead Sea are not borne out by the sea itself. The wild tales of medieval travelers that in its poisonous air no plant could live, that over its dead waters no bird could fly, and that no waves ever disturbed its gloomy surface, are figments of the imagination. The tradition that this sea covers Sodom and Gomorrah dates from Josephus. The site of the overwhelmed cities, whether under the waters of the sea at its north end, or its south end, or on its eastern or western shores, continues to excite the ingenuity of investigators. The Dead Sea lies about 1300 feet below the surface level of the Mediterranean, and is the lowest sheet of water on the earth's crust.

which, by reason of its size and the immobility of its waters, is called the Dead Sea. Its waters are stiff and tough because of the clay or lime which resists the waves, so that it is not activated by the wind and cannot be used by ships. All inanimate matter sinks to the bottom, and so this sea does not support material of any kind, except such as receives the light of day. Its length exceeds one hundred thousand paces; its width at its greatest point is twenty-five thousand paces, and at its smallest point six thousand paces. [This last sentence relating the Dead Sea's length and width are not in the German edition of the chronicle].

ILLUSTRATIONS

(A) CARMENTIS, ITALUS, AND RECHAB

The following are represented by individual portraits (each 2" square):

1. Carmentis, daughter of King Evander, portrayed by the same woodcut which represented Zilpah (Zelpha), handmaid of Leah (not of Rachel), at Folio XXVI recto.
2. Italus Rex, Italy's first mythical king. The same woodcut was used for Xerxes, Folio XXVI recto.
3. Rechab, from whom a priestly line was evolved. The same woodcut did service for Sol, the son of Jupiter, at Folio XXV recto.

The Lineage of Christ was brought down to and including Naasson (Naason) at Folio XXX recto, and is here continued; but with only one addition—Salmon, his son. This woodcut, 5" x 2-1/4" is a sturdy piece of work, far superior to many of the portraits in the Chronicle. It is the typical conception of an old Jewish patriarch. This lineage will not be resumed until we reach Folio XXXV recto.

(C) TIBERIAS

Folio XXXV recto

At about this time the kings of Italy commenced to reign. Their names frequently changed. The very first was Janus. He built a palace that was named Janiculum after him. Later he was held to be a great god. He is portrayed with two faces, and his holiday was the beginning of the year. He was the end of the old year and the beginning of the new. The first month, January, is for him. [Janus was worshipped by both the Etruscans and the Romans, and occupied an important place in the Roman religion. He presided over the beginning of everything, and was therefore always invoked first in every undertaking, even before Jupiter. He opened the year and the seasons, and hence the first month of the year was called after him. He was the porter of heaven, and therefore bore the surname Patulcus, or Patulcius, the "opener," and Clusius, or Clusivius, the "shutter." In this capacity he is represented with a key in his left hand and a staff or scepter in his right. On earth also he was the guardian deity of the gates, and hence is commonly represented with two heads, because every door looks two ways. He is sometimes represented with four heads, because he presided over the four seasons. At Rome, Numa is said to have dedicated to Janus the covered passage bearing his name, which was opened in the time of war, and closed in time of peace. This passage is commonly, but erroneously, called a temple. It stood close by the forum. It appears to have been left open in time of war to indicate that the god had gone out to assist the Roman warriors, and to have been shut in time of peace that the god, the safeguard of the city, might not escape. On New Year's Day, which was the principal festival of the god, people gave presents to each other, consisting of sweetmeats and copper coins, showing on one side the double head of Janus, and on the other a ship. The sacrifices offered to him consisted of cakes, barley, incense and wine].

Saturn, the king, was the father of Jove, the Cretan Zeus, the son of Arius, the son of Ninyas, the son of Ninus, the son of Belus, the son of Nimrod; he began to reign in the time of Isaac, and was thereafter ousted from the kingdom by his son Jove. Now as Janus saw that Saturn wished to assume the life of a peaceful citizen, and desired to plant vineyards and teach their cultivation, he hospitably received him and shared the kingdom with him. And Saturn bore Picus, who ruled after him. Some call Saturn by the name of Stercutius from manure (stercus), the use of which he, as a most informed husbandman, discovered. For this reason, after his death, they made him a god of agriculture and good fortune. The Romans pictured Saturn with a sad countenance gray with age, in his left hand a scythe, in his right a flame-spewing dragon. His sorrowful countenance indicated that he had been driven out of his own country, or that the appearance of Saturn, the star, foreboded grievous things. Item: And as this star is the coldest in its operations, the ram and the water carrier (Aquarius), which indicate Saturn, are also considered cold signs. Item: the gray hair symbolizes that he discovered husbandry, or that by reason of his cold nature he is an enemy of humankind; for (as Servius states) he held in his left arm the children whom he slew with his scythe. Item: the dragon denotes that he is the end of the year. He is also called the father of Jove, for he is higher than Jupiter. He also wears a water-colored garment, for his star is by nature moist and cold. Saturn loves to receive the sacrifice of a young person by death; for the devil, being envious of the human race, dotes on human sacrifice and the spilling of human blood.

According to the popular belief of the Romans, Saturn made his first appearance in Italy when Janus was reigning over the fertile region that stretches along the banks of the Tiber. Ejected from his own country, he presented himself to Janus, and was kindly received. He proceeded to instruct the people in agriculture and many other arts then unknown to them, for example, how to train and nurse the vine, and how to cultivate fruit trees. And so he raised the people from their rude condition to one of peace and order. In consequence he was held in high esteem, and in course of time Janus shared with him the government of the kingdom, which thereupon assumed the name of Saturnia, 'a land of seed and fruit.' The poets called his time the golden age. Once a year, in December, the Romans held a feast, the Saturnalia, in his honor.

Sterculius, Stercutius, or Sterquilinus are surnames of Saturn, derived from stercus, manure, because he had promoted agriculture by teaching the people the use of manure. Saturn's temple stood at the foot of the clivus Capitolinus leading from the Forum where the ruins of a late restoration of it are still visible. It contained the Republican treasury. The feet of his statue were bound together by woolen bands, probably to keep it from running away. He was untied during the Saturnalia to join in the fun.

Juno, a daughter of Saturn and Ops, and a sister and wife of Jupiter, lived at this time. Through pagan error she was regarded as the queen of the gods, and so became the goddess of the kingdom's finances and of marriage. And they imagined her to be the guardian of women in childbirth; so they made her a beautiful chariot and a coat of arms, and assigned to her fourteen excellent maids. She was also waited upon by a peacock, in whose tail (as Ovid states) she set the eyes of her herdsman, Argus, who was slain by Mercury. Juno bore Vulcan by Jupiter, and upon her death was finally accounted a goddess. The Samians erected a noble temple to her.

Juno (the Hera of the Greeks), was the sister and wife of Jupiter, the Zeus of the Greeks. As Jupiter was the king of heaven, so his spouse was its queen. As such she was worshipped at Rome. As Jupiter was the protector of the male sex, so she was the protectress of the female. She was supposed to accompany every woman through life. Moreover, she was the guardian of the realm's finances, and under the name Moneta, had a temple, which contained the mint. Being a married goddess, she was believed especially to preside over marriage. June, originally called Junonius, was considered the most favorable period for marrying. Women in childbirth invoked Juno Lucina, and newly born children were likewise under her protection. In the representations of the Roman Juno that have come down to us, the type of the Greek Hera is commonly adopted.

A splendid temple was erected to Hera at Samos. She is usually represented as a majestic woman of mature age, with a beautiful forehead, large and wide-open eyes, and a grave expression commanding reverence. Her hair is adorned with a crown or diadem. A veil frequently hangs down the back of her head, to characterize her as the bride of Zeus, and the diadem, veil, scepter and peacock are her usual attributes.

The Argus to whom the Chronicle refers was surnamed Panoptes, "the all-seeing," because he had a hundred eyes. Hera appointed him guardian of her cow into which Io had been metamorphosed. But Hermes (Mercury) at the command of Zeus, put Argus to death, either by stoning him, or by cutting off his head, after sending him to sleep with sweet notes of his flute. Hera transplanted his eyes to the tail of the peacock, her favorite bird.

Poets describe the marital difficulties of Zeus and Hera at great length. She was extremely jealous of his early amours. On one occasion, at least, Jupiter beat his spouse, and threw her son Hephaestus (Vulcan) out of Olympus. As goddess of storms, Hera was consistently described as the mother of Ares (Mars), occasionally herself taking part in wars.

Picus, the son of Saturn, was the first king of Laurentum, and an excellent warrior. He was also a prophet in interpreting the cries of birds. He was assigned a rank among the gods. [Picus, a purely Roman deity, was the son and successor of Saturn. He was an ancient prophet and forest god. According to one story he loved and married Pomona. Circe, the witch, was attracted by his beauty, but finding her affection unreciprocated, avenged herself by changing him into a woodpecker, a bird held to be a sacred symbol of prophecy by the Augurs, or Roman priests, whose office was to foretell coming events by observing the flight of birds and other phenomena. Besides being worshipped as a god, Picus was also regarded as one of the first kings of Italy. According to another legend, Picus was not changed into a woodpecker, but merely made use of that bird in his prophetic art. He was a famous soothsayer and augur. The whole legend of Picus is founded on the notion that the woodpecker (picus) is a prophetic bird].

Faunus was the second king of Laurentum and was also a god, according to some who chose to call him such. [Faunus was a son of Picus. He corresponds to the Greek Pan, and the Roman poets frequently called the latter "Faunus." But Faunus had certain myths peculiar to himself. He delivered oracles in groves and communicated them by means of dreams, which those desiring them obtained by sleeping in sacred places on hides of animals that had been offered as sacrifices].

All the women who prophesy, or foretell the future, are commonly, according to the Greek tongue, called Sibyls. The very learned speak of ten of these: as one from Persia; the second from Libya; the third from Delphi; the fourth from Cimmeria; the fifth from Erythrea; the sixth from Samos; the seventh from Cumaea, or Amalthea; the eighth from the Hellespont; the ninth from Phrygia, the tenth from Tiburtina.

Sibylla is a name designating a number of prophetic women in various countries and at different times in antiquity. The first and original Sibyl is said to have been a daughter of Dardanus and Neso. The number of Sibyls varied according to authors from one by Plato to twelve by other writers: Erythrean, Samian, Egyptian, Sardinian, Babylonian, Libyan, Delphian, Cimmerian, Hellespontine, Phrygian, Tiburtine and Cumaean. The most famous of these was the Cumaean Sibyl, identified with Herophile of Erythrae in Ionia, and who was thought to have lived a thousand years. She was consulted by Aeneas concerning his descent into Hades and sold to the last Tarquin three prophetic books at a price he refused to give for the original nine, six of which she had burned.

The derivation and meaning of 'Sibylla' are unknown, but certainly are not Greek. In the period preceding the development of the full classical culture (about 800-600 BCE), religious movements of all sorts were common in Greece and Asia Minor, and especially, inspired prophets were numerous. Many prophecies, generally in hexameter verse, the usual meter of Apolline oracles, were attributed to the Erythrean Sibyl, and her popularity led ultimately to her multiplication, numerous places claiming, from about the 4th century on, to be her native city, or to have been visited by her, or to be the birthplace of another Sibyl of like inspiration. Varro gives a list of ten, which includes the famous Cumaean Sibyl, often identified with the Erythrean.

The Sibylla was supposed to be the authoress of the Sibylline Oracles, which were kept in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus at Rome under the care of the quindecimviri and consulted in emergencies by order of the Senate. Apollo loved her and granted her the gift of prophecy, and also a life of as many years as she had grains of dust in her hand; but she forgot to ask for youth, and so gradually withered away almost to nothing. Finally, Jewish and Christian apologists discovered a Judaeo-Christian Sibyl to whom were attributed the numerous prophecies, still extant, containing Judaeo-Christian propaganda.

The Sibylline Oracles have been defined as a collection of Apocalyptic writings, composed in imitation of the Greek and Roman Sibylline books by the Jews and, at a later date, by the Christians in their efforts to win the pagan world to their faith. The fact that they copied the Greek form in which the revelations were conveyed, and the Homeric language, is evidence of a degree of external Hellenization, which is an important fact in the history of post-exilic Judaism. Book III contains Jewish oracles relative to the Golden Age established by Roman supremacy in the East about the middle of the second century BCE. Book IV is a definite attack upon the 'heathen' Sibyl (the Jews and Christians did not attempt to pass off their "forgeries" as genuine) as the mouthpiece of Apollo by a Jew who speaks for the Great God and yet uses a Greek review of ancient history from the Assyrian empire. Book V contains a more developed form of the myth of Nero redivivus in which a panegyric on him has been brought up to date by some Jew or Christian, and eulogies of Hadrian and his successor, side by side, with the legend of the miserable death of Titus in revenge for his destruction of Jerusalem, which probably represents the hope of the zealots who survived it. The remaining books appear to be Christian, and to belong to the 2nd and 3rd centuries.

ILLUSTRATIONS

(A) JUNO

Juno is represented by the same illustration that portrayed Ceres at Folio XXV, recto. There is nothing Greek or Roman about the portrait—just a commonplace medieval portrait of any woman.

(B) LINEAGE OF THE KINGS OF ITALY

The Lineage of the Sovereigns of Italy appears here in illustration for the first time. It covers the full length of the page, and includes Janus, the prime mythological ancestor; Saturn, who became his partner in government; and Picus, and Faunus, respectively Saturn's son and grandson. All four are represented in regal attire with crown, orb, and scepter. The portraits of all four are the same used in the Greek Lineage (Folio XXIX, recto) of Inachus, Phoroneus, Serapis, and Argus.

Folio XXXV verso

Sibilla Agrippa, in a rose-colored dress, and not so very young, holds one hand to her bosom as if surprised, while with the other she points to a brief writing which says: "The unseen word will be touched, and will bring one forth as from a root. He will wither like a leaf, and his beauty will not be apparent. The motherly body will be encompassed and God will blossom forth in eternal joy. And he will be trodden down by man. He will be born of a mother, as a god, but will wander about as a sinner. A heathen saw this glory."

Sibilla Libica, adorned with a green floral wreath, clothed in a modest mantle, and also not very young, speaks thus: "Believe this as true, The day will come, and the Lord will illumine the density of darkness; and the bond of the synagogue will be released, and the last of the human race will come to an end and see the king of the living. A virgin will hold him in her bosom, a mistress to the pagans. And he will rule in mercy, and the body of his mother will be a balance or scale for the people of the age."

Sibilla Delphica, was born before the Trojan War. She is clad in black. Her hair is dressed in a coronet braid, and she is of youthful stature. In her hand she holds a horn. She says: "A prophet will be born of a virgin without human intercourse."

Sibilla Frigia, in a red dress, her arms bare, a sad elderly countenance and tousled hair. She points with a finger and says: "From heaven on high he will come and he will strengthen his council in heaven. And a virgin in the valley of the wilderness will receive the annunciation."

Sibilla Samia, young in person, with a beautiful bosom, wearing a subtle veil, and holding her hand to her breast, speaks: "Accept this for truth, A wealthy one is coming, born of a poor woman. The animals of the earth will worship him and cry out and say: In the forecourts of heaven you shall praise him."

Sibilla Europa, young and beautiful, of ruddy face, framed in the subtlest veil, and wearing a dress embroidered in gold, points to a short inscription, and says: "He will come, and he will pass over the hills and the hidden waters of heaven, or the mountain Olympus. He will govern in poverty and reign in silence, and come forth from the womb of a virgin."

Sibilla Persica, in a dress of gold and a white veil, speaks thus: "Take for true, you irrational animal that is trodden upon, the Lord will be born within the confines of the earth. And the lap of the Virgin will be a salvation to the pagans, and his feet will be employed in the advancement of mankind, and the hidden word will be touched."

I have also found another Sibyl (whose name I have not been able to learn). She testifies to Christ, and speaks: "Out of the tribes of the Hebrews will come forth a woman named Mary, who has a spouse by the name of Joseph. Out of her will issue, without cohabitation with man, but through the Holy Ghost, the Son of God, called Jesus. And she will be a virgin before and after the birth. He who will be born of her will be a true God and a real man. And he will fulfill the laws of the Jews, adding his own laws to them. His kingdom will remain upon earth. Over him will come a voice, saying This is my beloved Son, Him you shall hear. He will be the resurrection of the dead. He will speedily cure the lame and crippled; and the deaf will hear, the blind will see, and the dumb will speak. With five loaves of bread and two fishes many thousands of people will be fed. With a word he will allay the winds and calm the raging sea. And he will tread the sea with his feet and wander about on the waters. He will relieve the sick and drive away much pain."

Item: Another Sibyl, called Erythraea, said: "In the last age God will become patient, and the godly race will become human and the Deity will come among humanity. The lamb will lay down in the hay, and God and man will be sustained by a virgin's care. And he will elect twelve from among the fishermen and the rejected."

ILLUSTRATIONS THE SIBYLS

These prophetic ladies are represented by eight distinct portraits, four to the left and four to the right of the text. In view of the fact that the chronicler has already described them, not much remains to be said. In reading these descriptions we note that the chronicler has introduced the element of color: The dress of the Phrygian Sibyl is said to be red; while that of Sibyla Agrippa is rose-colored. The Libyan, or Egyptian Sibyl, is said to be adorned with a green wreath. The European Sibyl has rosy cheeks, while the Persian Sibyl is represented as dressed in gold and white.

The last, or 'very spiritual' Sibyl (Sibilla q(ua)dam valde religiosa), is undoubtedly the invention of the chronicler himself. The Erythrean prophetess is mentioned in the text but not honored in the gallery. The Cumean, Tiburtine, Hellespontine, Cimmerian, Babylonian, Sardinian and Egyptian Sibyls (unless the latter is included under the Libyan) are neither mentioned in the text nor portrayed. On the other hand, in addition to the Spiritual or Religious Sibyl already mentioned, the Chronicle speaks of and illustrates the Sibyls of Agrippa, Persia and Europe.

The confusion arises through the fact that the ancients have not agreed upon either the names or the numbers of these prophetic women.

Folio XXXVI recto

This Troys (Tros; referring to the portrait below), reigned in Dardania and built Troy.

Anchises (portrayed opposite), according to the erroneous idea of the pagans, bore through the goddess Venus a son, Aeneas, who ruled in Italy.

Laomedon (portrayed opposite), the king of Troy, was slain. His daughter Ixiona was taken prisoner and carried to Greece. Out of this a serious war resulted and terrible evils followed.

Troy (Troas) is a region in Asia Minor in which lay the city of Ilium (Ilium). Yet at times Troy was considered the name of the city. According to Homer, Troy was the most celebrated city among all cities under the sun and the heavenly stars. But now great Troy (which was the capital of almost all of Asia) is extinguished, so that hardly a trace of it is to be seen. For now (as Ovid and Virgil write) fields and farms have taken its place, the city having been burned and destroyed. And so end all mortal things. Once upon a time a king's son, named Troys (Tros), in his old age, it being the 40th year of Aioth (Aiah or Ajah) the judge, came into Dardania and built Troy. He was a fighter and learned in the art of war. He enlarged the kingdom, and the region formerly called Dardania was named Troy after him. One Dardanius came into the land of Phrygia, and he called it Dardania. To this same Dardanius (Dardanus) was born the above named Troys (Tros), who in righteousness and goodness was a praiseworthy man. In his memory Troy was named. He had two sons, Ilium (Ilus) and Astiricum (Erichthonis?). The first and eldest of these ruled Troy and called it Ilium. Laomedon, son of Ilus, was the father of Priam. He restored and rebuilt Troy after its first destruction and made it great. He erected battlements and surrounded its suburbs with a high wall of marble, thus well fortifying it. He organized a large army, so that the city would not be again destroyed (as happened before in the time of Leomedontiades). Item: He there built a royal city, and dedicated columns and a temple to Jove. Through the city flowed the river Xanthus (Scamander), and the river Simois (Satinis), which flowed by Troy and had its source in the Trojan Mount Ida. As this river Simois approached the sea it joined the Xanthus. It flows into the sea near the Sigeon mountain (Cape Sigeum). Priam, by his wife Hecuba, bore Hector, the first-born, Alexander or (Paris), Deiphobus, Hellenus, Troilus, Andromache, Cassandra, and Polyxena.

Troas, the territory of Ilium, or Troy, formed by the northwestern part of Mysia, and was bounded on the west by the Aegean Sea, on the northwest by the Hellespont, on the east and northeast by the mountains which border the valley of the river Rhodius, and extend from its sources southwards to the main ridge of Mount Ida, and on the south by the north coast of the Gulf of Adramyttium along the south foot of Ida. The chief rivers were the Satnois on the south, the Rhodius on the north and the Scamander (Xanthus) and Simois in the center. The Scamander and Simois, so renowned in the legends of the Trojan War, flow from two different points in the chain of Mount Ida, and unite in the plain of Troy, through which the united stream flows northwest and falls into the Hellespont east of the promontory of Sigeum.

The mythical account of the origin of the kingdom is briefly this. Teucer, the first king in the Troad, had a daughter, who married Dardanus, the chieftain of the country to the northeast. Dardanus had two sons, Ilus and Erichthonius; and the latter was the father of Tros, Troas and Troes. Tros was the father of Ilus, who founded the city, which was called after him Ilium, and also, after his father, Troja. The next king was Laomedon, and after him Priam. In his reign the city was taken and destroyed by the confederated Greeks, after a ten years' siege. Ancient chronologers have assigned different dates for the capture of Troy, the calculation most generally accepted placing it in 1184 BCE.

Tros was the son of Erichthonius and grandson of Dardanus. He was the king of Phrygia and father of Ilus.

Anchises was the son of Capys and Themis, the daughter of Ilus, king of Dardanus on Mount Ida. In beauty he equaled the gods, and was beloved by Aphrodite, by whom he became the father of Aeneas. The goddess warned him never to betray the real mother of the child; but as on one occasion he boasted of his intercourse with the goddess, he was struck by lightning and killed, blinded or lamed, depending upon which account one reads. Virgil in his Aeneid makes Anchises survive the capture of Troy, and Aeneas carries his father on his shoulders from the burning city.

Laomedon, son of Ilus and Eurydice, was the father of Priam. Poseidon and Apollo, who had displeased Zeus, were doomed to serve Laomedon for wages. So the former built the walls of Troy, while Apollo tended the king's flocks on Mount Ida. When they had done their work Laomedon refused them the reward and expelled them from his dominions. Thereupon Poseidon let loose the sea over the lands, and also sent a sea monster to ravish the country. By the command of an oracle, the Trojans were obliged to regularly sacrifice a maiden to the monster, and one occasion it was decided by lot that Hesione, the daughter of Laomedon himself, should be the victim. Hercules promised to save the maiden, if Laomedon would give him certain horses that Tros had once received from Zeus. He promised, but again broke his word. So Hercules, who had killed the monster and saved the king's daughter, sailed with a squadron of ships against Troy, killed Laomedon, with all his sons, except Pordaces (Priam). Hesione ransomed her brother Priam with her veil. Priam, as the son of Laomedon, is called Laomedontiades.

After this, war was waged against the Trojans by the Greeks for ten years and six months. It occurred in the first year of Esebon (Ezvon), the judge of Israel, and this (as the poets write) was the cause: As Alexander (who is also called Paris) once upon a time went hunting in the forest, and fell asleep, Mercury

THE CITY OF TROY

The city of Troy is represented by a woodcut 7-7/8" x 8-3/4", which has not, as yet, done service for any other city. There are certain characteristics that indicate that the artist may have had the City of Troy in mind. It is well fortified by high walls, towers and battlements. A river flows along at the left beyond the walls, reaching far out into the mountains. A bridge gives access to the suburbs on the left bank. In the background on a high elevation is the citadel. Two gothic churches with tall steeples, strangely surmounted with a crescent, are rather anachronistic elements.

brought before him Juno, Venus and Minerva to judge of their beauty. On this occasion Venus promised Paris that if he would judge her the most beautiful, she would give him the most beautiful woman in Greece for a wife. On this assurance Paris favored Venus; and thereafter he carried off Helen, the wife of Menelaus, the king; and this brought on the final destruction and extinction of Troy. [Paris was the second son of Priam and Hecuba. Before his birth Hecuba dreamed she had brought forth a firebrand that spread forth over the whole city. So when the child was born it was given to a shepherd to expose on Mount Ida. When the shepherd returned after five days, the child was still alive, having been fed by a she-bear. He took the boy home, and called him Paris. He grew up a valiant defender of the flocks and shepherds, receiving the name of Alexander ('defender of men'). He discovered his real origin, and was received by Priam as his son. The most celebrated event in his life was his abduction of Helen: When Peleus and Thetis celebrated their wedding, all the gods were invited except Eris, or Strife. Enraged at her exclusion, she threw among the guests a golden apple inscribed "to the fairest." Hera (Juno), Aphrodite (Venus) and Athena (Minerva) each claimed the apple, and Zeus ordered them taken to the beautiful shepherd, Paris, to decide the dispute. Hera promised the judge the sovereignty of Asia and great riches; Athena, glory and renown in war; and Aphrodite promised him the fairest of women for wife. Having awarded the apple to Aphrodite, Paris sailed under her protection to Greece and was well received in the palace of Menelaus at Sparta. He carried off the king's wife Helen, the most beautiful woman in the world, and with both her and the treasures that he stole from the hospitable house of Menelaus, he returned to Troy. This gave rise to the war. Before her marriage to Menelaus, Helen had been wooed by the noblest chiefs of Greece, and these, now resolved to avenge her abduction, sailed against Troy. Paris fought with Menelaus before the walls of Troy and was defeated, but was carried off by Aphrodite. He is said to have slain Achilles, either by one of his arrows, or by treachery in the temple of the Thybraean Apollo. On the capture of Troy, Paris was wounded by Philoctetes with an arrow of Hercules. He then returned to his abandoned wife Oenone, but she refused to receive him. He returned to Troy and died there. Philoctetes was one of the suitors of Helen, who took part in the Trojan War]. This ten years' war is noted and described by Dares Phrygius and Dictys Cretensis, who were present in the camp of the Trojans at that time; and their accounts are so clear that nothing better or briefer can be found.

Dares Phrygius was a priest of Hephaestus at Troy, mentioned in the Iliad (5.9) to whom was ascribed in antiquity an Iliad, believed to be more ancient than the Homeric poems. This work, undoubtedly the composition of a sophist, is lost; but there is extant a Latin work in prose, consisting of 44 chapters, on the destruction of Troy, entitled Daretis Phryggi de Excidio Trojae Historia, and purporting to be a translation of the work of Dares by Cornelius Nepos. But the Latin work is probably of much later origin. It is the production of a person of little education and bad taste, and is by some believed to have been written as late as the 12th century. It is usually printed with Dictys Cretensis. The best edition is by Dederich Bonn, 1837.

Dictys Cretensis is the reputed author of an extant Latin work on the Trojan War, in six books, entitled Ephemeris Belli Trojani, professing to be a journal of the leading events of the war. The preface states it was composed by Dictys of Cnossus, who accompanied Idomeneus to the Trojan War, and was inscribed in Phoenician tablets on limewood or paper made from the bark. The work was buried in the same grave with the author, remaining undisturbed till the sepulcher was burst open by an earthquake in the reign of Nero, the work being found in a tin case. It was carried to Rome by Eupraxis, whose slaves had discovered it, and it was translated into Greek by the order of Nero. It is from the Greek that the extant Latin work professes to be translated by one Q. Septimius Romanus. Although its alleged origin and discovery are unworthy of credit, it appears to be a translation from a Greek work extant under the name of Dictys, since it is frequently quoted by Byzantine writers. It was probably written in Greek by Eupraxis in Nero's reign, but the time of the translation is uncertain. It contains a history of the Trojan War from the birth of Paris to the death of Ulysses. The complications ascribed to Dictys and Dares are of much importance in the history of modern literature, since they are the chief fountain from which the legends of Greece first flowed into the romances of the Middle Ages, and then mingled with the popular tales and ballads of England, France, and Germany. The best edition of Dictys is by Dederich Bonn, 1835.

The city was captured in the third year of Labdon, judge of Israel, 430 years before the city of Rome was built. On the war of the Greeks against the Trojans and the destruction of Troy.

Orosius writes that 430 years before the building of Rome, a sworn confederacy of the Greeks and gathering of one thousand ships took place in consequence of the abduction of Helen. And thereafter the city of Troy was besieged for ten years. Phrygius Dares (who wrote the history), says that the princes or generals who besieged Troy numbered 47, and they brought with them 1202 ships. But there came to the assistance of Priam, the king of Troy, 33 princes or generals. And this is the substance of the history of Troy, written by the above mentioned Dares, and brought out of the Greek into Latin by Cornelius. When Castor and Pollux heard that the beautiful Helen, wife of Menelaus, brother of Agamemnon (Agamemnon), had been abducted by Paris, they boarded a ship and followed after her. When they landed by the island of Lesbos a great storm came up, and they disappeared. The Lesbians searched for them as far as Troy, and as they could not be found, they believed them to have become immortal gods. [Castor and Pollux, generally referred to as the Dioscuri, the well-known heroes, were sons of Zeus. The Romans also called the brothers Castores. According to Homer they were the sons of Leda and Tyndareus, king of Lacedaemon, and consequently brothers of Helen. Castor was famous for his skill in taming and managing horses, and Pollux for his skill in boxing. Both had disappeared from the earth before the Greeks went against Troy. Although they were buried, says Homer, they came to life every other day, and they enjoyed honors like those of the gods. According to other traditions both were the sons of Zeus and Leda, and were born at the same time with their sister Helen out of an egg. According to others, Pollux and Helen only were children of Zeus, and Castor was the son of Tyndareus. Hence Pollux was immortal, while Castor was subject to old age and death. The fabulous life of the Dioscuri is marked by three great events, namely, their expedition against Athens, their battle with the sons of Aphareus, and their part in the expedition of the Argonauts. According to story, Zeus rewarded the attachment of the two brothers by placing them among the stars as Gemini. These heroic youths received divine honors at Sparta, and their worship spread from Peloponnesus over Greece, Sicily and Italy. They were worshipped as the protectors of travelers. Whenever they appeared they were seen riding on magnificent white steeds. They were regarded as presidents of the public games and were believed to have invented the war dance and warlike music. When Sparta went to war its kings were accompanied by symbolic representations of the Dioscuri. Their usual representation is that of two youthful horsemen with egg-shaped helmets, crowned with stars, and with spears in their hands]. There gathered at Troy 47 leaders of troops, with 1202 ships. At first Diomedes [Diomedes succeeded Adrastus as king of Argos. According to Homer, Tydeus, father of Diomedes, fell in the expedition against Thebes while his son was yet a boy; but Diomedes was afterwards one of the Epigoni who took Thebes. He went to Troy with a number of ships, and was, next to Achilles, the bravest hero in the Greek army. He enjoyed the especial protection of Athena, and fought against the most distinguished of the Trojans, such as Hector and Aeneas, and even with the gods who espoused the cause of the Trojans. He thus wounded both Aphrodite and Ares. He and Odysseus (Ulysses) carried off the palladium from Troy since it was believed the city could not be taken so long as this object was within its walls. The palladium was an image of Athena, which was kept hidden and secret, and was revered as a pledge of the safety of the town, where it existed]. and Ulysses [Ulysses, Ulyxes, or Ulixes, called Odysseus by the Greeks, was one of the principal Greek heroes of the Trojan War. He succeeded his father Laertes as king of Ithaca, was the husband of Penelope, and father of Telemachus. During the Trojan War he is prominent, not only as a brave and skillful fighter, but more so as the giver of shrewd counsel and for his cunning enterprises, alone or with Diomedes. After Homer, his character in literature often is portrayed as that of an unscrupulous and dishonorable man. He tries to shirk service at Troy by pretending madness; but Palamedes discovers the trick. In revenge, Odysseus brings about his ruin and death. After the death of Achilles, Odysseus and Ajax contend for his armor, which is adjudged to the former. He is at length accidentally killed by Telegonus, his son by Circe or Calypso]. were sent to Priam [Priam is the famous king of Troy who reigned during that country's disastrous war. His original name is said to have been Podarces, that is, "the swift-footed," which was changed to Priamus, "the ransomed," because he was the only surviving son of Laomedon and was ransomed by his sister after he had fallen into the hands of Hercules. When the Greeks landed on the Trojan coast, Priam was already advanced in years. He took no active part in the war, and once only did he venture upon the field of battle, to conclude the agreement respecting the single combat between Paris and Menelaus. When the Greek entered Troy the aged king put on his armor to rush against the enemy, but his wife prevailed upon him to take refuge with his family as a suppliant at the altar of Zeus. He was slain in the temple by Pyrrhus]. to demand restoration with reference to the outrage which had been perpetrated. The Trojans having refused to make reparation, war resulted between the parties. In the first engagement, Hector [Hector was the chief hero of the Trojans in their war with the Greeks. He was the eldest son of Priam and Hecuba, and the husband of Andromache. He fought with the bravest of the Greeks, and at length slew Patroclus, the friend of Achilles. This roused the latter to the fight. The other Trojans fled before Achilles into the city. Hector alone remained outside the walls; but when he saw Achilles his heart failed him and he took to flight. Three times he raced around the city, pursued by the swift-footed Achilles, and then fell pierced by Achilles' spear. Achilles tied Hector's body to his chariot and dragged his corpse before the walls of Troy. At the command of Zeus, Achilles surrendered the body to Priam, who buried it at Troy with great pomp], the son of Priam, slew Protesilaus [Protesilaus led the warriors of several Thessalian places against Troy, and was the first of all the Greeks who was killed by the Trojans, being the first to leap from the ships upon the Trojan coast. According to common tradition he was slain by Hector]..

In the second battle he killed Patroclus [Patroclus was the celebrated friend of Achilles. Aeacus, the grandfather of Achilles, was a brother of Menoetius, so that Achilles and Patroclus were kinsmen as well as friends. He is said to have taken part in the expedition against Troy on account of his attachment to Achilles. He was slain, and a long struggle ensued between the Greeks and Trojans for his body; but the former obtained possession of it, and vowed to avenge the death of his friend. His ashes were collected in a golden urn and deposited under a mound, where the remains of Achilles were subsequently buried], and overcame Minones (Menoetius?) [This probably refers to 'Menoetius,' son of Actor and Aegina, father of Patroclus, who is for this reason called Menoetiades], and Ajax, the Telamonian [Ajax was the son of Telamon, king of Salamis. Homer calls him Telamonian Ajax. He sailed against Troy in twelve ships, and is represented in the as second only to Achilles in bravery, and as the hero most worth, in the absence of Achilles, to contend with Hector. In the contest for the armor of Achilles, he was conquered by Odysseus, and this, says Homer, was the cause of his death. Others relate that his defeat by Odysseus brought on madness, and that he rushed from his tent and slaughtered the sheep of the Greek army, imagining them to be the Greek leaders who had 'betrayed' him; and that at length he put an end to his own life].; but he did not recognize his own blood; for he was born of Esiona, the sister of Priam.

Then at the request of the Greeks a truce of two years was declared. In this third encounter Hector slew the Boeotian Archilocus (Arcilycus) and Prothenorus (Prothoenor), the generals. [Prothoenor and Arcilycus, respectively son and father, took part in the Trojan War. Prothoenor was one of the leaders of the Boeotians against Troy, where he was slain]. In the fourth battle Alexander pierced the hip of Menelaus with an arrow. [Menelaus was a younger brother of Agamemnon. He was king of Lacedaemon and married the beautiful Helen. When she was carried off, he and Odysseus sailed to Troy to demand her restitution; but the journey was of no avail. Thereupon Menelaus and his brother resolved to march on Troy with all the forces Greece could muster. Agamemnon was chosen commander-in-chief. In the Trojan War Menelaus distinguished himself with bravery. He was one of the heroes concealed in the wooden horse; and as soon as Troy was taken he and Odysseus hastened to the house of Deiphobus, who had married Helen after the death of Paris, and put him to death. He was among the first to sail away from Troy with his wife, Helen]. In the fifth engagement Hector slew seven very strong commanders, and Aeneas [Aeneas, according to the Homeric story, was the son of Anchises and Aphrodite. On his father's side he was the great grandson of Tros, and thus nearly related to the royal house of Troy, as Priam himself was a grandson of Tros. At first he took no part in the Trojan War; and it was not until Achilles attacked him on Mount Ida and drove away his flocks that he led his Dardanians against the Greeks. From that point on he and Hector are the great bulwarks of the Trojans against the Greeks. After the city fell he withdrew to Mount Ida with his friends and the images of the gods. From there he journeyed to Italy, settling at Latium (near Rome), where he became the ancestral hero of the Romans]. slew two, and Diomedes two. The sixth engagement lasted 80 consecutive days; and then, at the request of the Greeks, a three years' truce was declared. At the expiration of it the war was renewed, and Hector, at the head of his forces, slew four strong commanders. On the side of the Greeks two Trojans were slain by Achilles. [Achilles is the great hero of the . According to the Homeric story he was a son of Peleus, a king of Thessaly. He was educated by Phoenix, who taught him eloquence and the arts of war, and accompanied him to the Trojan War. In the art of healing he was instructed by Chiron, the centaur. In 50 ships he led his hosts of Myrmidons against Troy. Here he was the great bulwark of the Greeks. Previous to the dispute with Agamemnon, he ravaged the country around Troy. When Agamemnon was obliged to give up Chryseis to her father, he threatened to take away Briseis from Achilles, who surrendered her on the persuasion of Athena, but refused to take any further part in the war, and shut himself up in his tent. The affairs of the Greeks declined in consequence. An embassy was sent to Achilles, offering him rich presents and the restoration of Briseis; but in vain. By his dearest friend Patroclus he was persuaded to allow the latter to use Achilles' horses, armor and men on behalf of Greece. Patroclus was slain; and Achilles, to avenge his death, went back into action for Greece. Soon thereafter he slew Hector]. They fought thirty days, when Priam requested a third truce of six months. Agamemnon, [Agamemnon was the brother of Menelaus, and became one of the most powerful princes in Greece. When Helen was carried off by Paris, the Greek chiefs resolved to recover her by force, and Agamemnon was chosen their commander-in-chief. His quarrel with Achilles has been told elsewhere]. on the part of the Greeks, requested a fourth truce of thirty days. Andromache, [Andromache, daughter of Eëtion, king of the Cilician Thebes, is one of the noblest characters in the . Her father and seven brothers were slain by Achilles at the taking of Thebes, and her mother, who had purchased her freedom by a large ransom, was killed by Artemis. She was married to Hector, for whom she had the deepest affections]. the wife of Hector, desired her husband not to engage in the ninth battle, for in her sleep she saw that it would be useless for him to participate in it; but as Hector would not heed her request, she laid her two sons at his feet; but still she was unable to detain him. He went forth to battle and slew three of the strongest opponents, wounded two, and also Achilles. But Achilles finally slew him. The Greeks then asked for a fifth truce of three months. But after the tenth engagement the Greeks requested a sixth truce of one year.

In the eleventh battle, Palamedes [Palamedes joined the Greeks in their expedition against Troy; but Agamemnon, Diomedes, and Ulysses, envious of his fame, caused a captive Phrygian to write him a letter in the name of Priam, and bribed a servant of Palamedes to conceal the letter under his master's bed. Then they accused Palamedes of treachery. Upon searching his tent they found the letter that they themselves had dictated; and thereupon they caused him to be stoned to death. When he was led to death he exclaimed, "Truth, I lament you, for you have died even before me." The manner in which Palamedes perished is variously related. Some say Odysseus and Diomedes induced him to descend into a well, where they pretended they had discovered a treasure, and when he was below they cast stones upon him and killed him; others state that he was drowned by them while fishing; and others that he was killed by Paris with an arrow. The story of Palamedes, which is not mentioned by Homer, seems to have been first related in the , and was afterwards developed by the tragic poets, especially by Euripides, and lastly by the sophists, who liked to look upon Palamedes as their pattern. The tragic poets and sophists describe him as a sage among the Greeks and as a poet; and he is said to have invented lighthouses, measures, scales, the discus, dice, the alphabet and the art of regulating sentinels], who became king through an uprising, was slain. In the twelfth encounter Troilus [Troilus was a son of Priam and Hecuba; or, according to others, a son of Apollo. He fell during the Trojan War at the hands of Achilles. However, others relate that he was made a prisoner, and that Achilles ordered him to be strangled; or, fleeing from Achilles he ran into the temple of the Thymbraean Apollo, where Achilles slew him]. slew many in the Greek ranks. The thirteenth engagement lasted for seven consecutive days. And Agamemnon desired a truce of thirty days. In the eighteenth engagement Troilus wounded Achilles, and they fought for seven consecutive days. In the nineteenth encounter Troilus fell from his horse and was slain by Achilles. In the twentieth battle Menno, the Persian leader, was slain.

Then at the request of Priam there was a tenth truce of thirty days.

In the twenty-first engagement Alexander slew Achilles in the temple of Apollinus, to which he enticed him for the purpose of negotiating peace. For this reason the Greeks requested the eleventh truce. In the twenty-second battle Alexander wounded Ajax, and he in turn gave Alexander a mortal wound, of which he died. In the twenty-third and twenty-fourth encounters Pathasillia (Penthesilea), the queen of the Amazons, many times wounded Neoptolemus [Neoptolemus, also called Pyrrhus, was the son of Achilles. The name of Pyrrhus is said to have been given him because he had fair hair, or because Achilles, while disguised as a girl, had born the name of Pyrrha. He was called Neoptolemus, that is, young or late warrior (or 'new war'), either because he had fought in early youth, or because he had come late to Troy. Neoptolemus was reared in Sycros in the palace of Lycomedes, and was brought from there by Ulysses to join the Greeks against Troy, because Hellenus had prophesied that Neoptolemus and Philoctetes were necessary for the capture of Troy. Neoptolemus was one of the heroes concealed in the wooden horse. At the capture of the city he killed Priam at the sacred hearth of Zeus, and sacrificed Polyxena to the spirit of his father. He took Andromache, the widow of Hector, and had children by her], the son of Achilles; but she was thereafter slain by him. Finally Antenor [Antenor, according to Homer, was one of the wisest among the elders of Troy. He received Menelaus and Odysseus into his house when they came to Troy as ambassadors, and advised his fellow citizens to restore Helen to Menelaus. Thus he is represented as a traitor to his country, and when sent to Agamemnon just before the taking of Troy, to negotiate peace, he concerted a plan of delivering the city, even the palladium, into the hands of the Greeks. On the capture of Troy Antenor was spared by the Greeks. His history after this event is related differently. Some writers say that he founded a new kingdom at Troy. According to others, he embarked with Menelaus and Helen, was carried to Libya and settled at Cyrene; while a third account states that he went with the Neneiti to Thrace, and hence to the western coast of the Adriatic, where the foundation of Patavium and several towns is ascribed to him. The sons and descendents of Antenor were called Antenoridae], Polydamus [Polydamus, son of Panthous and Phrontis, was a Trojan hero, a friend of Hector, and brother of Euphorbus], and Aeneas spoke to Priam on the subject of peace; and when he refused to make peace they betrayed and gave up the city.

When Troy was captured, Agamemnon divided up the possessions and estates of the Trojans. And so the war against Troy lasted ten years, eight months and twelve days; and (as Dares Phrygius states), Greece lost 870,000 and Troy 676,000 men, in dead, up to the time of the surrender of the city; but after the surrender and betrayal of Troy 276,000 Trojans were slain. Aeneas sailed back to Greece with 22 ships, and Alexander went with him. Three thousand four hundred Trojans followed. And so two thousand five hundred followed Antenor; and Etheleaus, with Cassandra and Andronica and Hecuba, Priam's wife, with fifteen hundred persons, went to Orinuseum. Homer says that Menelaus and Helen fled to the Egyptian country, called Thecures or Polipus, after the destruction of Troy.

When I see that innumerable writers make mention of the destruction of the Trojans and, in addition, when readers of the places, names, and deeds (of this story), on account of their ignorance of history, begin to stumble and often even to fall, for this reason I send everyone back to the histories of the Trojan destruction that Dares the Phrygian and Dictys the Cretan, cultured men, recounted in detail, since the former lived and fought at that time, and the latter was present as a follower of Idomeneus, leader of the Cretans. And as far as knowledge of Trojan affairs is concerned, nothing is briefer or more useful. In fact, nothing can be found clearer and more succinct. He narrates the deeds with such diligence and with such care. And all these deeds, thus arranged by the times, the names, and the places, he treats so accurately in the end that the story is not narrated, but performed, not described, but in fact it seems to readers that they are dragged back again into the war itself and are present (in the story). Folio XXXVII recto

The Trojan ten years' war (as Eusebius states) started in the first year of Esbon, the judge of Israel. During this period those mentioned hereafter also flourished. Troy (which Ilus the son of the Trojan king built up), was only 1500 paces from the sea. Want as well as abundance of all things was at hand. For, as Troy had suffered a ten years' siege on the part of the Greeks, so the city was finally destroyed.

Hercules, with Jason, laid waste the city of Troy, which was built up again by Tros, and began the Olympian War. There was much fighting. And twelve extraordinary and superhuman deeds were performed by Hercules.

Hector, the first born of Priam by Hecuba, his wife, was a man of unequaled strength and ability as a warrior; and because of the great brilliance of his career the Trojans held him in high esteem; for, with his incredible strength and wisdom, he not only elevated his ancestry, but his country as well, to nobility, honor and glory. By his wife, Andromache, he bore many sons. One of these was called Franco, and from him (as Vincentius, historian of Burgundy says) the French originated.

Helen was the lawful wife of Menelaus, the king. She was abducted by Paris, the son of Priam, and taken to Troy. And this was the cause of the Trojan War. After the destruction of Troy, Helen was returned to Menelaus. Happily he embarked with her on a ship, bound for home. But by reason of an adverse sea, and because of storms, they came to Egypt, to King Polibus. Thereafter they wandered about aimlessly for eight years (as Eusebius testifies [This parenthetical phrase is not in the German edition of the chronicle].), and finally reached home.

Paris, who is also called Alexander, was Hector's brother, born of Priam and Hecuba. Supposedly as a messenger he came to Greece with 20 ships, and was hospitably received by Menelaus. When Paris saw the wife of the king, he abducted her, and in the king's absence carried her and the king's treasures off to Troy. In consequence of this wrong the Greeks waged a ten years' war against the Trojans. In this war, Paris, after many valorous exploits, was slain by Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles.

Agamemnon was the brother of King Menelaus, and commander-in-chief of the entire forces sent by Greece against Troy, which was shamefully and treacherously surrendered in the end. Agamemnon was the son of Atreus, the king [He was the grandson of Atreus, king of Mycenae; though some call him the son of Atreus and the grandson of Pelops]. All the forces were under his command. He left his wife, Clytemnestra, who had born him many children, and went to war. He labored hard and endured much opposition on the part of the princes before Troy, in consequence of which he was deposed and supplanted by Palamedes. But when Ulysses later slew Palamedes, Agamemnon was restored to his former powers, which he exercised with great honor. After Troy was captured and destroyed, Agamemnon sailed for home with Cassandra, the daughter of Priam, and with much booty. However, adverse seas and heavy storms caused him to wander about aimlessly for an entire year.

These two (referring to opposite portraits), Turcus and Franco, fled from Troy and set up two kingdoms; but this occurred long afterward.

Franco was a son of Hector and grandson of Priam, and of him the French derived their name. He was driven from Troy, and after wandering through all Asia he came to the Donau (Danube). After staying there for sometime he sought a region removed from organized communities; and he came to the river Tanais and the Sea of Maeotis (the Sea of Azov), where he built the city of Sicambria.

Turcus was a son of Troilus, who was a son of King Priam. At his wish his people were called Turks, after him. Some say their place of origin is in the neighborhood of Scythia.

The images on this page (several of which have been used previously) are, like nearly all portraits in the Chronicle, conventionally attired in late medieval dress. In addition, the physical characteristics of many of the figures seem to have little or nothing in common with the figures they purportedly represent (e.g, Hector and Paris are portrayed as older individuals, Agamemnon is too young, etc.).

Folio XXXVII verso

Phinehas (Phynees) was the son of Eleazar. Because the children of Israel began to commit whoredom with the women of the Midianites and to worship their gods, God commanded that the twelve princes be hanged. Thereupon Phinehas, the priest of God, slew one of the children of Israel, who had illicit relations with a Midianitish woman; and thereby he turned away the wrath of God. Because of this evil there fell in Israel 24,000.

This is an abridgment of Numbers 25:1-9, 14:15:

And Israel abode in Shittim, and the people began to commit whoredom with the daughters of Moab. And they called the people unto the sacrifices of their gods: and the people did eat, and bowed down to their god. And Israel joined itself unto Baal-peor; and the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel. And the Lord said unto Moses, Take all the heads of the people, and hang them up before the Lord against the sun, that the fierce anger of the Lord may be turned away from Israel. And Moses said unto the judges of Israel, Slay every one of its men that were joined unto Baal-peor. And behold, one of the children of Israel came and brought unto his brethren a Midianite woman in the sight of Moses, and in the sight of all the congregation of the children of Israel, who were weeping before the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. And when Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron the priest saw it, he rose up from among the congregation, and took a javelin in his hand; and he went after the man of Israel into the tent and thrust both of them through, the man of Israel, and the woman through her belly. So the plague was stayed from the children. And those that died in the plague were twenty and four thousand. . . . Now the name of the Israelite that was slain, even that was slain with the Midianite woman, was Zimri, the son of Salu, a prince of a chief house among the Simeonites. And the name of the Midianite woman that was slain was Cozbi, the daughter of Zur; he was head over a people and of a chief house in Midian.

Phinehas, whose name means 'brazen mouth' was a son of Eleazar, and a grandson of Aaron (Exodus 6:25; I Chr. 6:4, 50). Phinehas filled the office of high priest of the Jews for a period of almost twenty years. His zeal and promptitude in punishing the sin of Zimri turned away the wrath of the Lord against the Israelite nation, and was duly rewarded by a promise to his family of perpetual succession in the Jewish priesthood (Numbers 25:6-15). This promise was fulfilled; for except for the interval from Eli to Zadok, the priesthood continued in the family of Phinehas until the destruction of the temple and the captivity of the nation.

Deborah (Delbora) was a prophetess and a judge of Israel under whom Jabin, the king of the Canaanites and Sisera, the general of his army, were slain. He (Sisera) sprang from his chariot and fled into a woman's house. After a drink of milk he became drowsy and fell asleep. And this same woman drove a nail through his temple and with a hammer pinned him to the ground; and so he was killed. [And Deborah said to Barak, Get up; for this is the day in which the Lord has delivered Sisera into your hand: has not the Lord gone out before you? So Barak went down from Mount Tabor, and ten thousand men after him. And the Lord discomfited Sisera, and all his chariots, and his entire host, with the edge of the sword before Barak; so that Sisera lighted down off his chariot, and fled away on his feet. But Barak pursued after the chariots and after the host, etc. Nevertheless, Sisera fled away on his feet to the tent of Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite: for there was peace between Jabin the king of Hazor and the house of Heber the Kenite. And Jael went out to meet Sisera, and said to him, Turn in, my lord, turn in to me; fear not. And when he had turned toward her, in the tent, she covered him with a mantle, and he said to her, Give me, I pray of you, a little water to drink, for I am thirsty. And she opened a bottle of milk, and gave him drink, and covered him. . . Then Jael, Heber's wife, took a nail of the tent and took a hammer in her hand, and went softly to him, and drove the nail into his temples, and fastened it into the ground: for he was fast asleep and weary. So he died. (Judges 4:14-23)] This same Deborah also made a song of thanksgiving because of the victory of the people. [Blessed above women shall Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, be blessed shall she be above women in the tent. He asked water, and she gave him milk; she brought forth butter in a lordly dish, she put her hand to the nail and her right hand to the workmen's hammer; and with the hammer she struck Sisera, she struck off his head, when she had pierced and stricken through his temples (Song of Deborah, Judges 5:24-26)].

Gideon (Gedeon), the fourth judge, judged Israel for forty years. He slew four kings, Oreb, Zeeb, Zebah and Zalmunna. [Judges 7:25, 8-21]. And so were subjugated the Midianites into whose hands the children of Israel had been given for seven years because of the evils which they had practiced. For while Gideon was threshing the wheat, an angel appeared unto him with the prophecy that the children of Israel should be delivered from bondage through him; and as a sign of future victory, the broth and the unleavened bread were consumed upon a rock; and Gideon's fleece (of wool) laden with heavenly dew lay upon the dry earth; and when the skin was dry, the earth about it was moist. [And there came an angel of the Lord, and sat under an oak which was in Ophrah, that pertained unto Joash, the Abi-ezrite; and his son Gideon threshed wheat by the winepress, to hide it from the Midianites. And the angel of the Lord appeared to him, and said to him, the Lord is with you, you mighty man of valor. And Gideon said to him, Oh my Lord, if the Lord is with us, why then has all this happened to us? And where are all his miracles that our forefathers told us of? . . . But now the Lord has forsaken us, and delivered us into the hands of the Midianites. And the Lord looked upon him, and said, Go in this your might, and you shall save Israel from the hand of the Midianites: have I not sent you? . . . And he (Gideon) said to him, If now I have found grace in your sight, then show me a sign that you are talking with me. . . And Gideon went in and made ready a kid, and unleavened cakes of an ephah of flour; the flesh he put in a basket, and brought it out to him under the oak, and presented it. And the angel of God said to him, Take the flesh and the unleavened cakes, and lay them upon this rock, and pour out the broth. And he did so. Then the angel of the Lord put forth his staff that was in his hand, and touched the flesh and the unleavened cakes; and there rose up fire out of the rock, and consumed the flesh and the unleavened cakes. Then the angel of the Lord departed out of his sight. . . And Gideon said to God, If you will save Israel by my hand, as you have said, Behold, I will put a fleece of wool in the floor; and if the dew is on the fleece only, and it is dry upon the earth beside it, then shall I know that you will save Israel by my hand, as you have said. And it was so; for he rose up early in the morning, and thrust the fleece together, and wringed the dew out of the fleece, a bowl full of water. And Gideon said to God, Let not your anger be hot against me, and I will speak but this once: let me prove, I pray you, but this once with the fleece; let it now be dry only upon the fleece, and upon all the ground let there be dew. And God did so that night: for it was dry upon the fleece only, and there was dew on all the ground. (Judges 6:11-14, 17-21, 26-40)]

Abimelech, the fifth judge of the Jews, was a natural although illegitimate son of Gideon. He persuaded the men of Shechem to slay his seventy legitimate brothers, the sons of Gideon, so that he alone might rule. This they did, and all of them were beheaded on a stone, with the exception of Jonathan (Jotham), the smallest, who was hidden. For this the Lord caused Abimelech to suffer an evil death. And Jotham told them the fable of the trees that went to the vine, the fig tree, the olive tree and lastly to the bramble, in order to persuade each in turn to act as the king of the trees. Abimelech afterward quarreled with the men of Shechem; and he fired the tower of Shechem, destroying a thousand persons in it. When he finally besieged and was storming the city of Thebes, he was struck on the head and knocked down by a stone thrown upon him from the walls by a woman. He called upon his armor-bearer to kill him so that it might not be said that he was slain by a woman. And the armor-bearer did as Abimelech wished. [This Abimelech is not to be confused with the king of the Philistines at Gerar (Genesis 20:2), nor with his successor (Genesis 26). The Abimelech here in question was a son of Gideon by his concubine in Shechem (Judges 8:31). After the death of his father he persuaded the men of Shechem to make him king. He put to death seventy of his brothers who dwelt in his father's house at Ophrah, leaving only Jotham, the youngest alive, who had concealed himself (Judges 9:1-5). And when Jotham learned that Abimelech had been proclaimed king, he went and stood on the top of Mount Gerizim, and lifting his voice, called upon the men of Shechem to listen to him. And he told them the fable of the trees, which is said to be the oldest fable extant. It seems the trees went forth once upon a time to anoint a king over them. They invited the olive tree first; but he declined, saying, Should I leave my fatness, on account of which by me they honor God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees? The fig tree, next asked, also declined, refusing to forsake its sweetness and good fruit for a royal promotion. And the vine also declined the honor, refusing to leave its wine that cheers God and Man. At last they approached the bramble, who said to them, If in truth you anoint me king over you, then come and put your trust in my shadow; and if not; let fire come out of the bramble and devour the cedars of Lebanon (Judges 9:8-15). See also Judges 9:52-54].

Tola (Thola), of the tribe of Issachar, judged Israel for 23 years. He had 30 sons, who rode asses, and were rulers over 30 cities. He gave them wives. After him the Israelites sinned against the Lord and were punished many fold by the Amonites and Midianites. Thola finally died and was buried in Shamir. [It was not Tola, but his successor Jair, who had 30 sons who "rode on thirty ass colts, and they had thirty cities," which were in the land of Gilead (Judges 10:1-5). This is confirmed by a succeeding paragraph on the same page of the].

Uzzi (Osy), the priest, was from the seed of Aaron, through the line of Eleazar; and after his death, the priesthood, according to the will of God, passed to the line of Ithamar for 120 years, and Eli, the first high priest of Ithamar was the last. [Ezra: 1-6].

Jair (Yair), of the tribe of Manasseh, the seventh judge of Israel, had thirty pious sons whom he made rulers over 30 cities. And as the times were quiet and peaceful, it would seem that in the days of these two judges the children of Israel were devoted to God; for which reason all things were fortunate in their outcome. And after he (Jair) had worthily carried the office for twenty years, he died in old age.

During the time of these two judges, Thola and Jayr, Israel was devoted to the Lord, for which reason these same times were peaceful and prosperous. But after their death, life among the Hebrews became dishonorable and irreligious, and the laws were ignored. For this reason the Palestinians (Philistines) destroyed their country with large armies.

The Lineage of the Priests, begun at Folio XXV verso, and continued at XXIX verso, is here resumed with these additions:

1. Phinees (Phinehas), who is mentioned in the text, is here represented by a woodcut that has not been used before. He wears the mitre of a high priest, bearing the crescent described and illustrated at Folio XXXIII recto. He raises his fingers in benediction. His robes are not those prescribed for his high office.
2. Aysue (Abishua), son of Phinehas, appears in the same regalia as his father, and this woodcut is also here used for the first time. Aysue is not mentioned in the Chronicle text at this point.
3. Booz or Buuz (Bukki), the son of Abishua, is not to be confused with Boaz, the husband of Ruth, who is also, later on, styled Booz or Buuz. Bukki is portrayed by the same woodcut used at Folio XXV verso for Levi.
4. Ozy (Uzzi), the son of Bukki, is represented by the same portrait served for Merari, son of Levi, at Folio XXV verso.

(B) LINEAGE OF THE JUDGES

1. Delbora (Deborah), who appeared as Diana at Folio XXV recto.
2. Gedeon (Gideon), who appears in very complete armor, his head not only encased, but his face almost entirely covered. Through the slits in his visor he peeps at a helpless protesting little lamb which he holds in both hands, and which is struggling to get away.
3. Abimelech, middle-aged, jowly, and clean-shaven he seems slightly bored (or mildly disgruntled).
4. Thola (Tola), who is shown in a fur cap and with both hands tucked away in the ample sleeves of his coat.
5. Jayr (Jair), a very sickly, decrepit old man, and bald, except for a forelock. He is almost swallowed up in the great coat he wears.

Of the Famous Islands of the Mediterranean Sea

Sardinia is an island of the sea which flows out of the great ocean that surrounds the earth, and which sea runs through the middle of the earth. [The Mediterranean Sea]. It was named after Sardus, the son of Hercules. This same Sardus with countless numbers migrated out of the land of Libya and overran the island of Sardinia, in the Tyrrhenian Sea [Tyrrhenum Mare was the name given in ancient times to the part of the Mediterranean Sea along the west coast of Italy. The name was originally employed by the Greeks, who generally called the people of Etruria Tyrrhenians, and was merely adopted by them from the Romans. It was the designation of that part of the Mediterranean that extended from the coast of Liguria to the north coast of Sicily and from the mainland of Italy to the islands of Corsica and Sardinia on the west], which island the Greeks called Icus [Not Icus, but 'Ichnusa,' from its resemblance to the print of a foot. They also called it 'Sandalotis' from its likeness to a sandal].; and he called the island Sardinia after himself. The island is 98 miles wide and 220 miles long. Some say its circumference is 4000 furlongs. The island has many rough, sharp, and turbulent regions, but the remainder is in all things blessed and productive, particularly in wheat, cattle and pastures. There no wolf is born, nor are any snakes found. But in the summer time the most productive regions suffer from plagues and sickness. It has many cities, of which Calaria (Caralis or Cagliari) is the foremost. Large coral fisheries are found there. For a long time it was enlightened by the holiness of the blessed father, Augustine. In ancient times the island produced rams whose shaggy locks were used for wool. They were called musimones. The inhabitants of the island clothed and protected themselves with the skins of these rams, which at the same time served them as armor or breastplate. The inhabitants of the island were formerly called Jolenses (Iolai or Iliensis); and it is said that Iolaus, who was born of one of the love intrigues of Hercules to Sardinia, who lived there among the inhabitants. And they were thereafter called Sardinians. Item: The Peni (who came from Africa to the same place) later secured control of the country; and they undertook a war against the Germans, but were completely exterminated by them. The Romans for a long time sought to master this island, and after it had suffered many revolts, attacks, invasions and defeats at the hands of the barbarians, the Pisans and the Geneose, it finally fell into the hands and power of the Arragonians.

The statements of ancient writers with reference to the origin of Sardinia's population are various and conflicting. According to Pausanias, the first inhabitants were Libyans, who crossed over under the command of Sardus, the son of a native hero or divinity, whom the Greeks identified with Hercules. He is supposed to have given the island its name, which was previously called Ichnusa by the Greeks for reasons already stated. But neither the name Ichnusa nor Sandaliotis were ever in common use. Though the theory of Pausanias is plausible, little value is to be attached to these traditions. He states that the next settlers were a Greek colony under Aristaeus, to whom some writers ascribe the foundation of Caralis; and these were followed by a body of Iberians under Norax, who founded the city of Nora. Next came Greeks from Thespieae and Attica, under command of Iolus, who founded a colony at Olbia. After this came a body of Trojans who had escaped the destruction of Troy, and who established themselves in the southern part of the island. But they in turn were soon expelled by a body of Libyans, who drove them into the mountainous regions, which they retained down to a late period under the name of Ilienses. They are mentioned by Livy as well as by geographers. The Iolai or Iolaenes, on the other hand, had lost their name in the time of Strabo. There is no account of any Greek colonies in Sardinia during the historical period. The first historical event is the island's conquest by the Carthaginians, but the time cannot be definitely dated. The subsequent Roman conquest occurred 238 BCE, after which it became a Roman province.

The mountain tribes revolted in 181 BCE, but were put down with heavy losses. The number of captives brought to Rome on this occasion was so great that it is said to have given rise to the expression "Sardi venales," for anything that was cheap and worthless. Another revolt was suppressed in 114 BCE, the last war of importance in Sardinia.

In 456 CE Genseric, the Vandal, wrested Sardinia from Rome, and it was not recovered until 534 CE, in the reign of Justinian. It was again conquered by the Gothic king Totila in 551 CE. In the eighth century it was conquered by the Arabs.

Corsica, one of the islands of the above named sea, was first taken possession of by Cirinus (Cyrnus), brother of the aforesaid Sardus and son of Hercules, (who came there from Libya); and after him the island was named Cirinum (Cyrnus). [Cyrnus is the name by which Corsica was known to the Greeks; but the origin of this name is wholly unknown, though later writers, as usual, derived it from a hero, Cyrnus, whom they pretended to be a son of Hercules]. But once upon a time after that, a woman named Corsica (Corsa) was pasturing her bull in the land of Liguria; and the bull went into the sea and swam to this island. Without the knowledge of her parents, the woman sailed after the bull and came to the island. There she found him in fertile pastures. And she was greatly pleased with the beauty of the place. She made it her home, and named it Corsica after her own name. [Solinus, following authors now lost, who has written fully concerning Corsica, especially ascribes the first population of the island to the Ligurians, and this is confirmed by the legend of the Ligurian woman of the name of Corsa (not Corsica), who has fabled to have first discovered its shores. Corsica was probably the native name of the island, adopted from the people themselves by the Romans]. The island is 160 miles in length and 70 miles wide. It has a circumference of 3200 furlongs [The ancients exaggerated the size of the island. Its greatest length is 116 miles, and its greatest breadth about 51]. and lies in the Ligustian Sea [Ligusticum Mare was the name given by the ancients to that part of the Mediterranean Sea which adjoined the coast of Liguria, and lay to the north of the Tyrrhenian Sea. The name was applied (like all similar appellations) with considerable vagueness, sometimes as limited to what is now called 'the Gulf of Genoa,'—in which sense it is termed the Ligusticus Sinus by Florus; at others it was used in a much wider sense, so that Pliny speaks of Corsica as an island "in Ligustico Mari." This is the more usual significance with which the name is used], but to the north it is nearer the Tuscian Sea. [Tusculum Mare or Tyrrhenum Mare. The latter of these two names was given in ancient times to that part of the Mediterranean Sea that adjoins the western coast of Italy. It is evident from the name itself that it was originally employed by the people of Greece, who called the inhabitants of Etruria Tyrrhenians. The people more frequently called the sea on the west coast of Italy simply the "lower sea" (Mare Inferum). They called the Adriatic "the upper sea" (Mare Superum)]. The distance between this island and Sardinia is 20 miles; although Pliny says not more than 9 miles. In the time of Strabo, this island (as he writes) was badly constituted, and in many regions it was unsafe for travel. For in the mountains lived people who sustained themselves by murder and exceeded wild animals in cruelty. [Almost all of Corsica is occupied by a range of lofty and rugged mountains extending from one extremity of the island to the other, rendering it one of the wildest and least civilized portions of southern Europe. Strabo speaks of the inhabitants of the mountain district as "wilder than the very beasts," and of a character so untamable that when brought to Rome as slaves it was impossible to make any use of them, or to accustom them to domestic habits. Seneca was banished to Corsica in 41 CE, and there he lived for eight years in exile. Other political offenders were exiled there indicating that the island had a bad reputation among the ancients]. When the Romans afterwards gained dominion over the island, they found in it many fertile regions and good pasturage; so they built many cities there. At present there are six cities of no mean repute. In the time of Charles the Great the island became subject to the power of the Genoese; but later it passed under Pisan rule; and there it remained for a short time while the affairs of the Pisans prospered. For a time also it was subject to the Church of Rome. When the Pisans were defeated, the island was again brought under Genoese dominion; and there it has remained. In addition to producing the best wine it also grows the sweetest fruits. It is rich in oxen, mountain goats, sheep, and other animals; and it produces the best-dispositioned dogs.

Crete is also an island of the above-mentioned sea, and in it Cres, or Orion, Demogorgonis's son, reigned (according to Eusebius) as the first king [Cres was the son of Zeus by a nymph of Mount Ida, from whom the island of Crete was believed to have derived its name. According to Diodorus, Cres was an Eteocretan, that is, a Cretan autochthon, or one sprung from the earth itself. Orion was a famous hunter, of giant stature, beloved by the goddess Artemis, with whom he lived on the island of Crete until the time of his death, after which he was transformed into a constellation]. After him the island was named Crete. But at first it was called Aeria (which means 'airy'), because of the good air that it derives from the heavens. Thereafter the Greeks called it Macoroneson (that is), the blessed island. Some say the island derived its name from Creta (Crete), the daughter of Hesperiadis. But there are others who say it is so called because of its loamy soil, which the word creta signifies. This island is now subject to the Venetians. It once belonged to Greece and has a lovely location. It stands out very brilliantly in the sea. At one time (as Isidorus writes) it was graced with one hundred prominent cities. Item: The inhabitants of the island built temples to the mother of the gods in the cities of Cnossus and Cybelis. The island was also first in the art of navigation and the use of arms. The teaching of music began there. Snakes and other noxious animals are not found there; nor the night owls. However, when a night owl is taken there it soon dies. The island is not far distant from Peloponnesus, or Arcadia (and, as it is said), in the middle of the world. The Aegean Sea [The Aegean Sea (Aegaeum Mare) is that part of the Mediterranean bounded on the north by Macedonia and Thrace, on the west by Greece, and on the east by Asia Minor. At its northeast corner it is connected with the Propontis by the Hellespont. Its extent is differently estimated by the ancient writers, but the name is generally applied to the whole sea as far south as the island of Crete. The Aegaeon Sea was divided into the following:] is to the north, and the Ionian or Myrtoan Sea to the west, both of which belong to Europe. To the east is the Icarian and the Egyptian Sea [Egyptian Sea, portion of the Mediterranean off Egypt], which both extend into Asia. Then also, it is bounded on the south and west by the African Sea [Libyan Sea, also called African Sea, being the portion of the Mediterranean between Crete and Africa].

Sicilia (Sicily) is an island in the sea mentioned. There Siculus, the son of Neptune, who came there after Sicano his brother, reigned, and after him the island was called Sicily. But at first it was called Tinacria (Trinacria) and thereafter Sicania [The pre-Hellenic inhabitants of Sicily were called Sicani or Siculi, variant names of kindred tribes who migrated from northern Africa. It is convenient to retain the two names, applying the term Sicanian to the stone age and to reserve Siculan for the Chalcolithic and the bronze and iron ages, the first Siculan period being Chalcolithic, the second Siculan being the bronze age, while the beginnings of the iron, or third Siculan period, will be 900 to 700 BCE, and the beginning of the fourth Siculan may be placed at 700 BCE, when the native civilization is hybridized with the Greek], and it is part of Italy. But now, through an earthquake (as Pliny states) it is separated from it by turbulent waves of the sea. The island is triangular, and in each of the three corners are opposing mountains. The one is Pachinus (Pachynus, now Passero); the second is Pelorus (Pelorum, now Faro) and the third is called Lylibeus (Lilybaeum, now Boeo). The first stretches to the south, while the second extends toward the north and is but 1500 paces away from Italy. The third extends westerly in the direction of Libya, and can be seen from Carthage. It is not more than 120,00 paces from Africa. The ancient Romans called the island a storehouse or granary, and it is more esteemed than any other region in Italy. It is noted for its fodder, saffron, honey and many other fruits, as well as for its cattle hides, wool and cheese, &c. [This is to some extent a repetition of Folio XIX recto where Sicily is mentioned in the text].

Cyprus, the island, was named Cetina after Cethin (Kittim), who was the third son of Javan, and Japheth's grandson; for this same Kittim was the first to take possession. Among islands it is the most celebrated; for it has an abundance of everything. It is adorned with the treasures of the ancients, and a spirit of voluptuousness prevails; for which reason the island was dedicated to Venus, the goddess. After the decline of Rome, Cyprus was for some time under the power of the Greeks, who ruled after the Emperor Constantine of Constantinople. King Richard of England once sailed with a large navy against Jerusalem, but stormy weather carried him to this island. However, the inhabitants did not desire the king to land. And he was angry; and the weapons he had intended to use against the Saracens he now turned against the Greeks, took the island from them, plundered it, and left a large garrison in possession. Not long thereafter he gave possession of it to a Gaul, named Guido Lusunanus (Guy Lusignan), who was warring for the kingdom of Jerusalem. This Lusignan having received the island from the said English king, held it for some time for himself and his descendants.

After the division of the Roman Empire in 395 CE, Cyprus passed into the hands of the eastern emperors, to whom it continued to be subject, with brief intervals, for more than seven centuries. It was administered as a pro-consulship by an official appointed from Antioch, the capital being transferred from Paphos to Salamis (then known as Constantis). Until 632 the island was exceedingly prosperous, but in that year began the period of Arab invasions that continued intermittently for the next three centuries. In 647 the Arabs mastered the island and destroyed Salamis; but they were driven out by the emperor only two years later. In 802 it was again conquered by the Arabs, and it was not restored to the Byzantine empire until 963. Its princes became practically independent, and tyrannized the island until, in 1191, Isaac Comnenus, who in 1184 had assumed the title of Despot of Cyprus, provoked the wrath of Richard I of England, by wantonly ill-treating the crusaders. Richard therefore wrested the island from Isaac, whom he took captive. He sold Cyprus to the Knights of the Templars, who resold it to Guy Lusignan, titular king of Jerusalem.

Guy ruled from 1192 until his death in 1194, his brother Amaury succeeding him as king. This dynasty ruled for 300 years. In 1372, after a quarrel between the Venetian and Genoese consuls, the Genoese took Famagusta, the chief commercial city in Cyprus, and held it until 1464. It was however, recovered by James II, and the whole island was reunited under his rule. His marriage with Caterina Cornaro, a Venetian lady of rank, was designed to secure the support of the powerful Republic of Venice; but after his own death and that of his son James II, the sovereignty of the island passed to his new allies. Caterina, unable to contend alone with the Turks, abdicated in favor of the Venetian republic, which took possession in 1489, just four years before the publication of the Chronicle.

After various changes the island came to two brothers. One of them, called Peter, with the assistance of the Catelanians and Gauls, made war upon the city of Alexandria in Egypt. He gained possession of the city and destroyed half of it; but the Egyptians in large numbers came to the assistance and rescue of the city, and he was obliged to flee. However, he took a rich and substantial booty with him. Not long thereafter he was killed by his brother; for one finds no pious company in sovereignty. And so his brother stained with blood was elected king; but remorse was not long postponed. After this the island of Cyprus suffered a great invasion and much strife; but now it is under Venetian rule.

Euboea (Euboya) is a renowned island that we now call Negroponte (Nigropont) [Euboea or Negroponte is the largest island in the Greek archipelago. The Greeks believed the island to have been torn from the mainland by an earthquake. It lies off the coasts of Attica, Boeotia, Locris, and southern Thessaly, from which countries it is separated by the Euboean Sea, called the Euripus in its narrowest part. In Homer the inhabitants are called Abantes. In the Middle Ages the island was called Egripo or Evripo, a corruption of 'Euripus.' The first bridge from the island to the mainland was built by the Boeotians when Euboea revolted from Athens in 411 BCE, making it "an island to all but themselves," and impeding shipments of gold and corn from Thrace, timber from Macedon, and horses from Thessaly. In the partition of the Eastern Empire among the Latins, the island was divided into three fiefs, but all soon became dependencies of Venice. When the Venetians took possession, observing the "black bridge," they called it Negroponte]. In it lies the city of Chalcis that was built by Cecrops the Athenian [Cecrops is the same who founded Athens and after whom the Acropolis was named. He had three daughters to whom Phrygia, a fourth, was added in Euboea], or (as Cicero says) by Alabando. But Plato says that Amasis [Amasis was the king of Egypt 570-526 BCE. During his long and prosperous reign close intercourse existed between Egyptians and Greeks, and he sent gifts to several Greek cities], the Egyptian king, constructed it. This city is the capital of the island, very celebrated, warlike and equipped for defense. Nevertheless it was taken from the Venetians by Mohammed Ottoman, the Turkish sultan. In this island Cecrops, the king, first recognized Apollo as a god, invented graven images, built temples, and made sacrifices. There also he added a fourth to his three daughters; and he called her Phrygia. She migrated to another country, lived there and named it Phrygia after herself. In the summer of the year 1471 CE, through the treachery of one Thomas, an evil-disposed Liburnian [Liburnia was a district of Illyricum, on the Adriatic], Mohammed, the Turkish sultan, took Chalcis with great damage to the Christians, particularly the Venetians; and he commanded that all Italians who had become of age be impaled, and the Greeks sold at public auction. [Chalcis was captured by Mohammed II in 1470, and the whole island fell to the Turks. After the Greek War of Independence, the island was included, in 1830, in the new Greek state.]

[The Latin edition follows with three more paragraphs, not translated here (except for the second paragraph); the first is on more islands (e.g. the Balearics); the second is a single linking sentence ("After the description of famous and other islands of the Mediterranean Sea, we should add a few things about the latitude of the Earth."), and the third, not surprisingly, is on latitude (and, to a lesser extend, longitude and climate). The final sentence of this third paragraph translates as follows: "Now we leave this investigation, following the history of the times."]

Folio XXXIX recto

Paris, the royal and highly renowned city of Gallia, lying in the land of the Senones [The Senones were a powerful people dwelling along the upper course of the Sequana (Seine) in Gallia Lugdunensis, a country situated in the confluence of the Arar (Saone) and the Rhodanus (Rhone), with Lugdunum as their chief city, corresponding to the city of Lyons. Lutetia, commonly called 'Lutetia Parisiorum' (Paris), was the capital of the Parisii in Gallia Lugdunensis, and was situated on an island in the Seine. Under the emperors it became a place of importance. Here Julian (the Apostate) was proclaimed emperor in 360 CE], had its beginning after the fall of Troy. For at that time Paris, the Trojan, and Aenaeas, together with Franco, the son of Hector, fled to Gallia, and settled on the banks of the river called the Sequana (Seine). There he made a people; and after him they called it Paris. So the French are of Trojan origin. After the destruction of Troy, these people under the leadership of Priamus, grandson of the great Priam, came through the Euxine Sea and the swamps or sea of Maeotis into Scythia. And there they built a city that they called Sicambria; and they became a great people. They paid tribute to the Romans, like other Scythians, up to the time of Valentinian the emperor. At that time the Alani began their attack upon the Roman Empire. In order to silence the cruelties of the Alani the emperor promised those who would oppose the Alani ten years of freedom. By this offer the Sicambrians were encouraged to oppose the Alani with force of arms, to defeat them in war, and to exterminate them [The Alani were a great Asiatic people, included among the Scythians, but probably a branch of Massagetae. They are first found about the eastern part of the Caucasus in the country called Albania, apparently just another form of the same name. In the reign of Vespasian they made incursions into Media and Armenia, and at a later time advanced into Europe as far as the Lower Danube, where, toward the end of the 5th century CE, they were routed by the Huns, who then compelled them to become their allies. In 406 CE some of the Alani took part with the Vandals in their expedition into Gaul and Spain, where they gradually disappear from history]. By this action the Sicambrians earned their freedom; and they changed their name to Franks, which according to the Attic tongue means free, terrible, or noble, and according to the Italian tongue, free. After the expiration of the ten-year period the Romans again demanded tribute; but the Franks, because of the freedoms that they had enjoyed, were now opposed to the demand, and refused to comply. Now as the Franks went out of Scythia and came into Germany and there lived for a long time, they became Germans. As the Roman Empire increased, so did France, until all of Gallia and a large part of Germany, from the Pyrenees Mountains to the extremity of Pannonia, was called France. And it was divided into two parts: Gallia, which was called the occidental or western Frankish or German kingdom, and

Germany the oriental or eastern part. Under Charles the Great this people merited the Roman Empire and were comforted by the Papal Chair, which was for a long time involved in the Lampertian War. There are many who insist that only those who live in and around Paris are French, and that the Roman Empire was given to them, but these are more properly called Francigenas than Frenchmen born in France. In this city the kings held court and had their residence for a long time, and thereby they made it great and mighty. Charles the Great, after receiving his imperial crown, established there because of its excellent location, a public high school for the whole empire; and from Dionysus Areopagiticus

Dionysius Areopagiticus, called "The Areopagite," is named in Acts 17:34 as one of the Athenians who believed when they heard Paul preach on the Areopagus ('The Hill of Ares [Roman 'Mars']'). Beyond this our only knowledge of him is the statement of Dionysius, bishop of Corinth, recorded by Eusebius, that this same Dionysius was the first "bishop" of Athens. Some hundred years afterwards his name was attached to a number of theological writings of unknown origin. These were destined to exert a great influence over medieval thought. The writings of the Pseudo-Areopagite are: (1) Concerning the Celestial Hierarchy; (2) Concerning the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy; (3) Concerning Divine Names; (4) Concerning Mystic Theology, and (5) ten letters addressed to various worthies of great interest, first as a striking presentation of the heterogeneous elements that might unite the mind of a gifted man in the fifth century, and secondly because of their enormous influence upon subsequent Christian theology and art. Their ingredients—Christian, Greek, Persian and Jewish—are united into an organic system, not crudely mingled. Perhaps theological philosophic fantasy has never constructed anything more remarkable.

The writer owed his constructive principles to Hellenism in its last great philosophical creation, Neo-Platonism, since the general principle of the transmission of life from the ultimate Source downward through orders of mediating beings unto men might readily be adapted to the Christian God and his ministering angels. Pseudo-Dionysius had lofty thoughts of the sublime transcendence of the ultimate divine Source. That Source was not remote or inert; but a veritable Source from which life streamed to all lower order of existence—in part directly, and in part indirectly as power and guidance through the higher orders to the lower. Life, creation, every good gift, is from God directly; but his flaming ministers also intervene to guide and aid the life of man; and the life which through love floods forth from God has its counter flow whereby it draws its own creations to itself. God is at once absolutely transcendent and universally immanent. To live is to be united with God; evil is the non-existent, that is, severance from God.

The transcendent Source, as well as the universal immanence, is the Triune God. Between that and men are ranged the three triads of the celestial hierarchy: Seraphim, Cherubim and Thrones; Dominations, Virtues, Powers; Principalities, Archangels, Angels. Collectively their general office is to raise mankind to God through purification, illumination and perfection; and to all may be applied the term angel. The highest triad, which is nearest God, contemplates the divine effulgence, and reflects it onward to the second; the third, and more specifically angelic triad, immediately ministers to men. The sources of these names are evident: seraphim and cherubim are from the Old Testament; later Jewish writings gave names to archangels and angels, who also fill important functions in the New Testament. The other names are from Paul (Eph. 1:21; Col. 1:16).

Such is the system of Pseudo-Dionysius, as presented mainly in The Celestial Hierarchy. That work is followed by The Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, its counterpart on earth. What the primal Triune Godhead is to the former, Jesus is to the latter. The ecclesiastical hierarchy likewise is composed of triads. The first includes the symbolic sacraments: Baptism, Communion, Consecration of the Holy Chrism. Baptism signifies purification; Communion signifies enlightening; the Holy Chrism signifies perfecting. The second is made up of three orders of Bishops, Presbyters and Deacons, or rather, as the Areopagite names them, Hierarchs, who are in a state of perfection, the initiated laity, who are in a state of illumination, and the catechumens, in a state of purification. All worship, in this treatise, is a celebration of mysteries, and the pagan mysteries are continually suggested.

Concerning the Divine Names is a discussion of the qualities that may be predicated of God, according to the warrant of the terms applied to him in Scripture. Concerning Mystic Theology explains the function of symbols, and shows that he who would know God truly must rise above them.

The fifteenth chapter of The Celestial Hierarchy constituted the canon of symbolical angelic lore for the literature and art of the Middle Ages.

, the bishop, who was sent there by the apostles, because of their preaching, it received the holy gospels of Christ. There also Saint Dionysius earned his crown of martyrdom. This city is adorned with the holiness of Bathildis, the queen, and Aurea the virgin, and many other martyrs.

CITY OF PARIS

7.5" x 8-3/4"

The City of Paris, or as the ancients knew it, 'Lutetia Parisiorum,' is represented by a woodcut here used for the first time. In the earlier part of the Chronicle it was suggested that rulers were in the habit of setting up statues of themselves in the public squares of the cities that they founded. And since this is the City of Paris, we may assume that the warrior we see on the high pedestal towering over the city in the public square is none other than the beautiful Trojan shepherd lad who favored Venus and who later left his utterly destroyed home town to found a city of his own liking and of his own name. True, he had gotten beyond the shepherd boy stage, and now appears in the high place, accoutered cap-a-pie, a lance with flowing pennant in his right hand, his left grasping his trusty sword, and his visor fully drawn. If he was beaten at Troy, he does not look the worse for the wear, and he is still too active for the confines of a pedestal.

Yes, this must be Paris, for in the foreground is the Seine, which the ancients called the Sequana. And resting on its marcelled waves is a sturdy bulging galleon. And there is activity on board. A crew of three men is working on the sails. Apparently the ship is ready to dock, and out of the city gate comes a lone inhabitant to bid the craft and crew a welcome.

The town is well protected by walls, turrets and battlements. The citadel appears in the elevated background. In a way, as one follows the course of the water about the walls, it does seem that this must be the Île de la Cité, the natural stronghold upon which ancient Lutetia sprang up. Paris was at first a fortified town of the Gallic tribe of the Parisii. During the first century CE we hear of it as a Roman town. The island was originally half its present size. It was not a normal site for a town, and could only have been selected for defensive reasons. The old town of Lutetia was destroyed by the barbarian invasions of the third century, but reappeared toward the end of the century on its original site. The stronghold was built for protection against the dangers of the time, for it lay on the route followed by barbarians on their way from the north to the south.

In the fifth century the Franks made themselves masters of Paris. Under Clovis they were converted to Christianity. He established his capital at Paris and built a church or two. Many more churches were built in the following centuries. They were particularly numerous in the Île de la Cité. And so we suppose the artist was justified in dominating his landscape with an imposing Gothic cathedral, and not far from it another church of the same type. According to the usual trend of the times private dwellings are clustered about these religious establishments, while in the distance we see patches of land, possibly cultivated areas, vineyards and meadows, amidst a setting of barren rock and a few clumps of trees.

Folio XXXIX verso

Mainz (Maguncia), a city and archbishopric of Germany, was begun at the time of the destruction of Troy, by Maguntius, a Trojan, after whom the city was named. So Carinus states in his Chronicles. It is located on the river Rhine. Drusus Nero, who is called Germanicus after the German nation, greatly enhanced the reputation of this city and the praise bestowed upon it during the time he was conducting a war against the German states beyond the Rhine. A horse fell upon him and broke his leg, and he died thirty days later. Nero Claudius having heard of his brother's illness, came at once; and he took his corpse to Rome. It was laid in the grave of Julius, the emperor. The great deeds performed by Drusus Nero on the Rhine are mentioned by Tacitus and other historians. [Nero Claudius Drusus was the son of Tiberius Claudius Nero and Livia, and he was the stepson of Augustus, and the younger brother of the emperor Tiberius. From youth he was liked by the people. His manners were affable, his conduct beyond reproach. He was greatly trusted by Augustus, who employed him in important offices. He carried on the war against the Germans and penetrated far into the interior. In the year 12 CE he drove the Sicambri and their allies out of Gaul, crossed the Rhine, followed the river down to the ocean, and subdued the Frisians. Three succeeding campaigns brought him to the river Elbe. He resolved to cross it but is said to have been deterred by the apparition of a woman of unusual stature, who, speaking to him in Latin, said: "Where are you going, insatiable Drusus? The fates forbid you to advance. Away! The end of your deeds and of your life is near." On the return of the army to the Rhine, Drusus died of a fractured leg, which happened through a fall from his horse. Upon receiving news of the serious illness of Drusus, Tiberius immediately crossed the Alps, and after traveling with extraordinary speed, arrived in time to close the eyes of his brother. He brought the body to Italy where it was burned in the field of Mars, and the ashes deposited in the tomb of Augustus. Germanicus Caesar, the Roman general and provincial governor, was his son. The name Germanicus, the only one by which he was known in history, he inherited from his father. He was adopted by his uncle Tiberius, with whom he fought against the Germans]. At Mainz are to be found good specimens of antiquity. Some say that this city was completed by Paulinus Pompeius, the Roman commander of the forces in Germany under Nero, the emperor. The archbishop of this city aids in the election of the Roman emperor [Paulinus Pompeius had command of the Roman forces in Germany in 58 CE. Seneca dedicated to him his treatise]. The city has in it (the body of) the most holy man, Albanus the martyr. Not far removed from Mainz is Frankfurt, the noble industrial center, where the upper and lower Germans meet twice a year. And there also the emperor is elected according to ancient custom. The river Main flows by it. Ptolemy calls it the Obrigma. He states that this river separates the High Germans from the Low Germans, and there is no other river that makes such a division. Even today the Low Germans extend to Mainz, while beyond this point the inhabitants are called High Germans. The river has its source in the mountains near Bohemia, and from the region of Mainz it flows into the Rhine. Some believe that Mainz was named after the river. In this city are to be seen large open courts and buildings in the Roman style as well as many other ruins and relics of war.

Mainz was a pre-Roman settlement, and there Drusus, the stepson of Augustus, erected a fortified camp about 13 BCE. The castellum Mattiacorum (the modern Castel) on the opposite bank, was afterwards added to it, the two being connected with a bridge at the opening of the Christian era. The earlier name became latinized as Maguntiacum, Moguntiacum, Maguncia and Maguntia, and a town gradually arose around the camp, which became the capital of Germania Superior. At certain times Mainz suffered severely, being destroyed on different occasions by the Alamanni, the Vandals and the Huns. Charlemagne, who had a palace in the neighborhood, gave privileges to Mainz, which rose rapidly in wealth and importance.

In 1244 certain rights of self-government were given to the citizens of Mainz; and in 1254 it was the center and mainspring of a powerful league of Rhenish towns. According to legend the first bishop of Mainz was a disciple of the Apostle Paul. He preached among the Roman battalions about the year 82 while they were stationed here, and here he died a martyr. In 1462 there was warfare between two rival archbishops. The citizens, having espoused the losing cause, were deprived of their privileges. Many were driven into exile, and these carried into other lands knowledge of the art of printing which had been invented at Mainz by Johann Gutenberg in 1450. Mainz still retains many relics of the Roman period, notably the Eigelstein, believed to have been erected by Roman legions to Drusus.

CITY OF MAINZ (MAGUNCIA)

7-3/4" x 8-3/4"

This landscape, representing the ancient city of Mainz, is here used for the first time. We are on the river Main, which appears to have a very strong current at this point. A delicate young lad is ferrying three passengers across the river in a rather fantastic boat. Other and larger craft appear in the background.

Christianity was introduced into Mainz in the middle of the eighth century under Boniface. The city became an archbishopric, and to this the primacy of Germany was soon annexed. Considering its ecclesiastical distinction, it is only fair and just that this ancient archepiscopal city should be well supplied with cathedrals and churches. Of these, two appear behind the battlements, occupying the greater part of the town. In the year 1160 the citizens of Mainz revolted against their archbishop and three years later the walls of the city were pulled down by order of Frederick I. But here we see them restored, tightly girding the city about. From the farther side of the walls roads lead into the hills and rocky country in the distance.

Along the river runs a road or natural wharf, and there lie nine barrels awaiting shipment. These barrels or casks were of much importance to merchants in the days when the Chronicle was written. One of the most serious difficulties with which shippers had to contend was inclement weather. Although the roads were not always passable, commerce encountered little difficulty on the main highways. The most serious problem was to keep merchandise dry and free from weather damage, for it had to be carted great distances on wagons that did not give sufficient protection against the elements. For instance, carters required five weeks to make the journey from Nuremberg to Basle and return, sometimes longer, depending on the season of the year and weather conditions. It was necessary to wrap each piece of merchandise separately.

Anton Koberger, publisher of the Chronicle, carried on an extensive book business. Shipping cases were not suitable for this class of merchandise, as they did not keep out rain and moisture. On the other hand, barrels were readily obtainable, were generally well made and water proof. They were easy to open, without damage to the container, and could therefore be used again and again, unless, perhaps, they were broken open by highwaymen.

It is not difficult to imagine that some of these barrels lying on the wharf may have come from or were destined to Nuremberg; for in such containers it was the custom of the Kobergers to ship their wares, and in such containers the Chronicle itself was no doubt originally distributed to its first purchasers all over the continent of Europe by wagons.

It was in the city of Mainz that Johann Gutenberg was born in the year 1397, almost a century before the advent of the great picture book of the late Middle Ages, the Nuremberg Chronicle. Here he invented the art of printing by moveable type in the year 1450, and here he died in 1458, thirty-five years before the Chronicle was published.

Folio XL recto

Here sprang up the kingdom of the Lacedaemonians, and there Eurystheus (Euristeus) first reigned for 42 years.

Boaz (Boos), the son of Salmon, was born in the 48th year of his father, and in the 3775th year of the world.

Here began the kingdom of the Corinthians, and there first reigned Aletes (Atlethes), a warlike man and conqueror. As he was a powerful man, and saw that by force or counsel he could sway the people as he wished, he took it upon himself to become their ruler.

It is to be noted that in the Gospels a gap occurs between Boaz and Obed (Obeth), for between them elapsed 272 years, which cannot be covered by but one person. Therefore Boaz occurs five times. Nicholas de Lyra says that in truth there were three Boaz's who followed one after the other, for such a situation is not to be found in credible and orderly history. However, it is certain that between the beginning of the judgeship of Joshuah, when Salmon espoused Rahab who bore Boaz, up to the time of David's birth 367 years elapsed, during which time three generations are mentioned by the evangelists. [See remarks on the Illustrations following].

Ruth was of the tribe of the Moabites. She took for her husband a man named Mahlon (Maalon). He was a Jew and native of Bethlehem. His father was named Elimelech and his mother Naomi (Noemi). Because of a famine in her country, Naomi with her two sons, wandered into the land of the Moabites. Her son Chilion (Chelion) married Orpah (Orpbam), and her son Mahlon married Ruth. After the lapse of seventeen years Elimelech and his two sons died. In bitter sorrow over her misfortune, Naomi decided to return to Judah, her native land. But her daughters-in-law were not willing to have her leave them. But as Ruth was not willing to remain, Naomi took her along to Judah. And as they came into Bethlehem, Boaz, the friend of Elimelech, took them into his house. Now as Boaz, after a time learned that Ruth was the widow of his departed friend, and as he himself had no wife, he took her to wife according to the laws of Moses. A year thereafter she bore him a son. And Naomi took him and named him Obed, because she became his nurse in her old age. And to Obed was afterward born Jesse, from whom was born David. [See Book of Ruth 1-4. In the German edition of the this paragraph and the preceding one are switched].

ILLUSTRATIONS

(A) EURYSTHEUS AND ALETES

Eurystheus (Euristeus) is here represented in a small woodcut, with crown, orb and scepter. It is the same woodcut that represents Baleus at Folio XXXVII recto, in the Lineage of the Assyrian Kings. For earlier remarks on Eurystheus, see Lacedaemonia (Folio XXVIII verso, and notes).

Aletes, son of Hippotes, and a descendant of Hercules, is said to have taken possession of Corinth.

(C) GENEALOGY OF RUTH

The Genealogy of Ruth begins with Elimelech and his spouse Naomi, and proceeds downward to their two sons, Chilion and Mahlon, beside whom is his wife Ruth. To the right of Ruth is her second husband, Boaz. The group is represented by a single woodcut 7½" x 3¼".

Folio XL verso

These four (referring to the opposite portraits of Zerariah (Zaraya), Meraioth (Meyraioth), Amariah (Amarias), and Ahitub (Ahitob)), placed in the Priestly Lineage, were not high priests or bishops, but Zadok (Sadoch) descended from them, and was placed in the priestly office by Solomon after the previous deposition of Yathar (Ithamar?) from the priesthood; and therefore he was the last of the line of Ithamar (Ythamar).

The Priestly Lineage, as portrayed and set forth in the Chronicle is based on the text of Ezra 7:1-6:

Now after these things, in the reign of Artaxerxes, king of Persia, Ezra the son of Seraiah, the son of Azariah, the son of Hilkiah, the son of Shallum, the son of Zadok, the son of Ahitub, the son of Amariah, the son of Azariah, the son of Meraioth, the son of Zerariah, the son of Uzzi, the son of Bukki, the son of Abishua, the son of Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron the high priest; this Ezra went up from Babylon; and he was a ready scribe in the law of Moses, etc.

Reversing the order and beginning with Aaron, we have the following: Aaron and Eleazar at Folio XXIX verso; Phinehas (Phinees), Abishua (Abysue), Bukki (Booz or Buuzz), and Uzzi (Ozy) at Folio XXXVII verso; Zerariah (Zeraya), Meraioth (Meyraioth), Azariah (whom the chronicler omits), Amariah (Amarias) and Ahitub (Ahitob), at Folio XL verso. This leaves out of account the initial series of priestly portraits shown at Folio XXV verso, covering Levi and his three sons Merari, Gershon and Kohath.

It will also be noted that the name of Azariah occurs twice in the biblical text; which, however, is not an error or inconsistency, as a succeeding descendant often bore the same name as one of his ancestors. It must therefore be assumed that this is an omission on the part of the chronicler in providing no portrait or text for Azariah.

Jephthah (Iepte), an illegitimate prince of murderers, was made a captain by the Gileadites to fight the Ammonites. So to begin with, Jephthah sent his messengers to the Ammonite king to ascertain why he was coming into the land of the Israelites, which land had been given them by God. But the king would not hearken unto Jephthah. And Jephthah made a vow that whosoever should come forth from his house to meet him in the event of his victorious return, him he would sacrifice (to the Lord). Then he went forth against the Ammonites, and defeated them. When he returned, his virgin daughter came out to meet him with timbrels and dances. But to keep his oath he sacrificed her, acting unkindly and as a fool in the matter of the vow. Jephthah was the seventh judge of Israel, and he judged for six years. [This is the story of Jephthah as recorded in Judges 11:1-40. He is spoken of simply as "the Gileadite," and as being "a man of mighty valor." He is said to have been "the son of a harlot," for which cause he was driven from his home in Gilead by his brethren. Thereupon he gathered a band of followers and led the life of a freebooter in the land of Tob. When Gilead was threatened by the Ammonites, the people begged him to return and defend his country. This he engaged to do upon condition that he be made a chief or king of the people should he return victorious. And to this the Gileadites agreed. And the "spirit of the Lord" came upon Jephthah, and on his way to battle he made the vow that should he return victorious, he would offer up to the Lord as a thanksgiving, whomsoever should come out of his house to welcome him. Upon his return his daughter came forth to meet him with timbrels and dances. She was his only child. And he was seized with horror and grief, and rent his clothes, for he could not forego his vow. When she learned of this she begged for a respite of two months in order to go into the mountains and 'bewail her virginity.' When she returned, Jephthah fulfilled his vow. The story is of interest because it may give some evidence of at least one undeniably repugnant aspect of the ancient religion among the Israelites—the sacrifice of human beings in times of special stress. The words 'bemoaning her virginity,' are added to the story to lay stress upon the fact that if Jephthah's daughter had had a husband, or had been a mother, her father would have had no control over her; since in the one case her husband would have been her sole possessor, and, in the other, she could have claimed protection from the father of the child, whether the latter was alive or not]. Thereafter Abesson (Ibzan) of Bethlehem, judged for seven years, and he was the eighth judge; and he had thirty sons and many daughters. Thereafter Abialon (Elon), the 9th judge, was judge for ten years; and after him Abdon for eight years. He had forty sons and was the tenth judge. [This is the Lineage of the Judges according to Judges 12:7-14: And after him Ibzan of Bethlehem judged Israel. And he had 30 sons, and 30 daughters, whom he sent abroad and took in 30 daughters from abroad for his sons. And he judged Israel 7 years. Then died Ibzan and was buried at Bethlehem. And after him Elon, a Zebulonite, judged Israel; and he judged Israel 10 years. . . . And after him Abdon, the son of Hillel, a Pirathonite, judged Israel. And he had 40 sons and 30 nephews that rode on threescore and ten ass colts: And he judged Israel 8 years.]

Carthage, the greatly renowned city in Africa, derived its name from a little town called Cartha. And among the Greeks it is written KAPXHΔQN. It was first built by Dido Beli (generally known as Queen Dido), daughter of (Belus) the king of Tyre, 73 years before Rome was built. Prior to that time the city was called Byrsa, which signifies bull's hide. For the said Dido purchased from King Hiarbas for the purpose of building the city as much ground as might be covered by the hide of a bull. As Virgil states, she caused this hide to be cut up into the narrowest strips possible, and with them she enclosed a large area of land. And so this city derived its name Byrsa from this hide. However, later it was called Carthage. Cicero writes that the city was named after a woman whose name was Carthago. Pliny states that the city was at war with Rome for 120 years, and often destroyed and built up again. Because of its antiquity, greatness and splendor, this renowned city is highly regarded among all the cities of Africa and Spain. [Spain is undoubtedly injected into the text of the at this point in deference to Carthago Nova (New Carthage), a city on the eastern coast of Hispania Terraconensis, founded by Carthaginians under Hasdrubal in 243 BCE, and subsequently conquered by the Romans. It was situated on a promontory extending out into the sea, and in ancient times New Carthage was one of the most important cities in all Spain. The city was most strongly fortified and had in its immediate vicinity the richest silver mines of Spain, employing 40,000 men. The city was one of Ptolemy's points of recorded astronomical observation]. At the time of its first destruction, Scipio the Younger, stormed the city for six successive days and nights, and finally forced it to capitulate, and upon condition that the survivors might serve as slaves. In this war it is said 25,000 women and 30,000 men were slain. Hasdrubal the king threw his wife, himself and his children into the very midst of the flames, which raged for sixteen consecutive days. And the lamentations and misery were so great (as Livy states from observation) that even the enemy was moved to sympathy. And so was Carthage, together with its walls, destroyed 668 years after it was built. Twenty-two years later the Romans undertook to rebuild the city and many Roman citizens were sent there. But in a short time fire burst from Mount Aetna, and the city was burned by hot ashes. To replace the loss the Romans exempted the city from taxes for a period of ten years. In the course of a number of years, Carthage also suffered greatly at the hands of the Goths. Finally it fell into the hands of the Moors (Arabs), and until this time it has been a royal city. According to their tongue it is now called Tunis (Tunicium). [According to the old chroniclers Dido, or Elissa, the daughter of a king of Tyre, escaped from the power of her brother Pygmalion with the treasures for the sake of which he had murdered her husband, and with a band of noble Tyrians who shared her flight. Having touched at Cyprus, and carried from there eighty maidens to be the wives of her followers in their future home, she arrived at a spot on the coast of Africa marked out by nature for the site of a mighty city. She entered into a treaty with the natives, and purchased from them for an annual tribute as much land as could be covered with a bull's hide, but craftily cut the hide into the narrowest strips possible, and so enclosed the area on which she built the city, which afterwards as the place grew, became a citadel, and retained in its name Byrsa, the memory of a bargain, which, however mythical, has many a counterpart for deceitfulness in later times. And Carthage grew by the influx of colonists from the surrounding country. Its growing prosperity excited the envy of Hiarbas (Virgil calls him Iarbas), king of the Libyans, who offered Dido the choice of war or marriage. Debarred from the latter alternative by her vow of fidelity to her late husband, but urged to embrace it by the importunities of her people, she stabbed herself to death before their eyes on a funeral pyre that she had erected to her husband's honor. In Virgil's (especially books 2, 4, and 6), Dido commits suicide in the same way, but only after being betrayed by Aeneas. Immediately after her death the Carthaginians enrolled her among their deities].

By a narrow vertical panel four portraits of minor priests or bishops are added to the Priestly Lineage, concerning whom the text has nothing to offer except that they are the lineal bridge to Zadok, of whom we are to hear in the future.

(B) CARTHAGO (CARTHAGE)

The City of Carthage is represented by a woodcut 4¾" x 6¾". True to actual location the city appears to be situated on a peninsula extending into the Mediterranean Sea. It is surrounded by a wall, whose main gateway is in the foreground. In the background, high up on a hill, is what we may suppose to be the original citadel, or Byrsa, about which the city was originally built in the days of Dido. A temple with a dome appears at the left (probably Roman), while at the right we observe a square church tower and minaret. May we not assume that this diversity in architecture is intended to reflect the succeeding hostile occupations to which Carthage was subjected in her long and unfortunate struggle with her rivals and invaders! In a war beginning in 149 BCE and lasting three years, Carthage was utterly destroyed by the Romans. For thirty years it remained in ruins until a colony was established on the old site by the Gracchi; but this remained in feeble condition until the time of Julius and Augustus, under whom a new city was built south of the former on the southeasterly side of the peninsula, with the name of Colonia Carthago. It rapidly grew in extent and covered a great part (if not the whole) of the site of the ancient Tyrian city. It became the first city of Africa, and it occupied an important place in ecclesiastical as well as civil history. It was taken by the Vandals in 439 CE, retaken by Belisarius (Justinian's military commander) in 533 CE, and destroyed by the Arab conquerors in 698 CE.

Folio XLI recto

Saul, the first king of the Jews, a son of Cis (Kish) out of the tribe of Benjamin, was chosen king by the Lord in the 12th year of Samuel; and with Samuel he reigned 26 years. Although he was a good man in the beginning, he later scorned God's commandments. Originally a king, he afterward became a tyrant and oppressor of his subjects. Finally after many persecutions and pursuits against David, he fought with the Palestinians (Philistines) on Mount Gelboe (Gilboa), and there his army was defeated and he himself was severely wounded. He voluntarily fell upon his naked sword and died. Seeing this, his armor-bearer also killed himself. [Now the Philistines fought against Israel; and the men of Israel fled before the Philistines, and fell down slain on Mount Gilboa. And the Philistines followed hard upon Saul and upon his sons; and the Philistines slew Jonathan, and Abinadab, and Melchi-shua, Saul's sons. And the battle went badly against Saul, and the archers hit him; and he was badly wounded by the archers. Then said Saul to his armor-bearer, Draw your sword and thrust me through with it lest these uncircumcised men come and thrust me through and abuse me. But his armor-bearer would not; for he was very afraid. Therefore Saul took a sword and fell upon it. And when his armor-bearer saw that Saul was dead, he fell likewise upon his sword and died with him. (I Samuel 31:1-6)]

As David presented himself to Saul in the presence of his son Jonathan, Jonathan entered into a great friendship with David, and he gave him all his clothes to wear. [When David made an end of speaking to Saul, the soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David, and Jonathan was knit with the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him. And Jonathan and David made a covenant. And Jonathan stripped himself of the robe that was upon him and gave it to David and his garments, even to his sword, his bow, and his girdle. (I Samuel 18:1-4)] Now as Saul and David returned to Jerusalem, the maidens came to meet them, and they said, Saul has slain thousands, and David ten thousands. And Saul became sad with envy and was concerned that his kingdom might pass from him to David. So one day, when David was playing on his harp before Saul, Saul attempted to run him through with a javelin [I Samuel 18:6-11]. But thereafter he made him a captain over his men of arms, and promised to give him his daughter Michal for wife, if he would bring him one hundred foreskins of the Philistines. But it was really Saul's intention to have David slain by the Philistines. However, David agreed and he brought two hundred foreskins, and the two hundred he killed in a righteous war, for they were the enemies of the people of Israel. [I Samuel 18:12-27]. And now Jonathan reconciled David and Saul. [I Samuel 19:1-7]. But as David afterward defeated the Philistines with great loss, Saul again tried to kill him with his javelin; but David again escaped the thrust and fled to his house. Thereupon Saul sent his messengers to capture David and to slay him. But Michal, his wife, let him down through a window. When Saul learned that David was with Samuel at Aioth (Naioth) he three times sent many and various messengers to take David. And when they arrived and found the prophets with Samuel and David, they too prophesied with them and praised God. And finally Saul himself came there, and he prophesied with them, stripping himself naked. [I Samuel 19:8-24].

During the judgments of Abesson (Ibzan), Abylon (Elon), and Abdon times were peaceful and nothing of note occurred in Israel. But mark you that although the 70 interpreters say nothing of this Abylon, nor of the time when there were no judges, they add to the time of Joshua those whose judgements were uneventful according to the Hebrew truth; and so you should keep the years closely in mind, or you will err.

When Ulysses (As Augustine and Boethius write) returned from the Trojan War, he sailed the seas aimlessly for ten years. Finally he came to an island near Italy with a single ship. And on the island lived Circe, the sorceress, a very beautiful woman. She was called a daughter of the Sun. By means of her magic arts she prepared a potion by means of which she at will metamorphosed those who drank it from human beings into beasts. And she handed the drink to the companions of Ulysses, and metamorphosed one into a wild boar, another into a lion, and another into a deer. But Mercury had given Ulysses a flower to counteract the sprits of sorcery. And as they did not harm him, he forced Circe with drawn sword to reconvert his companions into their former state. Solinus writes that Ulysses built the city of Ulixbonam [Lisbon]. in Spain, which was named for him. [Ulysses, Ulyxes or Ulises, as the Latin writers call him (Odysseus in Greek), was one of the principal Greek heroes of the Trojan War. His career is well known through the classics. However, no part of his adventures are so celebrated in ancient story as his wanderings after the destruction of Troy, and his ultimate return to Ithaca, which form the subject of the Homeric poem called after him the . After the taking of Troy one portion of the Greeks sailed away, and another with Agamemnon remained behind on the Trojan coast. Odysseus at first joined the former, but when he had sailed as far as Tenedos, he returned to Agamemnon. Afterwards, however, he determined to sail home, and in the course of that voyage he had many experiences and adventures. At one time he arrived at the island of Aeolus, probably in the south of Sicily, where he stayed one month. On his departure Aeolus provided him with a bag of winds, which were to carry him home, but his companions opened the bag, and the winds escaped; immediately after which the ships were driven back to the island of Aeolus, who was indignant, and refused all further assistance. After a voyage of six days he arrived at the city of Lamus, in which Antiphates ruled over a sort of cannibals. Odysseus escaped from them with one ship, and his fate now carried him to a western island, Aea, inhabited by the sorceress Circe. A part of his people was sent to explore the island, but Circe changed them into swine. Eurylochus alone escaped, and brought the sad news to Odysseus, who, when he was hastening to the assistance of his friends, was instructed by Hermes by what means he could resist the magic powers of Circe. He succeeded in liberating his companions, who were again changed into men, and were most hospitably treated by the sorceress, with whom he and his men spent one year].

ILLUSTRATIONS

(A) LINEAGE OF THE JUDGES

To the Lineage of the Judges which began at Folio XXX recto, with Joshua, and continued with Deborah at Folio XXXVII verso, is now added a third panel (2-1/4" x 9-7/8") consisting of four additional portraits. Although the last three figures on the panel are mentioned in the text on the same page, all four are specifically treated on the verso of the opposite folio.

(B) SAUL, FIRST KING OF ISRAEL

Saul, the first king of Israel, is honored in a full-length portrait (2" x 6½"). The doughty king is confined to a rather restricted area. He wears an ornate foliated crown, which has a diameter equal to the length of his shinbone. He is attired in an embroidered medieval coat. His head is large, and his flowing mane and heavy beard remind one of the classic conception of Jupiter. But looking again we see that one eye is wide upon, the other almost closed—and we think of the one-eyed Wotan. In his right hand he carries his trusty javelin that David had so much difficulty in dodging. Suspended from his belt is a scimitar. The king does not take a very firm stand, and his knotty extremities would seem to have some difficulty in sustaining the royal dignity. Although otherwise well accoutered, the subject appears to be unshod.

(C) CIRCE AND ULYSSES

Ulysses, looking rather wearied and troubled, is seated in the last ship that has survived the tribulations of his navy on the homeward voyage after the siege of Troy. He is off the coast of the magic island of Aeaea, abode of Circe, the sorceress. The lady herself is seated at the table on the beach. Although a meal seems to be in progress we see only one plate, a knife, and salt and pepper shakers to entice the guests. Circe herself, in high medieval headdress, holds in her left hand, probably to indicate her calling, a wand, to which she points with her right hand to make sure that you will take note of that powerful instrument. A younger woman, probably a maid or attendant, is walking to the water's edge, carrying the potion which brought about the transformation in the companions of Ulysses; for in the hold of the ship, we see not mariners but a cargo of animals (an ass, a lion, a ram, etc.). Although the drink is just being offered, and one of the crew is reaching out for it, the metamorphosis is already complete; and so the artist has anticipated the effect of the draught. But Ulysses, quietly seated on the upper deck, has not been affected; and in his hand he holds the flower given him by the kindly Mercury to counteract the evil arts of Circe.

Folio XLI verso

Eli (Heli), the priest and judge, had two sons, Hophni (Ophni) and Phinehas (Phinees); and because he was negligent in the discipline and punishment of his sons, he himself was punished by the Lord; for when he learned of the defeat of both his sons, and the capture of the ark, he fell from his seat, broke his neck, and died of pain at the age of ninety-eight years. [Eli was a descendant of Ithamar the fourth son of Aaron, and successor of Abdon as high priest and judge of Israel. His two sons, Hophni and Phinehas were temple priests in name, but at heart "sons of Belial;" for they knew not the Lord. The meat offerings brought by the people they appropriated to themselves for the gratification of their own appetites. In consequence of his negligence and injudicious management of his sons, Eli suffered punishment at the hands of the Lord. The judgments to be visited upon him were disclosed to him by Samuel, and they came to pass twenty-seven years later. His sons were slain in battle with the Philistines, into whose hands the ark of God also fell at the same time. The aged priest, then in his 98th year, was overwhelmed when these calamities were made known to him, and he fell backward from his seat and broke his neck (I Samuel 2:12-17; 3:13-14; 4:12-18)].

Samson, the twelfth and last judge of Israel, judged for twenty years. Among the Hebrews he was the strongest. His birth was prophesied to Manoah, his father, through an angel, [The circumstances attending the annunciation of Samson's birth are to be found in Judges 13:3-24: "And the angel of the Lord appeared to the woman and said to her, Behold, now you are barren, and bear not; but you shall conceive, and bear a son. Now therefore, beware, I pray you, and drink not wine or strong drink, and eat not any unclean thing; For see, you shall conceive and bear a son; and no razor shall come on his head, for the child shall be a Nazarite to God from the womb, and he shall begin to deliver Israel out of the hands of the Philistines . . . And the woman bore a son, and called his name Samson."] and he was given a wife out of the city of Timnath (Thamna). [This woman was a daughter of the Philistines, the uncircumcised; and such marriages were prohibited among the Israelites. Samson married her against the customary law and over the objections of his parents]. There he gave thirty youths a riddle to solve, which through the secret information given them by the cunning of this woman, they were able to do. He burned the fruit trees of the enemy with torches attached to the tails of foxes. He slew a thousand men with the jawbone of an ass, out of which the Lord caused water to flow to satisfy his thirst.

On his way to Timnath to fetch his bride, Samson slew a lion, and afterward found in its carcass a swarm of bees, and he ate of the honey and took some to his parents. This occurrence gave rise to a riddle that he propounded at his marriage feast: "Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness." Unable to solve the riddle within the three days allotted, Samson's thirty companions resorted to his wife who, by the most urgent entreaties had obtained from him the solution. By cruel threats they extorted the secret from her, and gave him the answer. Although he kept his word and awarded the prizes he had offered, it was at the expense of the lives of thirty of their countrymen. He also forsook the wife who had been false to him. (Judges 14:5-20) he caught 300 foxes, joined their tails together in pairs, with firebrands between, and let them loose in the fields and vineyards of the Philistines, spreading fire and desolation over the country. To avenge themselves they set fire to the house where his former wife lived, and she and her father were burned in it. This again drew Samson's vengeance. Finding a new jawbone of an ass, he slew 1,000 Philistines with it. "And he was very thirsty and called on the Lord, and said, You have given this great deliverance into the hand of your servant; and now shall I die of thirst, and fall into the hands of the uncircumcised? But God split open a hollow place that was in the jaw, and water came out from it; and when he had drunk, his spirit came again." (Judges 15:1-8).

Finally, his hair, in which his strength was lodged, was cut off through the cunning of Delilah. He was taken prisoner by the Philistines and robbed of his eyesight. However, as his hair grew again and his strength was restored, he broke down the pillars of the house in which the princes and many people were assembled; and the house fell upon the princes and upon himself, and three thousand people were killed as a result of that; and there were more dead than living. And he was buried in his father's grave. [Samson attached himself to Delilah, a mercenary woman who discovered that the secret of his strength lay in his hair. And the Philistines came upon Samson while he was asleep, cut off his hair, put out his eyes, carried him to Gaza and imprisoned him. They were having a feast, and, to add to the merriment, had Samson brought in and seated between the two main pillars of the house, where the nobles and many people were assembled. He laid hold of the pillars and pushed with all his might. The entire structure thus collapsed, burying both Samson and the Philistines. (Judges 16:1-31)].

Ahitub (Ahitob) the son of Phinehas, was the father of Ahimelech. Saul slew him, together with his entire house, because of David. [Ahimelech, the son of Ahitub, and his successor in the priesthood, gave David some of the show-bread and the sword of Goliath, when he fled from Saul. For this offense he and all the priest of Nob were slain by Saul].

Eli (Hely) was a judge after Samson, and also a priest. Because of the more worthy office of priest, he was not called a judge, but a priest. When the priesthood was diverted from the sons of Eleazar, Eli, first of the sons of Ithamar, attained the priesthood; and as he was a judge, he may have passed on the office to himself. However, he began to judge in the 356th year from the time of exodus from Egypt; being the year 861 in the third age of Abraham, and of the age of the world the 2,809th; and he judged forty years. During this time occurred the story of Ruth, as previously related.

Samuel, the holiest prophet of the Lord, a priest and judge of the Hebrews, ruled the people of the Lord forty years after Eli. He was the son of the man called Elkanah (Helcane) and Hannah (Anna), his wife. Elkanah had two wives, Hannah and Peninnah (Phenena). Hannah was barren, but was loved most by her husband. Peninnah gave birth, and therefore she scorned Hannah because of her barrenness. This greatly saddened Hannah; and she went into the temple and made a vow and prayed God to give her a son. And as she prayed as one intoxicated, Eli the priest thought she was drunk and upbraided her. But she meekly excused herself, making her great sorrow known to him. And the Lord listened to her prayer and gave her a son, Samuel the prophet. At the suggestion of the Lord she dedicated him to the tabernacle and allowed him to serve there. And from childhood to maturity he served the Lord worthily.

Samuel, the son of Elkanah and Hannah, was a celebrated Hebrew prophet, and the last of their judges. While a child he officiated in some form in the temple, and was favored with revelations of the divine will respecting the family of Eli, the high priest, under whose care and training his mother had placed him (I Samuel 3:4-14).

After the death of Eli, Samuel was acknowledged as a prophet, and soon commenced a work of reformation. Idolatry was banished, the worship of the true God was restored, and Samuel was publicly recognized as a judge of Israel. Residing on his patrimonial estate in Ramah he made annual circuits throughout the country to administer justice until his infirmities forbade it, and then he deputed to his sons to execute this duty. They proved unworthy of the trust and the dissatisfied people wanted a change of government. They applied to Samuel, who, under divine direction, anointed Saul to be their king, and Samuel resigned his authority to him. After Saul was rejected, Samuel was instructed to anoint David; after which he returned to Ramah, where he died. (I Samuel 12; I Samuel 25:1).

And after having also officiated as a judge of Israel for forty years he died, two years before the passing of Saul. And Israel mourned him as its own father and his body was buried in Ramah (Kamatha).

(A) PRIESTLY LINEAGE (Cont.).

To get our bearings in the Priestly Lineage, let us review: (1) At Folio XXIX verso we began with Aaron, who branched off to Ithamar, whose two sons were consumed by fire. So the office of high priest descended upon Eleazar, his remaining son. At Folio XXXVII verso the lineage was continued through Phinehas, Abishua, Bukki and Uzzi; and at Folio XL verso, Uzzi's descendats, Zeraiah, Meraioth (Azariah was skipped), Amariah and Ahitub were added. Following the text of Ezra 7:1-6, we should now proceed with Zadok, Shallum, Hilkiah, Azariah, Seraiah, finally coming to Ezra. But we do not, and Zadok will not appear until Folio XLVIII recto is reached.

In this new panel (XLI verso) we begin with Eli, who, according to the text, followed the collateral line of Ithamar, when the priesthood was diverted from the sons of Eleazar:

1. Eli (Heli) appears in his high pontificals, with the crescent upon his mitre. He is followed by
2. Phinehas (Phinees), who was already incorporated in the Priestly Line at Folio XXXVII verso, though there represented by a different woodcut. Both portraits give the subject the indicia of a high priest. And so with

3. Ahitub (Achitob), who already appeared in the Priestly Line at Folio XL verso, although represented by an entirely different portrait and not as a high priest, as at present. He is followed by his son
4. Ahimelech, also in his high priestly robes. He has a square bejeweled plate on his mitre, set with gems. His hands are placed together in an attitude of prayer. It was he and his house who were slain by Saul for giving assistance to the hunted David.
5. Abiathar (Abyathar), the last in the panel, holds an open book with both hands. Like Ahimelech, he too has a square bejeweled plate on his mitre, set with gems. He is not mentioned in the text. Abiathar was a son of Ahimelech, who was head of the family of priests in charge of the sanctuary at Nob (I Samuel 21:1). All except Abiathar were massacred by Saul (I Samuel 22:20). When the rest obeyed the king's summons, he may have remained at home to officiate. On hearing of the slaughter he took refuge with David, carrying with him the oracular Ephod. Abiathar and Zadok accompanied the outlaw in his wanderings. During Absalom's rebellion they and their sons rendered yeoman's service to the old king (II Samuel 15:17). Abiathar's adhesion to Adonijah was of great importance, not only because of his position as priest, but also owing to his friendship with king David. Solomon, therefore, as soon as he could safely do it, deposed Abiathar from the priesthood and relegated him to the seclusion of Anathoth. His sons lost the priestly office along with their father.

1. SAMSON
2. ELI
3. SAMUEL
4. ELKANAH, PENINNAH AND HANNAH

The Lineage of the Judges which ended at Folio XLI recto, with Abdon, the last of the minor judges of Israel according to Judges 12:13-15, is here resumed with Samson, whose record occupies several succeeding chapters of the book of Judges.

1. Samson, having failed in his first matrimonial venture (which began with his Philistine courtship at Timnath, and ended with the slaughter of a thousand of his wife's kinsmen with the jawbone of an ass), soon thereafter went to Gaza, and saw there a prostitute; and he went in to her. As soon as the Gazites learned that Samson was among them, they encompassed him, and laid in wait for him all night "in the gate of the city." And Samson lay till midnight, when he arose and took the doors of the gate of the city, and the two posts, and went away with them, bar and all, and put them upon his shoulders, and carried them to the top of a hill (Judges 16:1-3). So here the artist and woodcutter have caught him in his triumphant march. In embroidered and intricate robes, including a great coat, but bareheaded, he gallantly (note the pose that he strikes) steps forward, with the gates on his shoulders. Taken in connection with the biblical text, this is one of the most comical woodcuts in the Chronicle.
2. Eli, who appeared at the head of the priestly line on this page, is now repeated in the Lineage of the Judges, for it will be remembered, he was both priest and judge. Here he appears as "Hely," just below the doughty Samson. He wears a medieval cap and gown, and according to his gestures, is engaged in the argument of some legal question. Below him is
3. Samuel, who is clothed in the same manner as Eli, and engaged in the same pursuit. He branches off from a triple portrait of
4. Elkanah (Helcana) and his two wives: Peninnah (Phenena) and Hannah (Anna). Peninnah is by far the younger of the two women. Both wear voluminous head-dresses, that of the younger woman the more pretentious. Peninnah has her hands folded in prayer, while Hannah holds the genealogical branch that proceeds to her beloved son Samuel. Elkanah is an elderly man and does not seem to feel particularly happy in his dual role of husband. But then, very few people in the Chronicle ever laugh, or even smile. He loved Hannah more than the scoffing Peninnah who bore him a number of children.

Folio XLII recto

Naples (Neapolis) is an old and highly celebrated city of the land of Campania. It was at one time called Parthenope. The city's origin and age are noted by Titus Livius, who writes that the city of Palaepolis was not far from the present site of Naples, and that the same people lived in both places. The city of Palaepolis, which was then in the hands of the Greeks, was conquered by Publius Plautius, the Roman. He occupied a convenient site between that city and Naples, and so prevented them from assisting one another against the enemy. But some write that this royal city was built by Diomedes, the king, in the maritime region, and that after it was subjugated by the Romans, it remained loyal and true to them and to other princes and lords. Yet Livy says that Naples was taken by the Romans with the assistance of the Nolanians; [Nola (Nolannus) was one of the most ancient towns in Campania, 21 miles southeast of Capua. In 327 BCE Nola was sufficiently powerful to send 2000 men to the assistance of Neapolis. In 313 it was taken by the Romans. It remained faithful to the Romans even after the battle of Cannae, when the other Campanian cities revolted to Hannibal, and it was allowed in consequence to retain its own constitution as an ally of the Romans. In the Social War it fell into the hands of the confederates, and when taken by Sulla it was burned to the ground by the Samnite garrison. It was afterward rebuilt and made a Roman colony by Vespasian. According to the ecclesiastical traditions, church bells were invented at Nola, and were for that reason called Campanae]. but that thereafter the Neapolitans nevertheless remained loyal toward the Romans and other lords at all times; for when the Romans were in distress, and the Neapolitans were their enemies, and their assistance was sought by Hannibal, they nevertheless stood by Rome. And afterward the city flourished during all the time that the Roman order of councilors and emperors continued to exist. By reason of its peaceful condition, many brave men sought relief there from their cares, and devoted themselves to luxury and frivolity. Suetonius states that when Nero came from Greece to Naples, he there first introduced the art of music; and that he rode through a breach in the walls with white horses. There also lived learned writers, namely Virgil, Livy, Oratius, and others. Bonifacius VIII and John XXIII, both popes, were born there. For the past 300 years this city has been graced by royalty, and magnificently adorned with many praiseworthy churches and large public buildings, houses, and other structures equal to those of other Italian cities. There is the cloister of Saint Clara, built by a queen, the wife of King Robert of Aragon, and it excels all the cloisters of Italy. Item: A beautiful, well-built Carthusian cloister, named after St. Martin, is located outside the walls. There also is a citadel, called "New Castle," a praiseworthy and memorable work, with its new structures, and which is to be prized over and above the older structures in Italy. I will be silent as to the height, thickness, beauty, breadth and adornment of the gates, walls, palaces, chambers and other structures there. Mount Vesuvius of the land of Campana, which is removed from all other mountains, lies within a thousand paces of this city. It abounds in wines, which are called Greek wines. This same mountain at times has cast out upon itself ashes and sparks, covering the fields to the treetops. In the time of Trajan, Pliny the Second, who wished to view this marvel near at hand, was suffocated by flames.

Naples (Neapolis or Napoli) is located on the western slope of Mt. Vesuvius and was founded by the Chalcidians of Cumae (colonists from the city of Chalcis, on the island of Euboea, in Greece), on the site of an ancient place called Parthenope, after the siren of that name. For that reason we find the town so called by Vergil and Ovid. The year of the foundation of Neapolis is not recorded. It was called the "New City," because it was regarded as a new quarter of the city of Cumae. When the town is first mentioned in Roman history, it consisted of two parts divided from each other by a wall, and called respectively Palaeopolis ("Old City") and Neapolis. This division probably arose after the capture of Cumae by the Samnites, when a large number of the Cumaeans took refuge in the city they had founded. Immediately after which the old quarter was called Palaeopolis, and the new quarter, built to accommodate the new inhabitants, was called Neapolis.

In the year 290 BCE the town passed into the hands of the Romans, who allowed it to retain its Greek constitution. At a later date it became a municipium, and finally a Roman colony. Under the Romans the two quarters of the city were united and the name of Palaeopolis disappeared. It continued prosperous and flourishing until the time of the empire; and its beautiful scenery, and the luxurious life of its Greek population, made it a favorite of residence with many of the Romans. In the reign of Titus it was destroyed by an earthquake, but he rebuilt it in the Roman style. The modern city of Naples does not stand on exactly the same site as Neapolis. The ancient city extended further east. The modern city, on the other hand, extends farther north and west.

ILLUSTRATION CITY OF NAPLES

The Latin edition of the Chronicle has a city image representing Naples that appears for the first time. In the German edition, however, the woodcut that appeared at Folio XXXIX verso, as representative of the city of Mainz, is here repeated.

Folio XLII verso

In the reign of this man (referring to the opposite portrait of Thautanes (Thatanes), a king in the Assyrian Lineage) Troy was destroyed, probably for the first, but not for the second time.

And at this time began the most important period of Greek history and accomplishments. From this point on they wrote their histories, beginning in the first or second year after the defeat and destruction of Troy; and it was in the third year of Abdon, the judge of Israel.

In the Year of the World 4025

In the reign of this Athanis (referring to the opposite portrait of the second king of this branch of the Assyrian Lineage), the Trojan wars are said to have been fought; during which time Mnestheus ruled the Athenians, and Polisides the Sicyonians.

Thineus (referring to the third portrait opposite) was the twenty-eighth king of the Assyrians, and during his reign the kingdom of Sicyonia came to an end, which was also in the time of Eli, the priest; and this kingdom endured 939 years. Thereafter priests, called Carni, were instituted.

Jesse, or Isay, had seven sons and two daughters, whose names are here written (referring to the inscriptions on the portraits).

1. All three kings are conventionally portrayed. Of interest here is that two of the three portraits differ between the Latin and German editions. In the German edition Thautanes is represented by a woodcut that at Folio XXVIII recto represents King Baleus in the Assyrian line.
2. Athanis is represented by the same woodcut that at Folio XXVI recto represents King Aegialeus in the Assyrian line.
3. In the German edition Thineus is represented by the same woodcut that at Folio XXV recto represents King Ninyas in the Assyrian line.

The Lineage of Christ was carried to Boaz at Folio XL recto, and is now resumed with his son Obed, born to him by Ruth. To Obed Jesse was born, and it is with the latter's issue that we are here largely concerned.

Jesse was married to a woman who has been previously married to one Nahash, or had been his concubine. Of this relationship two daughters were born, Abigail and Zeruiah. Abigail married Jether, the Ishmaelite, and bore him a son, Amasa. Zeruiah, the second daughter, also married and begot three sons, Abishai, Asahel and Joab.

To her second husband, Jesse, this same woman, according to I Chronicles 2:12-17, bore seven sons: Eliab, Abinadab, Shammah (Shimma), Nethaneel, Raddai, Ozem and David. It seems there was another, or eighth son, but his name is not given in the Bible.

1. Obed (Obeth), son of Boaz and Ruth, begins this branch of the Lineage of Christ, but is not mentioned in the text. He stands in the cup of a flower as do nearly all the genealogical characters, and from him a branch runs to his son.
2. Jesse (Jessent, also called Abysay), "that Ephrathite of Bethlehem Judah" and man of wealth and position. Jesse was, through David, the ancestor of the Judaic kings, and thus of Christ, and is shown in a dual portrait with his wife. The text speaks of him as "Jessent or Isay." The name "Abysay" appears above the portrait of his wife, but is not intended as her name. The portraits of Obed and Jesse and wife constitute a single woodcut. From Jesse's wife a branch runs to
3. Jether "the Ishmaelite" and Abigail, his wife, a dual portrait, but the branch proceeds to him in stead of her; for Abigail was the daughter of Jesse's wife by a former marriage, as already explained. The pair are printed by a single woodcut. From Abigail a branch proceeds to their son Amasa; also shown by a single woodcut. The connecting branch was printed from an independent block. Another branch from the main trunk of Jesse and his wife proceeds to six of the children born of Jesse.
4. Eliab (Heliab, Abidabad (Aminadab), Shammah (Samaa), Nethaneel (Nata), Raddai (Redda) and Ozem (Asan). The seventh son, David, is not shown, but is reserved to begin the next branch of the genealogy at Folio XLVI verso.
5. Zeruiah (Saruia), the second daughter of Jesse's wife by a former husband, and her husband are shown in a dual portrait, from which the foliage branches off to their three sons, Abishai (Abisay), Asahel, and Joab.

Folio XLIII recto

Homer, the Asiatic poet, of all Greeks the most celebrated (and of whose time and life there is no definite information), flourished in the time of Saul, the king of Israel. The Athenians considered him nonsensical because he said that the gods quarreled among themselves; although the historians say that because of his power and age, the Greeks considered him not only the prince of poets, but of natural philosophers as well; that above all others he was open in his views, and produced more real and genuine poetry than any others did. Yet Polycrates records of him this folly: that because he was unable to solve simple questions put to him by the mariners and fishermen, and was laughed to scorn by them, he gave up the ghost, pierced through by the poisoned shafts of shame. Once upon a time Homer took a stroll by the sea and he lifted up his countenance toward the heavens as though enamored of them. Then he saw a group of fishermen laughing and talking together, and engaged in removing vermin from their clothes. And he asked them what they had. And they answered and said, What we caught we do not have, and what we have not caught we still have. Although the fishermen referred to the vermin or lice in their clothes, Homer thought only of the fish; and he pondered how it could be that the fish they had not caught they still had. Some say this problem so embittered Homer that he hanged himself. According to the Greeks, Homer wrote twenty-four books on the defeat and capture of Troy, and as many books on the aimless voyages of Ulysses. Homer lived 108 years in a continued state of blindness.

Anchises, a son of Capys the Trojan, was warned by the Sibyl Phrygia that Troy would be wiped out. So he went out into the wilderness of the world and lived in the solitude as a hermit, and engaged in the herding of cattle, of which the wealth of the ancients often consisted. And as he was tending his herd by the river Symeantem (Symaethus?) he was loved by Venus the goddess, and as a result of their intercourse a son, Aeneas, was born, who reigned in Italy. This (tale) was invented by the betrayers of the barbarous people, who thus covered up their own adulteries and the seduction of virgins. [Compare text and illustration with Folio XXXVI recto, and see footnote there].

Aeneas, the son of Anchises, came to Italy in the sixth year of Labdon. In figure and speech he was noble and praiseworthy above all others. He and his father, and his son Ascanius, and his nurse Cayeta [The German edition records the name of Aeneas' nurse as Creta], had become associated with the Trojans, and after the destruction of Troy they were driven forth into exile by the Greeks. And they sailed to Italy with twenty ships and stirred up much war. It is said he had as wife a daughter of Priam. [The German edition states (uncharacteristically in its absurdity) that the wife of Aeneas was Helen. Actually, Aeneas had two wives: Creusa, daughter of Priam (mentioned in the last paragraph on this page in reference to her son, Ascanius), who dies during the capture of Troy, and Lavinia, his wife in Italy]. Through the ignorance of the rabble he was looked upon as a god. [See biographical note to Folio XXXVI verso].

Codrus, the son of Melanthus, a king, was the last king of Athens. His reign began in the twenty-seventh year of Samuel's rule, and he reigned twenty-one years. With his death the kingship of the Athenians came to an end. This king did not dress in royal robes, but went about in scant cast-off clothes, in which he was not recognized. He willingly went to his death in order that his people might be relieved of their enemies. Although by this act he set a worthy example for the princes and lords, yet very few, or none at all, followed him. By reason of his great fidelity he is often mentioned by the holy writers as though with him an image of Christ had passed away. For though he knew that the Peloponnesians had received an answer from the gods to the effect that his forces would be victorious but that he would be killed, he placed himself foremost against the enemy and allowed himself to be slain. When the Peloponnesians learned of this, they soon gave up the battle, and thus the Athenians were relieved. And so this king chose to die rather than have his people defeated, and himself live in honor afterwards. After his death the city of Athens was governed by a council until Solon the great lawgiver was elected a duke. The Athenian kings reigned 487 years, from the remotest time of the Hebrew bondage up to the time of Codrus. [Codrus was the son of Melanthus, and last (mythological) king of Athens. According to the mythical chronology, when the Dorians invaded Attica from the Peloponessus, c. 1068 BCE, an oracle declared that they should be victorious if the life of the Attic king was spared. Codrus, therefore, immediately resolved to sacrifice himself for his country. He entered the camp of the enemy in disguise, commenced quarreling with the soldiers, and was slain in the dispute. When the Dorians discovered the death of the Attic king, they returned home. Tradition adds that as no one was thought worthy to succeed such a patriotic king, the kingly dignity was abolished, and Medon, son of Codrus, was appointed archon for life instead].

Ascanius, a son of Aeneas by Creusa, the daughter of King Priam, was the second Latin king. He built the city of Alban (Alba Longa) and there he himself reigned. He is called a king of the Albanians and so his successors were also called.

Ascanius was son of Aeneas by Creusa. According to some traditions, Ascanius remained in Asia after the fall of Troy, and reigned either at Troy itself, or at some other place in the neighborhood. According to other accounts he accompanied his father to Italy. Other traditions give the name of Ascanius to the son of Aeneas and Lavinia. Livy states that on the death of his father Ascanius was too young to undertake the government, and that after he had attained the age of manhood, he left Lavinium in the hands of his mother, and migrated to Alba Longa. Here he was succeeded by his son Silvius. Some writers relate that Ascanius was also called Ilus, or Julus. The gens Julia (whose members included, among others, Julius Caesar) at Rome traced its origin from Julus, or Ascanius.

Alba Longa, the most ancient town in Latium, is said to have been built by Ascanius, and to have founded Rome. It was called Longa because it stretched in a long line down the Alban Mount toward the Alban Lake. It was destroyed by Tullus Hostilius, and was never rebuilt. Its inhabitants were removed to Rome. At a later time the surrounding country which was highly cultivated and covered with vineyards, was studded with splendid villas of the Roman aristocracy and emperors, each of which was called Albanum, and out of which a new town at length grew, also called Albanum, on the Appian way, ruins of which are still extant.

ILLUSTRATIONS

(A) HOMER.

Homer (Homerus) is represented by a very small woodcut. The portrait is, with the exception of the beard, out of tune with classical versions of the blind bard. His eyes are wide open and he is gesturing with both hands. Somewhat surprisingly, the German edition employs a portrait of Homer that is clean-shaven.

(B) LINEAGE OF THE ITALIAN KINGS.

The Lineage of the Kings of Italy is here continued from Folio XXXV recto, where it had its inception:

1. Latinus is represented by a woodcut that would appear to be here used for the first time. It is the usual king-picture—crown, orb and scepter. He is not mentioned in the text.
2. Aeneas appears below Latinus. In the German edition a different image is used, one that also served for Saturn at Folio XXXV recto.
3. Ascanius appears below Aeneas. In the German edition a different image is used, one that did service as Thautanes on the opposite page (Folio XLII verso), and previously as Baleus (Folio XXVIII recto) in that edition.
4. Anchises and Venus, of whose union Aeneas was born, are shown in a dual portrait outside of the pale of the regular lineage. A branch proceeds from them to their son.

(C) CODRUS.

Codrus is represented by a miniature portrait, with crown, orb and scepter.

Venice, in our time the most renowned city, a noble industrial center of Italy, and the mightiest by land and sea, had its beginning with Aeneti, or Veneti (Heneti), the Trojan. For after the destruction of Troy, Antenor [See Note on Antenor at Folio XXXVI verso]. came there across the Adriatic Sea in ships. And there came with him a great number, called Veneti, who had been drive out of Paphlagonia [Paphlagonia is a district on the north side of Asia Minor, between Bithynia on the west and Pontus on the east, being separated from the former by the river Parthenius, and from the latter by the Halys; on the south it is divided by the chain of Mount Olympus (according to others by Oglassys) from Phrygia, in the earliest times, but from Galatia afterwards. And on the north it is bordered by the Euxine. It appears to have been known to the Greeks in the mythical period. The Argonautic legends mentioned Paphlagon, the son of Phineus, as the hero eponymous of the country. In the Homeric catalogue Pylaemenes leads the Paphlagonians, as allies of the Trojans, from the land of the Heneti, about the river Parthenius, a region famed for its mules and horses; and from their leader, the later princes of Paphlagonia claimed descent, and after him the country itself is sometimes called Pylaemenia. These people were first subdued by Croesus; then they fell under Persian sway, but they made themselves independent, and so maintained their condition until their conquest by Mithridates. In the end the country became Roman and Augustus made it a part of Galatia. It was made a separate province under Constantine. The eastern portion, however, was assigned to Pontus, under the name of Hellespontus], and were seeking a region in which to live. From these same Veneti the country was called Venetia, which comprehends in length the country of Histria (or Istria) and extends from there to the river Padua (Po). In breadth it reaches from the same river to the mountains that separate Italy from Germany. It has had the name Venetia for fifteen hundred years. It was often invaded by its neighbors, and also the Gauls and the Germans, and was most cruelly attacked and laid waste by the ruthless and bloody Attila, king of the Huns. And Attila himself came there with great armies and attacked the city. He caused many to be burned and some to be destroyed in the ground, and as he captured and burned Padua, and the cities of Aquileia and Altinus were destroyed, the foremost Venetians with their wives and children, and their goods and chattels, fled to the nearest islands to escape this ruthless destroyer; and they named their new location after the land of Venetia. The city people who escaped to there erected buildings of many kinds and established a city. And as the inhabitants of Altinum [Altinum was a wealthy municipium in the land of the Veneti in the north of Italy, at the mouth of the river Silis and on the road from Patavium to Aquileia. It was a wealthy manufacturing town and the chief emporium for all the goods that were sent from southern Italy to the countries of the north. Goods could be brought from Ravenna to Altinum through the Lagoons and the numerous canals of the Po, safe from storms and pirates. There were many beautiful villas around the town]. had divided their state into six parts, so they built six cities in the islands of the sea, namely Torcellum, Maiorbum, Burianum, Amoriacum, Constanciacum, and Ainianum (Anneianum). Because the richest and most powerful Venetians lived there, the city of Venice increased and expanded from the time it was built. At first the ducal seat was at Heracleia; then at Methamaucum, and finally at Rialto by common consent; for this region was more secure against the enemy, and offered greater opportunities for the enlargement of the city. After the destruction of the cities, the country changed its name, and was no longer called Venetia. It then became a part of Lombardy, Tervisermarck (March of Treviso) Floriaul, and of Histria (Istria); but the islands retained the name of the country. This city was built in A.D. 461, in which year Attila [Attila in 434 CE, with his brother Belda, attained to the sovereignty of all the northern tribes between the frontier of Gaul and the frontier of China. He gradually concentrated upon himself the awe and fear of the entire ancient world, which ultimately expressed itself by affixing to his name the well-known epithet of "the Scourge of God." His career divides itself into two parts. The first (445-450 CE) consists of the ravage of the Eastern empire between the Euxine and the Adriatic, and the negotiations with Theodosius II which followed upon it. They were ended by treaty ceding to Attila a large territory south of the Danube and an annual tribute. The second part of his career was the invasion of the Western empire (450-452). He crossed the Rhine at Strasbourg, but was defeated at Chalons in 451. He then crossed the Alps, took Aquileia, but did not attack Rome. He recrossed the Alps, but died in 453]. destroyed the city of Aquileia; but since then the city was built up again; and with larger and more costly buildings and houses of worship. Item: In the year A.D. 827 the body of St. Mark was brought to Venice from Asia, and in the following year the church of St. Mark was built in the most aristocratic part of the city; and there costly and irreplaceable valuables are kept. For the Venetian power and riches increased daily and miraculously. [St. Mark's was originally the private chapel of the doge, an elective chief magistrate, holding princely rank in the Venetian republic. The Venetian dogate dated from 697 to 1797 when it was abolished. The Church of St. Mark's was adorned with the spoils of other buildings, both in the East and on the Italian mainland. A law of the republic required every merchant trading in the East to bring back some material for the adornment of the church. In fact, the building is a museum of sculpture of the most varied kind, nearly every century from the 4th down to the latest Renaissance is represented. The present church is the third one on this site. Soon after the concentration at Rialto, a small wooden church was erected about the year 828 for the reception of the relics of St. Mark, brought from Alexandria. The chronicler speaks of Asia in this connection because Egypt was at that time considered a part of that continent. From that moment St. Mark became the patron saint of Venice, supplanting St. Theodore. The church was destroyed with the ducal palace in the insurrection against Doge Candiano IV. But it was later rebuilt on a larger scale and Byzantine architects had a large share in the work; but Lombards were also employed, giving birth to a new style, peculiar to the district. In plan St. Mark's is a Greek cross of equal arms, covered by a dome in the center, 42 feet in diameter, and by a dome over each of the arms. The addition of a narthex before the main front and a vestibule on the northern side brings the whole western arm of the cross to a square. The exterior façade is enriched with marble columns from Alexandria and other eastern cities. The top of the narthex forms a wide gallery, in the center of which stand the famous four bronze horses]. As we reach the year 1204 the Venetians joined the French in a war, and in that war obtained control over Constantinople. And thereafter they built the Rialto. [The Rialto was the ancient city of Venice, and derived its name from Rivo-alto ('deep stream'). The Ponte di Rialto is the famous bridge over the Grand Canal, built in 1591, connecting the old Rialto with the island of San Marco]. But in this city, and of its location, there is more to be wondered at than spoken of or written about. It is surrounded by the sea, so that all manner of merchandise and necessities of life are not only brought to it by the sea, but also by other waters which flow there from the surrounding country. So it seems a contradiction to say that in this city in which nothing grows, everything is to be found necessary to sustain life, and even a surplus of it. I will be silent about the wide houses, the high towers, the adornment of houses of worship, the buildings erected in the midst of the waters, a thing which may seem incredible to those who have not seen it. And what is to be said of the large and numerous ships and their equipment, and of the great number of councilors, the order, the commendable customs, existent for over a thousand years; its kindness and open hospitality to all who choose to come there!

Venetia was a district in northern Italy originally included under the general name of Gallia Cisalpina. It was bounded on the west by the river Athesis (Adige), which separated it from Gallia Cisalpina; on the north by the Carnic Alps; on the east by the river Timavus, which separated it from Istria, and on the south by the Adriatic. Its inhabitants, the Veneti, called Heneti by the Greeks, were said to be descendants of the Paphlagonian Heneti, whom Antenor led into the country after the Trojan War, as it is said. There are many speculations as to who these people were, and from where they came, but all writers are agreed that they did not belong to the original population of Italy. To protect themselves against neighboring Celtic tribes, they formed an alliance with Rome; and the Romans defended them. They are almost the only people in Italy who became Roman subjects without offering resistance. They continued to enjoy great prosperity down to the time of the Marcomannic wars, in the reign of Aurelius. But from this time their country was frequently devastated by the barbarians who invaded Italy. In the fifth century many of its inhabitants, to escape the ravages of Attila, took refuge in the islands off their coast, on which now stands the city of Venice. In fact, the origin of Venice is attributed to these invasions, for it was founded by the refugees from the mainland cities who sought escape from the Huns in the impregnable shallows and mud banks of the lagoons. Venice, like Rome and other famous cities, was an asylum. But it is nearly certain that long before the Huns swept down on the Venetian plain in the middle of the fifth century, the little islands of the lagoon already had a population of poor fisherfolk, living in quasi-independence, thanks to their poverty and inaccessible site. This population was augmented from time to time by refugees from the mainland cities, such as Aquileia, Altinum and Patavium. With each movement of people, some of the refugees, no doubt, remained in the islands, and gradually built and peopled the 12 lagoon townships, which formed the germ of the State of Venice, and were subsequently concentrated at Rialto, or in the city we now know as Venice. These twelve townships were Grado, Bibione, Caorle, Jesolo, Heraclea, Torcello, Murano, Rialto, Malamocco, Poveglia, Chioggia, and Sottomarina.

In 466, 14 years after the fall of Aquileia, the population of the 12 lagoon township met at Grado to elect one tribune from each island for the better government of the separate communities, and to put an end to rivalries which had begun to play a disintegrating part. But with the influx of additional people, the jealousies increased and the individual tribunes were unable to control the situation. In this crisis the people suppressed their 12 tribunes and chose a single head of the State, and in 697 Venice elected her first doge.

The whole site of Venice is dominated by the Grand Canal that winds through the city and was at one time probably the bed of a river flowing into the lagoons near the Mestre. The smaller canals all serve as arteries to the Grand Canal. The alleys (calli) number 3227, with a total length of over 89 miles. The canals number 177 and measure 28 miles.

The soil of Venice is oozy mud, which can only be made capable of carrying buildings by the use of piles. There is no land fit for agriculture or the raising of cattle; the sole food supply is fish from the lagoon, and there is no drinking water save such as could be stored from rainfall.

The characteristic conveyances were the gondolas, flat-bottomed boats some 30 feet long by 4 to 5 feet wide, curving out of the water at the ends, with ornamental bow and stern pieces, and an iron beak resembling a halberd, which is the highest part of the boat. Gondolas are mentioned as far back as 1094, and prior to a sumptuary edict passed by the great council in 1562 making black their compulsory color, they were very different in appearance from now. The old boats had awnings of rich materials, supported on an arched frame open at both ends.

Fine examples of Venetian Byzantine palaces – at least of the facades – are still to be seen on the Grand Canal and on some of the smaller canals; but the interiors have been modified past recognition. The palaces seem to have had twin angle-towers, and the facades presented continuous colonnades on each floor with semi-circular high stilted arches, leaving a very small amount of wall space. The buildings are usually battlemented in fantastic form.

THE CITY OF VENICE

The scenic illustrations of the Chronicle are of two kinds: (1) Those of a general nature, used to represent a number of cities, and (2) those designed to represent a particular city, and therefore not repeated. We are here concerned with the second class. The first specific illustration was of Jerusalem (at Folio XVII recto); and now we have the second one, the city of Venice.

In the foreground is the favorite mode of Venetian conveyance, the gondola. Three couples are about to take passage.

As the eye scans the waterfront we note two columns. They are of Egyptian granite, and were brought to Venice as trophies by Doge Domenico Michieli in 1126. In 1180 they were set up with their present fine capitals and bases. One is surmounted with a bronze lion (the symbol of St. Mark), cast in Venice about 1178. In 1329 a marble statue of St. Theodore, standing on a crocodile (dragon), was placed on the other column. Both are shown in the woodcut. St. Theodore is regarded as one of the chief patron saints of Venice. His body was brought from Constantinople in 1260. In art he appears as a warrior in armor, generally trampling on the dragon.

And as we look about the city we see Venetian gothic architecture, both ecclesiastical and domestic. Also visible are the campanili ('bell towers'), one of the most striking features of Venice. These were at one time even more numerous. Earthquakes and the settling of foundations have brought many of them down, the latest to fall being the great tower of San Marco itself, which collapsed in 1902. Its reconstruction was undertaken at once, and completed ten years later. These towers are almost invariably square, as we see them on the woodcut. The campanile is usually a plain brick shaft with shallow pilasters running up the faces. It has small angle windows to light the interior staircase and is not broken into stories with grouped windows. Above the shaft comes the arcaded bell chamber, frequently built of Istrian stone, and carrying either a cone, cupola, or pyramid.

The ordinary Venetian house was built like a courtyard, and was one story high. On the roof was an open loggia for drying clothes; but apparently this is not washday on the Rialto. In front, between the houses and the water, ran the quay or wharf, as we see it in the woodcut before us.

As early as 1339 Venice had already established a hold on the mainland, and ceased to be purely an island empire.

Folio XLIII verso

Padua, a very celebrated old city of Italy, according to Virgil and Livy, was built by Antenor [Antenor, according to Homer, was one of the wisest among the elders at Troy. He received Menelaus and Ulysses into his house when they came to Troy as ambassadors, and advised his fellow citizens to restore Helen to Menelaus. Thus he is represented as a traitor to his country, and when sent to Agamemnon, just before the taking of Troy, to negotiate peace, he devised a plan for delivering the city, and even the palladium into the hands of the Greeks. His history after the capture of Troy varies. According to one account he went with the Heneti to Thrace, and from there to the western coast of the Adriatic, where the foundation of Patavium (Padua) and several towns is said to have been laid]. and his fellow fugitives from Troy. He proceeded directly through Argos to the Illyrian shores. He came into the dominion of the Liburnians, and finally reached the Adriatic Sea. He drove out the Euganei [The Euganei were a people who formerly inhabited Venetia in the Adriatic Sea, and were driven toward the Alps by the Heneti, or Veneti. According to some traditions they founded Patavium (Padua) and Verona. They possessed numerous flocks of sheep, the wool of which was celebrated], who were in possession of this country, and there he built the city of Padua. Cicero states that the Paduans were very friendly with the Romans and in trying times assisted them with arms and money. Later, during its most prosperous times, Padua was within the Roman jurisdiction, although not as a dependency, for it participated in the election of Roman consuls. We hold that in beauty of its public buildings Padua is without a peer in Italy. However, the buildings in general, and some in particular, are modern, for Attila, king of the Huns, devastated the city. Although it was rebuilt by Narses Eunochus [Narses was a eunuch, and hence this appellation. He was a celebrated general and statesman during the reign of Emperor Justinian. Narses put an end to the Gothic dominion in Italy by two brilliant campaigns, one in 552 CE, the other in 553, and again annexed Italy to the Byzantine empire. He was rewarded by Justinian with the government of the country which he held for many years. He was deprived of this office by Justin, the successor of Justinian; whereupon he invited the Longobards to invade Italy. This invitation was eagerly accepted by Alboin. However, it is said that Narses soon thereafter repented, and died of grief at Rome shortly after the Longobards had crossed the Alps. He attained the age of ninety-five years]. and by those from Ravenna, it was burned and destroyed by the Lombards. In later times, however, in the reign of Charlemagne, and of his sons and grandsons, and up to the time of Frederick I, the city developed wonderfully. Ezzelino, the most cruel of tyrants, subjugated Padua, and at the same time began to slay or expel its citizens. [Ezzelino da Romano (Ezelin or Ecelinus) was the head of the Ghibellines in Italy in the time of Emperor Frederick II. He was the son of Ezzelino II, the monk, of noble lineage, whose ancestors migrated to Italy from Germany under Conrad II. He was podesta, or chief magistrate of Verona in 1226. These magistrates were elected annually and entrusted with arbitrary power. He lost jurisdiction over the city in 1227, regained it in 1230, and allied himself two years later with his former antagonist Frederick II in his war with the Lombards. In 1236 the emperor made him lord of Vicenza, in 1237 of Padua and Treviso. In 1238 the emperor gave him his natural daughter, Selvaggia, as wife. From this time on Ezzelino restlessly pursued the goal to make his house supreme in his controversy with the Guelphs, a princely family that opposed the authority of the German emperors in Italy. He hoped to enlarge his jurisdiction so as to comprehend the entire March of Treviso. He held his conquests firmly and with the most gruesome tyranny. He set up a tyrannical rule in the subjugated regions that has made his name one of despicable memory in the history of Italy. He was generally hated and despised, oppressing open enemies by force and keeping secret ones at bay through great watchfulness. He also attempted to subjugate Milan, but a confederacy was organized against him. On September 27, 1259 he was defeated at Soncino, was taken prisoner and died a few days later. It is said that more than 50,000 people went to the hangman, or died in prison under his orders. His brother Alberich, in 1260, was compelled to give up his castle unconditionally, by starvation, and thereafter his sons and daughters were cruelly martyred and slain before his eyes. Alberich himself was tied to the tail of a horse and dragged to death. With him the house of Romano came to an end]. Thereafter the Carrarians exercised authority over Padua, and maintained possession for a century, making it more habitable and beautiful. By their labors the Carrarians raised up towers and fortified the city with triple walls. [At the Diet of Aix-la-Chapelle (828) the duchy and march of Friuli, in which Padua lay, was divided into four counties, one of which took its title from the city. At the beginning of the 11th century the citizens established a constitution composed of a general council or legislative assembly and a credenza or executive; and during the next century they were engaged in wars with Venice and Vicenza for the right of waterway on the Bacchiglione and the Brenta, so that the city, on the one hand, grew in power and self-reliance, while on the other, the great families of Camposampiero, D'Este, and Da Romano began to emerge and divide the Paduan district between them. The citizens, in order to protect their liberties, were obliged to elect a podesta, and their choice fell on one of the D'Este family (c. 1175); but in 1237 Frederick II established his vicar Ezzelino da Romano in Padua and the neighboring cities. When Ezzelino met his death, in 1256, Padua enjoyed a brief period of rest and prosperity; the university flourished; the basilica of the saint was begun; the Paduans became masters of Vicenza. But the advance brought them into dangerous proximity to Can Grande della Scala, lord of Verona, to whom they had to yield in 1311. As a reward for freeing the city from the Scalas, Jacopo da Carrara was elected lord of Padua in 1318. From that date until 1405, with the exception of two years, nine members of the Carrara family succeeded each other as lords of the city. Padua then (1405) passed under Venetian rule]. And although Tymanus entered through them, yet many and various moats and drains were built through the great industry of the Carrarians, which brought water to various parts of the city. In this city is a very strong fortress, and also a palace of first rank in Italy. Its buildings are various. Emperor Henry IV, a German, built the cathedral. There also was a courthouse, the most beautiful in the world. It was later destroyed by fire; but a more costly one was built by the Venetians. They laid the remains of Titus Livy in a more public place. There also is the much praised Church of St. Anthony, whose like is not often found in Italy; [The basilica dedicated to Saint Anthony in the most famous of the Paduan churches, and in a chapel there the bones of the saint are said to rest. The basilica was begun in 1231 and completed in the following century. It is covered by seven cupolas, and in the piazza in front of the church is Donatello's magnificent equestrian statue of Erasmo da Narni, the Venetian general]. and the temple of St. Justina, the virgin, in which are preserved the remains of St. Luke, the Evangelist, and of Prosdoanni [Probably St. Prosdócimo], together with the relics of St. Justina. [Justina, a saint famous in the Paduan and Venetian territories, was according to legend, a virgin of royal birth, who dwelt in the city of Padua. King Vitalicino, her father, having been baptized by a disciple of St. Paul, brought up his daughter in the Christian faith. After his death she was accused before the emperor Maximian of being a Christian. He therefore commanded that she be slain by the sword. Opening her arms to receive the stroke of the executioner, she was pierced through the chest and fell dead. In the year 453, a citizen of Padua founded in her honor the church that bears her name. Having fallen into ruin, it was sumptuously restored by the Benedictine Order in the beginning of the sixteenth century. The collection made for this purpose throughout northern Italy awakened the enthusiasm of the neighboring states, and it is from this time that we find her represented in the pictures of the Paduan and Venetian schools, and most frequently in the paintings of Veronese]. And it is said the same churches were once upon a time temples of Jove. But now there is in the same place a large monastery of the order of St. Benedict. In this city is also the most celebrated university of Italy. In addition to Livy, other brilliant and learned men were born at Padua, namely Paulus [Paulus Julius was one of the most distinguished Roman jurists. He was in the auditorium of Papinian, and consequently was acting as a jurist in the reign of Septimius Severus. He was exiled by Elagabalus, but recalled by Severus when the latter became emperor, and was made a member of his consilium. Paulus also held the office of praefectus praetorio. He survived his contemporary Ulpian. Paulus was perhaps the most fertile of all the Roman law writers, and there is more excerpted from him in the than from any other jurist, except Ulpian. Upwards of seventy separate works by Paulus are quoted in the . Of these his greatest work was , in eighty books. The industry of Paulus must have been unremitting, and the extent of his legal learning is proved by the variety of his labors. Perhaps no legal writer, ancient or modern, has handled so many subjects. It is said that there are 2462 excerpts from Ulpian in the , and 2083 from Paulus, which make about one-sixth of the whole], the jurist, and Peter de Aponodess, whose excellent writings and teachings for the common good of mankind are held in great esteem. Item: Albertus [Probably Albertus Magnus], of the hermit order, a highly renowned teacher and preacher of the Holy Scriptures. Item: Stella [Arruntius Stella], Flaccus [There are many persons by the name of Flaccus in Roman history and literature, but the here probably intends C. Flaccus, a native of Padua, was a poet who lived in the time of Vespasian. He is the author of the , an unfinished epic poem in eight books, on the Argonautic expedition, in which he follows the general plan and arrangement of Apollonius Rhodius. The eighth book terminates abruptly at the point where Medea is urging Jason to take her with him back to Greece], Volusius [This probably refers to Volusius Maecianus, a jurist, who was in the consilium of Antoninus Pius, and was one of the teachers of M. Aurelius. He wrote several works, and there are forty-four excerpts from his writings in the], and many others, exceptional men in all the arts. From the sea upward this city has navigation on the river Brenta, which flows by it. From Lucafusina (Lucia fusina) it is possible to sail for six miles to Padua on an artificial canal.

THE CITY OF PADUA

Illustrated by the same woodcut that has already been used for Trier (Folio XXIII recto)

Padua (Patavium, Italian Padova), an ancient town of the Veneti on the river Bacchiglione, twenty-five miles west of Venice and eighteen miles southeast of Vicenza, is said to have been founded by the Trojan Antenor. It became a flourishing town in early times and was powerful enough in 302 BCE to drive back the Spartan king Cleomenes with great loss when he attempted to plunder the surrounding country. Under the Romans it was the most important city in Northern Italy. According to Strabo it possessed 500 citizens whose fortunes entitled them to equestrian rank. It was plundered by Attila, and in consequence of a revolt of its citizens, it was subsequently destroyed by Agilulf, king of the Lombards, and razed to the ground; for this reason the modern town contains few remains of antiquity. It is celebrated as the birthplace of the historian Livy.

The most famous of the Paduan churches is the basilica dedicated to St. Anthony, commonly called Il Santo. There rest the bones of the saint in a richly ornamented chapel. The basilica was begun after his death in 1231 and was completed in the following century. It is covered by seven cupolas. In the piazza in front of the church is Donatello's magnificent equestrian statue of Erasmo da Narni, the Venetian general, who died in 1443.

At the Diet of Aix-la-Chapelle (828) the duchy and march of Friuli, in which Padua lay, was divided into four counties, one of which was named after the city. At the beginning of the eleventh century the citizens established a constitution. During the next century they were engaged in wars with Venice and Vicenza for the right of waterway on the Bacchiglione and the Brenta—so that, on the one hand, the city grew in power and self reliance, while on the other, the great families of Camposampiero, D'Este, and Da Romano began to emerge and to divide the Paduan district between them. The citizens, to protect their liberties, elected a podestà, and their choice fell first on one of the D'Este family (c. 1175); but in 1237 Frederick II established his vicar Ezzelino da Romano in Padua and the neighboring cities.

When Ezzelino met his death in 1256, Padua enjoyed a brief period of rest and prosperity. The university flourished; the basilica of the saint was begun. But this advance brought them into dangerous proximity to Can Grande Della Scala, lord of Verona, to whom they had to yield in 1311. As a reward for freeing the city from the Scalas, Jacopo da Carrara was elected lord of Padua in 1318. From that date until 1405 (with the exception of two years, when Gian Galeazzo Visconti held the town), nine members of the Carrara family succeeded one another as lords of the city. Padua passed under Venetian rule in 1405, and so remained, with a brief interval, till the fall of the republic in 1797.

It is strange that the chronicler, Doctor Schedel, a graduate of the University of Padua, and undoubtedly familiar with the city, had so little to say about his alma mater and this interesting town.

Folio XLV recto

OF THE KINGDOM OF THE LATINS AND OF ITALY

The country which is now called Campania was at one time the Latin kingdom, and, as Virgil and Livy state, it is one of eighteen regions which has many places that were visited by the others. But as more damage occurred here than in other countries or regions, and as it is not now built up, the visitors are fewer here than in any of the other regions. This land or province is called the Latin province because Saturn, the king of Crete, fled from the weapons of his son Jove and lived there in hiding; for such secret and concealed residence is expressed in the Latin by the word latino [The Latin word for 'hidden' or 'concealed' is lateo, not latino]. (as those learned in the Latin know). And thus Virgil has written and indicated in eight Latin verses. This province was at first small in area; but Servius writes that those are called Latins who live in the inner towns of the Alban Mountains. This province begins at the sea in the region of the Tiber and reaches to the city of Caieta [A town in Latium on the borders of Campania, situated on a promontory of the same name, and on a bay of the sea called after it Sinus Caietanus].; and here some cities were still in evidence, although others were destroyed. In this region and province were aboriginal peoples, called Rutuli [The Rutuli were an ancient people in Italy who inhabited a narrow slip of country on the coast of Latium a little to the south of the Tiber. Their chief town was Ardea, which was the residence of Turnus. They were subdued by the Romans, and disappear from history], Volsci [The Volsci, an ancient people in Latium, but originally distinct from the Latins, dwelt on both sides of the river Liris, and extended down to the Tyrrhene sea. Their language was nearly allied to the Umbrian. They were from an early period engaged in almost unceasing hostilities with the Romans, and were not completely subdued by the latter till 338 BCE, from which time they disappear from history]. Hernici [Hernici, a people in Latium, belonged to the Sabine race, and are said to have derived their name from the Marsic (Sabine) word herna ("rock"). According to this etymology their name would signify "mountaineers." They inhabited the mountains of the Apennines between the lake Fucinus and the river Trerus, and were bounded on the north by the Marsi and Aequi, and on the south by the Volsci. Their chief town was Anagnia. They were a brave and warlike people, and long offered resistance to the Romans. The Romans formed a league with them on equal terms in the 3rd consulship of Sp. Cassius in 486 BCE. They were finally subdued by the Romans in 306 BCE], Aequicolae [The Aequi (also called Aequicoli, Aequicolae, and Aequiculani) were an ancient warlike people of Italy, dwelling in the upper valley of the Anio in the mountains forming the eastern boundary of Latium, between the Latini, Sabini, Hernici, and Marsi. In conjunction with the Volsci, who were of the same race, they carried on constant hostilities with Rome, but were finally subdued in 302 BCE. One of their chief seats was Mount Algidus, from which they were accustomed to make their marauding expeditions]. and Marsi Marsi was the name of a people of the Sabellian race, who dwelt in the center of Italy in the high land surrounded by the mountains of the Apennines, in which Lake Fucinus is situated. Along with their neighbors the Peligini, Marrucini, etc, they concluded a peace with Rome in 304 BCE. Their bravery was proverbial, and they were the prime movers of the celebrated war waged against Rome by the Socii (Italian "allies") in order to obtain the Roman franchise, and which is known by the name of the Marsic or Social War. Their chief town was Marruvium. The Marsi appear to have been acquainted with the medicinal properties of several of the plants growing upon their mountains, and to have employed them as remedies against the bites of serpents, and in other cases. For this reason they were regarded as magicians, and were said to be descended from a son of Circe. Others again derived their origin from the Phrygian Marsyas, simply on account of the resemblance of the name.

Another people called Marsi inhabited Germany, and appear to have dwelt on both sides of the river Ems, and to have been only a tribe of the Cherusci, although Tacitus makes them one of the most ancient peoples in Germany. They joined the Cherusci in the war against the Romans, which terminated in the defeat of the Roman general Varus in 9 CE at the famous Battle of the Teutoburg Forest, but they were subsequently driven into the interior of the country by Germanicus.

; for this region has a large area. Janus, a father and god of the gods, admittedly a gracious and good man and lover of domesticity and hospitality, who came from the East, was the first to reign in Italy. In addition to other acts of virtue, he not only extended hospitality to Saturn, but divided his kingdom with him.

Such is the chronicler's story of Latium, which he does not specifically name, except as the Latin Kingdom. Latium was inhabited by the Latini, one of the oldest of Italian tribes. Most of the ancients derived the name from a king, Latinus, who was supposed to have been a contemporary of Aeneas; but undoubtedly the name of the people was transferred to this fictitious king. Other ancient writers connected the name with the verb latere ("to hide"), either because Saturn had hidden in the country, or because Italy was hidden between the Alps and the Apennines. The story is that the god Saturn came to Italy in the reign of Janus, by whom he was hospitably received, and that he formed a settlement there. Saturn was suddenly removed from the earth to the abode of the gods; whereupon Janus erected an altar to him in the forum. It is related that Latium received its name from this disappearance of Saturn. According to the Chronicle "This land is called the Latin province because Saturn, the king of Crete, fled from the weapons of Jupiter, and lived there in hiding, for such secret and concealed residence is expressed in the Latin by the word latino."

In very ancient times Latium reached only from the Tiber on the north to the Numicus and the town of Ardea on the south, and from the seacoast on the west to the Alban Mountains on the east. It was considerably extended even before the Roman conquest, and substantially enlarged by the Romans. The new accessions of territory were called Latium novum or adjectum. In its widest extent Latium was bounded by Etruria on the north, from which it was separated by the Tiber; by Campania on the south, from which it was separated by the Livis; by the Tyrrhene sea on the west, and by the Sabine and Samnite tribes on the east. The Latini formed a league of which the town of Alba Longa was the capital. Although Rome was originally one of Alba's colonies, she became powerful enough in the reign of her third king, Tullus Hostilius, to take Alba and raze it to the ground. Under Servius Tullius Rome was admitted to the Latin League; and his successor Tarquinius Superbus compelled the other Latin towns to acknowledge Rome as the head of the League, and to become dependent on the latter city. In 340 BCE the Latins were defeated by the Romans at the battle of Vesuvius. The Latin League was dissolved, and the Latins became subjects of Rome.

Italy is a region of Europe, and of all the regions of the whole world the most renowned, distinguished and excellent. It derived its name from the bull; and for that reason Plato in the Timaeus called the Italians by the name Tauri; and their country, by reason of its great beauty and productiveness, he called Italia. This country is in the form of a leg, and lies between the Adriatic and the Tuscan Sea. It reaches from the mountains, and rises more and more toward the Apennines until it comes to the Reginian peak; and it stretches out to the Bruttian peninsula. At its extremity it divides itself into two points of which one extends into the Ionian and the other into the Sicilian Sea. In this region is the city called Rhegium. In length this country stretches from the city of Augusta Praetoria, lying at the foot of the mountains, through Rome and Capua, to the city of Rhegium, and (as Solinus states) is ten times one hundred and twenty thousand paces long, four hundred and ten wide at its broadest point, and one hundred and thirty-six wide at its narrowest part. In the region of Rheate it has a navel, and it ends in the river Rubicon which flows out of the side of the upper Adriatic. Formerly this country was called Hesperia, after Hesperus, the brother of Atlantis. Later it was called Oenotria, after the best wine, which grows there. Finally it was named Italia, after Italo, the king of the Sicilians, who came to these parts and lived and reigned there. This region is second to none either in the fertility of its soil, or in the reputation of its arms; and it has many excellent cities.

Italia, from the time of Augustus, signified the country we call Italy, although the name was originally applied to a more limited extent of country. Most of the ancients, according to their usual custom, derived the name from an ancient king Italus; but others connected it with the old Italian word Italus (in Oscan vitlu or vitelu), an ox, because the country was rich in oxen. But there can be no doubt that Italia (or Vitalia, as it was also called) was the land of the Itali, Vitali, Vitelli, or Vituli, an ancient race, who are better known under the name Siculi. This race was widely spread over the southern half of the peninsula. Augustus was the first to extend the name of Italia so as to comprehend the entire basin of the Po, and the southern part of the Alps, from the Maritime Alps to Pola in Istria, both inclusive. The country was called by various other names, especially by the poets. These were Hesperia, a name which the Greeks gave to it, because it lay to the west of Greece, or Hesperia Magna, to distinguish it from Spain (Hesperia), and Saturnia, because Saturn was said to have once reigned in Latium. The names of separate parts of Italy were also applied by the poets to the whole country. Thus it was called Oenotria, originally the land of the Oenotri, in the country afterwards called Bruttium and Lucania.

Italy was never occupied by a single ethnic group, but contained a number of peoples who had migrated into it at very early periods. When Roman history begins, Italy was inhabited by the Etruscans, Umbrians, Sacrani, Casci or Prisci, and Oscan tribes; also the Opici, to whom belong the Volsci, Sidicini, Saticuli, and Aequi, as well as the Oenotrians, the Sabellians or Sabines, the Peligni, Marsi, Marrucini, Vestini, Hernici, and the Daunians or Apulians, Peucetii, Messapii, and Sallentini. They were all eventually subdued by the Romans, who became the masters of the whole peninsula.

Pisa, a noteworthy city of Etruria, originated at this time, according to Strabo, through the Greeks, who came there from Pisa [Pisa, the capital of Pisatis, is in the middle portion of the province of Elis in the Peloponnesus. Elis was bounded by Achaia from the north, Arcadia on the east, Messina on the south, and the Ionian sea on the west. In very ancient times Pisatis was a union of eight states. Pisa itself was situated north of the Alpheus, at a very short distance east of Olympia. The history of the Pisatae consists of their struggle with the Eleans, with whom they contended for the presidency of the Olympic Games. Finally the struggle was brought to a close by the conquest and destruction of Pisa by the Eleans. So complete was the devastation of the city that not a trace of it was left in later times]. in Elis; and they built this city in Italy, naming it after the former town. Virgil says that this celebrated and accomplished old town originated with the Alphearians; while Pliny states that it originated with the Greek people between the rivers Auser (Auxeris) and the Arno. However, Justinus claims it was built and augmented by the Ligurians and others. Lucan also has something to say concerning the city of Pisa. Although Pisa is now considered unfortunate because it is greatly oppressed by the Florentines, it was formerly mighty and powerful. We find that in the period when Rome flourished Pisa was powerless. But after Lima (Limnae) and Populonia, maritime cities, were destroyed, and the affairs of Italy under Charlemagne and his sons were in a state of peace, Pisa became powerful and mighty. It then possessed many excellent men, learned and experienced in naval affairs. In consequence of its virtue, strength and distinction, Pisa grew and increased, and finally became a principality. It possessed many islands, and subjugated the city of Jerusalem. But seventy years later, having come under the Florentines, Pisa declined in population and wealth. Under Pope Eugene III it was greatly beautified, and it is now adorned with tall buildings and with bridges over the Arno. A church was dedicated there to the Most Blessed Virgin Mary; also a cloister, called the Holy Field, the most celebrated in the world, as well as a wonderful campanile. All these things are so wonderful that one can hardly believe them without having seen them. Among others who were born at Pisa were Raynerius and Bartholomew, teachers of the Holy Scriptures and of the canon law, of the Preaching Order; also Uguicionus, the grammarian, and many others.

Pisa (Pisae, Pisanus) is one of the most ancient and important cities of Etruria, and was situated at the confluence of the Arno and the Auser (Serchio), about six miles from the sea. But the latter river altered its course in the twelfth century, and now flows into the sea by a separate channel. According to some traditions Pisa was founded by the companions of Nestor, the inhabitants of Pisa in Elis, who were driven upon the coast of Italy on their return from Troy; for this reason the Roman poets give the Etruscan town the name of Alpheia. This legend, however, like many others, probably arose from the accidental similarity of the names of the two cities. It would seem that Pisa was originally a Pelasgic town, that it afterward passed into the hands of the Ligyaes, and from them to the Etruscans. It then became one of the twelve cities of Etruria, and was, down to the time of Augustus, the most northerly city in the country. It is frequently mentioned in the Ligurian wars as the headquarters of the Roman legions. In 180 BCE it was a Latin colony, and appears to have been colonized again in the time of Augustus, since we find it called Colonia Julia Pisana. There is scarcely a vestige of the ancient city in the modern Pisa.

Little is known of Pisa during the barbarian invasions. It was one of the first towns to assert its independence of Byzantine rule. During the first years of the Lombard rule the necessity of defending the Italian coast from the attacks of the Byzantines was favorable to the development of the Pisan navy. The military development and real importance of Pisa in the eleventh century must be attributed to the continuous and desperate struggle it maintained against the tide of Arab invasion from Sicily. Meanwhile the Pisans increasingly flourished. In 1062 their ships returned from Palermo laden with spoils. In 1099 the Pisans joined in the first crusade, where they helped capture Jerusalem, from which they derived many commercial advantages. Later, wars arose with Florence, and eventually Pisa surrendered to its more powerful neighbor to the north in 1509.

England is an island, which the ancients, because of the white cliffs that mariners sailing there saw, called Albion. Some call it Brittania after Brutus Silvius, son of the Latin king, who conquered the island of Albion in which the giants lived; and so he called it Brittania after himself. It was called Great Britain to distinguish it from Little Britain which borders on Gaul. But now it is called England after a mighty English king. The island is triangular, and lies to the north and to the west. It is separated from all the neighboring countries. It begins at lower Germany and extends to Gaul, or France, and Spain, in the west. As Brutus, the Roman, chose to live in England, he built the fortified city of Trimoantem on the river Tamesis (Thames). The region was productive of all necessities of life and the city was comparable to Troy, of ancient memory. Brutus, as they say, had three sons, Lotrinus, Albenatus, and Cambrius. They divided the island among themselves. Lotrino, being the elder, received half of it, and it was called Lothria after him. And it is said that in Lothria lies the city of Londinum, which is much visited by merchants and receives shipments of merchandise. There also the kings and princes of England, and the councilors of the people, as well as merchants often meet. Albenetus received one fourth of the island, which was called Albion after him. This is now called Scotland, and it is the upper part of the island, toward the north. It has small rivers, and is separated from England by mountains. Cambria fell to the lot of the third son, Cambri. It is now called Tyle, and is an island that lies to the north and west. It was the last with which the Romans made acquaintance. When in the summer the sun changes its course, there is no light there, and during the winter solstice, there is no day there. The greater part of this island is fertile, and possesses cattle, gold, silver, and iron. From it are shipped raw material, cattle and good hunting dogs. The island is surrounded by other islands. One of these is Hibernia, which approaches England in size. It is separated from England by a small sea. Thereabout are also the Orkneys. The holy Pope Gregory II sent worthy men there to convert the people to the faith; and thereafter many kings appeared, illustrious for their miracles. In this land are also many rivers, as well as a variety of metals. Bede describes their histories best.

Bede (673-735), was a Benedictine monk from England whose most famous work, Historia ecclesiastica gentis Anglorum ("The Ecclesiastical History of the English People") has gained him the title "The father of English history." Britannia comprehended the island of England and Scotland, which was also called Albion, while Hibernia, or Ireland, was usually spoken of as a separate island. However, it is sometimes included under the general name of the Insulae Britannicae, or British Isles, which included the smaller islands around the coast of Great Britain. The etymology of the word Britannia is uncertain, but most writers derive it from the Celtic word brith or brit ("painted"), with reference to the custom of the inhabitants in staining their bodies with a blue color; whatever may be the etymology of the word, it is certain that it was used by the inhabitants themselves, since in the Gaelic the inhabitants are called Brython and their language Brythoneg. The name Albion (albus in Latin is "white") is probably derived from the white cliffs of the island; but writers, who derived the names of all lands and people from a mythical ancestor, connected the name with one Albion, the son of Neptune.

It was not until a late period that the Greeks and Romans obtained any knowledge of Britain. The first certain knowledge was from the merchants of Massilia (Marseilles) in the late fourth century BCE. From this time it was generally believed that the island was in the form of a triangle, an error that continued to prevail, even at a later period. Another important mistake was with reference to the position of Britain in relation to Gaul and Spain. As the northwest coast of Spain was supposed to extend too far to the north, and the west coast of Gaul to run northwest, the lower part of Britain was believed to lie between Spain and Gaul. The Romans first became acquainted with the island through Caesar's invasions in 55 and 54 BCE.

ILLUSTRATION ENGLAND

This illustration is ostensibly designed to represent England (Anglie Provincia). We have before us, as usual, a fortified medieval city, located on an unusually steep mountainside, and divided by a river, probably the Thames, which flows along with a strong current. All is towers, turrets, walls and battlements of varying shapes and sizes. There are no churches, except for one structure that slightly resembles a house of worship. There are no spires or crosses.

The Fourth Age of the World

Folio XLVI verso

The Fourth Age of the World has its inception with the advent of David, and ends with the Babylonian captivity, a period of 484 years, according to the Hebrew teachers, and of 485 years according to the seventy interpreters. David was the first king out of the tribe of Judah over which he reigned at Hebron for 47 years; but over all Israel he ruled for 33 years. This Fourth Age begins with David, not as king of Israel, but as the first king of the tribe of Judah. To him was made the express prophecy that Christ would be born of the tribe of Judah. His deeds and history appear throughout the entire second Book of Kings, &c. [2 Kings according to the Vulgate; 2 Samuel according to the Authorized Versio]. When David learned of Saul's death, he and his relatives mourned him; and he fasted and wrote a song of lamentation in which he acknowledged Saul as the first king of Israel and as his lord. []

David, a prince among prophets, son of Jesse of the tribe of Judah, first king of the Hebrews, began his reign over them 941 years after the death of Abraham; and altogether at Hebron and Jerusalem he reigned 40 years. He was dauntless, of a beautiful countenance and rosy complexion, of great strength, and of still greater intellect. Before the beginning of the kingdom he slew the strongest man, the giant of the Philistines, with a slingshot. In behalf of his subjugated people, he accepted leadership, and was always the first in places of danger and risk. When he assumed the reins of government, he first besieged Jerusalem, and thereafter drove out the captured Canaanites and Jebusites. And he dispersed all the Palestinians and other enemies. Finally, full of days and good deeds, he went to rest in the Lord at the age of 70 years and was buried properly at Jerusalem by his son Solomon.

Solomon (in the Year of the World 4165) [The parenthesis "(in the Year of the World 4165)" is not in the German edition of the chronicle], a son of David by Bathsheba, [Bathsheba was the daughter of Eliam. She became the wife of Uriah, an officer in David's army. Her beauty ensnared David, for he not only committed adultery with her, but treacherously procured the death of her husband. The child of this intercourse died. When the days of mourning were over, David married her, and she afterward bore him three sons besides Solomon. When Adonijah attempted to seize the throne, Bathsheba told the king at the instigation of Nathan. It was to her as queen mother that Adonijah went with the request for the hand of Abishag. (II Samuel 11; I Kings 2:13-22)]. the second king of the Hebrews, began his reign while his father still lived, and he ruled 40 years. Soon after he was born, his father gave him to Nathan the prophet, a very learned and holy man, to bring up and educate. When Solomon became a young man, his father, because of his good conduct and obedience, and in accordance with the command of the Lord, preferred him in the kingdom to his rejected brothers. Solomon fought the enemy and secured peace. Afterwards he built the most celebrated temple in the world, and in good fortune he excelled all other kings. He died at the age of 94 years, and was buried at Jerusalem.

When Queen Sheba (Saba) heard of the fame of Solomon she came from other parts of the world to hear his wisdom. And he satisfied her on all the questions that she asked. After she saw the order of his house, and his people, she praised him greatly; and they gave one another great presents. Solomon erected a throne of ivory which was approached by six steps; for all the people craved to look upon Solomon's countenance. Sheba was a prophetess, and was therefore called a sibyl. For she prophesied from the wood of the holy cross, and of the destruction of the Jews. She held the one true God in high esteem. [Sheba was a wealthy region in Arabia bordering on the Red Sea. The Queen of Sheba visited Solomon, coming to Jerusalem "with a very great train, with camels that bear spices, and very much gold and precious stones." (I Kings 10:1-13; II Chr. 9:1-12) Many ancient writers noted the abundance of spices in the Yemen, or Sabaean country. Herodotus says that the whole country exhaled an odor of marvelous sweetness, and Diodorus relates that the perfume extended far out to the sea. They used gold and silver lavishly in their furniture and utensils, and even on the doors and roofs of their houses. Precious stones also abounded there].

Folio XLVII recto

On the advice of the Lord, David and his people went to Hebron. There, in his youth, he was elected king of the tribe of Judah and anointed by Samuel. Ish-bosheth (Hysboseth), [Ish-bosheth was the son and successor of Saul. He was persuaded by Abner to go to Mahanaim and assume the government while David reigned at Hebron (II Sam. 2:8-11); and all Israel, except Judah, acknowledged him as king. A severe battle soon afterward occurred at Gibeon, between the army of David under Joab, and the army of Ish-bosheth under Abner, in which the latter was utterly defeated. Abner was afterward killed by Joab. Ish-bosheth, thus deprived of his strongest supporter, was assassinated after a brief reign of two years. (II Samuel 4:5-7)] the son of Saul, was, through the procurement of Abner, his uncle, made king of the other eleven tribes; and he reigned two years. And now assembled the armies of David and Joab, his commander, as did also the forces of Ish-bosheth and Abner, his commander. And out of sheer willfulness twelve men on the one side fought with twelve men from the other, and they slew one another at a single stroke. Then those who were with Abner were defeated and fled; and Asahel, the brother of Joab, pursued Abner; and as he would not desist in the pursuit, Abner finally wounded Asahel in the groin with a spear; and Asahel died. [The contest between the twelve men on either side was followed by a general battle, which resulted in Abner's defeat. He fled, but was pursued by Asahel. When in the heat of the pursuit, Abner counseled him to desist, and threatened to turn upon him and slay him if he did not, Asahel refused to turn aside, and Abner, "with the back end of the spear struck him under the fifth rib, that the spear came out behind him; and he fell down there, and died in the same place." (II Samuel 2:19-23) This is according to the . The nature of the injury is somewhat differently recorded in the (II Kings 2:23): "But he (Asahel) refused to hearken to him (Abner), and would not turn aside; wherefore Abner struck him with his spear with a back stroke in the groin, and thrust him through, and he died upon the spot."] Although the war between the house of Saul and the house of David lasted for a long time, David made more progress and his strength increased; but the house of Saul declined daily. To David were born at Hebron the following sons: The first, Amon (Amnon); the second, Cheliab (Chileab); the third, Absalon (Absalom); the fourth Adonias (Adonijah), and many others by numerous wives. [The issue of David is divided into two parts: (1) that born at Hebron, according to II Samuel 3:2-5; and (2) that born at Jerusalem, according to II Samuel 5:13-16. Both lines are given in I Chron. 3:1-9. The issue born at Hebron is not fully given in the . According to II Samuel 5:14-16, the children born there were as follows: Amnon, Chileab (called Daniel in I Chronicles 3:1), Absalom, Adonijah, Shephatiah, and Ithream]. But Abner, who ruled the house of Ish-bosheth, was called to account by his lord because he had slept with Saul's concubine; and thereupon they became enemies. [This was an offense against Saul's family. He had taken Rizpah, the concubine of Saul, into his harem, and this act was interpreted according to 'eastern' ideas, as an attempt to seize the throne. Abner was exceedingly irritated by the charge, and he immediately forsook the interests of Saul's house and espoused the cause of David]. And he went to David and promised him that he would bring the entire people of Israel under his rule. He undertook to deal in this way, and returned to Michal, [Michal was the second daughter of Saul, the king and the wife of David, who paid in dowry two hundred slaughtered Philistines. She was passionately devoted to her young husband and once saved him from the fury of her father. During David's exile, she was married to another man with whom she lived for ten years. After the accession of David to the throne, she was restored to him, but an estrangement soon took place between them, and on the occasion of the greatest triumph of David's life—the bringing up of the ark to Jerusalem—it came to an open rupture between them, after which her name does not again occur (II Samuel 6:1-23)]. David's wife, to David. Joab, to avenge his brother Asahel, treacherously slew Abner. [Abner, the son of Ner, was a first cousin of Saul, and a faithful and distinguished general of his armies (I Samuel 14:50). We first hear of him particularly as the captain of the host, of whom Saul inquired concerning the daring young David who had just gained the victory over Goliath to the king's great astonishment]. This did not please David, who caused Abner to be buried with his own, and to be mourned and fasted. [After Abner's desertion of the house of Saul, David received him cordially and sent him away in peace to persuade Israel to submit to David. While he was gone on this errand, Joab returned; and hearing what had been done, he went to the king and warned him against Abner as a spy and traitor. Soon after, and without David's knowledge, Joab sent for Abner; and when he arrived, took him aside privately and murdered him in revenge of the death of his brother, Asahel. The estimation in which he was held by the king and people appears from the sacred history. The king wept and refused his food, and all the people wept; "And the king said to his servants, don't you know that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?" (II Sam. 3:7-38)].

This David was a real miracle in human flesh; for in him were combined qualities never again found present together (in the same individual): Greatness and humility; great fairness and kindness; great solicitude for worldly affairs, and pure and devout regard for things spiritual; the slaughter of many people, and the shedding of many tears; the commission of great sins on one hand, and atonement on the other. Item: To him were born at Jerusalem the following sons: Shammuah (Salma), Shobad (Saba), Nathan, and Solomon (Salomon), out of Bathsheba, the wife of Uriah; also eight others, not counting the sons of his concubines. [Here we come upon the second branch of David's issue, namely, the children born to him at Jerusalem: Shammuah (Salma), Shobab (Saba), Nathan, Solomon, Ilhar (Jabaar), Elishua (Helisus), Nepheg, Juphia (Jaahia), Elishama (Helisama), Eliada (Helida), and Eliphalet (Helifeleth). (II Samuel 5:13-16)] And after he had restored peace to the land, he decided to enumerate the people, contrary to the laws of Moses; and he counted 1,100,000 fighting men; and of the tribe of Judah alone 470,000. But the census displeased God, and he struck Israel with a plague to which 70,000 Israelites succumbed. [According to the Old Testament twelve censuses were taken. The first was under Moses, three or four months after the Exodus, its object being to raise funds to build the tabernacle, each numbered person (every male of twenty years of age and upward) being obliged to pay half a shekel. The second numbering occurred in the second month of the second year after the Exodus (Num. 1:2). The third was immediately before the entrance of the Hebrews into Canaan (Num. 26). For a long time thereafter no reckoning was made; but David, instigated by Satan, out of mere curiosity and ambition to know how large a people he governed, ordered a count, with the result stated (I Chron. 21:5; II Sam. 24:9).]

These three (referring to the triple portrait of Gad, Nathan, and Aseph below) prophesied in the time of David; and Nathan was David's brother's son, and an adopted son of Jesse.

The Lineage of Christ is here continued from Folio XLII verso, where the line of descent was brought down to include Jesse and all of his children, except David, with whom the present branch of the genealogy therefore begins. And so here the Psalmist makes his debut. Strumming on a harp, he gracefully steps forth upon the root-branches of his genealogical tree. He wears his crown and his regal robes, which the artist has turned aside to expose the king's shapely leg. He moves forward as though about to dance to his own music. The costume, a tight-fitting outer garment with skirt, sleeves puffed and slashed, and the pointed shoes, are well done according to medieval fashion, but are hardly consistent with the period under consideration.

From the main trunk upon which David stands proceed three branches—one straight downward to King Solomon, his favorite son; another to the left, portraying the children of David born at Hebron; and a third, which proceeds to the opposite folio (XLVII recto), portraying the children born to him at Jerusalem:

1. Solomon Rex, although shown at full length, appears as a rather diminutive figure. His body is dwarfed, his head is large, and the crown he wears is of greater diameter than the king himself from shoulder to shoulder. He carries the orb and scepter, and is clad in an embroidered and fur trimmed robe. His footwear is rather meager, and he gives the appearance of having stepped forth in his stocking-feet.

2. The Sons of David at Hebron, shown to his left (Folio XLVI verso), are given as follows: First (Primus), Amon (Amnon), 2nd, cheliab (Chileab, also called Daniel), 3rd, Absolon (Absalom), 4th, Adonias (Adonijah), 5th, Saphacias (Shephatiah) and 6th, hietra (Ithream). This group is represented by a single woodcut, and there is nothing of particular interest about any of the portraits. Each emerges from a floral cup, and all are connected by a vine-like stem.
3. The Sons of David at Jerusalem are represented by a single woodcut that occupies almost one half of the opposite page (Folio XLVII recto). For purposes of identification the names are here repeated, firstly as given in the Chronicle, and secondly according to the text of II Samuel 5:13-16: Namely, Salma (Shammuah), Sab (Shobab), Nathan, Salomon (Solomon), Jabaar (Ibhar), helisua (Elishua), Nepheg, Japhia, helisama (Elishama), helida (Eliada), and helifelech (Eliphalet). And a rather quarrelsome lot these men appear to be. They stare and glare, frown and droop at the mouth, and gesture with both hands.

(B) THE QUEEN OF SHEBA (Saba)

The Queen of Sheba is represented opposite Solomon by a small woodcut of exquisite design. Her headdress and flowing veil as well as other raiment are entirely medieval. In her extended hand she offers Solomon a beautiful piece of jewelry, probably a cup or chalice, and no doubt one of the good will offerings of her visit from the land of Arabia.

(C) THE MURDER OF ABNER

The Murder of Abner is represented at Folio XLVII recto by a small woodcut approximately 3½" square. Abner has just returned to Hebron. Joab, the commander of David's forces, has taken him aside in the gate, as if to speak to him quietly; but he "struck him there under the fifth rib, that he died, for the blood of Asahel, his brother." (II Sam. 3:27) The incident is quaintly depicted. The men stand in a doorway, face to face, each with one leg extended forward as though engaged in a dance. But Joab is driving his trusty blade of no mean dimensions into Abner's back, producing in the latter a vacant far away look.

(D) GAD, NATHAN AND ASEPH

Gad, Nathan and Aseph are represented at Folio XLVII recto in a triple portrait, above which appears this inscription: "These three prophesied in the time of David; and Nathan was David's brother's son, and an adopted son of Jesse."

- Gad was a prophet and particular friend of David, the history of whose reign he wrote (I Chron. 29:29). He came to David when the latter was in the cave Adullam (I Sam. 22:5). He then began his career of counselor, under divine direction, which eventually won him the title of "the king's seer." (II Sam. 24:11,13; I Chron. 21:9)
- Nathan was a distinguished prophet of Judea, who lived in the reigns of David and Solomon and enjoyed a large share of their confidence (II Sam. 7:2). To him, David first intimated his design to build the temple, and he was divinely instructed to inform the king that this honor was not for him but for his posterity. Nathan was also charged with the divine message to David upon the occasion of his sin against Uriah, which he conveyed under the significant allegory of the rich man and the ewe-lamb. Nathan was one of David's biographers (I Chron. 29:29) and also Solomon's (II Chron. 3:5).
- Aseph or Aseph (correctly Asaph) a Levite, was the chief leader of the temple choir, and a poet. (I Chron. 6:39). Twelve of the Psalms are attributed to him, namely Ps. 50 and Ps. 73 to 83. He is also spoken of as a "seer" in connection with David (II Chron. 29:30). The "sons of Asaph" were probably a school of musicians.

Folio XLVII verso

Solomon went up to Gibeon to offer sacrifice in the high place where the tabernacle and altar of Moses stood. And he offered a thousand hosts (burnt offerings) as one entire sacrifice. And the Lord appeared to him by night in a dream, and asked Solomon to say what he desired the Lord to give him. And he wished for wisdom in ruling over his people. This wish pleased the Lord, and the Lord said, because you have not asked for riches, nor for the death of your enemies, nor long life (for yourself), you have been heard. I have given you a wise heart, so that there was none like you before you. [I Kings 3:1-15]. The first judgment in which Solomon's wisdom manifested itself was in the case of the sons of two women (that were prostitutes), one of whom had lain upon her child during the night. And they quarreled as to which of them the surviving child belonged. But when Solomon gave judgment that the living child should be divided into two parts, the true mother asked that the child be given alive and entirely to the other woman. And Solomon judged that she was the rightful mother and he awarded her the child.

I Kings 3:16-28. Added to the end of this paragraph in the German edition of the Chronicle is the following passage:

And although in no other single individual before him were found such clear wisdom, such high degree of pleasure, such great honor, such riches, and such secret communion with God, yet in his later years Solomon marred and perverted these qualities by his love of women and his idolatrous practices.

Which, in turn, is derived from I Kings 11:1-8:

But Solomon loved many strange women, together with the daughter of Pharaoh, women of the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Zidonians, and Hittites; of the nations concerning which the Lord said to the children of Israel, you shall not go in to them, neither shall they come in to you: for surely they will turn away your heart after their gods: Solomon clung to these in love. And he had seven hundred wives, princesses, and three hundred concubines: and his wives turned away his heart. For it came to pass when Solomon was old, that his wives turned away his heart after other gods: and his heart was not perfect with the Lord his God, as was the heart of David, his father. . . . And Solomon did evil in the sight of the Lord, and went not fully after the Lord, as did David, his father. Then did Solomon build a high place for Chemosh, the abomination of Moab, in the hill that is before Jerusalem, and for Molech, the abomination of the children of Ammon. And likewise did he for all his strange wives, which burnt incense and sacrificed to their gods.

In the fourth year of his reign Solomon began to build to the Lord the most celebrated temple in all the world. This was in the 480th year after Israel's exodus from Egypt, and the birth of Abraham the 984th; and he completed the structure in the eighth year. The temple was built in Jerusalem on Mount Moriah, where Abraham wanted to sacrifice his son, and where Jacob, in his dream, saw the ladder that reached from heaven to the earth. This temple was built entirely of white stone. It was erected with much skill and constructed of polished stones wonderfully joined together. Its length was 60 cubits; and the breadth of it 20 cubits; and the height 120, with such proportions that the height from the pavement at the ground to the first floor was 30 cubits; and from the first floor to the second 30 cubits; and from this to the third, that is to the roof of the temple, is 60 cubits. And so the temple had two floors between the pavement and the roof. And at each floor and at the roof there was a balcony round about; and there, it is said, the Lord Christ was tempted by the devil; and before these balconies were grates, so that persons passing about the same would not fall off. The temple was divided into two parts. One was called the sanctum ('holy'). It was 40 cubits in length, and at this end was the entrance to the temple from the east. The other was called the sanctum sanctorum ('holy of holies'), 20 cubits in length. Between the sanctum and the sanctum sanctorum was a wall of cedar boards, overlaid with plates of gold, and 20 cubits in height. Before it there hung a thin, beautifully woven veil, which at the time of Christ's suffering was rent from top to bottom. In the sanctum sanctorum was placed the ark of the Lord that Moses had made. Within the ark were the tablets of the Ten Commandments. Into this sanctum sanctorum the high priest alone went once in each year, on the day that is called the Day of Atonement with great solemnity and adoration. But into the sanctum the priests often went because of various sacrifices, to light the candles or lamps. And there, to the south was the golden candlestick with the seven lights that Moses had made. To the north was the table of offering. In the middle was the golden altar that Moses had made. But to this Solomon added ten other candlesticks equally beautiful, but larger, five to the right and five to the left; likewise ten larger golden tables. In the middle was the altar of incense. [For the original and more accurate description of the temple and its furnishings, see I Kings 6].

"Then came there two women, who were harlots, to their king, and stood before him. And the one woman said, My lord, I and this woman dwell in one house; and I was delivered of a child with her in the house. And it came to pass the third day after that I was delivered, that this woman was delivered also: and we were together; there was no stranger with us in the house, save we two in the house. And this woman's child died in the night; because she lay upon it. And she arose at midnight and took my son from beside me, while your handmaid slept, and laid it in her bosom, and laid her dead child in my bosom. And when I rose in the morning to give the child suck, behold it was dead: but when I had considered it in the morning, behold, it was not my son, which I did bear. And the other woman said, No; but the living is my son, and the dead is your son. And the other one said, No; but the dead is your son, and the living is my son. Thus they spoke before the king. Then said the king, The one says, This is my son that lives, and your son is the dead one: and the other says, No; but your son is the dead one, and my son is the living one.

"And the king said, Bring me a sword. And they brought a sword before the king. And the king said, Divide the living child in two, and give half to the one, and half to the other. Then spoke the woman whose living child was before the king, for her heart yearned for her son, and she said, My lord, give her the living child, and in no way slay it. But the other said, Let it be neither mine nor yours but divide it. Then the king answered and said, Give her the living child, and in no way slay it: she is the mother of it.

"And all Israel heard of the judgment which the king had judged; and they feared the king: for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him, to do judgment."

I Kings 3:16-28

Of course, no artist creating pictorial material for a work of this nature would overlook the opportunity of portraying the judgment of Solomon upon the rival claims to motherhood. And so here the artist has wisely chosen, and he has done a good piece of work.

Complacently Solomon sits upon the judgment seat. He wears a crown and a simple but voluminous robe and in the exercise of his authority he holds the scepter to indicate that he is wielding the authority of his office. At this point the hearing is really over. The corpus delicti—a dead child and a live one—are present at the foot of the throne. The rival claimants to the living youngster have made their interesting pleas, as set forth in the biblical narrative quoted above. We are beyond the point of tentative judgment that the living child was to be divided, and the executioner who stands at the right idly holds his sword in his left hand, while with the right he pushes back his cap and scratches his head as though puzzled by the proceedings, or disappointed in the result. The false mother and the true, in their attitude toward the living child, have given the king the true solution.

To the left of the picture kneels the false claimant to whom the judgment has left the dead child. Behind her, silhouetted against a window with diamond-shaped panes, are two venerable men, one with a flowing beard, the other with a braided one, who may be councilors or advisers to the king; certainly they are not acting for either of the claimants, as each woman pleaded her own cause.

To the right of the throne is a space apparently open to the general public—a sort of porch, resembling the old Court of the Arches in London. The place is crowded with people, deeply interested in the proceedings. It is in this direction that the successful mother turns, holding her child by the hand. In parting, she looks back at the king in gratitude and proud satisfaction, and even the child seems to wave the good judge a 'Thank you!' And so, there was no work for the Lord High Executioner.

Folio XLVIII recto

Ahijah (Achias) the Shilomite (Silonites), a prophet, prophesied to Jeroboam (Hieroboam) that he would rule over the ten tribes of Israel in the beginning of the kingdom.

Jeroboam received the ten rents in his mantle at the hands of Ahijah, the prophet, and fled into Egypt. After Solomon's death he was elected king of the ten tribes. He set up calves of gold at Dan and Naphtali and became an arch idolater. He caused the people of Israel to commit the sin of idolatry, resulting in the dispersion of the entire people of Israel.

The Bible states that in the later years of his reign Solomon did much to displease God; for he had become a despot, and idolater and a lover of many strange women. And God stirred up many adversaries against him and otherwise troubled his closing years. (I Kings 11:1-25) Among these adversaries was one Jeroboam, who raised his hand against the king (I Kings 11:26-32):

And it came to pass at that time when Jeroboam went to Jerusalem, that the prophet Ahijah the Shilomite found him in the way; and he had clad himself with a new garment; and the two of them were alone in the field: And Ahijah caught the new garment that was on him, and rent it in twelve pieces: And he said to Jeroboam, Take ten pieces: for thus says the Lord, the God of Israel, Behold I will rend the kingdom out of the hand of Solomon, and will give ten tribes to you: (But he shall have one tribe for my servant David's sake, and for Jerusalem's sake, the city which I have chosen out of all the tribes of Israel.

Hearing of Abijah's prophecy, Solomon saw in Jeroboam, the youthful Ephraimite, an insubordinate spirit, and a usurper of his throne. The relation was strikingly similar to that of Saul and David, except that David did not lift his hand against the king. Realizing his position, Jeroboam fled to Shishak, the king of Egypt; and in that country he remained until Solomon's death. (I Kings 11:40) When Solomon died, after a reign of forty years, his son Rehoboam went to Shechem, a central meeting place for the northern tribes, to make himself king. In the meantime, Jeroboam in Egypt, heard of Solomon's death and the oppressed people called him forth as a leader. And he and the people met Rehoboam at Shechem, demanding relief against the yoke that his father had imposed upon them. But Rehoboam not only ignored their plea, but answered them roughly, promising that he would add to their yoke, and where his father had chastised them with whips, he would chastise them with scorpions. (I Kings 12:1-15) And so the ten tribes rebelled and chose Jeroboam king over all Israel. Rehoboam came to Jerusalem and prepared for war against Jeroboam and vainly attempted to subdue the rebellion. Jeroboam enlarged and fortified Shechem for a royal residence. He feared the return of the house of David to power, and calculating that should the people go up to do sacrifice in the house of the Lord at Jerusalem, they would reaffirm their allegiance to Rehoboam, and kill him. So he took counsel and made two calves of gold, and he said to the people, It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalem: behold your gods, O Israel, which brought you up out of the land of Egypt. And he set up the one in Dan in the northern part of the kingdom, and the other at Bethel (not Naphtali) in the southern, thus catering to the convenience of the people. And he ordained a feast and offered up sacrifices to these new gods at both places. (I Kings 12:20-33)

Shemaiah (Semeias) silenced Rehoboam in the war against Jeroboam, and he also wrote a history of Rehoboam's reign; and he prophesied that Shishak (Sesac) the Egyptian king would do much mischief in the land of Judah, namely in the fifth year of Rehoboam.

Shemaiah was one of the prophets of the age, who, according to the Bible, wielded a great moral power over the king and nation (I Kings 12:22-24):

The word of God came to Shemaiah, the man of God, saying, Speak to Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, king of Judah, and to all the house of Judah and Benjamin, and to the remnant of the people, saying, You shall not go up and fight against your brothers the children of Israel; return every man to his house; for this thing is from me. They listened therefore to the word of the Lord and returned to depart, according to the word of the Lord.

The prophet's words on this occasion, though doubtless much against the royal will, awed the king into submission. He appeared again in the time of Shishak's invasion, and his ministry was instrumental in averting the possible consequences of that invasion—the destruction of Jerusalem. (II Chron. 12:5-7) He also composed a history of Rehoboam's reign. (II Chron. 12:15)

Abdo the prophet, prophesied against the golden calves; and the hand of Jeroboam withered. And as he was returning to Jerusalem he was killed by a lion. [Jeroboam, having set up the idols, assembled the people to engage in the solemn worship of them; and to show his zeal for the service he officiated at the altar himself. But while he was thus occupied, a mysterious prophet from the land of Judah (whose name is here given as Abdo, but is nowhere given in the Bible) appeared in the midst of the assembly and uttered a prediction that a man by the name of Josiah should arise and destroy that altar, and should burn upon it the bones of the priests; and to confirm his authority he gave this sign, that the altar should immediately be broken in pieces and the ashes upon it be poured out; and it was so. Greatly provoked by this interference, Jeroboam put forth his hand to seize the prophet; but it was stiffened, so that he could not draw it in. Intimated by this miraculous judgment, and convinced that the man was indeed a prophet of the Lord, he begged him to intercede for him that his withered arm might be restored, which was done accordingly. Jeroboam, however, was not reformed by these miracles, but continued in his idolatries. (I Kings 13:1-6) The incident that the prophet was killed by a lion on his way back to Jerusalem still requires explanation. In sending him on his mission God had commanded him, Eat no bread, nor drink water, nor turn again by the same way you came. He was first tempted to break this mandate by Jeroboam, who invited him to his house to refresh himself and to reward him; but he refused. The purpose of God's command was that he should have no fellowship or communion with the works of darkness of these people, not so much as even to eat or drink with them. He was to deliver his message in passing, so to speak. Yet when "an old prophet" invited him to his house to eat bread, and assured him that he too was a prophet, and falsely represented to him that an angel of the Lord had spoken to him to bring him back into his house that he might eat bread and drink water, he believed him and accepted his hospitality. For this transgression, a lion afterward met him on the way and slew him. (I Kings 13:7-24) In the German edition of the , this paragraph follows that of Baasha and precedes that of Elah].

Nadab, son of King Jeroboam, was the second king of Israel. He began to reign in the second year of Asa (Aza) the king of Judea, and, like his father, he committed much evil. But Baasha (Baasa) slew him and reigned in his stead, according to the prophecy of Ahijah. [Nadab was the son and successor of Jeroboam. His wicked reign of two years was brought to a close at Gibbethon, a city of the Philistines, by the successful conspiracy of Baasha. (I Kings 15:25-28)]

Baasha, of the tribe of Issachar, third king of Israel, also committed evil before the Lord and wandered in all the wicked ways of Jeroboam. He would not listen to Jehu (Hieu), the prophet, who was sent by him, but killed him. However, he himself was killed by Chreone. [Baasha was the third king of Israel and founder of a dynasty, though probably of non-aristocratic birth. (I Kings 16:2) He rose to the throne by his slaughter of Nadab, king of Israel, and all his family, while the king was besieging Gibbethon. (I Kings 15:27) By this cruel act he unwittingly fulfilled the prophecy regarding Jeroboam's posterity. (I Kings 14:10) He followed in the wicked ways of Jeroboam and was visited with the most fearful judgments. The warnings he received through Jehu, the prophet, did not deter him from his wicked course. He reigned 24 years, a period filled with war and treachery, and his family and relatives were cut off according to prediction. (I Kings 16:3-11)]

Hela (Elah) the son of Baasha, was the fourth king of Israel. He and his father's entire house were slain by his servant Zimri (Zambricum), who "left not one that pisses against a wall." [Elah was the son and successor of Baasha, king of Israel. He reigned two years, and was assassinated by Zimri, "captain of half his chariots," while he was "drinking himself drunk in the house of Arza, steward of his house in Tirzah." The record of this king is a repetition of that of Nadab, the son of Jeroboam. As Nadab ended the first, so Elah ended the second dynasty of the Israelite kings].

Zadok (Sadoch), a high priest, began to function at the beginning of Solomon's reign. He was in the line of bishops the eighth.

Achimas (Achimaas), the son of Zadok.

Ahimaaz (Achimas), the ninth high priest of the Hebrews, was renowned and held in the greatest honor by the Jews.

ILLUSTRATIONS

(A) KING SOLOMON'S TEMPLE

The woodcut of Solomon's Temple is intended to amplify the text on the verso of the opposite folio. It measures 5-9/16" x 8-3/4". It is a rather inferior piece of work and neither complies with the specifications of that "noble pile" in the Bible, nor is it in accord with the consensus of conjecture as to what the temple really looks like. According to the present artist, it was hexagonal in outline, while the biblical narrative gives it only length and breadth, and a rectangular shape. There is also a lack of balconies and the necessary guardrails. The temple was apparently a three-story structure, but it is not so shown here. The place, to which the temple was after all a mere adjunct, is not in evidence, unless the slender square tower to the left, with the grand staircase, is meant to represent the "great house" of the celebrated king. The minor structures in the foreground to either side of the temple are apparently intended as porches or antechambers to the temple, although they appear in a rather unrelated position.

In the temple court seven persons, probably priests, are promenading about, while an eighth one is upon his knees in front of a flat object that resembles a prayer rug. All is surrounded by a fortified wall with turrets at frequent intervals. All the structures have cupolas, most of which resemble a fair sized and rather ripe squatty tomato. In the distance is a hilly landscape.

The Priestly Lineage is here continued from folio XLI verso, where Eli, Phinehas, Ahitub, Ahimelech and Abiathar were portrayed. The present panel contains but two illustrations, the son and grandson of Ahitub:

1. The first of these is a portrait of Zadok (Sadoch), son of Ahitub. Zadok was one of the two high priests in the time of David, Abiathar being the other (II Sam. 8:17). He joined David at Hebron and was always faithful to him, staying behind in Jerusalem at his request during Absalom's rebellion. He subsequently anointed Solomon as king, and was rewarded by him for his faithful service by being made sole high priest.
2. The second is a portrait of Ahimaaz (Achimaz), son of Zadok, and it is a duplicate of the portrait of Bukki in the Priestly Lineage shown at Folio XXXVII verso. The line of the priests up to the time of the captivity is to be found in I Chron. 6:3-48.

(C) LINEAGE OF THE ISRAELITE KINGS

Here begins the Lineage of the Israelite Kings, the first four of whom are portrayed in a narrow panel in the usual form. They appear in order of the text: Jeroboam, Nadab, Baasha (Baasa) and Elah (Hela). Neither the Bible nor the Chronicle give these potentates very good characters, and their portraits are about as "tough" as their records. The portrait of Hela is a duplicate of the portrait of Amytias found in Folio XXV recto.

(D) THREE HEBREW PROPHETS

The three Hebrew prophets, Ahijah (Achias), Shemaiah (Semeias) and Abdo (the mysterious prophet who remains unnamed in the Bible) are portrayed by three small woodcuts scattered through the text.

Folio XLVIII verso

Perusia (now Perugia) is a very ancient and noble city of Etruria; and although formerly the first, it is now the third of all the Etrurian cities. According to Justin [Justin (the English form of his Latin name Justinus) was, like Schedel, also a compiler of sorts. He is the author of (known in English as the , short for the), a work described by himself in his preface as a collection of the most important and interesting passages from the very lengthy , written in the time of Augustus by Pompeius Trogus, but now lost. His date is unknown, except that he must have lived after Trogus. Although the main theme of Trogus was the history of the Macedonian monarchy, Justin permitted himself a certain amount of freedom of digression, and thus produced an anthology instead of a mere summary (the meaning of 'epitome'). Justin's history was widely used in the Middle Ages, during which the author was sometimes confounded with Justin Martyr]. it was built by the Achaeans. It had its beginning at the time the city of Rome was built, although some say that Perusius, the Trojan prince, was its builder, and that it was named Perusium, or Perusiam, after him. More than any other city in Italy, Perugia enjoyed the blessings of good fortune, and that to an incredible degree. This position it maintained, together with the same manners, customs and commercial dealings which it enjoyed before the building of Rome; and these it continued to enjoy when Rome was ruled by kings, consuls, emperors, and tyrants. Yet Perugia suffered from various attacks. After the death of Alexander the Great, it was forced to submit to the Romans, under the power and compulsion of L. Posthumus, the consul. [Posthumus (M. Cassianus Latinus Postumus) is second on the list of the thirty tyrants, enumerated by Trebellius Pollio. He was a man of humble origin and owed his advancement to merit. Valerian nominated him governor of Gaul, and he was specially entrusted with the defense of the Rhenish frontier]. Livy relates that Fabius, the Roman, during the period of unrest and wars in Etruria, slew 4500 Perugians. Later, under the rule of the Roman triumvirate, the city was very unfortunate. The emperor Octavian besieged L. Antonius, the brother of M. Antonius (Mark Anthony), in the city of Perugia, and during that time the forces of Anthony and the Perugians suffered famine to an unheard-of degree. The city was captured and destroyed. When Octavian became sole ruler, he soon rebuilt the city, securing it with forts and turrets, which are still to be seen there. He called the city Augusta (Augusta Perusia), after himself; and to this cubit-high inscriptions on the fortifications testify to this day. The city is so situated, surrounded by sharp peaks and mountains, that it requires no other form of defense. Although there has been much dissension among the people of the city, and they were at times oppressed by tyrants, Perugia is now free and has within it good and highly educated men and laws. Here are to be found mighty churches, and beautifully adorned cloisters for the spiritual, tall palaces for the laity, large hospitals for the poor, a very renowned school, a large market, a beautiful fountain and a park well improved with buildings. Its fields produce oil, wine, saffron and all manner of sweet fruits. Here flourished Baldus [Baldus de Ubaldis, Petrus (1327-1406) was an Italian jurist of the noble Ubaldis family. He studied civil law at Perugia under Bartolus, gaining the doctorate at the age of 17. Federicus Petrus of Siena was his master in the canon law. Baldus taught at Bologna for three years, and then became a professor at Perugia, where he stayed thirty-three years. Later he taught at Pisa, Florence, Padua, and Pavia, when the schools of law in those universities disputed supremacy with Bologna. The extant Treatises of Baldus hardly account for the reputation he enjoyed, due partly to his public career, and partly to the fame of his consultations of which there are five volumes], who was held in high esteem; and he, together with Bartolus Sassoferrato [Bartolus (1314-1357) was an Italian jurist, and the most famous master of the dialectical school. He was a native of Sassoferrato; whence his name Bartolus Saxoferrato. He studied law under Cinus at Perugia and other noted men at Bologna. His reputation was probably due to his revival of the exegetical system of law teaching. His treatises and are his best known works, although his has been sometimes exalted to equal authority with the code itself], were supreme in knowledge of the civil and canon law. Similarly, Angelus and Petrus, brothers. [Angelus and Petrus were brothers of Baldus, and also eminent as jurists]. And Cinus before them was a very skillful lawyer of Perugia. During our time Matheolus, the celebrated physician, was born here, and with his learning and teaching he flourished in the University of Padua. [Perusia (now Perugia) was an ancient city in the eastern part of Etruria. It was one of the 12 cities of the Etruscan confederacy. It was situated on a hill, and was strongly fortified by nature and by art. In conjunction with the other cities of Etruria, it long resisted the Roman power, but at a later period was made a Roman colony. It is memorable in the civil wars as the place in which L. Antonius, the brother of the triumvir, took refuge, when he was no longer able to oppose Octavian in the field, and where he was kept closely besieged by Octavian for some months, from the end of 41 BCE to the spring of 40. Famine compelled it to surrender; but one of its citizens having set fire to his own house, the flames spread, and the whole city was burnt to the ground. It was rebuilt and colonized anew by Augustus, from whom it received the surname of Augusta. In the later time of the empire it was the most important city in all Etruria, and long resisted the Goths. Part of the walls and some of the gates still remain. Perugia, the capital of Umbria, is the seat of an archbishopric and of a small university founded in 1320. It lies in a group of hills about 1,000 feet above the valley of the Tiber. Of the Etruscan walls that enclosed the old town, over 3,000 yards in length, considerable portions still remain. In the 14th-15th century, Perugia was the most powerful city in Umbria, but in 1370, rent by internal quarrels; it had to surrender to the pope. The struggle for independence was, however, continued under various leaders, notably Braccio Fortebraccio of Montone, who usurped the supreme power in 1416, and later under Giovanni Parlo Baglioni, down to the end of the 15th century. Perugia was famous as the seat of the Umbrian school of painting. Perugino and Pinturicchio lived there. Matheolus, to whom Doctor Schedel refers in the text, was for three years his instructor in medicine at the University of Padua (see folio CCLII verso).

CITY OF PERUGIA

The old Etrurian city of Perusia (now Perugia) is here represented by the same woodcut that at folio XXIII verso is used to represent the city of Damascus.

Folio XLIX recto

The writings of the religious teachers treating of these times give no consideration to the history of the pagans, perhaps because they are of no service in an understanding of the Holy Scriptures. Some make no mention of intermediate kings up to the time of Sardanapalus, the last Assyrian ruler.

Rehoboam (Roboam), son of Solomon, and third Hebrew king, did not follow the wisdom of his father; he scorned the advice of his elders, and followed the willful inclinations of younger men; and in consequence he depressed the people and retained but two of the tribes. This was called the kingdom of Judah. Because of his sinful conduct he was obliged to endure the violence and persecutions of the Egyptian king. Rehoboam had eighteen wives and thirty concubines, twenty-eight sons, and forty daughters. The kingdom of David was divided in the first year of his reign, and was never reunited.

Jehu (Hyeu), son of Hanani (Anani) the prophet, was sent to Baasha; and he firmly suffered martyrdom unto his death.

Jehu, Eleazar (Eliezer) and Uzziel (Oziel), together with Azariah (Azaria), prophesied for Asa (Aza), Jehoshaphat (Josaphat), and Joram, the kings of Judea.

After Silvius, the son of Aeneas from Lavinia, and third king of the Latins, the succeeding kings were called Silvius. He was called Silvius because he was raised in the woods and was a hunter. He was born after the death of his father. And he is called Postumus because he was born after the burial of his father Aeneas, according to that account of Virgil. By the common people he was called Postumus, and he reigned 29 years.

The German edition of the Chronicle replaces this paragraph with the following sentence: "The successors of Silvius Aeneas, son of the third king of Latium, were called Silvius after him."

All succeeding kings of Alba bore the name Silvius. These mythical kings according to Livy, Ovid and Dionysius, were as follows:

LIVY	OVID	DIONYSIUS
1. Aeneas	Aeneas	Aeneas
2. Ascanius	Ascanius	Ascanius
3. Silvius	Silvius	Silvius
4. Aeneas Silvius		Aeneas Silvius
5. Latinus Silvius	Latinus	Latinus Silvius
6. Alba	Alba	Alba
7. Atys	Epytus	Capetus
8. Capys	Capys	Capys Silvius
9. Capetus	Capetus	Capetus
10. Tiberinus	Tiberinus	Tiberinus
11. Agrippa	Remulus	Agrippa
12. Romulus Silvius	Acrota	Alladius
13. Aventinus	Aventinus	Aventinus
14. Proca	Palatinus	Procas
15. Amulius	Amulius	Amulius

Aeneas, son of said Silvius Postumus, reigned 31 years, and left an heir, Latinus, and died. [Postumia Gens was one of the most ancient patrician family clans at Rome. Its members frequently held the highest state offices. The most distinguished family in the gens was that of Albus or Albinus; but we also find at the commencement of the republic families of the names of Megellus and Tubertus].

Abijah, son of Rehoboam, and fourth king of the Jews, reigned three years. He was wicked before the Lord and followed in the evil ways of his father, and therefore reigned but a few years. Jeroboam, the king of Israel, made war against him, and in that war Jeroboam employed 80,000 fighting men and Abijah 40,000. And although Abijah saw such a great force coming against him, he trusted in God and he easily silenced and overcame it, and he slew 5,000 men in a single battle. [II Chron. 13:1-22.]

Hanani, the prophet, reproved Asa, and was therefore imprisoned. [II Chron. 16:7-10. The German edition of the switches the order of this paragraph and the one that follows it].

Latinus reigned 50 years in the time of David.

Alba Silvius was the son of Aeneas Silvius. He built the city of Alba, after which the kings of the Albans were named.

Atys (Achis) reigned for 24 years in the time of Rehoboam. His son Capys survived him.

Asa, in the beginning of his reign and up to the thirty-sixth year, did what was good before the Lord, and followed in the way of David, his father. He abolished idolatry and defeated the Ethiopians who came against him. [II Chron. 14:1-5]. Finally, he made a league with Benhadad (Benedab), king of Syria. This was a mistake, and the Lord sent the prophet Hanani to him; but Asa imprisoned him. [II Chron. 16:7-10]. For this reason he was diseased in the feet; and from that he died. [II Chron. 16:12-13.] While Asa ruled and all was well with the kingdom and according to the law of God, Zerah (Zara), king of the Ethiopians, attacked him with a vast army. Asa and his forces went forth to meet them. And he called upon the Lord, and the Ethiopians were frightened off, and turned in flight. [II Chron. 14:9-15]. Thereupon Azariah the prophet ran to meet Asa, and he comforted him with the prophecy that Jerusalem would be taken by the Chaldeans. [II Chron. 15:1-8].

The Lineage of Christ is here continued from Folio XLVI verso, which there ended with Solomon. We here resume, and add:

- Rehoboam (Roboam), son of Solomon;
- Abijah (Abya), son of Rehoboam; and
- Asa, son of Abijah.

And so we have just another line of kings, with crown, orb and scepter; the portrait of Rehoboam being a repetition of the woodcut called Belus, first king of Assyria at Folio XVII verso; while that of Asa stood for Ninus of the same line at the same place. The portrait of Abijah is new, but there is nothing unusual about it.

(B) JEHU, ELEAZER, OZIEL (UZZIEL), AND HANANI, THE PROPHETS.

- Silvius Postumus.
- Aeneas Silvius.
- Latinus Silvius.
- Alba Silvius.
- Atys (Achis) Silvius.

The Lineage of Italian Kings began at Folio XXXV recto.

Folio XLIX verso

Azariah, son of Obed, was a prophet and flourished at this time. He prophesied from prison. He went forth to meet Asa, the king. The king was encouraged by his words; and he was warned to abolish idolatry from the land of Judah and Benjamin. [He met Asa's victorious army at Mareshash and urged them to begin religious reform. (II Chron. 15:1-8)]

Zimri (Zamri), a king of Israel, annihilated the house of Baasha; but Zimri was before long himself defeated by Omri (Amri), who afterwards ruled in his place. [Omri was one of the most important kings of Israel and the founder of a dynasty. He was one of the generals of the army under Elah, son of Baasha. This king was assassinated by Zimri, another officer of the army who usurped the throne. Omri was at the siege of Gibbethon at the time, and his troops acclaimed him king in the place of his rival. A civil war of some duration followed. The forces of Omri marched forth to Tirzah, where Zimri resided, and captured it. Zimri set fire to the house he occupied and was consumed. The Israelites were then divided into two parties; but after a short struggle Omri prevailed and for a time occupied the old capital Tirzah. In the sixth year of his reign Omri built Samaria, which thereafter became the capital of the ten tribes. The prophet Micah (Micah 6:16) speaks of the "statutes of Omri," and denounces them. They were probably of an idolatrous character. Omri subdued Moab to Israel. The Assyrians first became acquainted with Israel in the time of Omri, and they called the country "the land of the house of Omri," even after the extinction of his dynasty. The length of his reign is stated to have been twelve years].

Elijah (Helia) the prophet, though prayers brought about a drought of three years upon the land; and he was fed by a raven at the brook Cherith (Carith). The raven brought him meat and bread early and late. He was also fed at Zarephath (Sareptana) by a widow who still had a small quantity of flour, which never grew less. And he raised her son from the dead. [] On Mount Carmel, before the assembled people, he caused the fire of heaven to come down upon the sacrifice, something which the 400 priests of the idolaters could not accomplish; and he slew them. [I Kings 18:19-40]. Therefore Jezebel pursued him, and Elijah fled into the wilderness. An angel appeared to him as he slept under a juniper tree. And the angel awakened him, and urged him to eat the bread which he had brought him; by the strength of which Elijah journeyed 40 days unto Mount Horeb. [I Kings 19:1-8]. And from there he went to Damascus. Thereafter the Lord drew him up into heaven by means of a whirlwind. []

Obadiah (Abdias), one of the twelve prophets, was a steward of the house of Ahab (Achab), king of Israel. Now when the queen, Jezebel (Jezabel) [Jezebel was a daughter of Ethbaal, king of Tyre, and previously high priest of the Tyrian Baal. She was the wife of Ahab, the king of Israel, of the dynasty of Omri. Her influence in the land of Israel, particularly in combating the religion of Yahweh in the interests of Baal worship, was exercised not only during the twenty-two years of Ahab's reign, but also during the thirteen years of the rule of her sons, Ahaziah and Joram. Moreover, this influence extended, though in a less degree, to the Southern Kingdom of Judah, where Athaliah, the daughter of Jezebel, seems to have followed in the footsteps of her mother (II Kings 8:18). In her strength of character, her lust for power, her unshrinking and resolute activity, her remorseless brushing aside of everything and anything that interfered with her plans, she was the prototype of Catherine de Medici. In the Old Testament, the figure of Jezebel is presented in connection with some dramatic episodes—such as the account of the trial of strength between the prophets of Baal and Elijah (I Kings 18:19 to 19:3); the narrative about Naboth and his vineyard (I Kings 21:1-16), and, as illustrating her obstinate and unbending character to the very end—note particularly her words to Jehu in II Kings 9:31, and the story of her death in II Kings 9:30-37], Ahab's wife, slew the prophets of the Lord, Obadiah hid fifty from among them in one cave, and fifty in another; and for this he earned the spirit of prophecy. [I Kings 18:4].

Ahab, the sixth king of Israel, chiefly because of the influence of his wife, Jezebel, exceeded all his predecessors in wickedness. Finally he was wounded in battle, and died. Jezebel was the daughter of the king of Sidon, and a symbol of wrath. She killed Naboth and the prophets of the Lord, but was herself slain by Jehu and eaten by dogs. []

Micaiah or Micah (Micheas), a prophet out of the tribe of Ephraim (Ephrem), often reproved Ahab for his sins, and prophesied to him that he would die; and so in a war against Syria, he was shot to death while alone on a chariot.

Micaiah, or Micah, the son of Imlah, is called by Ahab, at the request of his ally, Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, to prophesy the result of a projected expedition against the Syrians, and he foretells the disaster which will befall them if they go up to Ramothgilead to battle. But Ahab, king of Israel, and Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, nevertheless gave battle there.

And a certain man drew a bow on a whim, and struck the king of Israel between the joints of the harness: and so he said to the driver of his chariot, Turn your hand, and carry me out of the battle; for I am wounded. And the battle increased that day: and the king remained in his chariot against the Syrians, and died in the evening; and the blood ran out of the wound into the midst of the chariot. . . So the king died, and was brought to Samaria; and they buried the king in Samaria. And one washed the chariot in the pool of Samaria; and the dogs licked up his blood; and they washed his armor; according to the word of the Lord which he spoke.

Ahaziah (Ochosias), the seventh king of Israel, sent (messengers) to Beelzebub, the local deity of Ekron (Accaron) [Ekron was the most northerly of the five cities of the Philistines, in the lowlands of Judah. It is now called Akir and is on a hill 12 miles south of Joppa], to learn whether he would get well again. But he died as Elijah had prophesied. He began to reign in the seventeenth year of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, and he left no son. Joram, his brother, succeeded him in the kingdom. ["Ahaziah, the son of Ahab, began to reign over Israel in Samaria the seventeenth year of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, and reigned two years over Israel." (I Kings 22:51) "Then Moab rebelled against Israel after the death of Ahab. And Ahaziah fell down through a lattice in his upper chamber that was in Samaria, and was sick, and he sent for messengers and said to them, Go, enquire of Beelzebub the god of Ekron whether I shall recover of this disease. But the angel of the Lord said to Elijah the Tishbite, Arise, go up to meet the messengers of the king of Samaria, and say to them, Is it not because there is not a God in Israel, that you go to enquire of Beelzebub the god of Ekron? Now, therefore, thus says the Lord, You shall not come down from that bed on which you now are, but shall surely die. And Elijah departed. (II Kings 1:1-4) "So he died according to the word of the Lord which Elijah had spoken. And Jehoram reigned in his stead in the second year of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat king of Judah; because he had no son." (II Kings 1:17)]

Jonah (Jonas), the son of Amittai (Amathi), was a brilliant prophet, and prophesied many things that are not here related. He was thereafter sent to Nineveh, as is related in his book. While still a child he is said to have been awakened from the dead by Elijah. He was swallowed by a whale. By his dangerous sea voyage he presaged the sufferings of Christ. [Jonah, the prophet, was the son of Amittai. Nothing certain is known of his history except his autobiography, contained in his own book. According to the biblical text bearing his name, he was sent by God to Nineveh, the metropolis of ancient Assyria, to preach repentance, and to announce the city's impending doom. For a reason not mentioned until the conclusion of the Book of Jonah—the fear that God would repent of his purpose—he refused to obey; and in order to escape from the immediate jurisdiction of God, he took passage at Joppa for Tarshish (Tartessus in Spain), in a heathen ship. A great storm arose, and the crew holding him responsible for this misfortune to their craft, cast him overboard. He was swallowed by a whale, but after three days and nights he was spewed up on land].

Jehoram (Joram) was besieged in Samaria by Benhadad; but he was relieved by the efforts of Elisha. He began to reign in the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat the king, in the place of his brother Ahaziah. But thereafter he followed in the wicked ways of Jeroboam, and was slain, together with all his father's house, by Jehu; although for many years he had observed the laws of God and ruled his subjects justly, and had held Elisha the prophet in honor and respect. The Moabite king made war upon his kingdom and overthrew and plundered it. [Jehoram of Israel, was a son of Ahab, and came to the throne after the brief reign of his brother Ahaziah. The first thing that claimed his attention was the revolt of Moab. This he endeavored to suppress, and with the aid of Jehoshaphat of Judah, he obtained some successes; but in the end the allied forces retreated without having accomplished their purpose. It is probably that the Moabites assumed the offensive, and took some of the Israelite cities. The prophet Elisha was active during the reign of Jehoram, and it is likely that the siege of Samaria, of which there is a graphic account in II Kings 6 and 7, also belongs to this period. Jehoram of Israel is to be distinguished from his namesake of Judah, the son of Jehoshaphat, who came to the throne of Judah during the reign of the other Jehoram in Israel. He was married to Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel (II Kings 8:16-24)].

(A) HEBREW PROPHETS

To the left of this page we see a vertical array of the five Hebrew prophets, all of whom are briefly mentioned in the accompanying text:

1. Azariah (Azarias), who was Abdon at Folio XLI recto.
2. Elijah (Helya), who was Hercules at Folio XXXVII recto.
3. Obadiah (Abdias).
4. Micaiah (Micheas).
5. Jonah (Jonas).

The Lineage of Israelite Kings is here continued from Folio XLVIII recto (Jeroboam I, Nadab, Baash and Elah), and the following are added:

1. Zimri (Zamri).
2. Omri (Amri).
3. Ahab (Achab) and Jezebel (Jesabel), a new dual portrait.
4. Ahaziah (Ochosias).
5. Jehoram (Joram).

As noted, the only new woodcut is the dual portrait of Ahab, and his queen Jezebel, both of whom appear with sword in hand, as though ready for any bloody work that might present itself.

Folio L recto

Jericho, at one time a royal residence and celebrated city, has now become a little village. It lies in a very beautiful region in the valley of the Jordan. It has about eight houses. All evidence of its holy character has entirely disappeared. The Holy Scriptures state that the Lord did much in Jericho. He miraculously broke down its walls, and caused Joshua to pronounce a curse against anyone who should rebuild them. [Josh. 6:26]. Rahab the prostitute was of this city. [Rahab, Josh. 2:8-23; 6:17-25]. And there Christ was given lodging in the house of Zacchaeus. [Zacchaeus was chief revenue officer of the district. (Luke 19:1-9)] There also bears tore asunder those who mocked Elisha the prophet. In this city the Lord made the blind to see. [Matt. 20:24-34; Mark 10:46-52; Luke 18:35-58]. Near it was a garden of balsams, of whose delights something has been written. This valley with its adjacent mountains which enclose it like a wall, covers an area of 200,000 jugera. [The Latin edition of the uses the word >jugera; the German, morgen. It is a Roman land measure, corresponding to our acre. But the Roman has 28,800 square feet, equivalent to 240 feet in length by 120 feet in width; while the English and American statute acre contains 43,560 square feet, or 4,840 square yards, or 160 square rods. The English and American rod is 5½ yards in length; so the square rod has 30.25 square yards]. Therein is a grove widely renowned for its fruitfulness and its delights. The balsam trees resemble pines, but are lower in stature. [The balsam or balm grows to a height of 12 to 14 feet. It belongs to the evergreen family. The resin that it produces is exceedingly odoriferous. It was anciently found in Judea and particularly in Gilead, from whence the Ishmaelites carried it as merchandise to Egypt. It was reckoned very valuable in the cure of external wounds, and was known as "the balm of Gilead."] They are grown like the vineyards. Although the sun is hottest in this region, the atmosphere is moderated by the shade of these trees. [Jericho is a very ancient city mentioned in the Old Testament as well as the New. It is situated in the valley of the Jordan, about five miles west of the river, and six or seven miles north of the Dead Sea. The portion of the plain on which it stood was noted for its fertility, being watered by a large spring, called the "Fountain of Elisha." Jericho is first mentioned as the city against which the Israelites were encamped before entering the Promised Land. (Deut. 34:3; Num. 22:1; 26:3). The town was of considerable size, strongly fortified, and a royal seat. Spies were sent into the city and received by Rahab the harlot. The wall fell after being encompassed seven days. A curse was thereafter pronounced against anyone who should rebuild it (Josh. 6:26). This curse was fulfilled upon Hiel, 553 years later (I Kings 16:34). In spite of many conquests, Jericho continued to flourish. The city is mentioned 56 times in the Old Testament and 7 times in the New].

As Elijah wandered about with his disciple Elisha, they came to the river Jordan. And as Elijah struck the waters with his mantle, a path was formed, and they went through the middle. Thereupon Elijah asked Elisha to express a wish before he (Elijah) was taken away from him. And he prayed Elijah to give him a double portion of his spirit, that is, to do miracles, and to prophesy. And Elijah said, if you see me when I am taken from you, you shall receive it. And while they thus talked to one another, a fiery chariot appeared, with fiery horses. And Elijah stepped in the chariot, and was taken up into heaven, that is, into the earthly paradise. There he will stay, alive, with Enoch, up to the time of Antichrist. Then he will depart from there to preach. And Elisha cried, my father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof, etc. And he took hold of the mantle that had fallen from Elijah, and returned to the Jordan. And he struck it with the mantle a second time; and the waters parted. And he went to Jericho to live there. At the request of the inhabitants he cured the evil waters of the region with a new jar containing salt, which he let down into the waters, making them fresh and good. And he went up from there to Bethel, and the children laughed at him, and said, go up, you bald head. And he cursed them, and two bears came and tore 42 of the children. [] Elijah, the greatest prophet of his time, was, during this period, thus taken away from the people. Nobody saw the end. During his lifetime he worked many miracles; and he was like a burning fire, and his words like a flaming torch. Finally, in the presence of Elisha, he was carried to heaven in a whirlwind, and he left Elisha behind in his stead.

ILLUSTRATIONS

(A) THE CITY OF JERICHO.

Jericho is represented by a woodcut 5"x 8-7/8". The place has the appearance of desolation. Before us are the city walls and gate. In the distance are the ruins of what was probably a castle or fort. Except for a few trees and shrubs, the landscape is barren, the city deserted. The woodcut is here used for the first time.

(B) ASCENSION OF ELIJAH.

(B) The Ascension of Elijah is represented by a woodcut approximately 5-1/4" square. The prophet is leaving the earth in a fiery four-wheeled box-shaped wagon, resembling those used by children at play. The vehicle is rather diminutive in comparison with its load. The horses disappear in a cloud of fire. Elijah looks back at Elisha who has seized the mantle of his master.

Folio L verso

Ben-hadad (Benedab), a son of Tab-rimmon (Tabremmon), a son of Hezion (Ozyon), king of Syria, entered into a league with Baasha, the king of Israel. After breaking this alliance, he entered into a league with Asa the king of Judah; since which time the kings of Syria afflicted the kingdom of Israel, etc. [I Kings 15:16-22]. Ben-hadad, the king of Syria, assembled his forces; and he had thirty-two kings to aid him. He joined in battle with Ahab, the king of Israel. The Lord, through a prophet, prophesied a victory (for Israel) and the defeat of the enemy. And so it happened, for the enemy fled. But the king of Syria at the return of the year strengthened himself with a new army, and he came on to give battle to Israel in the plains, saying that the gods of the hills were the gods of Israel; for which reason they (the Syrians) were formerly defeated. But the Syrian army was again routed, and of their number 100,000 were slain and over 47,000 fled to the city, where they were crushed by the falling of the wall. But Ben-hadad the king of Syria concealed himself; and he sent messengers to Ahab in hairy raiment, and with ashes upon their heads, to plead for mercy. And this Ahab granted, and left him free. For this a prophet, clad in disguise, called him to account by means of the parable of the man who was asked to keep another man prisoner, on pain of losing his own life if he escaped. And as Ahab had released Ben-hadad, who was deserving of death, therefore he prophesied that Ahab would lose his own life for Ben-hadad's and his people theirs in lieu of the lives of Ben-hadad's people. []

Hazael (Asael), king of Syria, was, according to prophecy and by the secret judgment of God, made a king of Syria, to punish the children of Israel. Over him Elisha wept, prophesying that he was a future king of Syria, and would do great evil in Israel. And as a punishment for their sins, the Lord sent him into all the lands of Gilead, Ruben, and Manassa; [Hazael was an officer at the court of Syria, and subsequently its most powerful king. Elijah was to anoint him, but left this duty to Elisha; and so when Hazael was dispatched by the king, Ben-hadad, to Elisha to inquire about the consequences of his affliction, the prophet predicted the elevation of Hazael to the throne of Syria, and that he would fire the strongholds of the Israelites, slay their young men with the sword, dash their children, and rip up their women with child. (II Kings 8:7-13) And so he warred against the kingdom of Israel and Judah. "And he attacked them in all the coasts of Israel; from Jordan eastward, all the land of Gilead, the Gadites and the Reubenites, and the Manassites, from Aroer, which is by the river Arnon, even Gilead and Bashan." (II Kings 10:32, 33)] and he was a blight all the days of Jehoahaz (Joathas).

Cf. II Kings 13:1-3:

In the three and twentieth year of Joash, the son of Ahaziah king of Judah, Jehoahaz, the son of Jehu, began to reign over Israel in Samaria, and reigned seventeen years. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, and followed the sons of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, which made Israel to sin; and he did not depart from there. And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and he delivered them into the hands of Hazael, king of Syria, and into the hands of Ben-hadad, the son of Hazael, all their days."

The reign of Jehoahaz was disastrous to Israel. The country was pillaged by the Syrians. The army was reduced to but a shadow. When his troubles multiplied, Jehoahaz sought the Lord whom he had forsaken, and the Lord ultimately raised up a deliverer in the person of Jehoash, or Joash, his son.

But by the grace of the Lord God, Joash (Joas), his son, took the cities from the hands of Ben-hadad, the son of Hazael, after Hazael's death.

Ben-hadad was the son of Hazael. Joash, the son of Jehoahaz (Joachas) and the king of Israel, took from the hands of Ben-hadad the cities that his (Ben-hadad's) father Hazael had won by war from Jehoahaz. For Joash defeated him three times. [Hazael oppressed Israel all the days of Jehoahaz. When Hazael died, Ben-hadad his son reigned in his stead as king of Syria. And Jehoash (Joash), son of Jehoahaz, took again out of the hands of Ben-hadad, son of Hazael, the cities which he had taken out of the hand of Jehoahaz his father, by war. Three times Joash defeated him and recovered the cities of Israel (II Kings 13:22-25)].

Jehoiada (Joiada) was a distinguished man. He prevented Athaliah from ruling over Judah, and placed Joash, the son of Jehoram, in her stead. As one reads, he lived, according to Moses, 130 years. Pursuant to divine will he arranged matters so that Athaliah was slain in the house of the king. [Jehoiada was a high priest of the Jews. He was the husband of Jehosheba. His administration was so important to the civil and religious interests of the nation, that when he died at an advanced age he was buried in the royal sepulchers at Jerusalem. Athaliah was the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel. She introduced Baal-worship into Judah. She advised her own son in his wickedness, and after Jehu had slain him, she resolved to destroy the children of her husband by his former wives, and then take the throne of Judah. But Jehosheba, a half-sister of Ahaziah, secured Joash, one of the children and heir, and secreted him and his nurse for six years. In the seventh year, everything being prepared for the purpose, Joash, the young prince, was brought out and placed on the throne. Attracted by the crowd of people who had assembled to witness the ceremony, and unsuspecting of the cause, Athaliah hastened to the temple. When the people had assembled, and when she saw the young king on the throne, and heard the shouts of the people, and found that all her ambitious designs were about to fail, she tore her clothes and shouted, Treason! Treason! hoping probably to rally a party in favor of her interests. The priest commanded her to be removed from the temple, and she was slain between the temple and the palace. And Jehoiada made a covenant between the Lord and the king and the people, that they should be the Lord's people; between the king also and the people. (II Kings 11:13-17)]

Rezin (Raasim), the king of Syria, devastated Judah in the time of Ahaz (Achas). For this reason Tiglath-pileser (Teglatphalazar) besieged him at Damascus. He captured the city, and slew Rezin.

Ahaz succeeded his father Jotham as the eleventh king of Judah. He worshipped other gods, and even sacrificed his children to the gods. This course brought upon him and his kingdom severe judgments. God made them flee before their enemies. Their allies often proved unfaithful. Early in his reign, Pekah, king of Israel, and Rezin, king of Syria, who just at the close of Jotham's reign had confederated for the destruction of Judah, invaded the kingdom with a powerful army and laid siege to Jerusalem. The allies, though defeated at Jerusalem, captured Elath, wasted Judah, and carried 200,000 into captivity. Ahaz in his extremity made a league with Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, who freed him from his enemies, but at the cost of the Judaic kingdom, which became tributary, and Ahaz sent him all the treasures of the temple and palace, and appeared before him in Damascus as a vassal. His only permanent service to his people was the introduction of the sun dial, which was probably connected with the Assyrian astrology and necromancy.

This paragraph and the next have their order switched in the German edition of the Chronicle.

Zechariah (Zacharias) the son of Jehoiada, was stoned between the altar and the temple at the command of the king because he upbraided the king for leaving the way of the Lord. []

Azariah (Azarias), relying on the laws of God, resisted Uzziah (Ozie), the king of Judah, who was about to sacrifice there, etc. [Azariah was the high priest who in the reign of Uzziah resisted with the eighty priests the king's attempt to perform priestly functions. (II Kings 14:21; II Chron. 26:17-20)]

Naboth, an Israelite, had a vineyard by the house of King Ahab. Ahab attempted to purchase the vineyard, in order to make a garden of it. To this Naboth was opposed. And as Jezebel, the king's wife, saw that Ahab was saddened by this, she comforted him, and so arranged matters that Naboth was accused of blasphemy by false witnesses. Although innocent, he was stoned. When Ahab came to take possession of the vineyard, the Lord sent Elijah, the prophet, to him, to prophesy his extermination and that of his house, because of this sin. [This is substantially the story of Naboth and his vineyard as told in I Kings 21].

The Priestly Lineage is here continued from Folio XLVIII recto (where Zadok and his son Ahimaaz were shown); and now are added the following:

1. Azariah (Azarias), the son of Ahimaaz, represented by the woodcut which did service for Ozy at Folio XXXVII verso.
2. Jehoiada (Yoyada), represented by woodcut used for Abishua at Folio XXXVII verso.
3. Azariah, (designated Asarias).

(B) LINEAGE OF THE SYRIAN KINGS

The Lineage of the Syrian Kings has its inception here with the following:

1. Ben-hadad I (Benedab).
2. Hazael (Asael).
3. Ben-hadad II (Benedab).
4. Rezin (Raasim).

NOTE: There were two Syrian kings named Ben-hadad (I and II), father and son. The first was hired by Asa, king of Judah, to make war on Baasha, king of Israel (I Kings 15:18-22). The second, his son, made war on Ahab, king of Israel (I Kings 20; II Kings 6:27; 7:6; 8:7-15). There was also a Ben-hadad III, son of Hazael, and who was thrice defeated by Joash and lost all his father had gained (II Kings 13).

(C) ZECHARIAS

Zechariah (Zacharias) son of the high priest Jehoiada, branches out from his father into the midst of the text. It was he who was stoned for rebuking Joash for his idolatry (II Chron. 24:21). It is the same woodcut that served for Yepte at Folio XLI recto.

(D) NABOTH

Naboth, owner of the vineyard coveted by Ahab and his Jezebel, is represented by a portrait in the lower right side of the page. It is the same woodcut that served for Abymelech at Folio XXXVII verso and Achias at XLVIII recto.

Aquileia (Aquileia), a city of Italy, and located beyond Padua, while once the first and mightiest (city), and also the most beautiful, and situated a short distance from the sea, is in our time almost entirely abandoned. It was named after the Trojan, Aquilus, who, with others was driven out of Troy. Then the building of the city began, and from him it has its name. And although a few priests and canons in a small way provide holy services in a decorated and beautiful little church, and a few herdsmen and fishermen reside there, yet a people do not live there now; so that this once magnificent city can hardly be called a citadel now. At present there is the church, just mentioned, and the patriarchal court, the walls about the city, and a convent, and evidences of the work of Peponis, the patriarch. The city began to flourish when the Romans began to raise their hands against the barbarian people living on the Danube. And although the Emperor Augustus Octavianus conducted the war largely through emissaries, yet to be nearer to them he marched (as Suetonius writes) from Rome to Ravenna, Milan and Aquileia. Julia traveled with him, and she was delivered of a child. [This may refer to Julia, the only daughter of Augustus, who was born to him by his wife Scribona]. The Aquileians sided with the Romans against the Maximinians, and were so faithful and ingenious that when there was a scarcity of sinews for bow-strings, they used the locks of their wives and made bow-strings from that. [Maximinus was Roman emperor from 235 CE to 238. He was born in a village on the confines of Thrace, of barbarian parents, his father being a Goth and his mother a German from the tribe of the Alani. Brought up as a shepherd, he attracted the attention of Septimius Severus by his gigantic stature and marvelous feats of strength, and was permitted to enter the army. He eventually rose to the highest rank in the service; and on the murder of Alexander Severus by the mutinous troops in Gaul (235), he was proclaimed emperor. He immediately bestowed the title of Caesar on his son Maximinus. During the three years of his reign he carried on war with success against the Germans; but his government was characterized by a degree of oppression and bloody excesses. The Roman world at length became tired of the monster. The senate and the provinces gladly acknowledged the two Gordiani, who had been proclaimed emperors in Africa; and after their death the senate itself proclaimed Maximinus and Balbinus emperors (238). As soon as Maximinus heard of the elevation of the Gordians he hastened from his winter quarters. Having crossed the Alps, he laid siege to Aquileia, and was there slain by his own soldiers along with his son Maximus. The most extraordinary tales are related of the physical powers of Maximinus. His height exceeded eight feet. The circumference of his thumb was equal to that of a woman's wrist, so that the bracelet of his wife served him for a ring. It is said that he was able to single-handedly draw a loaded wagon, could with his fist knock out the grinders, and with a kick break the leg of a horse; while his appetite was such that in one day he could eat forty pounds of meat and drink an amphora of wine]. Industry and trade in oriental and occidental wares which were brought together there made this city wonderfully and superabundantly rich; for while this city flourished there was no other place on the Adriatic Sea where the people of the Orient and the Occident could get together for the purchase and sale of their merchandise. And after this city had flourished for a long time, it was finally completely destroyed by Attila. The inhabitants fled to Venice and they augmented the city wonderfully. When the holy evangelist St. Mark was sent to Alexandria by St. Peter, and the ships were being prepared at Aquileia, he converted the Aquileians to the Christian faith. And the gospel, which he wrote with his own hand, is held in great esteem at Venice. The pious Hermagoras (Hermagoras) [Hermagorus, the tutelary and first bishop of Aquileia], who was also converted by the preaching of St. Mark, and in Aquileia by St. Peter, and who was appointed the highest councilor over all Venetia, won over this whole region for our Lord by his conversion to the Christian faith. He and St. Fortunatus were slain with an axe by the Emperor Nero. Chromatius [Chromatius was a Latin writer and bishop of Aquileia. He flourished at the close of the fourth century and the commencement of the fifth. The year and place of his birth are unknown. Though he condemned the writings of Origen, his friendship for Rufinus continued. The latter also dedicated some of his works to him, especially Latin translation of the ecclesiastical history of Eusebius. Jerome showed his regard by inscribing some of his writings to him. He urged Jerome to translate the Hebrew Scriptures into Latin. When Anastasius, the Pope, condemned both Origen and Rufinus, Chromatius was so far from coinciding, that he received Rufinus into the communion of his church. Of his works there are extant his and some tracts on the beatitudes and on parts of the Gospel of Matthew. A few epistles also remain. Several epistles addressed to Chromatius by Jerome are extant among the voluminous works of the latter. Jerome styles him most holy and learned; but he seems to have been a man of judgment and determination rather than of great ability]. of whom the glorified Jerome has written much, was also of Aquileia; also Rufinus (Ruffinus), the priest, so learned in the Latin and the Greek [Rufinus (surnamed Tyrannius or Turranius, or Toranus), was a celebrated ecclesiastical writer. He was born in Italy about 345 CE and was at first an inmate of the monastery at Aquileia. Later he resided for many years at a monastery in Palestine, where he became intimate with Jerome. The two afterwards quarreled, and Jerome attacked Rufinus vehemently because he supported the tenets of Origen. After spending twenty-six years in the east, Rufinus returned to Italy in 397, where he published a Latin translation of Pamphilus' for Origen, as well as Origen's , together with an original tract . In the preface to the , he quoted a panegyric, which Jerome had at an early period pronounced upon Origen. This led to bitter correspondence between the two former friends, which was crowned by the Apologia ('Defense') of the one adversus Hieronymum, and the Apologia of the other adversus Rufinum. Rufinus died in Sicily in 410. He had fled to the island when Alaric invaded Italy]. that we in no small measures esteem his books and interpretations among all the works of the teachers of the church. [Aquileia was located at the very head of the Adriatic, about 60 stadia from the sea. It was founded by the Romans in 182 BCE as a bulwark against the northern barbarians, and it is said to have derived its name from the favorable omen of an eagle (Aquila) appearing to the colonists. Being the key of Italy on the northeast, it was made one of the strongest fortresses of the Romans. From its position it also became a most flourishing commercial center. The Via Aemilia was continued to this town, and from it all the roads to Rhaetia, Noricum, Pannonia, Istria and Dalmatia branched off. It was taken and completely destroyed by Attila in 452 CE, but its inhabitants escaped to the Lagoons, where Venice was afterwards built].

Treviso (Taruismum), a city lying in the March of Treviso, was at this period (as Sicardus the bishop of Cremona states) founded by some Trojans. The city is divided by the river Sile that flows out of the mountains nearby, and by this and other rivers, having their sources there; it is watered and rendered productive. Treviso is said to have originated in the time of the Ostrogoths, and was then as it appears today; for the father of Totila, the king, made it his royal seat. Totila was the fifth king of the Ostrogoths, and a very distinguished man. He was born and brought up a Treviso. But thereafter, in the beginning of the Lombard kingdom, Alboin, the king of the same, went into Italy, and Aquileia and other cities surrendered to him. Treviso, however, was slow in doing so, and he decided to plunder and destroy it. Felix, the bishop of the city (as Gregory writes), a wise and fearless man and native of Ravenna, was not to be intimidated by the king's grimness. This city was also graced with another distinguished bishop, named Hermalao, who (as becomes a bishop) was more interested in being useful to his people than in merely lording over them. And while the whole March of Treviso was named after this city, yet I believe this was merely due to awkwardness in the use of the name; for in this region are other large cities like Verona and Padua, which excelled Treviso in reputation, power, and wealth. The Lombards possessed a large share of the lands of Italy and among them were four duchies; but in these their sons and grandsons had no lawful rights of inheritance. These were the Beneventan, Spoletanian, Taurinian and Flaurian regions; also two others, namely the Anconitanian and Trevisian regions, of equal rank with the aforesaid in size and wealth, and held upon condition that whosoever should attain to the kingship with the consent of the king, or through a general assembly of the Lombard people, should have the right and power to pass the lordship on to his sons or other male issue by inheritance. This city, like Padua, did not escape the ravages of Celim and his brother Alberti of Rumano, at whose hands it suffered innumerable troublesome attacks, worries, and sorrows. [The ancient Tarvisium lay off the main roads, and was not often mentioned by the ancients. In the sixth century it appeared to be an important place and was the seat of a Lombard duke. Charlemagne made it the capital of a marquisate. It joined the Lombard league and was independent after the peace of Constance (1183) until in 1339 it came under the Venetian sway. From 1318 it was for a short time the seat of a university. Its walls and ramparts were renewed under the direction of Fra Giocondo (1509). Treviso was taken in 1797 by the French under Mortier (duke of Treviso). In March 1848, the Austrian garrison was driven from the town by the revolutionary party, but in the following June the town was bombarded and compelled to capitulate. The modern Treviso is the Episcopal see of Venetia, and capital of the province of Treviso. It is situated on the plain between the Gulf of Venice and the Alps, and is eighteen miles by rail from Venice, at the confluence of the Sile and the Botteniga. The former flows partly around its walls, the latter through the town, and it has canal communication with the lagoons. It contains many fine works of art].

The ancient city of Travisium (now Treviso) is represented by a woodcut that was used to represent Paris at Folio XXXIX recto.

Folio LII recto

Jehoshaphat (Josaphat) did good in the sight of the Lord, and one reads of him nothing more deserving of punishment than that he gave assistance to an unworthy king of Israel. He extinguished all men of feminine inclinations from the soil of Judah, destroyed idolatry, observed the laws of the fathers; and by such virtues he overcame all the princes in the vicinity. The Palestinians began to pay him tribute. He lived sixty years, and his body was buried at Jerusalem with great pomp. [Jehoshaphat was the son and successor of Asa, king of Judah (I Kings 15:24; II Chron. 17:1). He came to the throne at the age of thirty-five and reigned 25 years. He was a man of distinguished piety, and his reign was powerful and prosperous (II Chron. 17:3-6). He caused the altars and places of idolatry to be destroyed, diffused knowledge of the law throughout the kingdom, and the place of judicial and ecclesiastical authority to be filled by the best men of the land (II Chron. 17:6-9). His sin in forming a league with Ahab, contrary to the counsel of Micaiah, against Ramoth-gilead was severely censured by Jehu (II Chron. 19:2), and nearly cost him his life (II Chron. 18:31). Later in life he connected himself with Ahaziah, son and successor of Ahab, kind of Israel, in a naval expedition; but this alliance with another wicked king also turned out disastrously; for the fleet was utterly destroyed in a storm (II Chron. 20:35, 37). Again, he involved himself in an alliance with Jehoram, the second son of Ahab, and also with the Edomites, for the purpose of invading the land of Moab; but while they attempted to make their way through the wilderness their water supply failed, and the whole army would have perished with thirst had not a miraculous supply been granted in answer to the prayers of Elisha, who accompanied the army (II Kings 3:6-20). Jehoshaphat had seven sons, one of whom, Jehoram, succeeded him].

Capys (Capis) Silvius built Capua in Campania, and he reigned 28 years and left the kingdom to his son Capetus (Carpentus).

Jehoram (Ioram), the ill-tempered, murdered his brother, and walked in the ways of the kings of Israel. Therefore he was unlucky in all his undertakings and died miserably. Although born of a spiritual father, he was inclined to infidelity and led the sons of Judah to unchaste practices. He followed the unchaste Ahab, whose daughter named Athaliah was his wife, and through her influence he daily committed acts of madness. [Jehoram (Ioram or Joram) was the eldest son of Jehoshaphat, and his successor as king of Judah. He married Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, and proved himself as wicked as his relatives. One of the first acts of his government was to put to death his six brothers and several of the chief men of the kingdom (II Chron. 21:4). To punish him for this and other abominations of his reign, the Edomites revolted and secured their independence from the throne of Judah (II Chron. 21:8-10). One of his own cities also revolted, and at about the same time he received a writing from Elisha, admonishing him of the dreadful calamities which he was bringing on himself by his wickedness. His territory was overrun by the enemy; the king's palace was plundered, and the royal family, except the youngest son, made prisoners. The king himself was struck with an incurable disease that carried him off unlamented (II Chron. 21:14-20)].

Capetus (Carpentus) [No doubt intended for Capetus, the eighth in the line of the kings of Alba who bore the cognomen Silvius (See note on Silvius, Folio XLIX recto, above)]. reigned 30 years after his father, in the time of Jehoshaphat.

Ahaziah (Ochosias), son of Jehoram, and eighth king of Judah, was, like his father, wicked in the sight of the Lord. And soon he was slain by Jehu. Matthew, the evangelist, left this king and the two succeeding ones, namely Joash and Amasias by the wayside. For he wished to mention but three foreigners; or (as Jerome and Augustine state) since Jehoram took to wife the daughter of the most evil Jezebel, therefore his sons to the fourth generation were rejected by the Lord. For Ahaziah walked in the way of Ahab, his maternal ancestor. This Ahaziah, Jehu, the prince of the house of Jehoram, the king of Samaria, exterminated with the entire house of Ahab. His corpse was taken from the city of Megiddo and buried in Jerusalem. [Ahaziah, also called Azariah, was a son of Jehoram and Athaliah. At the age of 22 he succeeded his father as king of Judah (II Kings 8:25). He continued the idolatry of the house of Ahab, and was governed by the advice of his infamous mother. He reigned but one year. He allied himself with his uncle Jehoram, king of Israel, and attacked Hazael, king of Syria, who defeated them at Ramoth-gilead. Jehoram was severely wounded and carried to his palace at Jezreel. There Ahaziah visited him. Israel meanwhile rebelled under Jehu. The two kings went out to meet him, and Jehu killed Jehoram. Ahaziah fled, and was pursued to the pass of Gur, where he was mortally wounded, but escaped, and died at Megiddo].

Tiberius (Tiberius) Silvis reigned nine years, and after he was drowned in the Tiber, formerly called the Albula, the river was named after him. [Albula was the ancient name of the river Tiber (Tibris)]. And so Romulus [Probably Remulus (Agrippa) the royal successor of Tiberinus]. made Tiberius a god, for he believed him to be the ruler of the river Tiber, whose use was very necessary to Rome.

Athaliah, a very vain and proud woman, after the death of her son Ahaziah, brazenly assumed sovereignty over the kingdom; and she slew all the royal seed except Joash (Joas) whom the wife of Jehoiada the bishop, and daughter of Jehoram, nourished in concealment for seven years. After she had reigned seven years Jehoiada cruelly murdered her. [Athaliah, see note on Jehoiada and Athaliah, Folio L verso].

Agrippa Silvius, king of the Albans, or Italians, reigned for 40 years after his father, the aforesaid Tiberinus. [Agrippa (Silvius), so called by Livy and Dionysus, but called Remulus by Ovid. See note on the Silvian kings of Alba, Folio XLIX recto].

Jonadab, son of Rechab, was a highly renowned man, in whom the very pious line of the Rechabites originated. When Jehu determined to slay the priests of Baal, Jonadab prophesied to him; for he and his sons were zealous lovers of divine honor, great moderation, and piousness. [The Rechabites were a tribe of Kenite or Midianite origin, descendants of Jehonadab or Jonadab and named from his father or ancestor Rechab. They were worshippers of the true God, though not fully identified with Israel. Jonadab aided Jehu in exterminating the idolatrous house of Ahab (II Kings 10:15-23). He laid an injunction on his posterity not to drink wine, build houses, sow seed, plant vineyards or hold lands, but to dwell in tents (Jer. 35:6-7). These rules were obeyed by his descendants, and their nomadic life and simple habits may have facilitated their escape from the Assyrians, who carried captive the Israelites of the northern kingdom, in which Jonadab had dwelt. Nearly 300 years after Jonadab's day, the Rechabites took refuge in Jerusalem on Nebuchadnezzar's invasion of Judea in the reign of Jehoiakim. Jeremiah was commanded by God to invite them into the temple and offer them wine to drink, that their refusal and filial obedience might rebuke the Jews for their disobedience to God's commands. A divine promise of continued existence was conveyed to the Rechabites by Jeremiah (Jer. 35:1-19) and was undoubtedly fulfilled though it may not now be possible to distinguish them, as some claim to do, among the tribes of Central Arabia]. And mark that the sons of Rechab, by command of their father, lived in the tabernacle as pilgrims and guests upon the earth, isolated from all mankind. They built no house, sowed no seed, and drank no wine.

During the time of Jehoram (Joram), king of Judah, the roof of the temple and its furniture, which had become old and neglected during the reign of Athaliah, were repaired with funds which were collected at the command of the king; for up to this time the priests had neglected to repair such things, although they had received the full measure of necessary funds from the people.

3. Ahaziah (Ochozia), son and successor of Jehoram.

(B) ATHALIAH

Athaliah (Athalia), infamous daughter of Ahab and Jezebel. This woodcut is used here for the first time. The subject appears crowned, scepter in her right hand, sword in her left.

(C) JONADAB

Jehonadab (Jonadab), was a son or descendant of Rechab. He was a chief among the descendants of Rechab, but not a king, and therefore he appears without royal accessories.

Folio LII verso

Lycurgus, according to Eusebius, was a distinguished and highly renowned man. He made the laws for the Lacedaemonians. Although a pagan, he made very just laws, equally applicable to natural and divine rights. He ordained nothing for which he himself had not furnished a precedent. He refused to tolerate the use of gold and silver, or any other material that might become an instrument of wantonness. He divided the land equally among all the people, so that the inheritance of one person would not be larger than that of another. In order that riches might not be secreted, he ordained that all transactions should be public. To each youth he permitted but one outfit of dress per year. No one was to go about more elegantly dressed than another, nor to dine more sumptuously. He also made certain regulations, not for the sake of money, but to facilitate exchange. He decreed that children of sufficient age should not be placed in trade, but upon the farms, to spend their early years in work and labor, and not in wantonness and luxury; nor were they to employ any bedding on which to sleep. They were to live on vegetables alone, and were not to frequent the cities until they had become grown-up men. He also decreed that maidens were to be married without a dowry, so that wives would not be chosen for money alone, and so that the men would take their courtship more seriously and without money as the incentive. The greatest honors were accorded to the aged, and not to the rich and mighty. But as these and other laws, contrary to the loose customs of the people and difficult of observance, met with opposition, Lycurgus assured the people that he had secured them from the Delphian Apollo, a pagan god. To give these laws permanence, Lycurgus obligated the people by an oath to observe them, and not to make any changes in these divine commandments until he returned home; in the meantime he would pay another visit to Apollo to inquire what could be done about these laws. But instead, he went to the island of Crete, to which he voluntarily exiled himself for the remainder of his life. He made provision that in the event of his death his remains be placed in a lead casket and thrown into the sea; for should his body be brought home, the Lacedaemonians might interpret his return as releasing them of their obligation. [According to the Spartan tradition preserved by Herodotus, Lycurgus was a son of Agis I and brother of Echestratus. On the latter's death he became regent and guardian of his nephew Labotas (Leobotes), who was still a minor. Other accounts give him a different origin, and make him regent of Charillus. According to Herodotus he introduced his reforms when he became regent; but the generally accepted story is that after being regent for some time, and spending several years in travel, he returned to Sparta and carried through his legislation when Charillus was king. He is said to have visited Crete, Egypt, and Ionia, and some versions even took him to Spain, Libya and India. In any case, details of his career are almost entirely mythical. Herodotus derives his constitutional ideas from Crete, but there is a fifth century tradition ascribing them to the initiative of Delphi. Herodotus says that Lycurgus changed all the customs; that he created the military organization, and instituted the ephorate and the council of elders. To him also are attributed the foundation of the apolla (the citizen assembly), the prohibition of gold and silver currency, the partition of the land into equal lots, and in general, the characteristic Spartan training. It is said that some of these statements are false. The council of elders and the assembly are not peculiar to Sparta; the ephorate is generally not considered to be his, and the partition of land never seems to have taken place at all—it is probably an attempt to give traditional sanction to the ideas of Agis and Cleomenes in the third century. Tradition presented him as finding Sparta the prey of disunion, weakness and lawlessness, and leaving her united, strong, and subject to the most stable government that the Greek world had ever seen].

Jehu (Hieu), son of Jehosaphat, king of Judah, and the tenth king of Israel, anointed by Elisha, slew Jehoram with the entire house of Ahab, and destroyed the house of Baal, putting all its prophets to death. But he did not leave the calves of gold at Bethel and Dan; for which reason Azahel, the king of Syria, as a visitation from the Lord, slew many in Israel. And he himself died there in the 28th year of his reign. [Jehu (Hieu), "son" of Jehoshaphat, a general in the army of Joram, slew his master and usurped the throne of Israel. He reigned 28 years. His history is to be found in I Kings 19:16-17 and II Kings 9:10. And although he slew Jezebel and zealously destroyed the priests of Baal, the Bible states that his heart was not right with God; for his "zeal for the Lord" was really a zeal for himself; for he continued the worship of the golden calves, and Jehovah began to cut Israel short. The Syrians took his eastern frontier, and his dynasty was extinguished in the fourth generation. (Hos. 1:4)]

Isaiah (Ysayas), a noble prophet, is said by the blessed Jerome to be more evangelist than prophet. Alone during the reign of four kings in those times was he considered famous on account of the clarity of his prophecy. [This paragraph does not appear in the German edition (though, surprisingly, the image of Isaiah does!). Isaiah is one of the major prophets of the Hebrew scriptures, and is considered the most important Old Testament prophet by Christians. Jerome, in the preface to his translation of Isaiah in the Vulgate said that Isaiah "should be called an evangelist rather than a prophet."]

Jehoahaz (Joachas) was, together with all his people, almost entirely dispersed by Hazael (Azahel), king of Syria; and so he called on the Lord, and was somewhat comforted. [Jehoahaz I was a son and successor of Jehu, king of Israel. He reigned 17 years. In punishment for his sins and those of his people, Israel was invaded and reduced to great extremities by the Syrians under Hazael and Ben-hadad. The king humbled himself before God, and deliverance came by the hand of Joash, his son].

Hosea (Osee) the prophet, first of the twelve sent against the ten tribes, was a son of Beer, although we find no prophecy by Beer. Hosea prophesied in the time of Jeroboam, king of Israel, the son of Joash, and the same, who with Uzziah (Osia) the king of Judah, reigned for fourteen years. In Judah were four kings – Uzziah (Osia), Jotham (Joathas), Ahaz (Achaz) and Hezekiah (Ezechias); and under these Hosea prophesied. [Hosea was probably the first of the prophets in chronological order exercising his office from the early part of Uzziah's long reign – which coincided with the last 14 years of Jeroboam II of Israel (II Kings 14:23; 15:1) – until sometime in Hezekiah's reign].

Joash (Joas) defeated the Syrians three times, according to the prophecy of Elisha (Helizei), and he took the cities from the power of Ben-hadad, son of Hazael (Azahel), and brought them back into his own kingdom. He also punished Amaziah, and not willfully but involuntarily, humbled him. He began to reign in the 37th year of Joash, king of Judah. [Joash, or Jehoash, here first referred to, was the son and successor of Jehoahaz, king of Israel. He had great regard for the prophet Elisha, and visited him on his deathbed, where by a divine oracle he was assured of three victories over the Syrians. He was also victorious when forced to give battle to Amaziah, king of Judah, when he broke down the north wall of Jerusalem and despoiled the temple. Although one of the best kings of Israel, worship of the golden calf continued during his reign. The other Joash here mentioned was the seventh king of Judah, only son of Ahaziah not slain by Athaliah].

Joel (Johel), the second of the twelve prophets of Judah, prophesied his own future tribulation. [Joel, one of the 12 minor prophets, lived in Judah at a time when the temple and temple worship still existed (Joel 1:14; 2:1, 15, 32; 3:1). He prophesied in the reign of Uzziah, nearly 800 BCE].

Jeroboam was a very warlike and successful man. He drove off the king of Syria, and restored the kingdom of Israel to its former status; and he also took Damascus. [Jeroboam II, here referred to, was the 13th king of Israel, and was the son and successor of Joash. He was the 4th of the five kings of Jehu's dynasty, which was the 4th in the northern kingdom, and his reign was the most prosperous of all. It continued for 41 years. He followed up his father's successes over the Syrians, took Hamath and Damascus, and all the region east of the Jordan down to the Dead Sea, and advanced to its highest point the prosperity of that kingdom. After him the kingdom rapidly declined, and his own dynasty perished within a year, fulfilling the prediction of Jonah. (II Kings 14:23-29; 15:8-12)] Mark how unsteady is the status and rule of kingdoms. Israel was dispersed and humbled in the end; and the Syrians were elevated; but now they in turn were miraculously oppressed by misfortune. He who was on top is now underneath. Then again he who was at the bottom rises up, only to fall again thereafter. This is the revolving wheel of time. Therefore it is not to be wondered that but few of the world are taken up by the Lord, and that the understanding and considerate men of the human race flee with all their might from participation in such uncertainties. Compare what Augustine says in many places in his City of God: If good men rule many men they do good, and the opposite if evil men etc. [This last sentence has been deleted from the German edition].

The Lineage of the Israelite Kings is here continued from Folio XLIX verso, which there ended with Jehoram (Joram) and is now resumed as follows:

2. Jehoahaz (Joachas).
3. Joash (Joas).
4. Jeroboam (II).

Folio LIII recto

Jonas (in the Year of the World 4306) [This parenthetical phrase is not found in the German edition], when seven years of age, was set up as a king of Jehoiada, the bishop; and he did good in all the days of Jehoiada. After the latter's death, however, Joash was softened by the flattery of the mighty, and his heart became evil; and so it remained to the end. He caused Zecharias (Zacharias), son of Jehoiada, the highest bishop, to be stoned between the temple and the altar in next to the last year of his reign. [This Joash, or Jehoash, was the seventh king of Israel (878-838 BCE). He was the only son of Ahaziah who was not slain by the usurping Athaliah. How he came to be saved and raised to the throne has already been told in the joint note on Jehoiada and Athaliah at Folio L verso (see also II Kings 11:16). While Jehoiada lived, for a period of twenty-three years, Joash served God and prospered. Idols were banished and the temple was repaired. But later Joash followed less wholesome counsel. Idolatry revived. How Zecharias was stoned when he rebuked the guilty people has already been told (Folio L verso, and note; see also II Chron. 24:20-22). Misfortunes soon multiplied. The king was repeatedly humbled by the Syrians under Hazael, and he gave them the temple treasures as a ransom. A loathsome disease embittered his life, which was soon cut short by a conspiracy of his servants (II Kings 11:12; II Chron. 23:24)].

Aremulus (Romulus Silvius) reigned nineteen years in the time of Joash, king of Judah, and he laid the foundation of Alba between the hills where Rome is now located. His sons, Julius and Aventinus, survived him. [Romulus Silvius was the twelfth mythological king of Alba. See note, Folio XLIX recto].

Amaziah (Amasias) (in the Year of the World 4346) [This parenthetical phrase is not found in the German edition]. made a bad end of a good beginning; which has been lamentably and commonly true of the mighty up to our own time. He also crushed many worthy officials, of which there are many examples today. [Amaziah, ninth king of Judah, son of Joash, began to reign at the age of 25, and he ruled 29 years in Jerusalem. The Bible states that he did good in the sight of the Lord, but not with a perfect heart. Having established himself on his throne and slain the murderers of his father, he mustered a host of 300,000 men of Judah and hired 100,000 of Israel for a war on Edom; but the latter he reluctantly dismissed at the command of God, who gave him victory without their aid. Yet he carried home the idols of Edom and set them up as gods. For this he was threatened with destruction by a prophet of the Lord. Soon after he made war with Joash, king of Israel, but was defeated, taken to his own capital a prisoner, and obliged to ransom himself. 15 years later he was slain by conspirators (II Kings 14:1-20; II Chron. 25)]. He also worshipped the gods of Seir (Seyr). [Seir probably refers to a chief of the Horites, who early occupied the mountainous region later possessed by the Edomites (Gen. 36:20; comp. Gen. 14:6; Deut. 2:12)].

Aventinus Silvius reigned 37 years; and for him the Aventine Hill at Rome was named after he was buried there. [Aventinus was one of the seven hills of Rome].

Procas (Prochas), son of Aventinus, ruled 33 years, and whose praises eulogized Vergil extols in this verse: Next is Procas, the glory of the Trojan nation. [The quote is from Virgil's 6.776. The German edition of the removes the poetic citation and simply states that Virgil praised him in his works]. Two sons survived him, Amulius and Numitor, father of Rhea, the mother of Romulus and Remus (Rhemus). [For Proca (Procas = 's Prochas) and Amulius, see table of Silvian kings, Folio XLIX recto and note].

For 13 years after the death of Amaziah, Judah was without a king. This one must infer by adding together the years of the kings of Israel and Judah; for Amaziah began to reign in the second year of Joash, king of Israel, and Uzziah (Ozias), the son of Amaziah in the 27th year of Jeroboam, king of Israel. This time covers a period of 41 years, and if the years of Amaziah are deducted from that, 13 years remain, during which Uzziah was small and incompetent to rule. However, the Seventy Interpreters and many historians do not have this; they compute it otherwise. In such a manner the matter must be made clear or you will be confused in reckoning the years.

Naaman, a general of the court of Syria, was a leper. To be cured he traveled with letters of recommendation to the king of Israel. When he came to the house of Elisha the prophet, Elisha told him that if he bathed seven times in the river Jordan, he would be cured. And although at first he did not want to do so, yet on advice of his retinue he went there and he bathed, and was cleansed of the leprosy. Then he returned to Elisha, and begged him to accept a present; but Elisha would have nothing. After Naaman had departed, Gehazi (Giezi), Elisha's disciple, came after him and asked a present on Elisha's account. And this he brought back to his house. Elisha discovered his disciple's sinful conduct, and therefore Gehazi was smitten with leprosy.

Naaman was a distinguished Syrian general, but a leper. Hearing through a captive Jewish girl who waited on his wife of the fame of the prophet Elisha, he set out on a journey to Israel with letters from his sovereign to the king of Israel. When the latter read them he was filled with apprehension, probably fearing that the king of Syria intended to find a pretext for a quarrel in his ability to cure his general. In this predicament, Elisha dispatched word to the king to give up his fears, and to send the distinguished stranger to him. Naaman received from Elisha's messenger the prescription to bathe seven times in the Jordan. The leper at first disdained the remedy. It was too simple, and attributed to the Jordan a virtue that he knew Abana and Pharpar, rivers of his own land, did not possess. His retinue wisely advised him not to spurn the remedy. Following their counsel, he bathed seven times in the Jordan and his "flesh became again like the flesh of a child." In gratitude Naaman offered the prophet a present, but he would not take it. Subsequently Gehazi, by uttering a falsehood, secured it, but in turn received Naaman's leprosy.

This paragraph on Naaman and the one that follows it on Amulius are switched in the German edition of the Chronicle—most probably to place the text about Naaman directly above the woodcut illustrating the text.

Amulius deposed his brother Numitor from the kingdom, and killed his son Lausus. In order to destroy all hope of inheritable issue, he gave his daughter Rhea to the goddess Vesta as a perpetual virgin, on the pretense of thus conferring an honor upon her. But after he had reigned seven years Rhea begot twins, Remus and Romulus. After they grew up they slew Amulius, and Numitor was restored to the kingship; for he was their ancestor. [Romulus, founder of Rome, was the figure around whom the Roman people credit their origin. The legend is this: At Alba Longa there reigned a succession of kings descended from Julius, son of Aeneas. One of the last of these kings left two sons, Numitor and Amulius. The latter, who was the younger, deprived Numitor of the kingdom, but allowed him to live in the enjoyment of his private fortune. Fearful, however, lest the heirs of Numitor might not submit so quietly to his usurpation, he caused his only son Lausus to be murdered, and made his daughter Sylvia one of the vestal virgins. Sylvia was raped by the god Mars, and in the course of time gave birth to twins. Amulius doomed the guilty vestal and her babes to be drowned in the river. In the Anio, Silvia exchanged her earthly life for that of a goddess, and became the wife of the river god. The stream carried the cradle in which the children were lying into the Tiber. It was stranded at the foot of the Palatine, and overturned on the root of a wild fig tree. A she-wolf that had come to drink of the stream carried the children into her den and suckled them. There they were discovered by the king's shepherd. He took them to his own house. They were called Romulus and Remus, and were brought up with the other shepherds on the Palatine Hill. A quarrel arose between these shepherds and the herdsmen of Numitor. Remus was taken by stratagem, during the absence of his brother, and carried off to Numitor. This led to the discovery of the parentage of the twins, who now slew Amulius and placed their grandfather Numitor on the throne.]

This (referring to the woodcut opposite) is Elisha (Heliseus) the prophet, who divided the Jordan with the mantle of Elijah; who with salt made the waters sweet; who cursed 42 children who mocked him and were torn by bears; who supplied the hosts of three kings with sufficient water; multiplied the widow's oil, awakened the son of the Shunamite (from the dead); improved the bitter (soup of) colocynth (colloquintidas); [The wild gourd of which the noxious soup was made is a poisonous plant, conjectured to mean the colocynth (colloquintidas), which has a cucumber-like vine, with several branches, and bears fruit of the size and color of an orange, with a hard woody shell, within which is the white mast or pulp, exceedingly bitter, and a drastic purgative (II King's 4:39). It was very inviting to the eye, and furnished a model for the carved and molten "knops" in Solomon's temple (I Kings 6:18; 7:24). According to Hasting's , (Gourds), the wild gourds were either the common squirting cucumber, one of the most drastic of known cathartics, or more probably the colocynth (citrullus colocynthis), a trailing vine-like plant with rounded gourds, intensely bitter to the taste and an irritant poison.] multiplied the loaves of barley for the multitude; cleansed Naaman; made Gehazi (Giezi) and his descendants leprous; blinded the hosts of Syria; prophesied the relief of Samaria from siege and starvation; placed Hazael on the throne of Syria and Jehu on the throne of Israel; prophesied that king Joash would three times defeat the Syrians; awakened the dead, etc. [Prophecies and miracles of Elisha: (1) dividing the Jordan with Elijah's mantle, (II Kings 2:14); (2) sweetening of spring waters (II Kings 2:19-22); (3) cursing children for irreverence, (II Kings 2:23-25); (4) supplying water sufficient for the hosts of three kings, (II Kings 3:16-20); (5) increase of widow's oil, (II Kings 4:1-7); (6) raising the Shunammite's son from the dead, (II Kings 4:18-35); (7) healing the noxious soup, (II Kings 4:38-41); (8) multiplying the barley loaves, (II Kings 4:42-44); (9) cleansing Naaman the leper, (II Kings 5:1-19); (10) making Gehazi and his issue leprous, (II Kings 5:20-27); (11) blinding the hosts of Syria, (II Kings 6:18); (12) prophesying the siege and relief of Samaria, (II Kings 7); (13) placing Hazael on the Syrian throne, (II Kings 8:7-13); (14) placing Jehu on Israel's throne, (II Kings 9:1-6); (15) prophesying three victories for Joash, (II Kings 13:18); and (16) awakening the dead, (II Kings 13:20)].

Numitor was restored to the kingship, and soon thereafter was slain by Romulus.

2. Amaziah (Amasias), son and successor of Joash.

(C) ELISHA AND NAAMAN

Elisha and Naaman. By a woodcut 3½" x 3-3/8" the first meeting of Naaman with Elisha is depicted. The prophet stands before the door of his house. Naaman, mounted on a horse and clad in pilgrim's raiment, has just arrived. In his left hand he holds the idle reins of his frisky steed. In his right he holds up an object which may be a leper's rattle, or clapper, and which lepers carried to mark their coming and to warn the healthy from their path. A like object appears in the hands of Rembrandt's "Leper". In some cases the afflicted used a horn or bell. Lepers also work masks to hide their deformities, and it will be noted that the lower part of Naaman's face is covered, probably for the same reason. Leprosy as a public menace did not die out in Europe until the end of the sixteenth century, almost one hundred years after the Chronicle was first published.

In the distance appears the river Jordan, and in it a person holding his hands in an attitude of prayer is seen immersed to the waist. Above him is the inscription "Sirus," probably meaning Syria, or Syrian. This may be one of those unusually sophisticated pictures in which two actions by the same person are depicted. This may represent Naaman after he has finally agreed to try the prophet's remedy.

Folio LIII verso

Here the kingdom of Israel was without a king for 33 years, as is discovered by adding together the kings of Judah.

Amos was the third among the twelve prophets, and he prophesied against many peoples, particularly the ten tribes. [Amos, third of the minor prophets, was a herdsman of Tekoah, a small town of Judah, about twelve miles from Jerusalem. He prophesied concerning Israel, at Bethel, in the days of Uzziah, king of Judah, and Jeroboam II king of Israel, about 800 to 787 BCE. He was a contemporary of Hosea and Joel, first and second of the minor prophets. The first two chapters of Amos contain predictions against the surrounding nations, enemies of the people of God. But the ten tribes of Israel were the chief subject of his prophecies. Their temporary prosperity under Jeroboam led to gross idolatry, injustice and corruption, for which sins he denounced the judgment of God upon them. His boldness in reproving sin drew upon him the wrath of the priests who labored to procure his banishment. (Amos 7:10-17)]

Obadiah (Abdias) was the fourth of the twelve prophets. He prophesied against Edom. He was quite old when he died, and was buried in the grave of Elisha. [Obadiah (Abdyas), fourth of the minor prophets, is supposed to have prophesied about 587 BCE. He was probably contemporary with Jeremiah and Ezekiel, who denounced the same dreadful judgments on the Edomites, and foretold the ultimate triumph of Zion (v. 17-21). The prophecy, according to Josephus, received its initial fulfillment about five years after the destruction of Jerusalem].

During this time the Spartans or Lacedaemonians roved about in wars for a hundred years, and they wrote their wives to take other husbands so that the race would not die out.

Jonah (Jonas), one of the twelve prophets, was sent to the people of Nineveh, who heard him. [Jonah was the fifth of the minor prophets. See Jonah, text and note, Folio XLIX verso].

Micah (Micheas) was the sixth of the twelve prophets. [Micah, or Micaiah. See text and note, Folio XLIX verso].

Nahum (Naum) was the seventh of the twelve prophets. [Nahum, the seventh of the twelve minor prophets, was a native of Elkosh, probably a village in Galilee. His prophecy consists of three chapters, in which he foretells the destruction of Nineveh. Opinions are divided as to the time in which he prophesied, but probably in the time of Hezekiah, after the war of Sennacherib in Egypt, mentioned by Berosus. Isaiah and Micah were his contemporaries. Nineveh perished about 100 years later in 606 BCE; and its exhumed remains well accord with his description of it].

Here the entire imaginary history of Tobias is given.

Tobit (Tobias) died at the age of 102 years. He was a holy man, of good works, and illustrious in the spirit of prophecy; for before the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, he prophesied that future event with a certainty as though it had presently happened. Soon after his death his wife died also. And after the young Tobit (Tobias) with his children left Nineveh, it was destroyed. [The Book of Tobit or Tobias is one of the most interesting of the Apocrypha of the Old Testament. Tobit, or Tobias, was a Naphtalite who remained faithful to the temple service amidst the defection of his countrymen; but, notwithstanding, he shared with them in their misfortunes and was carried to Nineveh by Shalmanezzer. His wealth and position at court gave him opportunity to help his people and thus win their regard, and for a time his life was enviable. But a change of rulers changed his fortune. When Sennacherib came to the throne, he was compelled to flee from the king's wrath because he buried the Jews whom the king had killed. All his property was confiscated, but on the entreaty of a nephew, the new king who succeeded Sennacherib allowed him to return to Nineveh. Soon thereafter he lost his eyesight through an injury his opened eyes received from warm swallow's dung which fell upon them, causing albugo, that is, white, hard flakes on the eyes, which are of greater or less extent and not transparent. A quarrel with his wife about a young goat led to reproaches, under which he wept grievously and prayed in sorrow. At this point, the episode of Sarra of Ecbatana, in Media, is introduced. She was the wife of seven men who were successively killed on their wedding night by Asmodaeus. Her prayer for death was made at the same time with Tobit's prayer for the same, "and Raphael was sent to heal them both" – that is, to scale away the white spots from Tobit's eyes" – and "to give Sarra for a wife to Tobias, the son of Tobit, and to bind Asmodaeus the wicked demon." This was brought about thus: Tobit sent his son to Media to recover some money lent out in the days of his prosperity. He improved the occasion to give his son some good advice. The angel Raphael in the guise of "Azarias, son of Ananias the great," saluted Tobias and made the journey in his company. The capture of a fish put in Tobias' hands the means of curing his father and ridding Sarra of the demon. His journey was eminently successful. He recovered the money loaned, married Sarra, to whom Raphael introduced him, and returned home with these treasures, greatly to the delight of Tobit, who had begun to be a little fearful for his safety. The book ends with the restoration of Tobit's eyesight and prosperity, his consequent psalm of gratitude (perhaps the best piece of writing in the book), and mention of the death of Tobit and Tobias].

Zechariah (Zacharias), the king of Israel, began to reign in the 38th year of Uzziah (Ozia), king of Judah. He did evil, as his forefathers had done. He was the fourth (king) after Jehu. [Zechariah, the 14th king of Israel, was the last member of the house of Jehu to come to the throne and he occupied it only six months. His assassination begins the period of virtual anarchy with which the history of Israel comes to an end (II Kings 14:29; 15:8-12). The name Zechariah, or Zachariah, is a very common one in the Old Testament. There were at least thirty different individuals so named]. He was slain by Shallum (Sellum), who then ruled in his stead. [Shallum I murdered Zechariah, king of Israel, and usurped his throne in 772 BCE. He reigned only one month, and was killed in Samaria by Menahem (II Kings 15:10-15). Shallum was a son of Jabesh, and his murder of Zechariah fulfilled what the Lord had told Jehu, that his children should sit on the throne of Israel to the fourth generation. (II Kings 14:29; 15:8-11)] The latter was soon thereafter slain by Menahem (Manahem), who deprived him of the kingship and of his life.

Menahem began to reign in the 39th year of Uzziah (Ozia) king of Judah. He did evil before the Lord; wherefore God gave him up to the king of Assyria, who required of him a tribute of a thousand talents of silver. [Menahem, the 16th king of Israel, was previously general of the army of Zechariah. When he heard of his master's murder, he immediately marched against the usurper Shallum, who had shut himself up in Samaria. He captured and slew him, and ascended the throne, reigning ten years in Samaria. He was a tyrannical and cruel idolater. Pul, king of Assyria, having invaded Israel during the reign of Menahem, obliged him to pay a tribute of a thousand talents, which he raised by a tax of 50 shekels per head on all his rich subjects. He apparently died a natural death].

Pekahiah (Phaceya) was slain by Pekah (Phacee), who then reigned in his stead. [Pekahiah, son and successor of Menahem, was also a wicked prince, and he reigned but two years. Pekah, son of Remaliah, conspired against him and slew him in his own palace (II Kings 15:22-25)].

Pekah (Phacee) was slain by Hoshea (Ozee), who then reigned in his stead. He (Pekah) formed an alliance with Rezin (Raasin) the king of Syria, and ravaged Judah; wherefore Tiglath-pileser (Theglathphalazar), the king of the Assyrians, crushed him and carried three of the tribes into Assyria. [Pekah was a general of Pekahiah, king of Israel. He conspired against his master, slew him, and reigned in his place twenty years (II Kings 15:25-28). In the latter part of his evil reign he formed an alliance with the Syrians of Damascus, and early in the reign of Ahaz, Pekah and Rezin invaded Judah and besieged Jerusalem (II Kings 16:1-6). Though unable to take the holy city, the allies killed many warriors of Judah, and took many prisoners (II Chron. 28:5-8), but the Israelites were divinely ordered to restore their captives. Ahaz, seeking the aid of Assyria, Tiglath-pileser defeated Syria and Israel, and deprived Pekah of the country beyond the sea of Galilee. Later Pekah was slain by Hoshea. He was the last of the four kings of Israel assassinated in the troubled times of the prophet Hosea].

Hoshea (Ozee) was the last king of Israel. He was made prisoner by Shalmaneser (Salmanazar), king of the Assyrians, who carried the Israelites into captivity in Assyria. [Hoshea, 19th and last king of Israel, slew Pekah, and after a 9 years' interregnum usurped the throne (II Kings 15:30). When his land was invaded by Shalmaneser, Hoshea became tributary to Assyria. Because he formed a secret alliance with Egypt, Shalmaneser ravaged Israel and besieged Samaria, and his successor Sargon, more than two years later took the city, imprisoned Hoshea, and carried the Israelites as captives to Assyria and Media].

Israel is taken over by the Assyrians.

In the eleventh year of Hoshea, which was the 3,151st year of the world, and of the Fourth Age of the World the 261st, the kingdom of Macedonia began. There Cararius, or Carnaus, first reigned, and for a period of 28 years. This kingdom endured until the time of Alexander the Great, through 24 kings. Carnaus began to rule in the 3530th year of the world, and he reigned 12 years and 6 months. After his death the kingdom was largely taken over by the Babylonia. [Caranus (the misspells his name as Carnaus) was a Heracleid (descendant of Heracles) of the family of the Temenidae, and according to some accounts, the founder of the Argive dynasty in Macedonia about the middle of the eighth century. The legend tells that he led into Macedonia a large force of Greeks, and, following a flock of goats, entered the town of Edessa in the midst of a heavy rain storm and a thick mist, unobserved by the inhabitants. Remembering the oracle that had desired him "to seek an empire by the guidance of goats," he fixed here the seat of government; and he named the place Aegae (after the Greek word for 'goat') in commemoration of the miracle].

1. Amariah (Amarias), son of Azariah, the father of Ahitub (I Chron. 6:11). This high priest is not to be confused with Amariah, son of Meraioth, a descendant of Aaron in the line of Eleazar, and who also had a son named Ahitub, and a grandson named Zadok (see Folio XL verso).
2. Ahitub (Ahitob), son of Amariah, and father of Zadok, is not to be confused with Ahitub, son of Phinehas and grandson of Eli (see Folio XLI verso).
3. Zadok (Sadoch), son of the above Ahitub, is not to be confused with another Zadok, son of another Ahitub and father of Ahimaaz (see Folio XLVIII recto).
4. Shallum (Sellum) the last portrait in the priestly lineage, was the husband of Huldah (Olda), the prophetess (see Folio LV verso, post), who ranked with Deborah and Hannah among the women prophets of the Old Testament.

NOTE: The author of the Chronicle has avoided considerable responsibility and confusion by total silence as to this portion of the priestly lineage. It is difficult to follow these names through the Bible. They may refer to the same person or to many persons.

The Twelve Minor Prophets of Israel began at Folio LII verso with Hosea and Joel. We now add Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah and Nahum, respectively the third, fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh minor prophets:

1. Amos, third of the minor prophets of Israel.
2. Obadiah (Abdias).
3. Jonah (Jonas), fifth minor prophet.
4. Micah or Micaiah (Micheas), sixth minor prophet.
5. Nahum (Naum), seventh minor prophet.

(C) TOBIT AND TOBIAS

Tobias or Tobit (Thobias), the apocryphal prophet, is represented by the same woodcut which has already been used for Jair (Yair) at Folio XXXVII verso.

(D) LINEAGE OF THE KINGS OF ISRAEL (concluded)

The Lineage of the Kings of Israel is here concluded with the following:

1. Zechariah (Zacharias), the fourteenth king of Israel, who was slain by Shallum.
2. Shallum (Sellum), the fifteenth king of Israel, who slew Zechariah and was in turn slain by Meneham.
3. Meneham (Manahen), the sixteenth king of Israel, who was taken prisoner by the Assyrians and compelled to ransom himself with 1000 talents of silver.
4. Pekahiah (Phacee), the seventeenth king of Israel, who was slain by Pekah.
5. Pekah (Phacee), the eighteenth king of Israel, who slew Pekahiah, and was in turn slain by Hoshea.
6. Hoshea (Ozee), the nineteenth and last king of Israel, who lost himself and his kingdom to the Assyrians.

Folio LIII recto

Arbaces, by birth a Mede, and formerly a vicar or satrap under Sardanapalus, founded the Median Empire in the sixth year of Hoshea.

Sardanapalus was the last king of the Assyrians, and of him Diodorus Siculus has written much in his Greek histories. Justinus has also mentioned him. He was more depraved and lewd than any woman. When Arbaces, his vicar, found him in the company of villainous women, spinning costly silk on a distaff, and clad in female apparel, he became provoked; and he prevailed upon the nobility to enter into an alliance against him; and so the king was defeated in battle. [Arbaces, according to Ctesias, founded the Median Empire. In conjunction with Belesis, he is said to have taken Nineveh, and to have destroyed the old Assyrian empire in the reign of Sardanapalus in 876 BCE. Ctesias assigns 28 years to the reign of Arbaces, and makes his dynasty consist of eight kings]. Thereupon Sardanapalus went to his royal funeral pyre, which he himself had built, ignited it and burned himself and his countless treasures, and (as Tullius states) he ordered these words to be written at the place of his cremation: The things I had, I made; as well as those which have been produced by consummate licentiousness. [Sardanapalus was the last king of the Assyrian empire of Ninus or Nineveh, according to Ctesias, who states that the Assyrian empire endured 1306 years; that the first king was Ninus, who was succeeded by Semiramis, and she by Ninyas, and that he was followed by thirty kings, sons succeeding fathers without interruption; that all these kings from Ninyas downward were sunk in luxury and sloth, till their degradation became climaxed in Sardanapalus, who passed his time in his palace, unseen by his subjects, dressed in female apparel, surrounded by concubines, and indulging in every species of licentiousness and effeminacy. When Arbaces, satrap of Media, saw this, he resolved to throw off his allegiance to so worthless a monarch. Supported by Belesis, noblest of the Chaldean priests, he advanced against Sardanapalus with a formidable army. But suddenly the latter threw off his luxurious habits, placed himself at the head of his troops, and twice defeated the rebels; but at length he was worsted and obliged to shut himself up in Nineveh. There he was besieged for two years and when his condition became intolerable, he collected all his treasures and women, and placing them on an immense pyre, set it on fire and thus destroyed himself and them. The enemies then obtained possession of the city. The whole narrative of Ctesias is purely mythical, and cannot be reconciled to genuine history. The legend of Sardanapalus, effeminate at one time and heroic at another, probably arose from him being equated with the aged god Sandon who was worshipped in Asia both as a heroic and a female deity. "Then, a little above the sea (one comes) to Anichiale, which, according to Aristobolus, was founded by Sardanapalus. Here, he says, is the tomb of Sardanapalus, and a stone figure which represents the fingers of the right hand as snapping together, and the following inscription in Assyrian letters: "Sardanapalus, the son of Anacyndarxes, built Anichiale and Tarsus in one day. Eat, drink, be merry, because all things else are not worth this," meaning the snapping of fingers. Choerilus also mentions this inscription: and indeed the following verses are everywhere known: "Mine are all that I have eaten, and the delights of love that I have enjoyed; but those numerous blessings have been left behind." The whole of the epigram, as found in some of the MSS, is as follows: "Well aware that you are by nature mortal, magnify the desires of your heart, delighting yourself in merriment; there is no enjoyment for you after death. Mine are all the food that I have eaten, and my loose indulgences, and the delights of love that I have enjoyed; but those numerous blessings have been left behind. This to mortal men is wise advice on how to live." (Strabo, 14:5.9)] And so this greatest of empires after a long time came to an end and was taken over by Media after 1305 years (as Augustine states in book 8 chapter 22 of his City of God); and so also the time of Belus [Belesis, here called Belus, was a Chaldean priest at Babylon, who is said, in conjunction with Arbaces, the Mede, to have overthrown the old Assyrian empire. Belesis afterward received the satrapy of Babylon from Arbaces]. the first king, is reckoned. Under the Medes the empire endured 128 years, for he turned this monarchy, or the rule of the East (as Justinus states) over to the Medes with expectations and not by deeds. This was afterward accomplished by Darius. Yet there were kings in Assyria after Sardanapalus (although they were not actually rulers or monarchs) up to the time of the destruction of Nineveh. Media is a country in Asia Minor, bordering on Assyria and Persia, and on the Caspian (Hyrcanian) Sea; and in it are said to be four regions. Medus, son of Media, built the city of Media in honor of his mother, and there he also founded the empire of Media, named for himself. The government of this country and the rule of the East were at that time in his hands. Although the empire attained to greatness and renown under Astyages the king, [Astyages, son of Cyaxares, last king of Media, ruled from 594 to 559 BCE. Alarmed by a dream, he gave his daughter Mandane in marriage to Cambyzes, a Persian of good family; but another dream induced him to send Harpagus to destroy the offspring of this marriage. The child, future conqueror of the Medes, was given to a herdsman to expose, but he brought it up as his own. Years later, circumstances arose which brought the young Cyrus to the notice of Astyages, who then discovered his parentage. He inflicted a cruel punishment on Harpagus, who waited his time for revenge. When Cyrus had grown up, Harpagus induced him to instigate the Persians to revolt, and, having been appointed general of the Median forces, he deserted with a great part of them Cyrus. Astyages was taken prisoner and Cyrus mounted the throne. He treated the captive monarch with mildness, but confined him until his death]. as stated in the first chapter of the Book of Judith, yet Cyrus the Persian king wiped it out and made it a part of Persia. After the Persians the Medes appear to have been subject to the Macedonians, and later to the Parthians. [Media was an important country of western Asia, occupying the extreme west of Iran. It was fertile, very productive, well populated, and altogether one of the most important provinces of ancient Persia. The early history of Media is involved in obscurity, and Herodotus and Ctesias (in Diodorus) give different chronologies for its early kings. The last king, Astyages, was dethroned by a revolution, which transferred the supremacy to the Persians, formerly a subordinate people in the united Medo-Persian Empire. Media/Persia fell to Alexander two centuries later. Then it formed part of the kingdom of the Seleucids, from whom it was taken by the Parthians].

Caranus (Carnaus), the Macedonian, founded Macedonia, for he was quick of perception and active with his hands. After countless wars, which he conducted with great vigor against his nearest neighbors, the land of his origin became subservient to him, and there he set up his throne. As Eusebius states, he began to reign in the 12th year of Hoshea, and he reigned 28 years. [Caranus of Argos, a descendant of Hercules, and a brother of Phidon, is said to have settled at Edessa in Macedonia with an Argive colony about 750 BCE, and to have become the founder of the dynasty of Macedonian kings]. But they say that Macedonia is a part of Europe, and we find that it was first named after Macedon, the son of Osyridis (Osiris?). [Macedonia, a country in Europe, north of Greece, is said to have derived its name from an ancient king Macedon, a son of Zeus and Thyia, a daughter of Deucalion]. According to Solinus, this land is bounded on the east by Thrace, on the south by Epirote Thessaly, on the west by Dardania and Greece, and on the north by Paphlagonia. The empire was small in the beginning, but by the might, power, and strength of its kings, the ambition of its people and its oppression of its neighbors, it became so great (as Pliny writes) that it embraced 150 peoples. Although the various parts of the empire were known by different names, it is now, like a single body, called by the single name Macedonia. The Macedonian empire, particularly in the time of Alexander the Great, was a splendid and powerful one; but in the time of Onie, [Probably Onias. There were four high priests of this name]. the bishop of the Jews, it was destroyed. In that empire, indeed, we read that a certain memorable deed took place when the Illyrians and the Thracians, after gathering together, tried to destroy their neighbors, the Macedonians. After the battle had been engaged, the Macedonians were forced to flee. They brought the infant son of their dead king in his cradle, placed him next to the line of battle, and renewed the fight more fiercely, as if they had been defeated before because the fortune of their king of future victory was not with the soldiers fighting. Finally, with great slaughter, they routed the Illyrians, revealing to their enemies that in the earlier battle it was not courage that was lacking to the Macedonians, but their king, whose name, indeed, is unknown.

Here Hartman Schedel (the author/compiler of the Chronicle) paraphrases ever so slightly—but also somewhat awkwardly—Justin's Epitoma Historiarum Philippicarum libri XLIV (7.6-12):

6 Sed Macedonibus adsidua certamina cum Thracibus et Illyriis fuere quorum armis, ueluti cotidiano exercitio, indurati, gloria bellicae laudis finitimos terrebant. 7 Igitur Illyrii infantiam regis pupilli contemnentes, bello Macedonas adgrediuntur. 8 Qui, proelio pulsus, rege suo in cunis prolato et pone aciem posito, acrius certamen repetiuit, 9 tamquam ideo uicti antea fuissent, quod bellantibus sibi regis sui auspicia defuissent, 10 futuri uel propterea uictores, quod ex superstitione animum uincendi ceperant; 11 simul et miseratio eos infantis tenebat, quem, si uicti forent, captiuum de rege facturi uidebantur. 12 Conserto itaque proelio, magna caede Illyrios fudere, ostenderuntque hostibus suis priore bello regem Macedonibus, non uirtutem defuisse.

The Macedonians had perpetual contests with the Thracians and Illyrians, and, being hardened by their arms, as it were by daily exercise, they struck terror into their neighbors by the splendor of their reputation for war. The Illyrians, however, despising the boyhood of a king under age, attacked the Macedonians, who, being worsted in the field, brought out their king with them in his cradle, and, placing him behind the front lines, renewed the fight with greater vigor, as if they had been defeated before, because the fortune of their prince was not with them in the battle, and would now certainly conquer, because, from this superstitious fancy, they had conceived a confidence of victory; while compassion for the infant, also, moved them, as, if they were overcome, they seemed likely to transform him from a king into a captive. Engaging in battle, therefore, they routed the Illyrians with great slaughter, and showed their enemies, that, in the former encounter, it was a king, and not valour, that was wanting to the Macedonians.

(Translated by the Rev. John Selby Watson; London, 1853)

And Macedonia, at that time, took possession of an empire of those lands that extend between two seas, the Aegean and the Adriatic. Its south flank touched the backs of Thessaly and Magnesia, while Paeonia and Paphlagonia were on its northern part, regions themselves which afterwards yielded to the power and authority of the Macedonians and were added to Macedonia. Also Epirus and the Illyrian land, the first south, the other north of Macedonia, extending to the Adriatic shore. Ardisius, or Ardis, a native of Greece, and a man celebrated and renowned for his magnanimity, founded the empire of Lydia, and in the 48th year of the kingdom of Hoshea (Ozie) he began to rule over the Lydians. According to Eusebius, he reigned 26 years. Lydia is a district in Asia Minor, and is now in part called Morea. And, as Pliny would have it, it was formerly called Maeonia (Meonia); but thereafter it was called Lydia after Lydus, son of king Atys (Athis) and brother of Tyrrhenus (Tyrrenus). For as the two brothers by reason of the meagerness of the kingdom were not able to get along, Tyrrhenus went away to a district in Italy, by the lower sea. This he called Tyrrhenia (Tyrrenam) after himself. But Lydus stayed at home, and he called the land of Maeonia, Lydia, after himself. In it were the cities of Ephesus, Colophon, Clazomenae, and Phocaea. But this kingdom was not renowned or celebrated, for it was overthrown by the Persians under King Croesus (Cresius), who gave assistance to the Chaldeans against the Persians. This kingdom endured for 230 years under nine kings, whose names and times are as stated:

Its boundaries varied from time to time. In early times the country had another name, Maeonia, by which alone it is known to Homer. In the mythical legends the common name of the people and country, Lydi and Lydia, is derived from Lydus, the son of Atys, the first king. The Lydians appear to have been a race closely connected | with the Carians and the Mysians, with whom they observed a common worship in the temple of Zeus Carius at Mylasa. They also practiced the worship of Cybele, and other Phrygian customs. Lydia was a very early seat of Asiatic civilization, and it exerted a very important influence on the Greeks. The Lydian monarchy, which was founded at Sardis before the time of authentic history, grew up into an empire under which the many different tribes of Asia Minor, west of the river Halys, were for the first time united. Tradition mentions three dynasties of kings: the Atyadae, which ended about 1221 BCE; the Heraclidae, which reigned 505 years, down to 716; and the Mermnadae, 160 years, down to 546. Only the last dynasty can be regarded as historical, and the fabulous element has a large place in the details of its history. The names and computed dates of its kings are as follows: (1) Gyges, 716-678; (2) Ardys, 673-629; (3) Sadyattes, 629-617; (4) Alyattes, 617-560; (5) Croesus, 560 (or earlier) – 546. Under these kings the Lydians appear to have been highly civilized, industrious, and wealthy people, engaged in agriculture, commerce, and manufacturing, and acquainted with various arts. Among the inventions that the Greeks are said to have derived from them were weaving and dyeing; various processes of metallurgy; the use of gold and silver money, and various metrical and musical improvements. After being conquered by the Persian King Cyrus, they were forbidden to carry arms, and gradually they became known as a byword for effeminate luxuriousness. Under the Persians, Lydia and Mysia formed the second satrapy. After the Macedonian conquest, Lydia belonged first to the kings of Syria, and next (after the defeat of Antiochus the Great by the Romans) to those of Pergamus, and so passed by the bequest of Attalus III, to the Romans, under whom it formed part of the province of Asia].

Olympiad (Olimpias) is a period of four years that the Latins and Greeks at times used in their histories and narratives, just as we now calculate our dates according to the year of Hoshea (Ozie), and it was instituted for the practice of games of war. From the capture of Troy to the first Olympiad was a period of 406 years. The first Olympiad was held in the second year of Aeschylus, judge of the Athenians. In the games of this same Olympiad Coroebus (Chorebus) of the city of Elis (Heliensis) was the victor. Those of the same city in the fifth year played games in which princes were leaders. These Olympiads were first instituted by Iphitus (Iphirus), son of Praxonidis or Hemonis. Some state that Hercules in the eighth year of Jair, a judge of Israel, first instituted such Olympiads among the Greeks on Mount Olympus, in honor of Jupiter; and he desired that those after the fifth year should take place every five years; from which time to the present is reckoned 405 years. But after the Greeks became accustomed to holding the games every fifth year, they also appointed princes for four years; and they called this period an Olympiad. The games occurred every fifth year as they might be forgotten if postponed longer. On the other hand, if they were held oftener than every four years, the cost would have been burdensome. Therefore an Olympiad includes four full years. Our Lord Jesus Christ is said to have been born in the 193rd Olympiad. From this time on it is said that the Greek histories are authentic; but before then they were contradictory. [An Olympiad, in Greek chronology, was a period of four years, used as a method of dating for literary purposes. The four years were reckoned from one celebration of the Olympian games to another. The first Olympiad began with 776 BCE, the last with 394 CE, when they were abolished during the reign of Theodosius the Great. The system was regularly used by the Sicilian historian Timaeus. The Olympia, usually called the Olympic games, was the greatest of the national festivals of the Greeks. It was celebrated at Olympia in Elis, the name given to a small plain to the west of Pisa, which was bounded on the north and northeast by the mountains of Cronius and Olympus, on the south by the river Alpheus, and on the west by Cladeus, which flows into the Alpheus. Olympia does not appear to have been a town, but rather a collection of temples and public buildings. The origin of the Olympic games is buried in obscurity. The legends of the Elean priests attributed the institution of the festival to the Idaean Heracles, and referred it to the time of Cronus. According to their account, Rhea committed her newborn Zeus to the Idaean Dactyli, also called Curetes, of whom five brothers, Heracles, Paeonaeus, Epimedes, Iasius and Idas, came from Ida in Crete, to Olympia, where a temple had been erected to Cronos by the men of the golden age; and Heracles the eldest, conquered his brothers in a foot-race, and was crowned with the wild olive tree. Heracles then established a contest, which was to be celebrated every five years, because he and his brothers were five in number. There are other legends as to the origin of these games. Strabo rejects all these legends, and says that the festival was first instituted after the return of the Heraclidae to the Peloponnesus by the Aetolians, who united themselves with the Eleans. Though these traditions are contradictory, they show that religious festivals had been celebrated at Olympia from the earliest times. The first historical fact connected with the Olympic games is their revival by Iphitus, king of Elis, who is said to have accomplished it with the assistance of Lycurgus, the Spartan lawgiver, and Cleosthenes of Pisa. The celebration of the festival may have been discontinued in consequence of the Dorian invasion, and we are told that Iphitus was commanded by the Delphic oracle to revive it as a remedy for intestine commotions and for pestilence, with which Greece was then afflicted. Iphitus therefore induced the Eleans to sacrifice to Heracles, whom they had formerly regarded as an enemy, and for this the games were regularly celebrated. The interval of four years between each celebration was called an Olympiad; but the Olympiads were not employed as a chronological era till the victory of Coroebus in the footrace 776 BCE. The most important point in the renewal of the festival by Iphitus was the establishment of a sacred armistice, the formula for proclaiming which was prescribed. The proclamation was made by peace heralds, first in Elis and afterwards in the other parts of Greece. It put a stop to all warfare in the month in which the games were celebrated. The territory of Elis itself was considered especially sacred during its continuance, and no armed force could enter it without incurring the guilt of sacrilege. When the Spartans on one occasion sent forces against the fortress Phyrum and Lepreum during the existence of the Olympic truce, they were fined by the Eleans, according to the Olympic law, 2000 minae, being two for each hoplite. No women were allowed to be present or even to cross the Alpheus during the celebration of the games under penalty of being hurled down from the Typaeon rock. Only one instance is recorded of a woman having ventured to be present, and she, although detected, was pardoned in consideration of her father, brothers and sons having been victors in the games. The number of spectators at the festival was very great; and these were drawn together not merely to see the games, but also because it afforded opportunity to do business with persons from distant places. The contests consisted of various trials of strength and skill, which were increased in number from time to time. There were 24 contests in which men took part, and 6 in which boys engaged, though they were never all exhibited at one festival, since some were abolished almost immediately after their institution, and others after they had been in use but a short time. The activities included foot races, chariot races, boxing, wrestling, horse racing, etc. The only prize given to the conqueror was a garland of wild olive, which, according to the Elean legends was the prize originally instituted by the Idaean Heracles. According to another account the olive crown was not given as a prize upon the revival of the game by Iphitus, and was first bestowed in the seventh Olympiad with the approbation of the oracle of Delphi. This garland was cut from a sacred olive tree, which grew in the sacred grove of Altis in Olympia, near the altars of Aphrodite and the Hours. Heracles is said to have brought it from the country of the Hyperboreans, and to have planted it himself in the Altis. A boy, both of whose parents were still alive, cut it with a golden sickle. The name of the victor and that of his father and of his country were then proclaimed by a herald before the representatives of assembled Greece. The festival ended with processions and sacrifices, and with a public banquet given by the Eleans to the conquerors in the Prytaneum].

[Note: The "Origin of the Spartans," the text that follows the paragraph on the Olympiad in the Latin edition of the Chronicle on folio LIV verso, does not exist in the German edition].

ORIGIN OF THE SPARTANS

The origin of the Spartan race also itself was at this time. When Alcumene (Alcamenes? [The text seems fundamentally corrupt here (see also the following note). There is no King Alcumene in ancient Greece, nor a people known as the Lacedaeniums. King Alcamenes, however, is a name that appears in Sparta's king lists as a member of the Agiad dynasty, and he in fact is said to have ruled c. 740-700 BCE, exactly at the time when Sparta waged a long but ultimately successful first war against their neighbors to the west, the Messenians].), the king of the Lacedaeniums (Lacedaemonians?) died, and their kingdom was destroyed, Justinus, in the third book of his Epitomes

Schedel's compilation skills are here quite suspect (perhaps accounting for the editorial decision in the 'revised' German edition published six months later in 1493 to delete this paragraph?), for either he himself, the typesetter, or the scribe responsible for the text of Justin in Schedel's library made a mistake by substituting 'Partheniai' for 'Spartanoi' in the following passage (Justine, Epitome of the Philippic History of Pompeius Trogus 4.1-16):

Under such a state of manners, the city acquired, in a short time, such a degree of strength, that, on going to war with the Messenians for offering violence to some of their maidens at a solemn sacrifice of that people, they bound themselves under a severe oath not to return till they had taken Messene, promising themselves so much either from their strength or good fortune. This occurrence was the commencement of dissension in Greece, and the origin and cause of a civil war. But being detained in the siege of this city, contrary to their expectation, for ten years, and called on to return by the complaints of their wives after so long a widowhood, and being afraid that by persevering in the war they might hurt themselves more than the Messenians (for, in Messene, whatever men were lost in the war, were replaced by the fruitfulness of their women, while they themselves suffered constant losses in battle, and could have no offspring from their wives in the absence of their husbands), they in consequence selected, out of the soldiers that had come, after the military oath was first taken, as recruits to the army, a number of young men; whom they sent back to Sparta with permission to form promiscuous connexions with all the women of the city, thinking that conception would be more speedy if each of the females made the experiment with several men. Those who sprung from these unions were called Partheniae (Virgins), as a reflection on their mothers' violated chastity; and, when they came to thirty years of age, being alarmed with the fear of want (for not one of them had a father to whose estate he could hope to succeed,) they chose a captain named Phalantus, the son of Aratus, by whose advice the Spartans had sent home the young men to propagate, that, as they had formerly had the father for the author of their birth, they might now have the son as the establisher of their hopes and fortunes. Without taking leave of their mothers, therefore, from whose adultery they thought that they derived dishonour, they set out to seek a place of settlement, and being tossed about a long time, and with various mischances, they at last arrived on the coast of Italy, where, after seizing the citadel of the Tarentines, and expelling the old inhabitants, they fixed their abode. But several years after, their leader Phalantus, being driven into exile by a popular tumult, went to Brundisium, whither the former inhabitants of Tarentum had retreated after they were expelled from their city. When he was at the point of death, he urged the exiles "to have his bones, and last relics, bruised to dust, and privately sprinkled in the forum of Tarentum; for that Apollo at Delphi had signified that by this means they might recover their city." They, thinking that he had revealed the destiny of his countrymen to avenge himself, complied with his directions; but the intention of the oracle was exactly the reverse; for it promised the Spartans, upon the performance of what he had said, not the loss, but the perpetual possession of the city. Thus by the subtlety of their exiled captain, and the agency of their enemies, the possession of Tarentum was secured to the Partheniae for ever.

(Translated by Rev. John Selby Watson; London, 1853)

, reports that the Spartans began in this way. The Lacedaemonians undertook a ten-year war against the Messenians. After a few years they were called back by the complaints of their wives after so long a widowhood. Afraid that they would lose the hope of future offspring through this never-ending war, they passed a law that their virgin daughters should sleep promiscuously with the young men left at home, supposing that pregnancy would occur sooner if each one of the women should try it with many men. Those born from these women were called Spartans, on account of the disgrace caused by their mother's shame; and, when they arrived at the age of thirty, being alarmed by the fear of poverty (for not one of them had a father to whose estate he could hope to succeed), they chose Phalantus, the son of Aratus, as their leader. And so, without taking leave of their mothers from whose adultery they believed they had had become dishonorable, they set out to seek another place to live, and being tossed about a long time, and suffering various misfortunes, they at last arrived on the coast of Italy, where, after besieging the citadel of the Tarentines, and driving out the original inhabitants, they established their homes in that place. Afterwards the Egyptian kings and the Jews eagerly sought their friendship, as the Books of the Maccabees [There are five separate texts listed under the name 'Books of the Maccabees,' but the use of that phrase invariably means only the first two: 1 Maccabees and 2 Maccabees. These deuterocanonical texts, perhaps written c. 100 BCE, describe the revolt of a Jewish faction from the rule of Antiochus IV, the Macedonian ruler of much of what is now known as the Middle East, in the years 175-134 BCE. Nowhere in either text is it mentioned that the Egyptian kings (i.e., the Ptolemaic rulers of Egypt) sought an alliance with the Spartans, although Ptolemy III around 228 BCE did form an alliance with Sparta. The attempt by the Jews to make the Spartans (not the Partheniai!) their ally in their revolt from Antiochus IV occurs in 1 Maccabees 12:2ff]. bear witness. But several years later, their leader Phalantus, being driven into exile by a political uprising, went to Brundisium, where the former inhabitants of Tarentum had retreated after they were expelled from their city.

Uzziah (Ozias) (in the Year of the World 4388), son of Amaziah (Amasia) and twelfth king of Judah, was a very gentle and worthy man, who did good before the Lord; except that he usurped the office of priest, in this, that he himself, although Azariah was the priest, presumed to make a burnt offering on the altar of incense. Therefore he was smitten with leprosy. [] And an earthquake occurred, in consequence of which half a mountain was torn asunder and the royal garden was sunk. [Amos 1:1; Zech. 14:5]. Yet Uzziah defeated the enemies all about him and beautified Jerusalem; and he rebuilt the walls that Joash (Joas) destroyed. Because of his leprosy he was removed from the city, and Jotham (Joatham) reigned in his stead. Upon his death Uzziah was buried in the sepulcher of the kings of Jerusalem.

Sardanapalus (Sardanapallus) was a depraved, unchaste, and effeminate man. He first introduced the use of the cushion or pillow. He associated with brazen women; and for these reasons loss and death followed him and divided his realm as previously related. [See Folio LIV recto, and note on Sardanapalus]. Terrible times came and these continued almost to the birth of Christ, during which period human blood was spilled like water throughout the world.

Pul (Phull), [Pul was king of Assyria about 765 BCE, when Assyria is first mentioned in the Bible after the time of Nimrod. He invaded Israel but was induced to retire by a present of 1000 talents of silver. (II Kings 15:19, 20; I Chron. 5:26)] the king of the Assyrians, and his successor endeavored to restore the monarchy; and in consequence they distressed the country in no small degree.

Jotham (Joathan) in the Year of the World 4440. [This sentence does not appear in the German edition].

Tiglath-pileser (Thleglathpalazar) captured the countries of Naphtali (Neptalim) and Galilee (Gallilea) and the lands beyond the Jordan, incorporating these into Assyria. Later, at the behest of Ahaz (Achas) he besieged Damascus and slew Rezin (Raasim), the king of Damascus. [Tiglath-pileser II was king of Assyria in the time of king Ahaz (747-729 BCE), Tiglath-pileser I having begun to reign about 1130 BCE, but not being mentioned in the Bible. The latter king, early in his reign, about 741 BCE, made a campaign against Pekah, king of Israel, overran all the northern part of the kingdom, carried away captive many inhabitants of the cities and placed them in various parts of his own kingdom (II Kings 15:29). Some years later the allied kings of Israel and Syria, Pekah and Rezin, having made war against Judah, Ahaz foolishly applied to Tiglath-pileser for assistance. The Assyrian army captured Damascus and slew Rezin (II Kings 16:9). It then ravaged Israel, chiefly east of the Jordan, carried off many captives, and exacted a very heavy tribute from Ahaz and greatly distressed him (I Chron. 5:26; II Chron. 28:16-21). Tiglath-pileser II reigned about nineteen years, and was succeeded by his son Shalmaneser IV].

Shalmaneser (Salmanasar) besieged Samaria and added Israel to Assyria. The kingdom of Israel ended after enduring for 282 years. [Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, reigned from 727 to 722 BCE, coming between the reigns of Tiglath-pileser and Sargon. He invaded Israel. Hoshea the king had revolted, but he conquered him and exacted a tribute. (II Kings 17:3) He then returned home, but as Hoshea revolted a second time and allied himself with the king of Egypt, Shalmaneser returned; and he ravaged Samaria, besieged Hoshea in his capital; and after three years the city fell. However, during his period a rebellion headed by Sargon broke out in Assyria, and Shalmaneser was deposed.]

Ahaz (Achas) (in the Year of the World 4466) [The phrase in the parenthesis does not occur in the German edition]. reigned in Judah after the death of his father Jotham (Joathan). He was the most evil, and zealously addicted to idolatry. Pekah (Phacee) came against him, and in a single day slew in battle 120,000 fighting men of Judah, and carried off 20,000 children, maidens and women as captives. But these he sent home again on the advice of the prophets. [Ahaz, son of Jotham, was the 11th king of Judah. He ascended the throne in his twenties, and reigned 16 years. He was a polytheist and held God in contempt. He made his own children pass through the fire to idols. He introduced the Syrian gods into Jerusalem, altered the temple after the Syrian model, and even closed it altogether. He met various repulses at the hands of Pekah and Rezin. The Edomites revolted and the Philistines harassed him. He sought the aid of Pul, king of Assyria, and in consequence became tributary to him and to his successor Tiglath-pileser. Ahaz was reduced to great extremities in buying off the Assyrians; and yet he became still more infatuated with polytheism. He died in at 36, and was refused burial with the ancestral kings. (II Chron. 28)] At this time Rome was built. [This paragraph and the one that follows it (on Hezekiah) are switched in the German edition].

Hezekiah (Ezechias) (in the Year of the World 4472) [The phrase in the parenthesis does not occur in the German edition], son of Ahaz (Achab) and 15th king of Judah, was the best and most pious, and he led the people back to the service of God. During his time the kingdom of the ten tribes declined and though Shalmaneser, the king, became part of Assyria. Sennacherib, king of Assyria, overran Hezekiah and his kingdom and besieged Jerusalem; but in answer to prayer and penance on the part of Hezekiah and Isaiah (Ysaye), the angel of the Lord in one night slew 285,000 men of the hosts of Sennacherib; and thus was Hezekiah relieved. Now, because of his boastful pride, or by reason of his ingratitude, Hezekiah was taken deathly ill; but through remorse and atonement he was restored to health. And as a sign of the cure the course of the sun was reversed by ten degrees. To the messengers of the king of Babylon he displayed all his riches; whereupon Isaiah prophesied to him that these same riches would be carried off by the Babylonians.

Hezekiah was a distinguished king of Judah, the son and successor of the apostate Ahaz. He ascended the throne at the age of 25 and ruled 29 years, till 697 BCE. During his reign the temple was repaired, and the Passover celebrated. A proclamation was sent from Dan to Beersheba inviting the tribes to Jerusalem to keep the Passover, and as a result of the convocation a national religious zeal broke out. Hezekiah held Isaiah in high esteem and frequently consulted him. He warred against the Philistines, and regained what his father had lost. He rebelled against the domination of Assyria. Sennacherib invaded his kingdom with an immense army, but was miraculously defeated. In the events of his private life, one is to be noted of peculiar significance. The king became sick to death, and Isaiah uttered his doom, telling him that he must die (II Kings 20:1-11):

Then he (Hezekiah) turned his face to the wall and prayed to the Lord. . . And it came to pass, before Isaiah had gone out into the middle court, that the word of the Lord came to him, saying, Turn again, and tell Hezekiah the captain of my people, Thus says the Lord, the God of David, your father, I have heard your prayer, I have seen your tears: behold, I will heal you. . . And I will add to your days fifteen years; and I will deliver you and your city out of the hand of the king of Assyria. . . And Isaiah said, Take a lump of figs. And they took and laid it on the boil and he recovered. And Hezekiah said to Isaiah, What shall be the sign that the Lord will heal me. . . And Isaiah said, This sign shall you have of the Lord, that the Lord will do the thing that he has spoken: Shall the shadow go forward ten degrees or go back ten degrees? And Hezekiah answered, It is a light thing for the shadow to go down ten degrees: No, but let the shadow return backwards ten degrees. And Isaiah the prophet, cried to the Lord: and he brought the shadow ten degrees backward, by which it had gone down in the dial of Ahaz.

Thus as a sign of the cure the dial was made to go back ten degrees. Another event of note in Hezekiah's life was the punishment pronounced upon his house by Isaiah for the display he made of his riches to the messengers of the king of Babylon, who had come to congratulate him upon his recovery (II Kings 20:15). Hezekiah died in honor and was buried in the "highest of the sepulchers of the sons of David."

Sennacherib (as already stated) disgracefully fled; and he came to Nineveh and tortured the Jews and Tobias. He was finally slain by his own sons. [Sennacherib was the son and successor of Sargon. Judah had paid tribute to Assyria, but under Hezekiah it revolted; and so Sennacherib determined to take revenge on Judah. And so he invaded Palestine on two occasions, on the first of which he was pacified by a tribute. When Hezekiah revolted a second time, Sennacherib sent an embassy demanding submission. In response to which Hezekiah prayed to God for deliverance. In consequence, the Bible claims, 185,000 Assyrians died of the plague in a night, the siege was raised and Sennacherib returned to Nineveh (II Kings 19:35). About twenty years later, while worshipping in the house of his god, Sennacherib was slain with the sword by his own sons. He had reigned twenty-two years, and brilliantly. He crushed the revolt of Babylon, attacked Sidon, made many cities tributary, and as Sargon had done, laid a heavy hand on the neighboring nations. His palaces were large and beautiful, and his monuments exist in unexpected places].

Manasseh (Manasses) (in the Year of the World 4501) [The phrase in the parenthesis does not occur in the German edition], son of Hezekiah, reigned after him in Judah for 55 years. He was a very evil man and inclined to idolatry and superstition. He slew the prophets, and Isaiah in particular he ordered to be cut apart with a wood saw. He was taken captive to Babylon, but upon his repentance and humility he received pardon and mercy, and was restored to his kingdom. After him reigned Amon, his son, who followed in the footsteps of his father in matters of sin, but not in repentance. He was slain by his relatives. [Manasseh, successor of Hezekiah, as king of Judah, ascended the throne at the age of twelve. The early parts of his reign were distinguished by acts of impiety and cruelty, and he succeeded in drawing his subjects away from the Lord to such an extent that the only kind of worship not allowed in Judah was that of Jehovah (II Kings 21:2-9). In the end he did much to repair the evils of his former life. (II Chron. 33:1-20)]

1. Uzziah (Ozias), son of Amaziah, and twelfth king of Judah.
2. Jotham (Joathan), successor of Uzziah as king of Judah.
3. Ahaz (Achas), son and successor of Jotham as king of Judah.
4. Hezekiah, son of Ahaz, and fifteenth king of Judah.
5. Manasseh (Manasses), son and successor of Hezekiah.

The Assyrian Lineage is here continued from Folio XLII verso (which there ended with Thineus) and is here resumed as follows:

1. Sardanapalus (Sardanapallus) is represented by a woodcut that is rather distinctive. The portrait is youthful and clean-shaven, with flowing locks of hair. The other two clean-shaven individuals on this page are Uziah (Ozias) and Pul (Phull), both of whom are of rather portly individuals who have clearly reached (and surpassed) middle age. The remaining portraits are of older, bearded individuals who stereotypically represent the idea of 'king.'

2. Pul (Phull) is represented by a woodcut that gazes diagonally across the page to his physical counterpart, Uziah (Ozias), the only other middle-aged clean-shaven heavy-set figure, who, in turn, looks back at him.
3. Tiglath-pileser (Theglathphalazar).
4. Shalmaneser (Salmanasar).
5. Sennacherib.
6. Esar-haddon (Assaradan).

Folio LV verso

Zephaniah (Sophonias), the ninth of the twelve prophets, was a son of Cushi (Chus), noblest of men. To the Hebrews he prophesied the destruction and rebuilding of Jerusalem. [Zephaniah, ninth of the minor prophets, was the son of Cushi, and lived in the days of Josiah. His prophecy was uttered in the early part of the ministry of Jeremiah and was mainly designed to excite the Jewish nation to repentance, in view of threatened judgments, and to comfort the people of God with promises of the final triumph of righteousness. The description of the judgment in 1:14, 15, "The great day of Jehovah is near" (in the Latin version, Dies irae dies illa) has furnished the key note to the sublimest hymn of the Middle Ages, the Dies irae, traditionally attributed to Thomas of Celano (c. 1250)].

Uriah (Urias), the prophet, was slain by king Jehoiakim (Jeconia). [Uriah or Urias, son of Shemaiah, a faithful prophet in Judah in the time of Jehoiakim, confirmed the prediction of Jeremiah against Judah; and having fled to Egypt for refuge from the enraged king, and having been sent back by Pharaoh-necho on demand, he was wickedly slain and dishonorably buried (Jer. 26:20-23)].

Minor Prophets

Habakkuk (Abacuck), tenth among the prophets, full of the spirit of prophecy, and held in esteem in Judah, prophesied against Nebuchadnezzar (Nabuchodonosor) and Babylonia. He also brought food to Daniel while in the lion's den in Babylonia. [Habakkuk, or Habbakkuk (Abacuck) was one of the twelve minor prophets of whose birth we know neither time nor place. He lived in the reign of Jehoiakim, or of Josiah. The prophecy of Habakkuk relates chiefly to the invasion of Judaea by the Chaldaeans, and the subsequent punishment of the Chaldaeans themselves, ch. 2. The passage, 2:4, "the just shall live by his faith," furnished Paul the text for his Epistle to the Romans (Rom. 1:17). The Book of Habakkuk consists of three chapters, which all constitute one oracle. The first foretells the woes which the Chaldaeans would soon inflict on his nation; the second, the future humiliation of the iniquitous conquerors; in the third the prophet implores the aid of Jehovah in view of his mighty works of ancient days, and expresses the most assured trust in him.]

Baruch was the scribe of Jeremiah the prophet. He made a prophetic book, and in it predicted the return from captivity. [Baruch was the secretary of the prophet Jeremiah, and came of a distinguished Jewish family (Jer. 32:12). His friendship for Jeremiah was strong and constant. At his dictation Baruch wrote the prophecies. These he read before the princes, who rehearsed them to Jehoiakim the king, having previously deposited the writing in one of the offices of the temple. The king ordered the writing to be read in his presence, and he became so exasperated that he destroyed the manuscripts and gave orders to arrest both the prophet and his secretary, but they had concealed themselves. Jehovah, however, repeated the prophecies to Jeremiah with some additions, and Baruch wrote them down a second time. Baruch was falsely accused of influencing Jeremiah in favor of the Chaldaeans, and they were both imprisoned until the capture of Jerusalem in 586 BCE. They were afterward forced to go down to Egypt (Jer. 43:6-7). The Book of Baruch is one of the Apocrypha of the Old Testament, of uncertain date and authorship].

Jeremiah, the holiest of the prophets, sanctified from his mother's womb (of a race) of priests, began to prophesy against Jerusalem and the temple, when he was still a child and but twelve years of age. And he prophesied for forty years, not including the years during which he prophesied in Egypt. And there, after many daring predictions, he was stoned by the people at Tahpanhes and buried in the same region; and after he drove out the snakes, he was honored.

Jeremiah was one of the four major prophets, the other three being Isaiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel. He was the son of Hilkiah, of Anathoth, in the land of Benjamin, (Jer.1:1) and lived under various kings from Josiah to the Captivity. As Professor Plumptre observes, "there is no one in the 'goodly fellowship of the prophets' of whom, in his work, feelings and sufferings, we have so distinct a knowledge, although it is derived almost exclusively from his book. He is the great example of the prophetic life. It is not to be wondered at that he should have seemed to the Christian feeling of the early church a type of Him in whom that life received its highest completion." He was not only the prophet of sorrow and public calamity, but also of a new and better covenant of the heart. Jeremiah was very young when called to his prophetic office, and for 42 years he persisted in this arduous service with diligence and fidelity, in the midst of the severest trials and persecutions. It was probably owing to his youth at the time, and his residence in Anathoth, that when the book of the Law was found in the house of the Lord, the king sent to Huldah the prophetess, instead of to him, to inquire of the Lord (II Kings 22:14). During all this time Jerusalem was in a distracted and deplorable state and the prophet was calumniated, imprisoned, and often in danger of death. But nothing could deter him. His exhortations to the king and rulers were to submit at once to the arms of Nebuchadnezzar, for by that means they would preserve their lives, while continued resistance would bring certain and dreadful destruction on Jerusalem. At this time the city swarmed with false prophets who contradicted Jeremiah and flattered the king and his courtiers that God would rescue them from the impending danger; and after the city was taken and part of the population carried to Babylon, these prophets confidently predicted a speedy return. On the other hand Jeremiah predicted that their captivity would be a long one and would endure for seventy years.

The prophecy of Jeremiah is a reflection of his sad and tender character and the calamities of his age. It embraces a period of 40 years. Jeremiah entered upon the office of prophet in the thirtieth year of Josiah, and his prophecy relates to the judgments that were to come in consequence of the gross idolatry and corruption of the people. His end is uncertain. There are indications that he may have reached extreme old age. On the other hand there is the tradition that the long tragedy of his life ended in actual martyrdom, and that the Jews at Tahpanhes, irritated by his rebukes, finally stoned him to death. Most commentators on the New Testament find an allusion to this in Hebrews 11:37.

This paragraph and the one that follows it (on Saraiah) are switched in the German edition of the Chronicle.

Seraiah (Sarayas) was slain by Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah with other advisers of Zedekiah. [Seraiah is the high priest who in the reign of Zedekiah was taken captive by Nebuchadnezzar and killed at Riblah (II Kings 25:18-21; I Chr. 6:14; Jer. 52:24-27)].

Huldah (Olda), the prophetess, was the wife of Shallum (Sellum) the high priest. She was illustrious and prophesied for Josiah (Josia), and particularly concerning the destruction of Jerusalem and the captivity of its people. [Huldah (Olda), a prophetess, wife of Shallum, keeper of the wardrobe under Josiah, and who dwelt in the suburbs, was the most noted person of prophetic gift in Jerusalem while Jeremiah was still at Anathoth. Josiah had recourse to her when Heliish found the Book of the Law, to procure an authoritative opinion on it (II Kings 22:14; II Chron. 34:22)].

These six (referring to portraits of Mizahel, Hananiah (Ananias), Azariah (Azarias) Daniel (the text incorrectly reads David), Ezekiel (Ezechiel), and Merodach (Mardocheus) below the text) all yet children, were, together with Joachim, the king, carried to Babylonia in captivity. Nebuchadnezzar set up a golden image, 60 cubits high, in a field, and ordered all princes to attend upon its dedication and for the worship thereof. And the herald called out: You shall worship the image, and you who do not do so, will in this same hour be sent to the oven of the blazing fire. And they all worshipped it, except the servants of Daniel. For this they were accused before the king. Whereupon an oven was lighted sevenfold; and in it they were thrown, bound and fully clad. But the flames killed the men who put them into the oven. And the angel of the Lord entered the oven like a blowing wind of mist, and refreshed them. Thereupon the three children praised and sanctified the Lord God, as with a single mouth. [In the reign of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, Nebuchadnezzar made war on Judah, taking the king prisoner. He besieged and took Jerusalem and carried off many of the people as captives, including Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael and Azariah, all of the royal family. He caused these four to be carefully educated in the language and learning of the Chaldeans, so they might be employed at court. They were also given Chaldaean names: Daniel was called Belteshazzar; Hananiah, Shadrach; Mishael, Meshach; Azariah, Abed-ego. Their education completed, the king communed with them, finding them superior to all the magicians and astrologers of the realm. (Dan. 1:1-20) He made Daniel ruler of the whole province of Babylon, and chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon. At Daniel's request the other three were set over the affairs of the province of Babylon; but "Daniel sat in the gate of the king." (Dan. 2:48-49) And Nebuchadnezzar made a golden image threescore cubits in height and set it up in the plain, calling on all the princes, governors, etc, to come together and worship it, under pain of death in a fiery furnace for failure to obey. And at a given sign the multitudes fell down and worshipped; but certain Chaldeans made complaint against Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-ego for not having done so. Before the king they admitted the charge and told him they would neither serve his gods nor worship his image. The king ordered the furnace to be heated "one seven times more than it was wont to be heated." The accused were thrown into it. The terrific heat killed the men who threw them in, but they themselves remained unscathed, and while in the midst of the flames sang the praises of the Lord (Dan. 3:1-30). The king recognizing the power of their God and released them].

Jehozadak (Iosedech), the priest, a son of Seraiah (Azaria), was, when the Lord through Nebuchadnezzar destroyed Judah and Jerusalem by force, taken captive with others to Babylonia. Some say he was Ezdra, the writer and priest, or, perchance his brother. [Jehozadak was the son of the high priest Seraiah, who was murdered by Nebuchadnezzar (II Kings 25:21). He was carried into captivity and never became high priest, but his son, Jeshua, attained to this office, and his descendants held it until Alcimus. He is more frequently called Jozadak or Josedech].

The Priestly Line is here continued from Folio LIII verso, which there ended with Shallum (Sellum, misprinted "Bellum"). We resume:

1. Hilkiah or Helkias (Elchias), who is not mentioned in the text, was high priest in Josiah's reign. He found "the Book of the Law," the sacred copy of the Pentateuch in the temple, and aided Josiah in his reformation. He was probably an ancestor of Ezra (II Kings 22:8-23, 25; II Chron. 34:14-35). This portrait represented Azariah (Azarias) at Folio L verso; Phinehas (Phinees), at Folio XXXVII verso.
2. Azariah (Azarias), son of Hilkiah, upon whom the text is also silent. This name was very common among the Jews and was born by many briefly referred to in the Scriptures. Three of them were high priests (I Chron. 6:9, 10; II Chron. 26:17-20; 31:10, 13). This portrait represented Uzzi (Ozy) at Folio XXXVII verso.
3. Seraiah (Sarayas), referred to in the text, was a son of the above named Azariah, and is here represented by a woodcut that served for Jehoiada (Yoyada) at Folio L verso; for Zadok (Sadoch), at Folio XLVIII recto; and for Abishua (Abysue) at Folio XXXVII verso.

4. Jehozadak or Jozadak (Josedeck) is mentioned in the text, and represented by a portrait used for Azariah (Azarias) at Folio L verso; for Achimas at Folio XLVIII recto; and for Bukki (Boos or Buuzz), at Folio XXXVII verso.

The prophets are resumed from folio LIII verso:

1. Zephaniah (Sophonias), the ninth prophet, was Azariah (Azarias) at Folio XLIX verso, and Ibzan (Abesson) at Folio XLI recto.
2. Uriah or Urias, a prophet, was Tola (Thola) at Folio XXXVII verso.
3. Baruch, the secretary or scribe of Jeremiah.
4. Habakkuk (Abacuck), the 10th prophet, was Eli (Hely) at Folio XLI verso.
5. Jeremiah (Hieremias) was Obadiah (Abdyas) at Folio XLIX verso, and Ahijah (Achias) the prophet, at Folio XLV recto.
6. Huldah (Olda), the prophetess, was Juno at Folio XXXV recto, and Ceres at Folio XXXV recto.
7. Daniel (mislabelled as 'David') is portrayed by a woodcut here used for the first time. He is represented as a young man, with long flowing curls, and in medieval robe. He is apparently in the act of prophesying. As he stands waist deep in the cup of a flower, he is gesturing, as is the custom of most of the characters illustrated in the Chronicle.
8. Ezekiel (Ezechiel), the prophet, also a new woodcut. The subject is an elderly man with long hair and flowing beard. He wears a cap and medieval cloak. He is gesturing, apparently to emphasize some prophecy.
9. Murdoch (Mardocheus) is also represented by a new woodcut, and appears as a middle-aged medieval character, attired in cap and robe, standing in the cup of a flower and gesticulating.

(C) THE MEN IN THE FIERY FURNACE.

The Men in the Fiery Furnace--Mizahel, Hananiah (Ananias), and Azariah (Azarias)--are here depicted in the blazing oven or furnace, which among the Chaldaeans was a device used for capital punishment (Jer. 29:22; Dan. 3:19-26; Rev. 1:15; 9:2). Although the intended victims had attained to manhood before they were obliged to undergo this ordeal, they are here represented as three children, neatly clad as choir boys, no doubt to indicate that (according to the text of the Vulgate) they sang the praises of the Lord amidst the flames (see Text and Note, above).

Folio LVI recto

Rhea, who was also called Ilia, daughter of Numitor the king, was at this time still a virgin. After her father was deposed by her uncle Amulius, she was placed among the virgins of the Vesta, the goddess of the fire, in order to compel her to remain a perpetual virgin. But when she became of full age and was moved by unchaste desires, she submitted to the most unworthy embraces of an unknown man. By him she became pregnant, and bore the twins Romulus and Remus. Because of this she was buried alive at the command of Amulius, her uncle. Thereafter he ordered the twins to be thrown into the Tiber at Rome. But when the servants could not get to the banks of the river itself because of the abundance of overflowing water, they placed the twins on the shore; and so Romulus and Remus were not done away with as Amulius had ordered. When the water receded, a she-wolf heard the cries of the children; and she left her young and followed the crying of the children. And she mothered them. Faustulus, the king's shepherd, found the children beside a tree and carried them home. He brought them up among the shepherds, according to their coarse peasant life. Some say they were the children of the pagan god Mars because they were born in the forest of Mars, or were nourished by a she-wolf (who is under the protection of this same Mars). As they grew up among the shepherds, they grew in size and fighting strength and waywardness from day to day. And when they became of age they murdered their uncle the king, and reinstated Numitor, their ancestor, as king. But in the following year he was deposed. And so were extinguished the names of the Latin or Albanian kings, a line of twenty-one kings, who had reigned six hundred and twenty-three years.

Remus, son of the Vestal Virgin Rhea, in this year, together with his brother Romulus, began the building of a city, which is now Rome. And as they were twins and equal heirs, they agreed to determine by means of bird augury which one was to rule and to name the city after him, Remus (who was in possession of the Aventine hill) first saw six vultures; and thereafter Romulus (who possessed the Palatine hill) saw twelve vultures. This, Romulus interpreted to mean that as he saw the greater number of birds, he should be the ruler of the city, and that the city according to the omen of the bloodthirsty birds of prey, would be a fighting one. Now, it was reckoned that an embankment which was thrown up, should be sufficient to protect the city. Remus laughed at that, and ridiculed Romulus. For this he was slain (some say at the behest of his brother, others say at the request of Fabius, the captain of the horse of Romulus). And he was buried outside the city because he had overstepped the marks or limits of the future wall of that city. This was the first sacrifice, by means of which he sanctified the fortification of the new city by his blood. [The story of Romulus and Remus was touched upon in connection with the mention of their uncle Amulius at Folio LIII recto and the note there, which brought the narrative to the point of assassination of Amulius and the restoration of Numitor to the throne. But, as stated by the chronicler, Numitor was again deposed in the following year, and the twins were his successors in equal right. Romulus and Remus loved their old abode and therefore left Alba to found a city on the banks of the Tiber. But they could not agree where the city should be built and after whom it should be named. Romulus wished to build it on the Palatine, Remus on the Aventine. They agreed to decide the question by augury; and each took his station on the top of his chosen hill. The night passed, and at dawn Remus saw six vultures; but at sunrise, when these tidings were brought to Romulus, twelve vultures flew by him. Each claimed the augury in his own favor; but the shepherds decided for Romulus, who proceeded to mark out the pomoerium, or line for the wall of his city, and to raise the wall itself. Remus, who still resented the wrong he had suffered, leaped over the wall in scorn; whereupon he was slain by his brother].

BEGINNING OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE

Romulus, first king of the Romans, at the age of twenty-one years and in the three hundred and twenty-fourth year of David's kingdom (when Numitor was slain and the Latin kingdom became disrupted), together with his brother Remus and by the assistance of a number of shepherds, built a little village on unprotected ground; and he named it for himself. There (as Eusebius writes) he began to reign in the same year, and he reigned 38 years. Although Romulus was of doubtful origin, as Plutarch states, his natural manners and characteristics were not servile. He carried himself with royal dignity and courage, and gave promise of a ready and warlike disposition. He was a very eloquent speaker, and of civic renown; and therefore he attained high honors. After Rome was built he singled out those who had arrived at a sturdy age, and established military ranks for the practice of war. The rest of the inhabitants he called the people (populus). Therefore he created senators whom he called fathers (patres), his own progeny he called patricians. But as there was a dearth of inhabitants, he provided a forest in the vicinity, free to the general public; and to it came a great many people from many places; and thus was made up the Roman population. Therefore Romulus decreed that alleged games should be held: and many maidens living in the vicinity came to see the games, and were captured by the Romans and married. This was the cause of much war. The strength of the city being soon increased, this most wise king made the following arrangement in the state; that the young men, divided into tribes, should be ready, with horses and arms, for any sudden demands of war. When he had thus regulated matters, and was holding an assembly of the people at the lake of Caprea, near the city, he was suddenly snatched out of their sight. and once upon a time, outside the city, near a pool there, he was suddenly withdrawn from humankind.

This section is taken from Florus' Epitome de T. Livio Bellorum omnium annorum DCC Libri duo (1.1). Florus, a Roman historian living at the time of the emperors Trajan and Hadrian, made a very abridged compilation of Roman history taken mainly from Livy. It was a beloved text in the Middle Ages, perhaps because of its 'rhetorically enhanced' (even bombastic) shaping of Roman historical events.

Romulus found the people too few in numbers. The city had become filled with men, but they wanted women. Romulus therefore tried to form treaties with the neighboring tribes in order to obtain connubium, or the right of legal marriage with his citizens; but his offers were met with disdain, and he resolved to obtain by force what he could not gain by entreaty. Four months after the foundation of the city, he proclaimed that games were to be celebrated in honor of the god Consus, and invited his neighbors, the Latins and the Sabines, to the festival. Suspecting no treachery, they came in numbers, with their wives and children. But the Roman youths rushed upon their guests and carried off the virgins. The parents returned home and prepared for vengeance. Three of the Latin towns took up arms, but were successively defeated by the Romans. At last the Sabine king advanced with a powerful army and desperate battles were fought. At length when both parties were exhausted by the struggle, the Sabine women rushed in between them, and prayed their husbands and fathers to be reconciled. Their prayer was heard; the two people not only made peace, but agreed to form a single nation. Finally, Romulus ruled alone over both Romans and Sabines. He reigned 37 years, and was at length taken away from the world. One day as he was reviewing his people in the Campus Martius, near the Goat's Pool (Caprea), the sun was suddenly eclipsed, darkness overspread the earth, and a dreadful storm dispersed the people. When daylight returned, Romulus had disappeared, for his father Mars had carried him up to heaven in a fiery chariot.

As Romulus was regarded as the father of Rome, its most ancient political institutions and the organization of the people were ascribed to him. Thus he is said to have divided the people into three tribes which bore the names Ramnes, Tities, and Luceres. The Ramnes were supposed to have derived their name from Romulus, the Tities from Titus Tatius, the Sabine king, and the Luceres from Lucumo, an Etruscan chief who had assisted Romulus against the Sabines. Each tribe contained ten curiae, which received their names from the thirty Sabine women who had brought about the peace. Each curia contained ten gentes, and each gens 100 men. Thus the people, according to general belief were originally divided into 3 tribes, 30 curiae, and 300 gentes, which mustered 3000 men, who fought on foot, and were called a legion. Besides those there were 300 horsemen, called Celeres. To assist him in the government of the people Romulus is said to have selected a number of aged men in the state, who were called Patres or Senatores. The council itself, which was called the senatus, originally consisted of 100 members, but this was increased to 200 when the Sabines were incorporated into the state. In addition to the senate, there was another assembly, consisting of the members of the gentes, which bore the name of comitia, because they voted in it according to their division into curiae.

RHEAM REMUS AND ROMULUS

Here we have the beginning of a new genealogy:

1. Rhea (also called Rhea Silvia, or Ilia), the virgin who bore Romulus and Remus. She is represented by a woodcut portraying her as a crowned queen with scepter in hand; but instead of an orb, she holds in the other hand a branch that proceeds to Remus and from there to Romulus. This woodcut is here used for the first time.
2. Romulus is represented by appears as a king, with crown, orb and scepter. In the German edition of the Chronicle, Remus appears here, and the phrase that precedes Romulus' name in the Latin edition, Regnu(m) roma(n)oru(m) ('Of the Roman Kings') does not appear in the German edition.
3. Remus appears as a king, with crown, orb and scepter. In the German edition of the Chronicle, Romulus appears here.

Numa Pompilius, second Roman king, succeeded Romulus in the 27th year of the kingdom of Hezekiah; and he reigned 41 years. Because of his piety he was elected king by the Sabine people. He taught spiritual exercises and the worship of the immortal gods, and instituted a priesthood of flamens, prophets, and others. He divided the year into twelve months, and ordered and prescribed the days of work and the holidays. All these things he ascribed to the goddess Egeria so that the rabble would more readily accept them and the uncivilized people brought to obedience. And so with justice and piety he ruled over a land that he had acquired by stealth and injustice. Later he died of a slight illness at the age of eighty years. [Numa Pompilius (715-672 BCE), second legendary king of Rome, was a Sabine, and his wife was the daughter of Titus Tatius, the Sabine colleague of Romulus. He was elected by the Roman people at the close of a year's interregnum, during which the sovereignty had been exercised by the members of the senate in rotation. Nearly all the early religious institutions of Rome were attributed to him. He set up the worship of Terminus (the god of landmarks), appointed the festival of Fides ('Faith'), built the temple of Janus, reorganized the calendar and fixed days of work and holidays. He instituted the flamens or sacred priests of Jupiter, Mars and Quirinus; the virgins of Vesta, to keep the sacred fire burning on the hearth of the city; the Salii, to guard the shield that fell from heaven; the pontifices and augurs, to arrange the rites and interpret the will of the gods. He also divided the craftsmen into nine guilds. He derived his inspirations from his wife, the nymph Egeria, whom he met by night in her sacred grove. After a long and peaceful reign, during which the gates of Janus were closed, Numa died and was succeeded by the warlike Tullus Hostilius. No single legislator can really be considered responsible for all the institutions ascribed to Numa. They are essentially Italian, and older than Rome itself. Even Roman tradition itself wavers; e.g. the fetiales are variously attributed to Tullus Hostilius and Ancus Marcius].

Tullus Hostilius, third Roman king, was elected by the Romans in the thirty-ninth year of the reign of Manassah, and he reigned 31 years. The sovereignty was voluntarily turned over to him in view of his virtue and ability, although he was of vulgar peasant origin. His cradle was (as Eutropius writes) a rustic hut [This clause is not found in the German edition of the . Also, Schedel is incorrect here, for it is not Eutropius who comments on the rustic hut as Tullus' cradle, but Valerius Maximus (3.4.1)], and he herded cattle in his youth but finally wore the purple and the crown jewels. He enlarged the city of Rome so as to comprehend the Caelionian hill (Mons Caelius). After a long period of peace, he warred against the Albans, defeated them and sent them to Rome, and destroyed their city, except the temples. When he had reached his greatest glory in war, he and his entire house were finally destroyed by a flash of lightning. [Tullus Hostilius (672-640 BCE), third legendary king of Rome, conducted successful wars with Alba, Fidenae and Veii, which mirror the earlier conquests of Latin territory and the first extension of the Roman domain beyond the walls of Rome. During his reign the combat between the Horatii and Curiatii, the representatives of Rome and Alba, took place. He is said to have been struck dead by lightning as punishment of his pride. He is simply the duplicate of Romulus. Both were brought up among shepherds; carried on war against Fidenae and Veii; doubled the number of citizens; organized the army, and disappeared from the earth in a storm. As Romulus and Numa represent the Ramnes and Tities, so, in order to complete the list of the four traditional elements of the nation, Tullus was made the representative of the Luceres, and Ancus, the founder of the Plebs. The distinctive event of his reign is the destruction of Alba, which may be regarded as an historical event. But when and by whom it was destroyed is uncertain – probably by the Latins].

Ancus (Anchus) Marcius, born of Numa's daughter, the fourth Roman king, received the Roman kingdom in the fourth year of the reign of Josiah (Josia), and reigned 25 years. Among his ancestors he was not the least in the arts and in renown for peace and war. He surrounded the battlements with a wall, and added the Aventine and the Janiculum hills to the city. He threw the first bridge over the Tiber, and built the city of Ostia (Hostia) by the sea, 16 miles from Rome. Finally he was seized by the plague and exchanged life for death. [Ancus Marcius (640-616 BCE.), was the fourth legendary king of Rome. Like Numa, his reputed grandfather, he was a friend of peace and religion, but was obliged to make war to defend his territories. He conquered the Latins, and some of them whom he settled on the Aventine formed the original Plebs. He fortified the Janiculum, threw a wooden bridge across the Tiber, founded the port of Ostia, established salt-works and built a prison].

Tarquinius Priscus, the fifth Roman king, was elected in the twenty-seventh year of the reign of Josiah (Josia) and reigned 37 years. And although he was a native of the city of Corinth in Greece, nevertheless, by reason of his valor and distinction, he was elevated to the Roman throne. He revived Greek learning and Italian art, and enlarged the number of senators by three hundred. He was better qualified for war than for peace. By force of arms he subdued twelve peoples of Tuscany, and celebrated his triumph in a golden chariot drawn by four horses. Finally, after many strenuous deeds he was slain by the Sons of Ancus. [Tarquinius Priscus, Lucius, (616-578 BCE), fifth legendary king of Rome, is said to have been the son of a Greek refugee who moved from Tarquinii, in Etruria, to Rome. He was appointed guardian of the sons of Ancus Marcius, but supplanted them on their father's death. He laid out the Circus Maximus, instituted the great games, built the great sewers (cloacae), and began the construction of the temple of Jupiter on the Capitol. He successfully warred against the Sabines and subjugated Latium. He was the first to celebrate a roman triumph, after the Etruscan fashion, in a robe of purple and gold, and was born on a chariot drawn by four horses. He was finally assassinated by the instigation of the sons of Ancus Marcius].

At this time the kings still used lances instead of a diadem, which the Greeks called scepters. From the beginning the ancients honored the lance as a symbol of the immortal gods; and on account of the memory of this religion, lances are added to the images of the gods.

Phalaris (Phaleris), tyrant and orator of Agrigentum, flourished at this time. To him came secretly from Athens an ingenious artisan. And as this artisan was familiar with the gruesomeness of this tyrant, he made for him, in order to please him, a brazen bull. In its side he made a door by which evil-doers were locked inside it; and they were punished by placing a fire under the bull. The cries of the victims were to imitate the bellowing of the bull. When the artisan asked compensation for his work, the king ordered him locked within the bull. Thus he became the first victim of his own invention. Ovid writes: There can be no more even justice than that one should suffer the same penalty, which by artifice he has prepared for others. And such was the answer of Phalaris to the Athenians who complained to the king of the handiwork of their own artisan.

Phalaris, tyrant of Agragas (Agrigentum) in Sicily, c. 570-554 BCE, was entrusted with the building of the temple of Zeus Atabyrius in the citadel, and took advantage of his position to make himself despot. Under his rule Agrigentum seems to have attained considerable prosperity. He supplied the city with water, adorned it with fine buildings, and fortified it with walls. On the northern coast of the island the people of Himera elected him general with absolute power, in spite of the warnings of the poet Stesichorus. According to Suidas he succeeded in making himself master of the entire island. He was finally overthrown in a general uprising, headed by Telemachus, the ancestor of Theron (tyrant c. 488-472) and burned in his brazen bull.

Succeeding ages have held up Phalaris to infamy for his excessive cruelty. In his brazen bull, invented, it is said, by Perillus of Athens, the tyrant's victims were shut up, and a fire was kindled beneath, and they were roasted alive, while their shrieks represented the bellowing of the bull. Perillus himself is said to have been the first victim.

Later tradition, however, represents Phalaris as a naturally humane man and a patron of philosophy and literature. Plutarch, though he takes the unfavorable view, mentions that the Sicilians gave to the severity of Phalaris the name of justice and a hatred of crime.

This paragraph is switched in order with the one that follows it (on the Erythraean Sibyl) in the German edition of the Chronicle.

The Erythraean (Erithrea) Sibyl, the most celebrated of them all, was a native of Babylonia, and lived at this time. She was dressed in the garb of a monk, wore a black veil, and carried a naked sword in her hand. She was not very old but her countenance was moderately sorrowful. Under her feet was a golden circle set with stars in likeness of the heavens. She speaks thus: In the final age God will be humbled; the divine seed will become mortal; the Godhead will become obedient to mankind; the Lamb will lie in the hay and will be nourished by attendant virgins.

(B) THE ERYTHRAEAN SIBYL.

The Erythraean Sibyl (Sibilla Erithea) is represented by a woodcut of special design. She wears a monkish robe and black veil; carries the naked sword in one hand and the golden ring studded with stars, in the other. She is a middle-aged woman and rather sad of countenance—all in accordance with the marks given her by the chronicler.

Folio LVII recto

Rome, a city celebrated throughout the world, mistress of all things in Italy, and lying beside the Tiber, was named after Romulus its builder. It was built by him in the eleventh year of Hezekiah (Ezechie), king of Judah, and in the second year of the eighth Olympiad. Although many writers speak of the size of the city, Flavius Vopiscus (Vopistus), [Flavius Vopiscus, a native of Syracuse, and one of the six Scriptores Historiae Augustae, flourished about 300 CE. His name is prefixed to the biographies of 1. Aurelianus; 2. Tacitus; 3. Florinus; 4. Proves; 5. The four tyrants, Firmus, Saturninus, Proculus, Bonosus; 6. Caius; 7. Numerianus; 8. Carinus; at this point he stops, declaring that Diocletian, and those who follow, demand a more elevated style of composition]. among others, states that the emperor Aurelius enlarged the city to a circumference of thirty thousand paces. However, the measurements of the ancients are not comparable with our own. The Tiber flows into the city from the north and out again on the southern side in the direction of the city of Ostia, leaving the hills of Vaticanus and Janiculum beyond the river, on the right. On the left the municipal boundaries comprehend seven hills. Pliny states that the city had thirty open gates and seven which were closed. [The number of gates is uncertain, and the position of many of them is doubtful. Pliny, indeed, states that their number was 37; but it is almost certain that this number includes many mere openings made through the walls to connect different parts of the city with the suburbs. The walls and gates of the city are generally classified into three divisions: those originally erected by Romulus; secondly, the walls of Servius Tullius; and thirdly, those erected by Aurelian]. But as the city increased from time to time, the gates of the last enclosure lost their identity or form; and the city was later destroyed, we will not undertake to discover them all. The first gate was called Porta Flumentana; the second, Pinciana; the third, Salaria (Solaria); the fourth, Viminalis, now St. Agnes, or Nomentana (Numentana); the fifth, Esquilina (Exquilina), now St. Lawrence; the sixth, Naevia (Nenia); the seventh, Asinaria (Asmaria), now named St. John, but called Caelimontana (Celimontana) by the ancients; the eighth, now enclosed in an angle, is called the Porta Metrovia (Metrodori) and was known to the ancients as Cabiusam, and later as the Porta Latina. One called Appia, formerly Capena; the last, in the region of the Tiber, erstwhile Ostiensis and called St. Paul; for it leads to his church and toward Ostia. There is yet another in the region of the Tiber, called Carmentalis. Lastly, Triumphalis, or the Gate of Victory, the most celebrated of all, and which in our own time is the one through which triumphs and victory games proceed. There one may see the great buildings on the outer shores of the Tiber; also a bridge leading to the Hospital of the Holy Spirit; also the way which is called the field of victory, which, together with its appurtenances is called the Vatican, so named after the hill that lies by St. Peter's Church, and which is visited more zealously and is regarded as more holy than any other place because of the relics of St. Peter and because of its High Church and the Papal Palace founded by Pope Nicholas II. It has a large pleasure garden, enclosed by a wall. The Janiculum is a quarter beyond the Tiber. Pope Leo IV first fortified the Vatican with a wall, and after him it was called the Leonine City. Rome has seven hills, the Capitoline, Aventine, Palatine, Caelian, Esquiline, Viminal, and the Quirinal; and after these

Rome was called the City of the Seven Hills. Capitoline means a chief, or head mount or hill; for when the foundations were dug for the Temple of Jove, a human skull was found there. Previously it was called the Tarpeian Rock, after Tarpeia, the vestal virgin. [Tarpeia was the daughter of Sp. Tarpeius, the governor of the Roman citadel on the Saturnian hill, afterwards called the Capitoline. She was tempted by the gold in the Sabine bracelets and collars to open a gate of the fortress to Tatius and his Sabines. As they entered, they threw upon her their shields, and thus crushed her to death. She was buried on the hill, and her memory was preserved by the name of the Tarpeian Rock which was given to a part of the Capitoline. A legend still exists at Rome that the fair Tarpeia ever sits in the heart of the hill, covered with gold and jewels and bound by a spell]. On this hill was the celebrated Temple of Jove, the great pagan god. The adornments of this entire hill even excelled the wonderful works of the Egyptians, and it was called the Golden Capitol, or abode of the gods. Beside it were two markets, one of oxen and the other of fish. Although this hill once had a remarkable number of small churches and temples, there is at present no church there except the Ara Caeli of the Franciscan Brothers. The Aventine Hill is so called after the people who came there, or after Aventinus Albanus, the king, who was buried there. On this hill many altars and temples were erected to gods and goddesses. Here also was a laurel wood, and a scattering of houses. At present the cloisters of St. Sabine and St. Boniface are located there. The rest of the hill is covered with buildings in a ruinous state, and with vineyards, except for the monastery of St. Alexius, and this appears to be very ancient. The Palatine Hill derived its name from Pallantians, who came to Rome with Evander, [Evander was the son of Hermes by an Arcadian nymph, called Themis or Nicostrata, and in Roman traditions Carmenta or Tiburtis. About sixty years before the Trojan war, Evander is said to have led a Pelasgian colony from Pallantium in Arcadia into Italy and there to have built a town, Pallantium, on the Tiber, at the foot of the Palantine hill, which town was subsequently incorporated with Rome. Evander taught his neighbors milder laws, and arts of peace and social life, and especially the art of writing, with which he himself had been acquainted by Hercules, and music. He also introduced among them the worship of the Lycaean Pan, of Demeter, Poseidon, and Hercules. Virgil represents Evander as still alive at the time Aeneas arrived in Italy, and as forming an alliance with him against the Latins. Evander was worshipped at Pallantium in Arcadia, as a hero. At Rome he had an altar at the foot of the Aventine]. the king of Arcadia, and who (according to Cornelius Tacitus) gave Rome its beginning by building on the same hill. On this hill, kings and senators, and later the emperors, had their official seats and residences. Here also was the Temple of Victory. [Templum Victoriae ('Temple of Victory'), on the summit of the Palatine, or the Clivus Victoriae above the Porta Romanula and the circus, in which the statue of the mother of the gods was at first preserved]. To it (as Pliny writes) was brought the great mother of the gods of Greece. There was also the Temple of Febris, [Febris, the goddess and averter of fever, had three sanctuaries at Rome, in which amulets were dedicated, to be worn by people during a fever]. and the Temple of the emperor Augustus, which was later destroyed by fire. [Templum Augusti ('Temple of Augustus') was founded by Tiberius and completed by Caligula, on the slope of the Palatine in the direction of the Via Nova. It stood before the temple of Minerva from which it was probably separated by the Via Nova]. The emperor Caius Caligula (C. Calpurnia) by means of a bridge over the temple joined the Palatine and Capitoline hills. The emperor Augustus here erected the Temple of Apollinis, [Templum Apollinis ('Temple of Apollo'), which was erected by Augustus, stood between the Circus Maximus and the Theater of Marcellus near the Porticus Octaviae, where the senate often assembled]. and added to it a structure with a Latin and Greek library. In the same region the ancients often held their councils. The same building was adorned with wonderful work. Although this greatly celebrated hill was once upon a time the site of magnificent and costly structures, as the ruins still testify, yet there is no building upon the hill now other than St. Nicholas Church built by Calixtus, the pope, but which is no longer entire. Now there was in this region of the Palatine (Pallacii), toward the north, looking in the direction of the triumphal arch of Constantine, the site of the statue of the goddess Minerva. And here also are remarkable buildings, in a ruinous state, with dual gates of marble. There also, enclosed by the surrounding wall, is the church of St. Andrew de Pallara. The remaining area is covered with vineyards and is surrounded by a high wall. The Caelian Hill is named for the Duke Caelius Iubonnius (Iubaenius), who came to the assistance of Romulus against Latium. This hill was added to the city when Tullus Hostilius destroyed the city of Alba (Longa); and thereafter he himself lived there, building a palace which he called Hostilia. [Alba Longa was the most ancient town in Latium. It is said to have been built by Ascanius. It was called Longa because it stretched in a long line down the Alban Mount toward the Alban Lake. It was destroyed by Tullus Hostilius, and never rebuilt. Its inhabitants were removed to Rome. At a later time the surrounding country, highly cultivated and covered with vineyards, was studded with the villas of the Roman aristocracy, each of which was called an Albanum, and so a new town grew up also called Albanum (Albano), ruins of which are extant]. On the same hill Vespasian built the temple of Claudius. In this same region were many houses of the gods, temples and altars; the great slaughter-house; the cave of the Cyclops, the houses of prostitution; the society of the five watchers or wardens; the tents of the pilgrims, and the cattle sheds. In the middle of its ridge are two aqueducts, one of which is very tall. Now, however, this hill is adorned with Christian churches. In the region lying against the Palatine hill is the monastery of St. Gregory, built there upon his father's land; and St. John's and St. Paul's church. And there is the hospital of Salvator, and the church of St. Mary in Dominica; also Stephen's church, which was later adorned by Pope Simplicius. To the left of the same hill is the church of the four crowns, and St. Erasmus monastery. The latest building on the hill is a pilgrim's refuge, called Lateranese (Lateranense). At the extreme end of the hill there is now the Lateran Church, so called because it was built on the soil of the most noble Lateran people. This worthy church contains the heads of the apostles and other holy relics. It is very tall, and renowned throughout the world. It was given to Pope Sylvester by the Emperor Constantine, and was called the Church of Constantine. This church was the first seat of the Roman bishops, and they had their residences there. Now, however, most of the palaces about the church are in ruins. Near this hill is the great gate of Naevia, and the half-destroyed theater. Some call this the castle of wonders. There also is the church of the Holy Cross of Jerusalem, built by Helena, mother of Constantine, on the site where the Temple of Venus and Cupid formerly stood. Beside it is a Carthusian monastery. On the hill called the Esquiline, which is the largest, is the church called St. Mary Maggiore. On this hill were many wonderful buildings; and firstly, upward of the tower of the nobility, are the ruined buildings of the baths of the Emperor Constantine, and the great marble pillars of a half-naked age. Not far removed from it are marble horses with half-naked riders, wonderful works of art; also the vaulted baths of Diocletian—very wonderful and beautiful; and also many residences of celebrated persons. There too was a slaughterhouse, and St. Vitus Church. Adjoining this is the triumphal arch of Galicenus; and so there are many churches and innumerable other things. The hill, called Viminal, derived its name from Jove Vimineus, whose buildings are there. And although many houses were erected on this hill, a number are no longer there, except three of the most beautiful palaces in the whole city, namely those of M. Crassus, Q. Catullus, and C. Acquilius. The hill of Quirinal was named after the temple of Quirinus. Varro the teacher, called those elevations hills because they are small. Livy writes that Servius the king added the nearest two hills to the city in order to enlarge it; and in order to give this region prestige, he lived there himself. He surrounded the city with a wall and moat. Rome is closed on the east by the hill Tarquinius, where now stands the church of St. Mary of Popolo. A water, which is called virgin, flows through the recesses of the Quirinal hill, and now by its own force flows from the outer waters to the city of Rome. In the neighborhood of this hill is the Campus Martius, lying between the city and the Tiber. [Campus Martius, the "Plain of Mars," was in its widest significance, the open plain at Rome, outside the city walls, lying between the Tiber and hills Capitoline, Quirinal, and Pincius; but more commonly it signified the northwest portion of the plain lying in the bend of the Tiber, which nearly surrounds it on three sides. The Campus Martius, it is said, originally belonged to the Tarquins and became the property of the state. It was consecrated to Mars on the expulsion of the kings. Here Roman youths performed their gymnastic and warlike exercises, and here the comitia of the centuries was held. At a later time it was surrounded by porticoes, temples, and other public buildings. It was enclosed within the city walls by Aurelian]. Some wonderful buildings were located there; but of these only the ruins are to be seen. There also is the Church of St. Mary in Ecuria; and the Temple of Isis (Isidis). [Isis, though an Egyptian divinity, was extensively worshipped in Greece. Her worship was introduced into Rome in the time of Sulla; and although the Senate made many attempts to suppress her worship, and ordered her temples destroyed, yet the new religious rites took deep root at Rome and became very popular. In 43 BCE the triumvirs courted the popular favor by building a new temple to Isis and Serapes. Augustus forbade any temple to be erected to Isis in the city; but his prohibition was later disregarded; and under the early Roman emperors the worship of Isis and Serapes became firmly established. The most important temple to Isis at Rome stood in the Campus Martius, whence she was called Isis Campensia. The priests and servants of the goddess wore linen garments, from which she herself is called linigera ('linen-wearing'). Those initiated into her mysteries wore masks which represented the heads of dogs in the public processions. In works of art Isis appears in figure and countenance like Hera. She wears a long tunic and her upper garment is fastened on her breast by a knot. Her head is crowned with a lotus flower and her right hand holds the sistrum]. Here is also a memorable monument, where the elections of Roman senators took place. In Rome there were also twelve caves, wonderful structures, and aqueducts. [The word aqueduct is a term specially applied to the magnificent structures by means of which Rome and other cities of the Roman Empire were supplied with water. Aqueduct may be described in general terms as a channel, constructed as nearly as possible with a regular declivity from the source whence the water was derived to the place where delivered, carried through hills by means of tunnels and over valleys upon a substruction of solid masonry or arches. According to Strabo this device was neglected by the Greeks, and first brought into use by the Romans. The city of Rome by this means received an abundance of pure water from the hills which surround the Campagna. The Romans at first had recourse to the Tiber, to springs and to wells sunk in the city, and it was not until BCE 313 that the first aqueduct was constructed. Their number gradually increased to 14 in the sixth century of the Christian era]. And so one sees and reads about many triumphal arches through which the Roman emperors were escorted after their victories over the enemy. Some of these have been destroyed, some buried in ruin, and others replaced by new buildings; and thus the old has been removed from the sight of man. And so are seen the sights of different buildings and famous ruins. Therefore with these we leave the description of Rome. [This sentence and the one that precedes it are not in the German edition of the chronicle].

Folio LVII verso

Folio LVIII recto

Rome, it delights me to gaze upon your ruins. From its fall ancient glory is made clear. But your people today have baked hard marble dug up from its ancient walls into the pliancy of lime. If this impious people should live three hundred more years, there will be no sign left of its nobility.

This paragraph, which is an epigram (known as Carmina 1.51 De Roma) composed by Aeneas Silvius (1405-1464, and later Pope Pius II, r. 1458-64) is not in the German edition of the chronicle. In verse it appears thus:

Gibbon cites this epigram as a footnote in his The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, in support of the following comment (Chapter LXXI, section III): "A fragment, a ruin, howsoever mangled or profaned, may be viewed with pleasure and regret; but the greater part of the marble was deprived of substance, as well as of place and proportion; it was burnt to lime for the purpose of cement. Since the arrival of Poggius, the temple of Concord, and many capital structures, had vanished from his eyes; and an epigram of the same age expresses a just and pious fear, that the continuance of this practice would finally annihilate all the monuments of antiquity."

ILLUSTRATION CITY OF ROME

The City of Rome is represented by a special woodcut (9" in height) extending across the verso and recto of Folios LVII and LVIII. From the standpoint of direction and the location of the various places of interest, this pictorial map involves considerable guesswork. We cannot get our bearings by assuming any particular compass-point. The upper part of the woodcut is certainly not north; nor will it submit to the test of being any one of the other three cardinal points. Both Republican and Imperial Rome were situated to the east of the Tiber, which although irregular in its course, has a general direction from north to south. But let us begin in the lower right-hand corner.

1. Porta de Populo, a gate in the formidable wall at the lower end of the woodcut, is probably the old Portia Flaminia, by which the city was entered from the extreme north by the Flaminian Way.
2. The Church of Santa Maria del Populo, to the left of this gate in the woodcut, is actually located beside the Porta Flaminia, and no doubt the gate has taken its name from the old church.
3. Porta Pinciana, like the Porta Flaminia, also pierces the old Aurelian Wall and also gives access to the city from the north, but at a more easterly point. It was located on a hill of the same name, and such a hill is indicated in miniature, back of the gate, in the woodcut. It appears in the lower extremity of the illustration and to the left of the gate by which we decided to enter. Still further on to the left is another gate; but it remains unnamed.
4. Porta Portula (Portese?), another gate, enters the wall at the upper center of the illustration. This I have not been able to identify with any of the gates listed by Smith.
5. Castle St. Angelo (Castellum S. Angeli), the circular structure to the right, just across the Tiber (Tiberius Fluvius), is one of the massive remains of Imperial Rome, and none other than the Mausoleum of Hadrian, by which name it may be identified on the maps of the ancient city. In actuality it stands to the north of a bend in the Tiber where that river veers to the east for a short distance. It is located on the site where once were the gardens of Domitia, overlooking the undulating plains of the Campagna in its rear. The structure is surmounted by a bronze figure of the Archangel Michael, poised as if he had just alighted with outspread wings and flowing mantle, and had paused there in the act of sheathing his sword. The woodcut suggests this figure, but it has given the Archangel a more militant attitude. His wings are outspread, but his sword is in action as thought about to strike.

Beneath this forbidding edifice flow the troubled waters of the Tiber into which it has cast its wavering reflection for over eighteen centuries. The structure leading to it across the river is the ancient Aelian Bridge, which has also changed its name and is now the Ponte St. Angelo.

The Mausoleum was built by Hadrian in the latter part of the second century. It was constructed of brick work and square blocks of peperino-stone laid with such care and exactness that lightning, war and earthquake have failed to shake its perfect solidity. Inside and out it was faced with courses of Parian marble. The basement was a square of about 340 feet each way and about 75 feet in height. This is not indicated in the woodcut. Above this rose a circular tower of some 235 feet in diameter and 140 feet high, divided into two or three stories and ornamented with columns. Above the circular tower there was originally a dome or curvilinear roof, which must have risen to a height of some 300 feet. Apparently the roof was originally crowned by a colossal group representing Hadrian in a chariot drawn by four horses. Rich friezes girded the building around. On each of the four sides of the basement was a massive door of gilt bronze, and at each of these doors were four horses. Between the doors were large tablets to be inscribed with the names and titles of the emperors who were to be buried within it. The walls were of immense thickness and of solid workmanship. In the center were two chambers in the shape of a Greek cross, one above the other, and here the ashes of the emperors were deposited.

The magnificent Aelian Bridge, resting on massive arches, formed the avenue by which the Mausoleum was approached by the funeral processions that bore the ashes of the dead emperors to their final resting place. But after Severus no emperor was buried in this Mausoleum, his successors being interred in the tombs of their families.

For centuries we have no glimpse of the Mausoleum in history, and as the curtain lifts, it is no longer a tomb but a fortress. We know that by the 6th century it had become part of the city's fortification, and was joined to its wall. As such it was assaulted and defended for centuries, and so we may readily understand how its character changed from Mausoleum to Castle.

In 846 the Saracens invaded Italy, and Leo IV, a Roman by birth, undertook the fortification of Rome, and enclosed it with a wall that portion of it surrounding the Vatican, which has ever since been called after him the Leonine City. The wall commenced at the Castle St. Angelo, enclosed St. Peters, and extended into the river below the gate of Sancto Spirito ('Holy Spirit'). The chronicler makes a brief reference to these facts in the text.

How the Mausoleum received the name St. Angelo is another story. In the year 590 Gregory the Great was elected Pope. Rome was then at its lowest ebb of suffering and disgrace at the hands of the Goths under Totila. Its population had shrunk and it was no longer the seat of empire. Earthquakes and floods had added to the work of destruction. And now came famine and pestilence in the wake. Vainly the people implored the mercy of Heaven. It was in the midst of these horrors and calamities that, as Gregory was passing the Mausoleum at the head of a penitential procession, he looked up and beheld hovering over it the figure of the archangel Michael, who paused in the act of sheathing his flaming sword. This vision he interpreted as a token from heaven that the pestilence should cease. And so the plague diminished, and finally ceased altogether; and in celebration of that a chapel was later erected on the top of the Mausoleum by Boniface the Ninth, which was dedicated to St. Michael, and received the name of St. Angelo. It is from this course of events that the structure itself became henceforth known as the Castle of St. Angelo.

Just how the Castle looked in the days when the Chronicle was written may be seen from a curious and interesting painting by Vittore Carpaccio, in the Academy of Fine Arts in Venice. It represents the pope as coming forth with his train of cardinals from the Castle to receive Saint Ursula and her virgins, accompanied by the son of the King of England, who was betrothed to her. The span of Carpaccio's life was from 1465 to 1522, his artistic career covering the range from 1490 to 1519. In this picture is given a careful representation, by way of background, of the Castle St. Angelo as it was at this period. Above the circle of the ancient tomb rises a high machicolated square tower occupying almost its entire diameter, and again above this is a second and smaller tower, also machicolated, on the top of which is the figure of the winged angel, the whole surrounded by massive walls, with round towers at each corner. And so it appears in this woodcut.

Just how Hadrian, his horses and chariot, left their dizzy height does not seem to be recorded. It would seem that after the vision of Gregory a great marble angel was actually placed there instead; for it is related that on October 29, 1497, four years after the Chronicle was published, a flash of lightning struck one of the magazines of the Castle, instantly exploding it, shattering to fragments the upper part of the fortress, blowing into the air the great marble angel on the top, and flinging pieces of it a considerable distance. Sixty persons were wounded by this explosion, but no one was killed. Under the pontificate of Clement II some improvements were made in the Castle. To replace the angel that had been thus blown to pieces another statue of marble was made by Raphael, representing the same subject. This was placed on the summit of the square tower. But as already stated, the present incumbent of the "high place" is of bronze, the work of the Flemish sculptor Verschaffelt. (It was set up in 1752 in the place of the marble angel of the 16th century.)

The terrible history of human baseness, tyranny, hypocrisy, arrogance and misery which this once ancient tomb, originally intended as a final resting place, witnessed after it became a fortress, it is not possible to relate in this brief note. History will ever record the tragic story of Beatrice Cenci so closely connected by tradition with the Castle St. Angelo.

6. The Antonine Column (Columna Antoniana). Let us return via the Ponte St. Angelo to this side of the Tiber, and proceed to the left. Here we find a huge column, inscribed by the woodcutter as parenthetically noted above. Although such columns were used chiefly to support buildings, either within or without, single columns were also erected in Rome commemorate persons or events. More often they were a monument to the dead. They varied in size even as monuments do in our day. They were surmounted with a statue of the deceased, and the pedestal was equipped with a door which led to a spiral staircase ascending to the summit. Light was admitted through various apertures in the column. Frequently a spiral bas-relief runs about the pillar pictorially recording the victories and other events in the life of the deceased.

This particular column was erected to the memory of the emperor Marcus Aurelius, in the Campus Martius, and is still in existence. It is located to the east of the Tiber and almost due east of the Mausoleum of Hadrian, and not to the west as would appear by the woodcut. It will be found noted on any map of Imperial Rome. A similar column and in the same vicinity was erected to Antoninus Plus after his death. There is an interesting relationship between the three men under discussion. Hadrian, weary with the affairs of state, formally adopted Antoninus and passed the empire on to him upon condition that Antoninus would in turn adopt Marcus Aurelius and name him as his successor. And in that order these men followed one another as heads of the Roman state.

7. The Colosseum (Coloseus), or Flavian amphitheater, appears at the extreme left of the woodcut, although in fact located a considerable distance to the east, and not to the west, of the Tiber. It was begun by Vespasian, on the site of part of Nero's famous Golden House, and inaugurated by Titus in 80 CE. It consisted originally of three arcaded stories of stone and an upper gallery, originally of wood, which was rebuilt of stone in the present form some time in the third century. The Colosseum probably seated between 40,000 and 50,000 people. It is elliptical in plan with its long axis 615 feet, and its short axis 510 feet. Its arena is 281 feet long and 177 feet wide. Its total height to the top of the third century stone screen wall is about 160 feet.
8. The Papal Palace (Palatium Pape), appears in the far distance on a high elevation, and in its immediate vicinity St. Peter's is indicated.
9. In the left foreground, beside the Antonine Column, appears the church of Santa Maria Rotunda (Maria Rotu(n)da), originally the Roman Pantheon begun by Agrippa in 27 BCE, probably as a rectangular building of the ordinary temple type. It was completely rebuilt by Hadrian, in its present circular form (110-125), the columns of the present front porch being probably those of the earlier building. Under Septimus Severus repairs and alterations were made; it is likely that at this time the rectangular coffers were cut on the inside face of the dome. The Roman Pantheon is remarkable, not only for its size, the dome being 144 feet in diameter, and for its elaborate brick construction, but also for its perfect preservation and the fact that for almost 2,000 years it has served continuously as a place of worship, having been dedicated in 609 CE as the church of Santa Maria Rotunda; and so it is designated on the woodcut, but no description of it is given in the text.

The Pantheon was originally erected as a temple to 'all gods' (the meaning of the Greek word 'pantheon'), but its present form is almost certainly due to Hadrian. The porch has no very close relation to the rotunda, the entablature stopping short. Its high gable and large pediment are in strong contrast to the flattened Byzantine dome. The porch has sixteen great Corinthian columns. As has been observed, from the strictly aesthetic point of view the porch might have been dispensed with altogether. The dome, paneled in a receding perspective, soars upward to the saucer of light that is the sky, and a single shaft of light completes the artistic unity of the interior composition. The dome was likened by the Romans themselves to the vault of heaven. Niches in the interior contained great statues of the gods, who have been replaced by the tombs of the Renaissance, including the Tomb of Raphael, and by decorations which signal the conversion of the place into "Santa Maria Rotunda."

10. Proceeding further to the left we note Castor and Pollux, leading their horses over a hill in the direction of the Coliseum. Castor and Pollux, according to Greek and Roman mythology, were the twin sons of Leda, who conceived them by Jupiter in the form of a swan. They were also known as the Dioscuri (Greek for "offspring of Zeus"), for such they were. Of the Temple of Castor and Pollux there remain but three beautiful Corinthian columns, with a piece of the entablature. The twin gods were adopted by the Romans in gratitude for their assistance at the battle of Lake Regillus, fought against Tarquin and the Latins in 496 BCE. Hardly any event in early Roman history has been more disguised by poetical embellishment and fiction, and it is impossible to decide what amount of historical character may be attached to it; but there is no reason to doubt the existence of the lake that was assigned as the scene of the combat. It is expressly described by Livy as situated in the territory of Tusculum. The twins brought the news of the victory to Rome, and watered their horses at the Fons Iuturna. The demolition of the church of S.M. Liberatrice, in 1900, brought to light the original spring between the Temple of Vesta (the virgins being the custodians of water as well as fire) and the Temple of Castor and Pollux. In it was found a marble altar, with reliefs on the four sides of the Dioscuri (Castor and Pollux), Jupiter, Leda and the Swan, and a goddess, perhaps Vesta, and the fragments of two life-size marble horses of the best Greek workmanship.

11. In the central background is indicated the Church of St. Peter. The Emperor Constantine I gave freedom to the Church in 313, and according to tradition, he began the construction of a splendid basilica on the Vatican hill over St. Peter's tomb. This was not completed until 349, in the reign of Constantius. Nothing unfortunately remains of Constantine's basilica, or of the splendid monuments with which it was adorned in the course of nearly twelve centuries, with the exception of a few remains preserved in the crypts of the present basilica. The church had the form of a structure that the Greek name ('basilica') implies. It had five naves, and its walls were adorned with painting and mosaic, that were much admired by pilgrims. Its five doors opened on a great square atrium called Paradisus, which was surrounded by a colonnade and in which there gradually accumulated the tombs of all the popes, emperors, kings, and princes who expressed a wish to be buried near St. Peter's tomb.

In the course of time this venerable edifice became so damaged that Pope Nicholas V determined on its reconstruction. The structure leaned so much to one side that it was deemed best to demolish it altogether, and to build a new one on the same site. On April 11, 1506 Pope Julius II laid the first stone of the new basilica; and it was not until 1603 that this was completed, according to the original plan in the form of a Greek cross. Just how the church looked in 1493 we do not know, but its appearance as vouched for by the present woodcut is confirmed by Breydenbach (Journey to the Holy Land, 1483-4). This view is almost identical with that of Breydenbach. It may be that in common with the earliest authentic view of Rome (that in P. Bergomensis, Suppl. Chronicarum, Venice, 1490), both examples were adapted from a woodcut, drawing, or painting earlier than 1490, not now in existence. Reconstructions of the Church of St. Peter, as it appeared in the Middle Ages, have been attempted, and good examples will be found in Die Stadt Rom zu Ende der Renaissance, by Ludwig von Pastor (Herder & Company, Freiburg im Breisgau, 1925). The illustration at pages 14-15, a reconstruction by Brewer and Crostarosa, shows a striking resemblance to the façade of St. Peter's in the woodcut before us.

12. Almost in the center of the woodcut, slightly to the right, on the banks of the Tiber, appears the Hospital di Santo Spirito, so named in the Breydenbach woodcut of the city of Rome, but left unnamed here. Its colonnade very much resembles that of St. Peter's. It is a memento of Anglo-Saxon piety. Anglo-Saxons, converted by Gregory the Great, were among the earliest and most devout of pilgrims. Among these were the Saxon king Ceadwald (689). He was followed by Conrad of Mercia, and Offa, who cut off and consecrated their long hair at the tomb of St. Peter. Ina, King of Wessex, came in 717, and endowed there the Schola Anglorum, a hostel for the shelter, and school for the education, of his countrymen. The whole district between the Castle Angelo and St. Peter's was under the control of the Anglo-Saxon colony, and obtained the name of Burgus Saxonum, whence the word Borgo. In 847 occurred the great fire in the Borgo, when the portico of St. Peter's and the Saxon buildings were destroyed. This event was depicted by Raphael in the fresco of the Sala dell Incendio in the Vatican.
13. In the upper right hand corner of the panorama of Rome, just within the walls, and on a high eminence, is the Belvedere, the name applied to the northern galleries of the Vatican Palace, which appears to the left. Why this was called the Belvedere is clear from the Latin derivation of the word (bellus = 'beautiful'; videre = 'to see').

Folio LVIII verso

Genoa (Genua), mistress and queen of the Ligurians, and also called Janua, is a very renowned city in Italy, situated on the shores of the Ligurian Gulf. [Gulf of Genoa. Liguria is an ancient district in Italy between the Po and the Gulf; now Genoa and Porto Maurizio provinces. The Ligurians served as mercenaries in the Carthaginian armies, and later became engaged in war with the Romans; but it was many years after the second Punic War before they were finally defeated]. It was built by Genuo, son of King Saturn, and was named after him. Paulus Perusinus says that the city derived its name from Genuinus, the associate of Phetontis. Others write that it was built by Janus, the Italian king, and was enlarged after (the fall of) Troy, and that the image of Janus was there first revered. However, some state that no mention of the city occurs before the time of the African War. [Probably the Punic Wars]. Livy says that the rule of Lucretius was postponed until he had rebuilt the city of Genoa, which Mago, the Poeni, [Synonymous with Carthaginian; root of the word Punic]. had destroyed. Thereafter the Romans availed themselves of the friendship of the Ligurians and Genoese, who aided them with men and material useful in their wars. From this it appears that Genoa was well favored by its natural position and its wealth in shipping. Charlemagne and his son Pepin, a king of Italy, and their Frankish successors, ruled this and other Italian cities with great righteousness and goodness, appointing dukes (called counts) to administer their affairs. Genoa was also a market for this entire region; and it prospered so tremendously that by reason of its attainment of great power and strength in ships, and its tall buildings and various adornments, it now excels all other Italian maritime cities except Venice. Genoa became so proficient in naval warfare that for many years it ruled the seas and protected them against murderous pirates. But after the time of Charlemagne the city suffered under such gross tyranny that it was obliged to invoke foreign masters; while on account of internal dissension it lost its maritime power. Both East and West were so astounded by its frequent transformations, that Genoa remained helpless and without counsel or advice; and the power which she had exercised far and wide became exhausted. It lost the city of Pera, [A suburb of Constantinople, north of the Golden Horn; what used to be known after the conquest of the city by the Ottoman Turks as the Christian part of the city]. near Constantinople; also Mytiline; [The name given to the ancient island of Lesbos by Greek writers, from its chief city of that name. It is the largest and most important island in the Aegean Sea along the coast of Asia Minor. The ancient capital of Mytilene is in ruins, and near the old site sprang up the modern chief city of Kastro or Castro]. Famagusta, capital of the island of Cyprus; the island of Chios, and other Greek islands and places that she had captured from the Turks and other peoples, or had compelled to pay tribute. But this city is blessed by the ashes of the forerunner of the Lord, and with the precious smaragdine Sacro Catino, a bowl or basin from which (as they say) the Lord Jesus Christ and his disciples partook of the Paschal Lamb at the Last Supper.

Genoa (Italian Genova) was from earliest times the chief maritime city of Liguria, situated on the Gulf of Genoa, known as the Ligurian Sea, but in ancient times called Sinus Ligusticus. Its situation, rising above the sea in a wide semicircle, and its numerous palaces have earned it the name of La Superba. The old town is a network of narrow and steep streets, lined with many-storied buildings. At a very early period Genoa was the chief city on the Ligurian coast, and the principal emporium of trade in this region of the Mediterranean, an advantage which it naturally owed to the excellence of its port, combined with the facility of communication with the interior through the valley of the Portiere. Its name is not mentioned until the second Punic War, but it then appears at once as a place of considerable importance. Hence, when the consul P. Scipio abandoned the pursuit of Hannibal up the Rhone, he at once returned with his fleet to Genoa, with the view of proceeding from thence to oppose the Carthaginian general in the valley of the Po. At a later period of the war, when Mago (son of Hamilcar Barca, and youngest brother of Hannibal) sought to renew the contest in Liguria and Cisalpine Gaul, it was at Genoa that he landed, making himself master of that city in the first instance. After holding the town for two years he destroyed it and quit the country, and on this account we find the Roman praetor Sp. Lucretius charged with the duty of rebuilding it. From this time Genoa is rarely mentioned, and its name only occurs incidentally during the wars of the Romans with the Ligurians and Spaniards. It afterward became a Roman municipium, and Strabo speaks of it as a flourishing town.

No ancient authority supports the orthography of Janua, or Genua, which appears to have come into vogue in the Middle Ages for the purpose of supporting the fabulous tradition that ascribed the foundation of the city to Janus. This form of the name is first found in Liutprand, a Lombard writer of the tenth century. It is believed by some to have derived its name from the fact that the shape of the coast here resembles that of a knee (genu).

The history of the city during the Dark Ages is but the repetition of the general history of the Italian communes. The patriotic spirit and naval prowess of the Genoese, developed in their defensive wars against the Saracens, led to the foundation of a popular constitution and to the growth of a powerful marine. From the necessity of joining an alliance against the common Saracen foe. Genoa united with Pisa early in the eleventh century in expelling the Moslems from the island of Sardinia. But this island soon furnished occasions of jealousy to the conquering allies, and there commenced between the two republics the long naval wars that terminated fatally for Pisa in the battle of Meloria, in 1284. From this disaster Pisa never recovered, and Genoa now obtained the supremacy over the western islands, Corsica, and nominally over Sardinia also. At a still earlier period Genoa had participated in the Crusades, and secured to herself great trade advantages with the Levant. The seaports wrested at the same period from the Saracens, along the Spanish and Barbary coasts, became important Genoese colonies, while in the Levant, on the shores of the Black Sea, and along the banks of the Euphrates were erected Genoese fortresses of great strength. She also possessed settlements at Constantinople and in the Crimea, in Syria and Cyprus, at Tunis and Majorca. Her commercial and naval successes during the Middle Ages are the more remarkable, because unlike her rival, Venice, she suffered unceasingly from internal discord – the Genoese commons and nobles fighting against each other, rival factions among the nobles striving to grasp the supreme power of the state, nobles and commons alike invoking the arbitration and rule of some foreign prince as the sole means of obtaining a temporary truce. And so Genoa was soon drawn into the vortex of the Guelph and Ghibelline factions; but its recognition of foreign authority – German, Neapolitan, and Milanese – gave way to greater independence in 1339, when the government assumed a permanent form with the appointment of the first doge, an office held at Genoa for life, in the person of Simone Boccanegra. Alternate victories and defeats of the Genoese and Venetians were at length terminated by a decisive victory gained by the Venetians in 1380.

The internal history of the city was no less checkered than the external. The admiral of Emperor Charles V, Andrea Doria, at length restored peace by the establishment of a new oligarchic constitution in 1528. But the power of Genoa was on the wane. The Turks conquered its eastern possessions one after another. In 1684 Genoa was taken by the French. In 1805 it was formally annexed to the empire of France, and in 1815 to the Kingdom of Sardinia. Its later history is beyond the scope of our subject.

Although the city of Genoa possesses a number of celebrated ecclesiastical edifices such as the cathedral of San Lorenzo, dating back to the tenth century, and the venerable church of San Matteo, to which Oberto in 1266 brought the bell from Canea, and in which the seal and great standard of Pisa were placed after the battle of Meloria, the chronicler does not mention either one of these buildings, nor any other of the structures in existence during his time. He does state that the city is blessed with "the ashes of the forerunner of the Lord, and with the precious smaragdine Sacro Catino, a bowl or basin from which (as they say) the Lord Jesus Christ and his disciples partook of the Paschal Lamb at the Last Supper." The first reference is to John the Baptist, in whose chapel, erected in 1451-96, is a stone chest of the thirteenth century containing relics of John the Baptist, brought from Palestine during the Crusades. In the sacristy is the Cathedral Treasury, containing the Sacro Catino, the vessel out of which Jesus and his disciples are said to have partaken of the Paschal Lamb, and in which Joseph of Arimathea is said to have caught some drops of the blood of the crucified Jesus. It is said to have been captured by the Genoese at Caesarea in 1101, and was supposed to have been made of a large emerald (smaragd). For centuries the Genoese pretended to believe that it was cut of a single emerald. It is an octagonal basin of dark green Venetian glass, very transparent, and about which a collection of mysterious tales have gathered. Not only is it said to have been hollowed out of an emerald of the purest water, but it was held to have formed part of the treasure given by Solomon to the Queen of Sheba. Some said also that it was the dish of the Holy Grail, and it was guarded with the utmost care by twelve clavigeri, each of whom had to be a knight, and was bound to watch over the catino for a month in each year. Napoleon I came to Genoa and carried the catino off to Paris. In the course of the journey it was broken, and the fragments came back – no longer emerald, but glass – to lie decked with fine goldsmith's work in San Lorenzo. William of Tyre, who was contemporary with the taking of Caesarea, remarks that the catino was just a piece of glass.

It is disappointing also that the chronicler makes no reference to the Palazzo Ducale, the grand old residence of the doges, originally a building of the thirteenth century, to which the tower on the left belonged.

ILLUSTRATION

CITY OF GENOA

Genoa is represented by a special woodcut. The city is depicted as situated on the Gulf of Genoa, or old Ligurian Sea. True to topographical conditions, the artist has left only a small space of level ground along the shore, from which the city has been obliged to climb the lower hills of the Ligurian Alps. The original nucleus of the town is that portion which lies to the east of the port in the neighborhood of the old pier (Molo Vecchio). In addition to the fortifications, the main architectural features of the city are its medieval palaces and churches. To indicate the maritime nature of the town, a sailing vessel with a full complement of oarsmen is entering or leaving the harbor. A number of wharves projecting into the harbor are another characteristic. The flag of Genoa floats over several structures.

Folio LIX recto

Thales (Tales), the Asiatic philosopher and first among the Seven Sages of Greece, flourished in Athens at this time. The Seven Sages were named after him.

The Seven Wise Men of Greece, or the Seven Sages, as they are also called, were the authors of the celebrated mottoes inscribed in later days in the Temple of Apollo at Delphi: "Know yourself." (Solon of Athens); "Consider the end." (Chilon of Lacedaemon) "Know your opportunity." (Pittacus of Mitylene) "Most men are bad." (Bias of Priene) "Nothing is impossible to industry." (Periander of Corinth) "Avoid excesses." (Cleobulus of Lindus) "Certainty is the precursor of ruin." (Thales of Miletus).

The origin of the title "Seven Wise Men" was this: Some fishermen of Miletus sold a draught of fish to some bystanders before the net was drawn in. When the draught came in, there was also in the net a golden tripod. The fishermen claimed they had sold only the fish, while the buyer insisted he had bought the whole draught. To settle the dispute they referred the matter to the Oracle of Delphi. Being ordered to adjudge the tripod to the wisest man in Greece, they offered it to their fellow citizen Thales; but he modestly replied that there was a wiser man than he, and sent it to Bias. He also declined, and sent the tripod to another; and thus it passed through seven hands, and these seven were afterward called the "Seven Wise Men of Greece." It was finally placed in the Temple of Apollo at Delphi. These seven men met together but twice—once at Delphi, and again at Corinth.

Thales was the first among the philosophers to practice astrology and to predict an eclipse of the sun. He acquired a knowledge of geometry from the Egyptians. He was also an excellent counselor in matters pertaining to civic customs. He had (as they say) no wife, and when asked why he did not take one, he replied that it was because of his love of children. He contended that water is the origin of all things, and stated that the world was associated with and born of the devil. It is said that he also invented the year, and divided it into 365 days. He wrote on the subject of astronomy, and his writings are comprehended in 200 verses. When a golden table (tripod) was accidentally found, and there was a misunderstanding as to whom it belonged, Apollo answered that it should be awarded to him who excelled all others in wisdom. So it was offered to Thales, but he gave it to Bias and Bias Pitachus. At last the table came to Solon, but he turned it over to Apollo, as a token of most renowned wisdom. Thales was poor and he devoted himself to the acquisition of wisdom. Item: By means of astronomy he was able to predict fruitfulness in future years. One night when he was led out of his house by an old woman to study the stars he fell into a hole. And the old woman said to him, If you cannot see what lies at your feet, how can you expect to recognize the things that are in the heavens? He died at 78 years of age. [Thales of Miletus was born about 636 BCE, and according to the weight of authority he died about 546 at the age of 90; however, both dates are uncertain. Some say he was of Phoenician extraction, and this is probably the reason why the chronicler calls him an Asiatic philosopher. It is more probable, however, that he was born in Miletus. As a Greek natural philosopher his fame among the ancients was remarkable. He is said to have predicted the eclipse of the sun which occurred in the reign of the Lydian king Alyattes; to have diverted the course of the Halys, or Red River, the greatest stream of Asia Minor in the time of Croesus; and later, in order to unite the Ionians when threatened by the Persians, to have instituted a federal council in Teos, as the most central of the twelve cities. The application of wise man was conferred on him, not only for his political sagacity, but also for his scientific eminence. He became famous by his prediction of the eclipse that did actually take place during a battle between the Medes and the Lydians, and being total, caused a cessation of hostilities and led to a lasting peace between the contending nations. Thales was one of the founders of philosophy and mathematics in Greece. He maintained that water is the origin of all things].

Solon, the philosopher, second among the Seven Wise Men, flourished at Athens, and to the Athenians he gave wholesome laws, which the Romans later adopted. These laws were of considerable merit, and his wisdom relieved the people of subservience and oppression. After a change of fortune Solon fled to Egypt. In his later years he opposed the tyrant Pisistratus, who sought to oppress the Athenians. When asked in what he placed his trust in so boldly resisting the tyrant, Solon replied that he was relying on his old age. He stated that tyrants compared the good and virtuous with counters, which at one time were of consequence and at another time of none. Asked by Croesus whom he considered happiest, Solon replied, Those who are unknown and whose fame or credit is hidden. But Croesus greatly bedecked himself and sat with pride upon his throne; and he asked Solon whether he had ever seen such a wonderful and well endowed throne. And Solon replied that he had seen cocks, pheasants and peacocks who by nature were endowed with a thousand fold superior colors and plumage. When Solon wept over his dead son, a man told him not to weep, reminding him that this was of no avail. But Solon replied, Therefore I weep all the more for I realize that my loss is irreparable. When asked whether he wished his relatives to mourn his death, he said, I have labored with much zeal so that I will not die unlamented by my friends. He also stated that no one should say that he suffered greater sorrows than others. He formulated other laws: He who does not support his needy parents is not worthy of good repute. The children of those who have departed should, for the common good, be reared and educated at public charge. A guardian shall not live with the mother of the ward, nor should one act as guardian to whom the estate of the minor might descend upon the latter's death. The ring engraver should not retain the inscriptions on rings he sells. He who deprives a one-eyed person of sight shall suffer the loss of both his own eyes. Drunken princes are to be put to death. Responses of Solon to certain questions are these: What is a word? A word is the reflection of the deed; therefore the word is strengthened by silence, and silence by time. What is a strong king? A power. What is the law? A spiderweb in which the weak are entangled, but through which the mighty pass, breaking the web. Solon died at the age of eighty years in the time of King Hezekiah (Sedechie).

Substantial and important texts dealing with Solon are the first book of Herodotus' Histories, Aristotle's Athenian Constitution (Athenaion Politeia) and Plutarch's Life of Solon. From Plutarch we learn that Solon was born about 640 BCE and that he was the son of Execestides, a man of but moderate wealth and political influence, though he belonged to one of the highest families in Athens. Solon came into prominence in the contest between Athens and Megara for the possession of the island of Salamis. Through his strategy and encouragement of his fellow citizens, the island was recovered from the Megarians.

Solon's attention was turned to the distracted state of his country, due to party disputes, aggravated by the misery of the poor. The lower classes were in a state of mutiny, and it had become impossible to enforce the laws. All turned to Solon to alleviate the prevailing miseries. He was chosen Archon, with unlimited power. He addressed himself to the relief of the distressed, which he accomplished by his celebrated disburdening ordinance, by which the burdens of debtors were lightened with as little infringement as possible on the right of their wealthy creditors. He abolished the law giving the creditor the power to enslave an insolvent debtor. He lowered the rate of interest, although about this there is a dispute. He depreciated the coinage. Although at first nothing more was contemplated in the investment of Solon with dictatorial powers than the relief of the existing distress, his success procured for him such confidence and popularity that he was charged with the task of entirely remodeling the constitution. By this the right of citizens to the honors and offices of the state was regulated, not by nobility of birth, but by their wealth, and for this purpose the citizens were divided into four classes. He created an assembly of four Hundred, to which each class sent one hundred representatives. There were no doubt public assemblies of some kind before his time, though probably possessed of but little power. Solon undoubtedly greatly enlarged the functions of the assembly. He gave it the right of electing the archons and other magistrates whom he made directly accountable to the assembly when their year of office was expired. Every member of any of the four classes had a vote in the assembly, and all votes seem to have had the same weight.

Solon was also the author of a great variety of special laws. If a father did not teach his son some trade or profession, the son was not liable to maintain his father in old age. Idleness was punishable. The exportation of all produce except olive oil was prohibited. Solon was the first who gave those who died childless the power of disposing of their property by will. He enacted laws relating to marriage, especially with regard to heiresses. Frantic and excessive manifestations of grief at funerals were prohibited. The law that the thief should restore twice the value of the thing stolen seems to have originated with him. The laws were inscribed on wooden rollers and triangular tablets, and were set up at first in the Acropolis and afterwards in the Prytaneium. This act in itself was revolutionary, for it encouraged literacy and took the law out of the hands of so-called experts (and their 'flexible' memories) and made it common knowledge for all the members of the society.

Solon also rectified the calendar, introducing a division of time agreeing more accurately with the course of the moon. He is said to have been the first to introduce among the Greeks months of 29 and 30 days alternately.

From the government and the people he exacted an oath that they would observe his laws without alteration for a certain period (20 years according to Herodotus, 100 years according to others). He was aware that his laws were not perfect and was greatly annoyed by those who came to him with all kinds of complaints. To escape them he absented himself from Athens for ten years. He visited Egypt and conversed with learned Egyptian priests. From there he went on to Cyprus where he was received with great honor. Then, according to Herodotus, he made his way to the court of Croesus in Lydia. The interviews between Solon and Croesus spoken of by Herodotus (and later adapted by Plutarch in his biography of Solon) are undoubtedly fictitious, but very interesting nevertheless both in themselves and in the fact that they lay the foundation for Aristotle's celebrated definition of happiness (the Nicomachean Ethics are, among many other things, an extended meditation on the ideas espoused by Solon in Herodotus' History). During Solon's absence dissensions at home were renewed. Matters were approaching a crisis when he returned to Athens. Pisistratus, a distant relative of Solon, was able to overthrow the state and have himself made sole authority in Athens. Yet he paid considerable court to Solon and on various occasions solicited his advice, which Solon did not withhold. More importantly, he kept all of Solon's laws and constitutional reforms, thus laying the foundation for the world's first democracy some two generations later (in 510-508 BCE). We do not know how long Solon survived the overthrow of the constitution.

Chilon, the third sage, flourished at Athens in the time of Zedekiah. Because of his deep wisdom he was called the laconic speaker. He was delegated to Corinth to bring about an alliance and understanding; but when he there saw the dukes and elders of the people playing dice, he returned home without transacting the business, stating that he did not care to besmirch the honor and glory of the Spartans with such folly. He did not want it to be said that he had made an alliance with men who play games of chance. When asked to define luck, he answered, It is an unknowing physician. This man Chilon taught the taming of the tongue, particularly in trade. Not to speak ill of one's neighbor, for he might hear of it and be saddened thereby. Item: Threaten no one; for that is womanish. It is preferable to go to a friend in trouble than to one who is fortunate. Be humble in festivities and speak not ill of the dead. Honor old age. Know yourself. Control your temper. Do not crave the impossible. Do not laugh at the unfortunate. A lord should be gentle so that his subordinates will honor him more than fear him. One should prefer to sustain a loss rather than a gain through evil; for the loss brings sorrow but once; but an evil gain is a sorrow forever. He too was famous in the time of King Hezekiah. He lived, moreover, 56 years. [Chilon of Lacedaemon (Sparta), son of Damagetus, flourished at the beginning of the sixth century. In 560 BCE (or 556) he acted as ephor, one of the highest magistrates of Sparta, an office which he is said to have founded himself. It is uncertain when the office was created and what was its original character. We may regard it as an immemorial Dorian institution, or accept the tradition that it was founded during the first Messenian War which necessitated a prolonged absence from Sparta on the part of both kings. In historical times the ephors were five in number, the first of them giving his name to the year, like the eponymous archon at Athens. The ephors were elected annually by the people, and had an official residence in the Agora. Every full citizen was eligible. According to Chilon, the great virtue of man is prudence, or well-grounded judgment as to future events. It is said that he died of joy when his son gained the prize for boxing at the Olympic games].

Solon is represented here by a woodcut used for the first time. He is clothed in a sort of Oriental fez and a robe of many folds. He has a decidedly aquiline profile, and is diligently engaged in the study of a book.

In the Latin edition of the Chronicle the woodcut representing Solon is used in the German edition for Thales.

Pittacus (Pitacus) of Asia was the fourth of the Seven Sages. He was not only brilliant in learning but performed valorous deeds in the war between the Athenians and Mytilenaeans. He led the hosts of the latter. He fought a personal encounter with Phrynon (Firmone), leader of the Athenians. He concealed a net under his shield; with it he entangled Phrynon, slew him, and thus freed his country. The Mytilenaeans conferred the sovereignty on him, and he ruled over them for ten years, bringing the city into good order. At the end of that time he abdicated; and he lived another ten years. Although he might have become wealthy, he scorned all riches. When he saw an abundance of wine growing on the island of Mytilene, he made a public law against drunkenness, doubling the punishment for crime when committed by a drunkard; for he said that wine was good and evil—evil through excess, good by nature. He stated that reciprocal righteousness is the greatest virtue. The earth is a faithful thing, the sea a treacherous one. He lived seventy years, having flourished in the time of Joachim, king of Judah. [Pittacus (Pitacus) was a native of Mytilene, in Lesbos, and was born about 652 BCE. He was highly renowned as a warrior, statesman, philosopher, and poet. He is first mentioned as an opponent of the tyrants of Mytilene. With the brothers of Alcaeus he overthrew and killed the tyrant Melanchrus in 612. In 606 he commanded the Mytilenaeans in their war with the Athenians for the possession of Sigeum, on the coast of Troad, and signalized himself by killing in single combat Phrynon, the Athenian commander. He entangled his adversary in a net, and then dispatched him with a trident and dagger, in the same fashion in which the gladiators, called retiarii, long afterwards fought at Rome. The war was terminated by the mediation of Periander who assigned the disputed territory to the Athenians; but internal troubles continued and Pittacus was chosen absolute ruler. He held the office for ten years, resigning after having restored order. He died in 569 at an advanced age].

Bias of Asia was the fifth among the Seven Sages. War arose between the Prienesians and the Messenians, in which the warriors of the former carried away many of the Messenian virgins. Bias sympathized with them and cared for them as he would for his own daughter. He furnished them new apparel, gave each a present, and returned them to their parents under dependable escort. And thus he showed kindness to the enemy. When at another time Alyattes (Aliatus) besieged Priene in the hope of starving it out, Bias concealed the city's want and shortage of food by causing two well fed mules to be led out of the city so that they might, as if inadvertently, be captured by the enemy. When Alyattes saw the mules he concluded the city was abundantly supplied with necessities, sustenance and food. So he invited Bias to come to him in order to negotiate a peace. But Bias would not go to him, but asked him to send messengers into the city. He caused a heap of sand to be thrown up, and this he covered with grain. He called the pile to the attention of the messengers, who reported to Alyattes that great quantities of grain were still at hand in the city; and he, so believing, made peace and departed. And so, by the wisdom of Bias, the city was relieved. At another time, after a change of fortune, the enemy invaded the country. Those who felt so disposed fled, carrying their valuables with them. When Bias was asked why he was not taking his possessions, he replied, I carry all my wealth with me—for he carried it in his heart—not such wealth as is visible to the eye, but as is looked up in the mind. He said the best thing in life is a disposition which is inherently conscious of righteousness. And so a single thing may be dear to one. Bias flourished in the time of Zedekiah, the king, and he wrote many useful things. After his death, the people of Priene erected a temple to him. [Bias of Priene was one of the Seven Sages of Greece. He flourished about 550 BCE. Priene was one of the twelve Ionian cities on the coast of Asia Minor, and stood in the northwest corner of Caria, at the southern foot of Mt. Mycale, and on the north side of the Sinus Latinicus. Its foundation was mythically ascribed to Neleid Aepytyus, in conjunction with Cadmeans. It was originally located on the seashore, but a natural change in the coast left it some distance inland. It was of much religious importance in connection with the Panionian festival on Mt. Mycale, at which the people of Priene took precedence because they were supposed to be descendants of those of Helice in mainland Greece].

Cleobulus (Cleobolus), philosopher from Lindos, sixth of the Seven Sages, flourished in the time of Zedekiah the king of Judah, Cleobuline (Cleobola) his daughter, was a poetess of hidden questions, called riddles. And among others this was one of the riddles. There was a father who had twelve sons and to each of these was born thirty sons of unlike appearance. Some of these were white of countenance, and some were black; and although they are immortal, they are nevertheless destroyed and grow fewer. This is the year, father of the twelve months, etc. These are his teachings: Do well by a friend in order that he may become friendlier. Labor to make a friend of your enemies; for we should guard ourselves against the envy of a friend more than against the wiles of an enemy. The latter is open, while the former is a hidden evil; for the deceit which we do not expect is the more powerful. The more you are tempted to take a wife outside your own class, the less should you be inclined to do so; for if you take one of a higher class, you will have her family members as your master. Do not laugh at the unfortunate, for they will hate you for it. Do not be haughty in your good fortune, nor cast yourself into poverty; but submit bravely to the changes of fortune. He wrote three thousand riddles in verse form. And he died when he had completed seventy years of his life. [Cleobulus (Cleobolus) of Lindus in Rhodes, was a son of Evagorus. He lived about 580 BCE. He wrote lyric poems, as well as riddles, in verse. He is said to have been the author of the riddle concerning the year, but which is generally attributed to his daughter. He was greatly distinguished for strength and beauty of person. His daughter was renowned for her skill in riddles, of which she composed a number in hexameter verse].

Periander, the Corinthian philosopher, and seventh of the above mentioned sages, flourished in the days of Zedekiah king of Judah. He embodied many useful teachings in two thousand verses. His best known teachings are these: Those who wish to become tyrants [Tyrant (tyrannos), according to the original meaning of the term in ancient Greece, signified that one who exercised absolute power without legal warrant, whether ruling well or ill—a dictator, but not necessarily one who ruled cruelly or oppressively.] must equip themselves with good will and not with weapons. Fortunate and unfortunate friends should be treated with equality. What you promise should be performed. Periander, moreover, was famous in the time of Hezekiah, king of Judah. Periander died at the age of eighty years. [Periander was a son of Cypselus, whom he succeeded as tyrant of Corinth 625 BCE, and reigned for 40 years. His rule was mild and beneficent at first, but later became oppressive. It is said that this change was due to the advice of Thrasybulus, tyrant of Miletus, whom Periander consulted on the best mode of maintaining his power, and who is said to have taken the messenger through a cornfield, cutting off as he went, the tallest ears, and then to have dismissed him without committing himself to a verbal answer. His action, however, was correctly interpreted by Periander, who proceeded to rid himself of the most powerful nobles in the state. He made his authority respected at home and abroad. Like many of the Greek tyrants, he was a patron of literature and philosophy, and was generally reckoned one of the Seven Sages, although by some he was excluded in favor of Myson of Chenae in Laconia. Periander's life was marred by misfortune and cruelty. He married Melissa, daughter of Procles, tyrant of Epidaurus. She bore him two sons, Cypselus and Lycophron, and he passionately loved her; but he is said to have killed her by a blow during her pregnancy, having been roused to a fit of anger by false accusation against her. Her death embittered the remainder of his days, partly through remorse, and partly through the alienation of his younger son Lycophron, inexorably exasperated by his mother's fate. The young man's anger had been aroused chiefly by Procles, and in revenge Periander attacked Epidaurus, and having reduced it, took his father-in-law prisoner. He sent Lycophron to Corcyra; but when he was himself advanced in years, he summoned Lycophron back to Corinth as his successor, seeing that his elder son was unfit. But Lycophron refused to return to Corinth as long as his father was there. Periander offered to withdraw to Corcyra if Lycophron would come home and take over the government. To this he assented; but the Corcyraeans, not wishing to have Periander among them, put Lycophron to death. Shortly thereafter Periander died of despondency at the age of eighty].

Folio LX recto

Anacharsis (Anatharsis), a philosopher, was highly esteemed as a brave and stern man in military affairs and experience. But in order to enhance his knowledge of Greek learning and customs he traveled to Athens and went to the house of Solon the Wise. He caused it to be announced that he had come to see him and to become his friend. Solon answered that in one's own country friends were to be made at home. But Anacharsis replied, I am now in (my) country, and for that reason I am obligated to make friends. Surprised at his ready reply, Solon took him into his house and made of him a great friend and lover of wisdom. These are his statements: Being asked how one might become averse to wine, he answered, He who observes the vile conduct of drunkards will never become a lover of wine. He stated that mariners were removed from death only by the breadth of four fingers, for the hull of a ship is no thicker. Being asked what ships are the safest, he answered, those which peacefully rest on the land. Asked what was both good and evil in man, he answered, his tongue. He stated that a court is an exceptional place where persons deceive and over-reach one another. It is better to have but one friend who is worthy than to have a number of unworthy ones. Later on he returned to his home in Scythia, and undertook to educate his countrymen in the customs and usages of the Greeks in order to elevate his country. On this account and through envy his brother mortally wounded him during a chase. While dying he said, Through wisdom I was preserved in Greece, but through envy I pass away in my native land. [Anacharsis (c. 600 BCE), a Scythian philosopher, was the son of a chief of a nomadic tribe of the Euxine shores and a Greek woman. He went to Athens in search of knowledge, and made the acquaintance of Solon. It is said that he was initiated into the Eleusinian mysteries, and by his talent and acute observations he excited general admiration. The fame of his wisdom was such that he was reckoned by some among the seven sages. Several years later he returned home, filled with the desire of teaching his countrymen the laws and the religion of the Greeks. According to Herodotus he was killed by his brother].

Epimenides was a philosopher of Crete. While still young, his father sent him out to herd sheep. He climbed into a cave, and fell asleep and slept for 75 years. When he awoke, thinking he had slept for but a short while, he searched for his sheep. Not finding them, he went into the fields, but found everything changed and another in possession. In fear he returned to the people and went into his own house, telling who he was, until he saw his younger brother who was now old; and from him he now learned the whole truth about what had transpired. But as the Greeks regarded him as a man most loved by the gods, he was honorably received. By means of sacrifices he relieved the Athenians of a plague that had seized them. He also stated that money is a torment to the miser, a blessing to the humble, and death-blow to the treacherous. He lived 177 years, and wrote books of 5,000 verses on the creation and divine origin, and nine books of 1500 verses on the diverse nature of things. He also founded a temple to the gods at Athens, and flourished in the time of the very wise Solon.

Epimenides was a celebrated poet and prophet of Crete, whose history is to a great extent mythical. He was reckoned among the Curetes, and is said to have been the son of a nymph. He was a native of Phaestus in Crete, and appears to have spent the greatest part of his life at Cnossus, whence he is sometimes called a Cnossian. There is a legend that when a boy, he was sent out by his father in search of a sheep, and that seeking shelter from the heat of the midday sun, he went into a cave and there fell into a deep sleep which lasted 57 years. On waking and returning home, he found to his great amazement that his younger brother had in the meantime grown an old man. He is further said to have attained the age of 154, 157, or even of 229 years. His visit to Athens, however, is an historical fact and determines his date. The Athenians were visited by a plague in consequence of the sacrilege committed by Cylon, and they consulted the Delphic oracle about the means of their delivery. The god commanded them to get their city purified, and the Athenians invited Epimenides to come and undertake the purification. And so he came, about 596 BCE, and performed the task by mysterious rites and sacrifices, in consequence of which the plague ceased.

Epimenides was reckoned by some among the seven wise Men of Greece; but all that tradition has handed down about him suggests a very different character from that of the seven; he must rather be ranked in the class of priestly bards and sages who are generally comprised under the name of the Orphici. Many works, both in prose and verse, were attributed to him by the ancients, and Paul has preserved (Titus, 1.12) a celebrated verse of his against the Cretans.

The last sentence of this paragraph in the German edition of the Chronicle substitutes "the very wise Solon" with "Solomon the Wise."

Simonides the poet, while sailing over the sea, reached the shore and found there an uncorrupted dead body. While burying it, the dead man warned him not to put to sea on the following day; and he heeded the warning. The rest who took passage were drowned by the waves and the turbulence of the sea. These are said to have been his teachings: Silence is safer than speech; for we have seen many come to grief by talking, but none by silence. Hope in the future is a cure for ills. Conscience does not distress the innocent in adversity; for it is a comfort to man to know that he has not deserved to suffer. An innocent man may be deserted by good fortune, but never by hope. Simonides was renowned in the days of Manasseh, the king of Judah.

Simonides of Ceos (c. 556-467 BCE), one of the most celebrated lyric poets of Greece, was born at Julis, in the island of Ceos, as we learn from one of his own epigrams. He lived to the age of 89 years, was a master of elegiac verse and of epigrams, and the rival of Pindar in the dithyramb and the epinician ode. It appears that his family held some hereditary office in connection with the worship of Dionysus, and that the poet himself, when a boy, officiated in the service of the god at whose festivals he afterward gained many victories. He appears also to have been brought up to music and poetry as a profession.

From his native island Simonides moved to Athens, probably on the invitation of Hipparchus, the tyrant, at whose court he spent the best years of his life, probably from 528 to 514. He had completed his 80th year when his long poetic career at Athens was crowned by the victory that he gained with the dithyrambic chorus (477), being the fifty-sixth prize that he had carried off. It must have been shortly after this that he was invited to Syracuse by Hiero, whose court he lived till his death in 467. He was not only renowned for his poetic skills, but also for his political and moral wisdom; and he appears to have been especially anxious to emulate the fame of the Seven Wise Men, both for their wisdom itself and for their brief form of expressing it. Some ancient writers even reckoned him in the number of those sages. The leading principle of his philosophy appears to have been the calm enjoyment of the pleasures of the present life, both intellectual and material, the making as light as possible of its cares, patience in bearing its evils, and moderation in the standard by which human character should be judged. He made literature a profession and did not hesitate to exact compensation for his labors.

Tobit (Tobias), the Jew, a very holy prophet, was of the tribe and city of Naphtali. He was of a good disposition and distinguished for his spiritual grace. At this time he was carried into captivity by Shalmaneser the Assyrian king; but he was treated with kindness and persevered in divine service to the Lord. While at Nineveh he started to reflect on the commandments of the fathers, and visited the sick, gave alms to the poor, and comforted the distressed. He was seized with blindness, deprived of all his possessions, and became the poorest of mortals. But the Lord recognized his patience, and soon dispatched to him the angel Raphael, who restored his sight and his possessions tenfold. At the age of 102 years he prophesied the fall of Nineveh and the restoration of Jerusalem and the temple of the Lord, and gave up his ghost to the Lord. He was buried at Nineveh by his son Tobit (Tobias) and his grandsons. [Tobit (Tobias): This is a slight amplification and repetition of the same subject as given at Folio LIII verso. See also the Note there].

Folio LX verso

Amon (in the Year of the World 4551) [This parenthetical phrase marking the year is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. did evil before the Lord, and was slain by his servants. He died in his own house, where he was murdered. And they buried him with his father. [Amon, fourteenth king of Judah, was the son and successor of Manasseh. He was 22 years old when he began to reign and he reigned two years in Jerusalem. Zephaniah gives a vivid picture of the degradation of the kingdom under this wicked king. He was murdered by his servants and succeeded by his son Josiah].

Josiah (Iosias) (in the Year of the World 4558) [This parenthetical phrase marking the year is not in the German edition of the chronicle], king of Judah, received the kingdom when he was eight years of age. He ruled very well, pursuing the idolaters, urging the priests to erect the temple, prevailing upon the people to observe the law, to fear God, and to celebrate in a commendable manner the Feast of the Passover. Finally, contrary to the will of the Lord, he went forth to give battle to the king of Egypt. In this battle he was seriously wounded and was taken back to Jerusalem, where he died. Upon his death Jeremiah wrote a song of lamentation; for Josiah was highly renowned for the glory and honor which he brought to the people of Judah, but which died with him. Josiah from childhood had sought the Lord, and persisted in his pursuit to the end. With devotion and zeal he walked in the laws of the Lord to such an extent that (as one may say) he had no equal among the kings of Judah. [Josiah (Josias) the son and successor of Amon, king of Judah, began to reign when he was only eight years of age and reigned thirty-one years (641-610 BCE). He was remarkable for his integrity and piety. He gradually abolished the idolatrous customs of his predecessors, and in the eighteenth year of his reign began a thorough repair of the temple. In the progress of this work Hilkiah the high priest found a "book of the law of the Lord given by Moses." What book it is uncertain—probably Deuteronomy. Josiah seems to have been ignorant of its existence; but when it was read to him by one of his officers he was overwhelmed with grief to find how far they and their fathers had departed from the right way. He, however, humbled himself before God, and sent to inquire of the Lord through Huldah, the prophetess. In Jehovah's name she assured him that evil was determined of the Lord, but that he should not see it. (II Chr. 34:23-28) He then assembled the people and published the Law in their hearing, and all united with the king in a solemn vow of obedience. Then he destroyed every vestige of idolatry. When Pharaoh-necho went up from Egypt to Carchemish, Josiah opposed him, and mistrusting Nacho's message from God, gave the Egyptian battle at Megiddo; but he was mortally wounded and brought to Jerusalem, where he died at the age of thirty-nine and was buried in one of his father's sepulchers. His history is narrated in II Kings 22:23; II Chr. 34:35, and probably Jer.1-12].

Jehoahaz (Joathas) (in the Year of the World 4589) [This parenthetical phrase marking the year is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. was wicked before the Lord, for which reason God surrendered him into the hands of Pharaohnecho, the king, who took him into captivity in Egypt, and turned the kingdom over to his elder brother, Eliakim, and changed his name to Jehoiakim. [Jehoahaz was a son and the successor of Josiah, king of Judah. Though he was the fourth son, yet the people chose him king. He was an evildoer, and was referred to as a young lion by Ezekiel (19:3). He reigned only three months. It has been conjectured that his irregular election offended Pharaoh-necho, who got Jehoahaz into his power at Riblah, in Syria, whence he sent him a prisoner loaded with chains into Egypt. There he died, and his brother Jehoiakim became king in his stead].

Zealeucus (Zaleucus), a very righteous man, made many laws, and among others he ordained that he who commits the sin of adultery should be deprived of the sight of both his eyes. His son committed adultery, and he ordered both his eyes to be torn out. But the entire city pleaded for the son. And when he was finally moved to mercy by the persistent pleas of the people, yet, in order that his law might be complied with, he first caused one of his own eyes to be put out, and then one of his son's; and thus he showed a wonderful sense of moderation and not unpraiseworthy equality, as a merciful father and just lawgiver. Therefore, learn, my fellow Christians, by this with what zeal you should observe the commandments of thy God. This pagan preferred to be punished himself rather than to have his son's offense against the laws pass unpunished. [Zaleucus, of Locri Epizephyril in Magna Graecia, flourished about 660 BCE. He was a Greek lawgiver, and is said to have been the author of the first written code of laws among the Greeks. The story had some familiar features. The Locrians were distressed at their own lawlessness, and commissioned Zaleucus, a slave, to draw up a code, and he did so under divine inspiration. The code was a severe one of the Draconic type, which remained unchanged for centuries. The story ends with the episode of the lawgiver committing suicide on discovering that he had inadvertently broken one of his own laws].

Jehoiakim (Jeconias), also known as Eliakim (Eliachim), was also a son of Josiah, and was installed by Pharaoh as king, and was ordered to pay a tribute of one hundred pounds of silver. But he was wicked before the Lord, and therefore Nebuchadnezzar arose against him, and Jehoiakim became his servant for three years. But as he thereafter opposed Nebuchadnezzar, the latter again proceeded against him; and he slew him at Jerusalem and ordered his corpse to be thrown outside the wall. [Jehoiakim, second son of Josiah, and brother and successor of Jehoahaz as king of Judah, was at first called Eliakim. He was put on the throne by the king of Egypt, who at the same time changed his name to Jehoiakim. For the first four years he was subject to the king of Egypt, and paid him heavy tribute. Then for another three years he became tributary to Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. But he rebelled, and was taken prisoner by him and ingloriously slain and buried in 599 BCE].

Jehoiachin (Joachim), also known as Jehoiakim (Jeconias) was a son of Jehoiakim (Jeconias); and he was wicked before the Lord. In consequence he soon ceased to reign. He was taken to Babylonia in fetters, and imprisoned among the Chaldaeans for thirty-seven years. His (Nebuchadnezzar's) son released him from captivity after the death of his father. [Jehoiachin (Jeconias or Jeconiah), was the son and successor of Jehoiakim as king of Judah. He reigned but three months, and was then carried away to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar to avenge the alliance of his father with Egypt against Babylon. With him went all his family, the best of the people, and the sacred and royal treasures. He was imprisoned for thirty-six years, until finally released and favored by Evil-Meredoch, son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar. He was also called Coniah and Jeconiah (I Chr. 3:16; Jer. 27:20; 37:1)].

Zedekiah (Sedechias) in the Year of the World 4600 [The phrase "in the Year of the World 4600" is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. was the third son of Josiah and the last king of Judah and Jerusalem. He was evil and would not listen to the prophet Jeremiah. Therefore he and all of Judah were taken away to Babylon. His eyes were dug out, and his son was slain. Jeremiah and Ezekiel had predicted that he would be carried to the Babylonian king in fetters. And after he was made prisoner, the Chaldaeans strangled all the people. Those who escaped the sword were led away to serve the Chaldaeans. [Zedekiah, nineteenth and last king of Judah, was the third son of Josiah, full brother of Jehoahaz, and uncle to Jehoiachin, or Jeconiah, his predecessor (II Kings 24:17, 19; I Chr. 3:15). When Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, he carried Jehoiachin to Babylon, with his wives, children, officers, and the best artificers in Judea, and put in his place his uncle Mattaniah, whose name he changed to Zedekiah, pledging him by an oath of fidelity. Zedekiah began to reign at twenty-one years of age, and he reigned for eleven years. The Bible depicts him as doing evil in the sight of God, committing the same crimes as Jehoiakim (II Kgs. 24:18-20; II Chr. 36:11-13). In the ninth year of his reign he revolted against Nebuchadnezzar, trusting to the support of the king of Egypt, which proved ineffectual, and weakly despising the faithful remonstrance of Jeremiah (Jer. 37:2, 5, 7-10). Nebuchadnezzar marched into Judea and took all the fortified places, and in the eleventh year of Zedekiah's reign, being the 9th day of the fourth month (July), Jerusalem was taken (588 BCE). The king and his people tried to escape by night, but the Chaldean troops overtook them in the plains of Jericho. Zedekiah was carried to Nebuchadnezzar, then at Riblah, in Syria, who reproached him for his perfidy, caused his children to be slain before his face, and his own eyes to be put out. Loaded with chains he was then sent to Babylon and imprisoned, probably at hard labor].

Thales (Tales) the Milesian, one of the Seven Sages, is considered famous. After the theologians and the poets, they were called 'Wise', that is, 'Sages'. This Thales was the first who was able to predict an eclipse of the sun and moon (as Augustine says). The preceding folios make clear the accomplishments and words of these men. [This paragraph and the two lines of verse that follow the list of the names of the Seven Sages are not in the German edition of the chronicle].

Seven Sages

- Thales
- Solon
- Chilon
- Periander
- Cleobulus
- Bias
- Pittacus

He sings the Greek names of the Seven Sages.

And he honors those men famous in all parts of the world. [These two lines of verse (from a longer poem) are by Guarino Veronese (1374-1460), an Italian humanist and Classical scholar, one of the pioneers of Greek studies in Renaissance Western Europe and foremost teacher of humanistic scholars. Following studies in Italy and the establishment of his first school in Verona in the 1390s, Guarino studied at Constantinople (1403–08), where he was a pupil of Manuel Chrysoloras. Returning to Italy with a valuable collection of Greek manuscripts, he taught Greek at Florence (1410) and Venice (1414) and compiled (1418), the first Renaissance Latin grammar. It appeared in numerous editions and was used well into the 17th century. After two terms as master of rhetoric in Verona, Guarino became tutor to Leonello, son of Nicolò d'Este, lord of Ferrara, in 1430. Guarino prepared new editions of various Latin authors and translated works of Strabo and Plutarch. His linguistic talents were employed by Greek and Latin churchmen at the Council of Ferrara-Florence (1438–45). With his colleague Gasparino da Barzizza and former pupil Vittorino da Feltre, Guarino helped set the pattern for studies in humanism].

Marseilles (Massilia), the city beyond the mountains of Gaul (Gallia), was built in the first year of the reign of Zedekiah by the Phocaeans who were driven out from elsewhere and came here. In the time of Tarquin the king, there came in ships from Asia into the Tiber young men called Phocaeans, who made friends with the Romans, and then migrated into the land of Gaul, and amidst the Ligurians, the barbarous people of Gaul, built Marseilles. And by force of arms and war against the Gauls (or those whom they formerly overcame), the Phocaeans accomplished great things. The soil not being fertile, these Phocaeans sustained themselves more often on the water than on land by fishing and frequently by piracy, which was an honorable calling at that time. And so they entered the waters of the Rhone in Gaul and sailed to the hinterland beyond the sea, toward the west. And when they saw how pleasant this region was, they returned home and spread the news, and so caused many people to sail there. Furius and Peranus were leaders of this voyage. Marseilles was built on a promontory at the mouth of the Rhone, and in former times was highly regarded and of considerable size. It had a beautiful harbor and a well fortified castle. here also was built the very beautiful temple to Apollo of Delphi. But the Ligurians were envious of the city attacked it. Yet it constantly grew by conquests and through the defeat of its enemies and many new habitations were added. From them the Gauls learned the manner of refined living, husbandry, and the preservation of cities by walls. They abandoned their coarseness, and lived not by force of arms, but according to law. They established vineyards and planted oil trees, and became as renowned as if Gaul were changed into Greece, and not Greece into Gaul. To this city many noble Romans were sent to be educated. And although the city from time to time was invaded by many lords and tyrants, it never accepted a foreign law, nor suffered a single fall, except at the hands of the Catalauni (Cathelani). [Catalauni, or Catelauni, were a people in Gaul in the modern Champagne. Their capital was Durocatelauni, or Catelauni (Chalona sur Marne), in the neighborhood of which Attila was defeated by Aetius and Theodoric 451 CE]. To this city Lazarus, whom the Lord awakened from the dead, was sent from among the apostles as a bishop, and his relics have there been held in great reverence to this time. It is said that Mary Magdalene, a sister of Lazarus, was buried there. And there venerated men like Salvianus [Salvianus, an accomplished ecclesiastical writer of the fifth century, was born in the vicinity of Trevas, and passed the latter part of his life as a presbyter of the church at Marseilles]. and Museus, the priests, taught divine matters. Genadius, also a priest, taught Greek and Latin, and like Jerome, wrote a book about illustrious men. There also lived Corvinus the orator, Victorinus the rhetorician, and many others.

Marseilles is the French name for what was originally the Greek colony of Massalia (Latin Massilia). This colony was founded as early as the year 600 BCE by the mariners of Phocaea. In 542 BCE the fall of the Phocaean cities before the Persians probably sent new settlers to the Ligurian coast and cut off Massalia from close connection with the mother country. Isolated amid alien population, the Massalians made their way by prudence and by vigilant administration of their oligarchic government, and their colonies spread east and west, carrying with them the worship of Artemis. The great rival of Massalian trade was Carthage, and in the Punic Wars the city took the side of Rome, and was rewarded by Roman assistance in the subjugation of the native tribes of Liguria. In the war between Caesar and Pompey Massilia took Pompey's side, and in 49 BCE offered a vain resistance to Caesar's lieutenant Trebonius. In memory of its ancient services the city was left as a civitas libera ('free state') but her power was broken and most of her dependencies taken from her. From this time Massilia has little place in Roman history. It became for a time an important school of letters and medicine, but its commercial and intellectual importance declined. It appears to have been Christianized before the end of the third century, and at the beginning of the fourth century was the scene of the martyrdom of St. Victor.

After the ravages of successive invaders, Marseilles was repopulated in the tenth century under the protection of its viscounts. The town gradually bought up their rights, and at the beginning of the thirteenth century became a republic. In 1245 and 1256 Charles of Anjou, count of Provence, whose predecessors had left the citizens a large measure of independence, established his authority above that of the republic. In 1423 Alphonso V of Aragon sacked the town. King Rene, who had made it his winter residence, however, caused trade, arts and manufacturers again to flourish. On the embodiment of Provence in the kingdom of France in 1481, Marseilles preserved a separate administration directed by royal officials.

Pherecydes (Pherecides) was at this time a celebrated master. He was a native of Syros (Syrus) and a disciple of Pittacus (Pitacus), the natural philosopher. He was a man of exceptional understanding and the first among the Greeks to write of nature and the gods. Also (as Cicero states in the book Tusculum Disputations) [Cicero's () was a series of discussions on important points of practical philosophy, supposed to have been held in the Tusculanum of Cicero. It was written in 45 BCE]. he was the first to recognize the immortality of the soul. He predicted many wonderful things, as Laertius [Laertius, of whose life we have no particulars, probably lived in the second century after Christ. He wrote the in ten books. The work is of great value, as the author made use of a large number of writers on the history of philosophy, whose works are now lost]. states. Pliny says he was the first to reduce long dissertations to neat short ones. He was a master of Pythagoras, and wrote many letters to Thales the natural philosopher, receiving many from him in return.

Pherecydes of Syros, one of the Cyclades, was a son of Babys. The name of his birthplace, coupled with the traditions respecting the Eastern origin of his philosophical opinions, led many writers to state that he was born in Syria or Assyria. According to the concurrent testimony of antiquity, Pherecydes was the teacher of Pythagoras, although it is claimed by some that he received no instruction in philosophy from any master, but obtained his knowledge from the secret books of the Phoenicians. He was a rival of Thales, and like Thales and Pythagoras, was a disciple of the Egyptians and Chaldaeans. According to a favorite tradition in antiquity, Pherecydes died of the lousy disease, or Morbus Pediculosus; though others say that he threw himself from a rock at Delphi.

Pherecydes was, properly speaking, not a philosopher. He lived at a time when men began to speculate on cosmogony and the nature of the gods, but had hardly yet commenced the study of true philosophy. Hence he is referred to by Aristotle as partly a mythological writer, and Plutarch and others give him the title of 'theologos'. The most important subject he taught was the immortality of the soul. He maintained that there were three principia (Zeus or Aether, Chthona or Chaos, and Cronos or Time), and four elements (fire, earth, air and water), from which is formed everything that exists.

Pythagoras (Pytagoras), in these times and throughout the world, was the most celebrated natural philosopher. He was a Samian by birth, exceptionally well proportioned in body, and learned in the arts of music, weights and measures. He first taught the Greeks geometry. He was also versed in mathematics; nor did he neglect medicine. He believed in the transmigration of the soul. And although he had no equal in his time, he was ashamed to be called a wise man; but he called himself a philosopher, that is, a lover of wisdom. Although a Greek, he gave laws to the Italians. He made the regulation that those attending his school should not enter upon philosophical disputations for a period of five years. His books, it is said, were burned by the Athenians. Laertius thought much of his teachings, of which we here note this: In all respects we should sever illness from the body, ignorance from the soul, unchastity from the loins, civic disturbances from the home, and excess from all things.

Pythagoras was a Greek philosopher, a native of Samos, and flourished about 532 BCE. He is said to have been a pupil of Pherecydes. He left in Ionia the reputation of a learned and universally informed man. "Of all men," says Heracleitus, "Pythagoras, the son of Mnesarchus, was the most assiduous enquirer." The extensive travels attributed to Pythagoras are not doubt mostly apocryphal, but there is no intrinsic improbability in the statement of Isocrates that he visited Egypt and other Mediterranean countries. According to tradition he was driven from Samos by the tyranny of Polycrates, and migrated to Croton. There he became the center of a widespread organization, which was originally a religious brotherhood for the moral reformation of society, rather than a philosophical school. The Pythagorean brotherhood had much in common with the Orphic communities which sought by rites and abstinences to purify the believer's soul and enable it to escape from the "wheel of birth." The society became entangled in politics, resulting in its dismemberment and suppression. The first reaction against the Pythagoreans, led by Cylon, seems to have taken place in the lifetime of Pythagoras, resulting in his retirement to Metapontium, where he remained until his death. The order appears to have continued powerful in Magna Graecia till the middle of the fifth century, when it was violently stamped out. Those who survived took refuge at Thebes and other places. One of the foremost doctrines of Pythagoras is the theory of the immortality and transmigration of the soul, a teaching connected with the primitive belief in the kinship of men and beasts. The Pythagorean rule of abstinence from flesh is thus, in its origin, a taboo resting on the blood-brotherhood of men and beasts. The scientific doctrines of this school have no apparent connection with its religious mysticism. Their discourses and speculations all connect themselves with the idea of numbers, and the school holds an important place in the history of mathematical and astronomical science. Pythagoras made geometry part of a liberal education, considering its principles and theorems from an immaterial and intellectual standpoint. His greatest discovery was perhaps that of the dependence of the musical intervals on certain arithmetical ratios of lengths of strings at the same tension. He was the first to hold the earth and universe to be spherical. He realized that the sun, moon and planets have a motion of their own. It is improbable that he himself was responsible for the astronomical system bearing his name, which deposed the earth from its place in the center, and made it a planet like the rest. For him the earth was still apparently at the center and the later Pythagorean system is attributed alternatively to Philolaus and Hicetas. The system is this: The universe is spherical and finite in size. Outside it is infinite void, which enables the universe to breathe, as it were. At the center is the simple fire, called the Heart of the Universe (among other names), wherein is situated the governing principle, the force which directs the movement and activity of the universe. In the universe there revolved about the central fire these bodies: Nearest to the central fire is the "counter-earth" which always accompanies the earth; next in order, reckoning outwards, is the earth, then the moon, then the sun, then the five planets, and lastly the sphere of fixed stars. The counter-earth, revolving in a smaller orbit than the earth, is not seen by us because the hemisphere in which we live is always turned away from the counter-earth. The analogy of the moon, which always turns the same side to us, may have suggested this. This part of the theory involves the assumption that the earth rotates about its own axis in the same time as it takes to complete its orbit round the central fire; and, as the latter revolution was held to produce day and night, it is a fair inference that the earth was thought to revolve around the central fire in a day and night, or in twenty-four hours.

The system amounts to a first step toward the Copernican hypothesis, and Copernicus himself referred to it as such. The curious thing is the introduction of the counter-earth, the object of which, according to Aristotle, was to bring the number of revolving "bodies" up to ten, the perfect number according to the Pythagoreans. But elsewhere he hints at the truer explanation, when he says that eclipses of the moon were considered due sometimes to the interposition of the earth, sometimes to the interposition of the counter-earth, whence it would appear that the counter-earth was invented in order to explain the frequency of lunar eclipses as compared with solar ones.

Sappho (Sapho) Crexæa [The meaning of the name given to Sappho of 'Crexæa' is unknown. Perhaps it is a corruption of Eresos, a town on Lesbos that some believe was the birthplace of Sappho], a poetess of divine understanding, flourished at this time. She invented the plectrum with which stringed instruments are played. She was married to a very rich man and bore him a son named Dydan. She had several women students—Anactoria of Miletus (Anagora Millesia), Gongyla of Colophon (Congilla Colophonia), etc., to whom she taught a number of lyric pieces. She wrote in these lyric forms: epigram, elegy, iambic, and monody. She was also a very noble poet. [Sappho, one of the leaders of the Aeolian school of lyric poetry, was a native of Mytilene, or as some say, of Eresos, in Lesbos. She flourished during the reign of the Lydian king, Alyattes (c. 628-570). Easily the most famous of female poets of the ancient world (Plato called her the 'Tenth Muse'), she was a celebrated and controversial figure in Greece and Rome (issues of sexual identity surrounded her, and Roman poets in particular found her fascinating for a variety of reasons). By the end of the nineteenth century she had become a patron saint of women writers in general, and of lesbian writers in particular. Her life and surviving poems (especially fragments 1 and 31—the latter perhaps the most famous and influential love lyric of all time in the Western world) continue to inspire men and women up to the present. Strangely, the Chronicle contains two entries devoted to her: the one here and the other, rather different, at Folio LXXI recto].

Ezekiel (Ezechiel) the prophet, holy man and priest of the Lord, was taken prisoner with Jehoiachin (Joachim) the king, and carried off to Babylonia. To the people of Judea he predicted woe and bondage. These predictions he sent from Babylonia to King Zedekiah at Jerusalem; but the king would not believe them. At the age of thirty years, being the fifth year of his imprisonment, he wrote his book of prophecies. To Dan and Gad, as well as others, he predicted that they would not return to Jerusalem. He was murdered at Babylon and buried in the grave of Shem, son of Noah. [Ezekiel, one of the major prophets, son of Buzi the priest, was born and spent his earlier years in Judea. He was carefully educated but carried into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar with Jehoiachin, the king of Judea, eleven years before the destruction of Jerusalem, and was placed with a Jewish community in Chaldaea. He prophesied for over twenty-two years, was held in great esteem, and frequently consulted by the elders. Tradition states that he was murdered, and his supposed tomb is shown near Baghdad. Ezekiel was a stern Jewish patriot devoted to the rites and ceremonies of his religion].

Daniel, a man of zeal, high priest and prophet, born of the tribe of Judah, was taken prisoner by Nebuchadnezzar, king of the Chaldeans and, with Jehoiachin (Joachim), carried to Babylon, and nourished by his captor. At Jerusalem, in the ninth year of Zedekiah, when this young Daniel saved the innocent Susanna from death, he was inspired by the Holy Ghost and interpreted the first dream of the king of Chaldaea. For this the king appointed him collector. After Nebuchadnezzar died, and Daniel interpreted the handwriting on the wall for his son Belshazzar (Balthasar) [Belshazzar, the last king of the Chaldees at Babylon, reigned in conjunction with his father Nabonnedus at the time when the city was besieged by Cyrus in 558 BCE. Nabonnedus was closely shut up in Borsippa, a neighboring city, while in Babylon itself, Belshazzar made an impious feast, at which he and his courtiers drank out of the sacred vessels which had been carried away from the temple at Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, his grandfather. He was terrified by the apparition of the hand that wrote on the wall; and in the same night was slain, and the city taken by the Medes and Persians under Darius]. and predicted the course of his life, he was carried about in the city with great honor. Prompted by envy, Darius, son of Astyages, cast him into the lions' den; but he was released to enjoy even greater honors. He wrote his book of prophecies, divided into ten parts, according to the ten visions which he saw—three under Nebuchadnezzar, three under his son Belshazzar, and the seventh and eighth under Darius, and the last two in the reign of Cyrus. He was buried in the city of Ebethenis in the country of Persia (Media).

Daniel, one of the four major prophets, was of noble, perhaps royal descent, and probably born at Jerusalem. In his youth he was carried captive to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, together with three other Hebrew youths of rank, Hananiah, Mishael and Azariah in 604 BCE. He was there instructed in the language and arts of the Chaldeans, and with his three companions, trained for the royal service in the palace. They refused to eat of the king's meat and to drink his wine, but chose "pulse and water." After three years training Daniel interpreted a dream for the king, and in reward was made ruler of the whole province of Babylon, and chief of the governors over all the wise men. In this capacity he won great fame. He also prophesied for the king and his successor.

Under Darius the Mede, Daniel was made the first of the "three presidents" of the empire. His enemies influenced Darius to forbid all prayer save unto the king for thirty days. But Daniel did not stop praying, and so was cast into a den of lions for punishment. But the Lord delivered him, and he was kept in his office. In the reign of Cyrus he likewise prospered, but seems to have left Babylon. When and where he died is uncertain. He is to be compared with Joseph at the court of Pharaoh. Both were involuntary exiles, and both statesmen. Both maintained their religion and personal character in the face of idolatry and corruption; both rose by their wisdom and integrity from slavery to the highest dignity in a pagan empire.

Bologna (Bononia), an ancient city of the Romans, was at first called Felsina, a name given it by the Etruscans; but thereafter, the Boii, a people of Gaul, called it Bononia. It was the first city of the Etruscans beyond the Apennines. Later it became the capital city of the Boii, after whom it was called Bononia. Livy states that the Romans secured possession of the city, taking it from the Boii, this being the territory that formerly belonged to the Etruscans. After the latter were driven out, the Romans sent 3,000 men there, and with their help the population was increased and the city expanded to such an extent that by the time of Augustus and under other emperors it became one of the three richest cities of Italy on the upper sea. Suetonius states that Octavian granted the Bolognans a charter incorporating their territory into that of Italy out of consideration for the tact that they were at one time of the Antonian family. Suetonius also writes that the emperor Nero favored the Bolognans against the Romans. In the Year of Salvation 840, in the time of Pope Sergius (formerly called the Pig's Snout), when Emperor Lothair (Lotharius) sent his son Louis (Ludivicum) with a large force against Rome, the Bolognans opposed him and inflicted much mischief and damage, compelling Louis to retreat with his forces. And he overstepped the bounds of reason in wreaking vengeance upon the Bolognans, devastating their lands and slaying innocent people he found on the streets of the city and in the villages; and he besieged and leveled the cities that he conquered. Thereafter, in the Year of the Lord 1271, Bologna was so mighty that it barred the Venetians from free use of the Adriatic, and conducted a three years' war. After the conflict ceased, internal strife arose among the Bolognans, resulting in the devastation of the city, and making it necessary to bring it under the control of the Roman Church. The city was enclosed within its present walls by the Romans; and it increased in riches; and as it brings forth an abundance of grain, wine, and other necessities of life, the city is called the Fat Bologna. [La Grassa in Italian]. From the time of Theodosius to the present its celebrated University has maintained its great renown; for it is called the Mother of the Arts; and here are taught the laws, canon and civil, the liberal arts, and sacred literature. Here also flourished many holy and highly learned men, in particular the holy Petronius, the bishop, who wrote the lives of the ancient fathers. Guido, the archdeacon, John Andreas and John Calderinus, celebrated jurists who left many commendable writings.

Bologna, anciently Bononia, was an important town of Gallia Cispadana, in Italy. According to classical writers it was of Etruscan origin. It is situated at the foot of the northern spur of the Apennines, in the very center of Italy, on a rich and fertile plain. Nature has lavished her gifts in this region; the soil is rich and fertile; corn, wine, oil, hemp, and other products of the earth justify one of Bologna's titles of La Grassa, and from an agricultural standpoint she ranks high among Italian states. A more dignified surname, La Dotta ('learned'), comes to her through the famous University; while another, that of La Gentile, is due to the ready courtesy she extends to foreigners.

The first name borne by the city was that of Felsina, from Felsino, King of Tuscany, who according to Girardacci (Della Historia di Bologna), reigned from 897 to 865 BCE. Another legend ascribes the name to Felsina, daughter of one Fero, who with his daughter and his wife Aposa have come to this spot with the intention of building a house here. One day, overcome by toil and heat, he fainted, but was revived by his daughter, who restored him with some water from a neighboring stream, and prayed that as a reward for her labors, the place might be called after her. This the father did.

King Felsino was followed by his son Bono, who loved the town so dearly that he altered its name to Bononia, after himself, a name by which it was known for years, and from which with slight modifications it has become the Bologna of today.

Bologna was made the metropolis of twelve other cities, and remained under the rule of the Truscans till the reign of Tarquinius Priscus, fifth king of Rome (580 BCE), when the Celtic Gauls under Belloveso crossed the Alps, drove the Etruscans from before them, and spread victoriously over the rich lands lying between the Apennines and the Adriatic. They retained Bologna as their capital.

Bologna, "with the region of Felsina," was assigned to the Boii, a strong and numerous tribe of the Gauls, who confirmed the choice of Bologna as the capital. Their possession was hotly contested by the Romans, and the Romans finally triumphed. It became a Roman colony in 189 BCE. Three thousand colonists with Latin rights were established there, and the city attained military and commercial importance. But its name does not again occur in history until the period of the Civil Wars. It was here that Octavian, at the head of his army, met the combined forces of Antonius and Lepidus, and arranged the terms of the Second Triumvirate. The city appears to have been under the special patronage of the Antonian family, and the Triumvir in consequence settled there many of his friends and dependents. Pliny and Tacitus speak of it as an important and flourishing place under the Roman Empire, and it seems to have retained its prosperity thereafter.

Fire was one of the hindrances that often held up building operations in Bologna, houses being entirely of wood and the roofs all of the thatch. The first fire recorded was 50 CE, and it destroyed almost the entire town. Nero, then a youth and high in favor with the emperor, was moved at the sight of the ruin and distress, and pleaded that help be sent from Rome. Funds were appropriated, the city was restored and rebuilt, and eventually Nero himself rebuilt the baths, and at his death bequeathed a sum to endow them.

Bononia was able to resist Alaric in 410 CE, and afterward belonged to the Greek exarchate of Ravenna.

The Roman city, orientated on the points of the compass, with the streets at right angles, can be readily distinguished from the outer city, fortified in 1206. The streets leading to the gates of the latter radiate from the outskirts, and not from the center, of the former.

The famous university of Bologna was founded in the 11th century. The students numbered between 3,000 and 5,000 in the 12th to the 15th century, and in 1262, it is said, nearly ten thousand. Among its professors were Giovanni d'Andrea and Giovanni Andrea Calderini, an eminent lawyer. Among its students were both Dante and Petrarch. Among the illustrious natives of Bologna's later days is Luigi Galvani (after whom galvanism was named). The last and perhaps the greatest name on this list is that of Giosue Carducci, the great poet of United Italy, who died at Bologna in 1907, respected, mourned and beloved by the whole population.

Merodach was the first king of Babylonia. He fled from the principality of Assyria. He and the king of Media were not obedient to Esarhaddon (Assaradon) [Esarhaddon (Assaradon), son and successor of Sennacherib (II Kings 19:37; Isaiah 37:38) reigned over Assyria from 682-669 BCE. He completely rebuilt Babylon, which Sennacherib had destroyed, and was a great restorer of temples. He was also a great conqueror, making three expeditions into Egypt, and finally conquered the whole North, garrisoning the chief cities and appointing vassal kings. He subdued all Syria, and received tribute from Manasseh. He ruled over Babylonia as well as Assyria, which explains the statement of II Chronicles 33:1 that Manasseh was carried captive there]. in anything. Therefore the empire of the Assyrians declined, while the kings of Babylonia began to wax mighty. He also sent Hezekiah (Ezechie) many presents. [Cf. Isaiah 39:1: "At that time Merodach-baladan, the son of Baladan, king of Babylon, sent letters and a present to Hezekiah; for he had heard that he had been sick, and was recovered." Thus Babylonia sought a friendly alliance with Hezekiah, king of Judah. And Hezekiah was so pleased that he showed the visiting Babylonians all his treasures. And he told Isaiah what had happened. Then Isaiah prophesied that the day would come when all that his fathers had laid up, would be carried off to Babylon, and also his sons, who would become eunuchs in the palace of the Babylonian king].

The game of chess [The origin of chess is involved in considerable mystery. The general opinion is that India is its birthplace; that it is an offspring of a game called Chaturanga, which is mentioned in Oriental literature as in use over 2000 years before Christ. From India the game spread into Persia, and thence into Arabia, and ultimately the Arabs took it to Spain and the rest of Western Europe. The game was probably invented to illustrate the art of war. According to Arab legend it was devised for the instruction of a young despot by his father, a learned Brahman, to teach him that a king, notwithstanding his power, was dependent for safety on his subjects. The Greek historians credit the game to Palamedes, who they claim devised it to overcome the tedium of the siege of Troy during the Trojan war]. was devised by Xerxes (Xerses), the pagan philosopher, for the beguilement of Evilmerodach, the tyrant, who generally slew his teachers and masters, and who by the fascination of this game was drawn away from his tyranny. [Evil-merodach (Evilmerodach) was the son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar as king of Babylon (II Kings 25:27). Soon after his accession to the throne he released Jehoiachin, king of Judah, from prison, treating him with great regard throughout life (Jer. 52:31:34). He began to reign in 561 BCE, but two years later fell a victim to a conspiracy formed among his own kindred by his brother-in-law, Neriglissar (probably the Nergal-sharezer of Jer. 39:3, 13), who succeeded him].

Nebuchadnezzar (Nabuchodonosor) was a very successful warrior, for he was scourge of God to punish the sins of the people. He conquered the Assyrian Empire that was destroyed by the Medes, and there he was himself a king. Also for seven months thereafter he lived among the wild animals. After seven years of penitence and the prayers of Daniel, he was converted into his former state. He carried on many wars with those on the border, particularly with the Egyptians whom he defeated to the limits of the land of Judea. He brought Syria under his power. He murdered Jehoiakim (Joachim), and carried his successors together with the temple treasures to Babylonia. Of Zedekiah (Sedechias), an uncle of Jehoiachin, he made a king of Babylonia. At the age of forty he was buried at Babylonia, leaving his kingdom to his son as his heir. [Nebuchadnezzar, son and successor of Nabopolassar, the founder of the Babylonia monarchy, was the most illustrious of these kings, and one of the greatest rulers of history (II Kings 24:1; Daniel 1-4). He seems to have been of Chaldaean origin, and married Amuhia, daughter of the Median king. We know most of him through the book of Daniel. He was entrusted by his father with the important task of repelling Pharaoh-necho, and defeated him at Carchemish on the Euphrates, bringing under subjection all the territory which Necho had occupied, including Syria and Palestine, overrunning these countries, taking Jerusalem, and carrying off a portion of the inhabitants, including Daniel and his companions. As soon as his father died he hastened back to Babylon and placed himself upon the throne, giving his generals instructions to bring the Jewish, Phoenician, Syrian and Egyptian captives to Babylon. While he was carrying on wars in other parts of Asia, Jehoiakim rebelled, and was punished by the irruption of Chaldaeans, Syrians, Moabites and Ammonites, incited, perhaps, by Nebuchadnezzar who, as soon as possible, sent his troops against Jerusalem and took Jehoiakim prisoner. During the reign of his son and successor Jehoiachin, Nebuchadnezzar invaded Palestine for the third time and took Jerusalem, putting Mattaniah, the uncle of Jehoiachin on the throne, changing his name to Zedekiah. After ten years he, too, rebelled, and was punished by Nebuchadnezzar, who reduced Jerusalem to famine, took it, and slew the two sons of Zedekiah, putting out the eyes of the father and taking him captive to Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar was a cruel and mighty monarch. He gave much attention to the architectural adornment of Babylon, and built the Hanging Gardens on a large artificial mound made to look like a hill. This great work, called by the ancients one of the Seven Wonders of the World, was executed to please his wife, whose home had been in a hilly country. It is said that nine-tenths of the bricks found among the ruins of the ancient capital are inscribed with his name].

Byzantium (Bisantium), thus called by the Greeks, is a city by the sea in Thrace, and was built by the Lacedaemonians, who consulted Apollo, the pagan god, as to its location. He answered that they were to build it "opposite the blind," stating that Megara, near Chalcedon, was built by the blind. For, although they sailed to Thrace and saw the region where Byzantium was built, as Strabo states, [] they passed up this rich country and selected a poorer one. But according to Justinus and Eusebius the city was begun in the Year before the Coming of Christ 663, near the region of the Chalcedonians, in Greece, close by the fertile and fortified city of Pausanias, king of Sparta. Although small, it was enlarged by Constantine the Great, and called Constantinople. We will say more in praise of it in his time.

Megara was situated about a mile from the sea opposite the island of Salamis, and is celebrated in the history of philosophy as the seat of the Megarian School, which was founded by Euclid, a native of the city, and a disciple of Socrates. Chalcedon is a Greek city on the coast of the Propontis at the entrance of the Bosphorus, nearly opposite Byzantium. It was founded by a colony from Megara in 685 BCE. Byzantium, a Greek city on the Bosphorus, occupied the most easterly of the seven hills of modern Constantinople. It was founded by Megarians and Argives under Byzas about 657 BCE. It was destroyed in the reign of Darius Hystaspes, but recolonized by the Spartan Pausanias in 479 BCE. Its situation was beautiful and secure. It controlled the Euxine grain trade. The depth of its harbors rendered its quays accessible to vessels of large burden, while the fisheries were so lucrative that the curved inlet near which it stood became known as the Golden Horn. The population was partly Lacedaemonian and partly Athenian. It was thus a subject of dispute between these States and was alternately in the possession of each, till it fell into the hands of the Macedonians. About seven years after its second colonization, the Athenian Cimon wrested it from the Lacedaemonians; but in 440 BCE it returned to its former allegiance. Alcibiades, after a severe blockade (408 BCE) gained possession of the city through the treachery of the Athenian party. In 405 BCE it was retaken by Lysander and placed under a Spartan governor. It was under the Lacedaemonians when the Ten Thousand, exasperated by the conduct of the governor, made themselves masters of the city, and would have pillaged it but for the eloquence of Xenophon. In 390 BCE Thrasybulus expelled the Lacedaemonian oligarchy, and restored democracy and the Athenian influence.

Byzantium joined with the islands of Rhodes, Chios, Cos, and Mausolus, king of Caria, in throwing off the yoke of Athens, but sought Athenian assistance when Philip of Macedon advanced against it. The Athenians suffered a severe defeat at the hands of the Macedonian admiral, but in the following year gained a decisive victory and compelled Philip to raise the siege. The deliverance of the besieged from a surprise, by means of a flash of lightning that revealed the advancing Macedonian army, has rendered this siege memorable. As a memorial of the miraculous interference, the Byzantines erected an altar to Torch-bearing Hecate, and stamped a crescent on their coins, a device which is retained by the Turks to this day.

During the reign of Alexander, Byzantium was compelled to acknowledge the Macedonian supremacy, after the decline of which it regained its independence, but suffered from the incursion of the Scythians. The losses that they sustained by land roused the Byzantines to indemnify themselves from the vessels that crowded the harbor, and the merchantmen that cleared the straits; but this provoked war with neighboring powers.

During the first years of its alliance with Rome, Byzantium held the rank of a free confederate city; but it was later subjected to the imperial jurisdiction and gradually stripped of its privileges. It was besieged and taken (196 CE) by Severus, who destroyed it, demolished the famous wall, and put the principal inhabitants to the sword. Relenting, Severus later rebuilt a large portion of the town, naming it Augusta and Antonina. It had scarcely begun to recover its former position when, through the capricious resentment of Gallienus, the inhabitants were once more put to the sword and the town was pillaged. From this disaster the inhabitants recovered so far as to be able to check an invasion of the Goths in the reign of Claudius II, and the fortifications were strengthened during the civil wars which followed the abdication of Diocletian. Diocletian had resolved to transfer his capital to Nicomedia; but Constantine, struck with the advantages which the situation of Byzantium presented, resolved to build a new city there on the site of the old and transfer the seat of government to it (330 CE).

Nebuchadnezzar (Nabuchodonosor) made Mattaniah (Mathanias), the uncle of Jeconiah (Joachim), king at Jerusalem, and by oath bound him to pay an annual tribute; and he changed his name to Zedekiah (Sedechias). He (Zedekiah) began to reign at the age of twenty-one years, and he reigned 11 years at Jerusalem. Thereafter he did evil in the sight of the Lord. He was arrogant and decided to make an alliance with the king of Egypt; nor did he keep his oath. The false prophets deceived him, saying, The Babylonians would certainly be driven out by the Egyptians. Jeremiah advised him to place his faith in God and not in humanity. In the ninth year of his reign, on the advice of the Egyptians, he decided not to pay the promised tribute, but to liberate himself and to ignore his oath, in consequence Nebuchadnezzar besieged him with a great number of people, and by starvation sought to compel him to pay the tribute. The city was opened at midnight, and Zedekiah and his relatives escaped, and went on their way to the wilderness. The mercenaries pursued him and captured him in the evening. And they brought him before the king at Riblah (Reblata). And the king punished him for his ingratitude, for although he had invested him with the kingdom, he had become perfidious; and he caused his eyes to be put out, and had him sent to Babylon in chains. He also contrived to have him, together with Jehozadek (Josedeck) [Jehozadak, son of Seraiah, was a high priest under Zedekiah. He succeeded his father who was slain at Riblah, but was immediately carried captive and died in exile]. and all his relatives, put to death. And he carried away from Jerusalem to Babylon a great number of people as prisoners. He caused the city and the temple to be destroyed and burned. [The text of the closely follows the 24th and 25th chapters of II Kings, covering the rebellions of Jehoiaikim and Zedekiah, and the siege and destruction of Jerusalem]. He also conquered the empire of Assyria, which the Medes had destroyed. And so Babylonia became the sovereign of all these empires, and the kingdom of the Hebrews passed out as that of the Chaldees sprang up. Chaldaea, the kingdom in Asia, adjoined Arabia, a poor flat country, lacking water. In it (Chaldaea) was Babylon the capital city; and in the time of Zedekiah, after Astyages the eighth and last king of Media had reigned 38 years, the empire of the Medes declined.

Destruction of Jerusalem

Jerusalem, the noblest and oldest city, was destroyed a number of times: Firstly by the King of Babylon when Nebuchadnezzar, King of Chaldaea in the time of Zedekiah, invaded the land of Judah with a great and powerful army, and afflicted the cities and besieged Jerusalem. Thereafter he marched against Pharaoh the King of Egypt; and when he had forced him to flight he sent Nebuzar-adan (Nabuzardo) [Nebuzar-adan, chief of the executioners under Nebuchadnezzar, and his agent in the sacking and destruction of Jerusalem (II Kings 25:8-21)], one of the generals of his army, to besiege Jerusalem. He was encamped there for eight months when they surrendered themselves and their city to the Chaldaeans. They slew the king, leveled the towers and walls, burned the Temple, and seized the temple treasures. The Temple remained desolate for seventy years. The captivity did not end until the time of Cyrus. The Temple was not rebuilt until the time of Darius, the King of Persia and Media. Jerusalem was destroyed a second time by Asobeus, King of Egypt. What the land of Judea suffered at the hands of the Medes, Egyptians, and Macedonians, I will not here relate. The city was destroyed a third time by that most cruel tyrant, Antiochus Epiphanes, who took the city through the treachery of Menelaus, and through merciless men plundered the Holy City; gave the Jews pork to eat, forced them to forego their own laws, and to worship the Olympian Jove. On the fourth occasion it was destroyed by Pompey, who conquered the entire land of Judea, making it and Jerusalem tributary. Strabo relates that Pompey on a certain sabbath of the Jews, when they withheld themselves from all labor, filled up the moats, set up the ladders, and conquered the city. For a fifth time the cities of Judea, and particularly Jerusalem, were attacked, and this time by Gabinius, Scaurus, and Varus; and Herod the Great [Herod the Great, King of the Jews, was the second son of Antipater. Caesar appointed his father procurator of Judea in 47 BCE. Herod, thought only twenty-five, obtained the government of Galilee. In 40 he went to Rome and obtained from Anthony and Octavian a decree of the Senate constituting him king of Judea. He possessed a jealous temper and ungovernable passions. His government, though cruel and tyrannical, was vigorous, and he was feared and respected by his subjects and neighbors. He loved to display his power and magnificence by costly and splendid public works. In the last year of his reign Jesus of Nazareth was born. He died in the 37th year of his reign, at the age of seventy]. and Sosius [Sosius was one of Anthony's principal lieutenants in the East. In 37 BCE he advanced against Jerusalem along with Herod, became the master of the city and placed Herod on the throne]. conquered it, and possessed it as a march. On the sixth occasion it was taken by Vespasian [Vespasian (T. Flavius Sabinus), Roman emperor from 70-79 CE, was the son of a man of modest means, in the country of the Sabines. His mother Vespasia Pola was the daughter of a praefectus castrorum, and the sister of a Roman senator. She was left a widow with two sons, Flavius Sabinus and Vespasian. Vespasian served as a tribinus militum in Thrace, and was quaestor in Crete and Cyrene. He married and had two sons, both of whom succeeded him. In the reign of Claudius he was sent into Germany as legatus legionis; and in 43 he held the same command in Britain, and reduced the Isle of Wight. He was consul in 51, and proconsul of Africa under Nero. He had a great military reputation and was liked by his soldiers. In the year 66 he conducted the war against the Jews, and with that war raised his reputation. He was proclaimed emperor at Alexandria in 69, and soon after all through the East. He came to Rome in 70, leaving his son Titus to continue the war against the Jews. Titus took Jerusalem after a siege of five months. The cause of Vespasian's return to Rome was the war that broke out between Otho and Vitellus. Vespasian on his return labored to restore order in the city and the empire. The simplicity and frugality of his mode of life was in striking contrast with the profusion and luxury of his predecessors, and his example is said to have done more to reform the morals of Rome than all the laws that had ever been enacted. He lived like a private person, was affable and easily approached. He ridiculed all attempts to give him a distinguished genealogy. He knew the bad character of his son Domitian, but kept him under proper restraint. In 71, Titus returned to Rome, and father and son triumphed together for their conquest of the Jews. In the summer of 79, Vespasian, whose health was failing, spent some time in his parental home in the mountains of Sabini. Drinking cold water to excess he injured his stomach, which was already disordered; but he still attended to business. When he felt death approaching, he said that an emperor should die standing, and so he died at the age of 69 on June 24, 79]. on the eighth day of the month of September, in the second year of his reign, through his son Titus, who razed it to the ground and destroyed the temple. They leveled the walls and filled the moats. This conquest the Romans considered a feat of great importance, and Titus, leader of the hosts, and afterwards governor of the realm, when he passed over the walls was himself surprised, and

THE CAPTURE OF ZEDEKIAH - Size 8¾" X 5½"

This woodcut portrays one of the incidents in the fall of Jerusalem as recorded in the accompanying text, based on the 24th and 25th chapters of II Kings.

We are in the plains of Jericho in the eleventh year of the reign of Zedekiah, whose army has been defeated and dispersed by the besiegers. From the right the Babylonian hosts—a horse and armed cap-a-pie in stout European armor of the Middle Ages, and equipped with implements of war of the same period—proudly enter the picture. At their head is a distinguished personage in Oriental turban, apparently intended for Nebuchadnezzar, although this potentate was at Riblah at this time and not on the plans of Jericho. Proceeding before them in simple raiment but wearing his crown, is Zedekiah. His hands are bound behind his back by a cord, and he is being urged along by a rather aggressive looking infantryman who has strapped to his back a peculiar shield in the shape of a human face. Strangely enough, his trusty sword is in its scabbard at his side, while he urges on Zedekiah and the multitude with a stick.

Zedekiah is proceeding forward as best he can, with a peculiar dance step. He is already blindfolded, no doubt the artist's way of indicating that his eyes have already been put out, although this did not occur until he was brought before the great Babylonian king at Riblah. Crowded about the unfortunate king of Judah are his people, men, women and children, all in distress and fear. One of their numbers, in a cloak or mantle, stands immediately before the blinded king, making a gesture as if speaking to him. Who this may be, or what he may be saying, we do not know.

Folio LXIII verso

acknowledged the result rather as a divine favor than the work of human strength. In the destruction of the city, murder, hunger and mortal suffering occurred, and if you would know the details, you should read Josephus [Flavius Josephus, the Jewish historian, was born in Jerusalem in 37 CE. On his mother's side he was descended from the Amonaeon princess, while from his father, Matthias, he inherited the priestly office. He enjoyed an excellent education, and at the age of 26 he went to Rome to plead the cause of some Jewish priests whom Felix, the procurator of Judea, had sent there as prisoners. He not only effected the release of his friends, but received great presents from the empress Poppea. On his return to Jerusalem he found his countrymen about to revolt from Rome, from which he used his best endeavors to dissuade them; but failing, he professed to enter into the popular designs. He was chosen one of the generals of the Jews, and was sent to manage affairs in Galilee. When Vespasian and his army entered Galilee, he threw himself into Iotapata, which he defended for 47 days. When the place was taken, his life was spared by Vespasian through the intercession of Titus. Josephus thereupon assumed the character of a prophet, and predicted that the empire should one day be his and his son's. Vespasian treated him with respect, but did not release him from captivity till he was proclaimed emperor three years later (70 CE). Josephus was present with Titus at the siege of Jerusalem, and afterwards accompanied him to Rome. He received the freedom of the city of Vespasian, who assigned him as a residence a house formerly occupied by himself, and treated him honorably to the end of his reign. The same favor was extended him by Titus, and by Domitian as well. He assumed the name of Flavius, as a descendant of the Flavian family. His time at Rome seems to have been chiefly employed in the composition of his works, among which is his Jewish War, in seven books, published about 75 CE. He first wrote in Hebrew, then translated it into Greek. It commences with the capture of Jerusalem by Antiochus Epiphanes in 170 BCE, runs rapidly over the events before Josephus' own time, and gives a detailed account of the fatal war with Rome. He also wrote another book, Jewish Antiquities, in twenty books, completed about 93 CE. It gives an account of Jewish history from the creation of the world to 66 CE, the twelfth year of Nero. He also wrote his own life in one volume, and other works]. who wrote, not according to hearsay, but recorded actual facts to which he and others were witnesses. When Titus, together with his father Vespasian, entered the city, he caused Simon, who was the cause of the destruction, to be dragged through the streets with ropes in his triumphal train, and his body bruised; and thereafter he slew him. Vespasian built a temple of peace, and caused to be deposited in it the holy treasures of the Jews, such as the tablets of the laws, and other things. The city was at that time the abode of thieves and murderers; and so it continued until the time of Hadrian. For fifty years it remained desolate. Thereafter Hadrian, the emperor, rebuilt it and restored its walls; and he called it Aelia Capitolina (Helyam), after himself. As St. Jerome wrote to Paulinus, the worship of Jove was practiced from the time of Hadrian to that of Constantine, for 180 years; and on the Mount of the Cross a column was erected to Venus, the pagan goddess, and worshipped by the pagans. Thereby they meant to dishonor the Holy City, and to uproot belief in our origin and in the Cross. At various times our own princes have held the city. Charlemagne captured it with great labor, but lost it again. Godfrey (Gothefridus) recaptured it; and so that it might be retained in possession, Emperor Conrad and King Louis (Ludovicus) of France marched into Asia. But as our princes afterward became indifferent, neither Jerusalem nor Antioch remained in our power. O how lamentable and shameful it is that the Saracens, enemies of the Cross, should hold the Temple of Solomon in which the Lord often preached; Bethlehem, in which He was born; Calvary, where He was crucified, and the grave in which He slept! Although the Christians did not choose to think of this, they should never forget it. Look at the city of the Living God; the office of our redemption; the city which God glorified with miracles and sanctified with his blood; and in which the bloom of our origin first appeared—all now in the power of the hordes of Mohammed and subject to a sinful people. [Jerusalem or Hierosolyma, called El-Kuds, that is, the Holy City by the Arabs. At the time of the Israelite conquest of Canaan, under Joshua, Jerusalem, then called Jebus, was the chief city of the Jebusites, a Canaanite tribe, who were not entirely driven out till 1050 BCE, when David took the city and made it the capital of the kingdom of Israel. It was also made the permanent center of the Jewish religion by the erection of the Temple of Solomon. After the division of the kingdom, under Rehoboam, it remained the capital of the kingdom of Judah, until it was entirely destroyed, and its inhabitants were carried into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, in 588 BCE. In 536, the Jewish exiles, having been permitted by Cyrus to return, began to rebuild the city and temple; and the work was completed in about 24 years. In 332 Jerusalem quietly submitted to Alexander. During the wars that followed his death, the city was taken by Ptolemy, son of Lagus, (320) and remained subject to the Greek kings of Egypt, till the conquest of Palestine by Antiochus III the Great, king of Syria (198). Up to this time the Jews had been allowed the free enjoyment of their religion and their own internal government, and Antiochus confirmed them in these privileges; but the altered government of his son Antiochus IV Epiphanes provoked a rebellion, which was at first put down when Antiochus took Jerusalem and polluted the temple (170); but the religious persecution which ensued drove the people to despair, and led to a new revolt under the Maccabees, by whom Jerusalem was retaken, and the temple purified (163). In 133 Jerusalem was retaken by Antiochus VII. Sidetes, and its fortifications dismantled, but its government was left in the hands of the Maccabee John Hyrcanus, who took advantage of the death of Antiochus in Parthia (128) to recover his full power. His son Aristobulus assumed the title of king of Judaea, and Jerusalem continued to be the capital of the kingdom until 63, when it was taken by Pompey, and the temple was again profaned. In 70 CE, the rebellion of the Jews against the Romans was put down, and Jerusalem was taken by Titus after a siege of several months, during which the inhabitants endured the utmost horrors. The survivors were all put to the sword or sold as slaves, and the city and temple were utterly razed to the ground. In consequence of a new revolt of the Jews, Hadrian resolved to destroy every vestige of their national and religious peculiarities; and, as one means to the end, he established a new Roman colony on the ground where Jerusalem had stood, by the name of Aelia Capitolina, and built a temple of Jupiter Capitolinus on the side of the temple of Jehovah in 135. The establishment of Christianity as the religion of the Roman Empire restored to Jerusalem its sacred character, and led to the erection of several churches; but the various changes which have taken place in it since its conquest by the Arabs under Omar in 638, have left very few vestiges even of the Roman city. Jerusalem fell to Saladin in 1187. For a brief interval from 1229 to 1244 the German Christians held the city by treaty; but in the latter year the Kharezmian Massacre swallowed up the last relics of Christian occupation. In 1517, it was conquered by Sultan Selim I, and thereafter it was a Turkish city until the modern period, where it went from British to Jewish control after World War II].

DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM - Size 10" X 20½"

This large and unusual woodcut (Destrucio Iherosolime), together with the accompanying text, concludes the fourth age of the world. It covers the greater part of Folio LXIII verso and LXIII recto and consists of two blocks. As one casually glances at this panorama of the Holy City one does not realize that a catastrophe is at hand. The city is pictured in a very hilly terrain and is itself located on a rather rotund elevation. It is surrounded by a wall that does not appear to have been seriously damaged, except in the lower right hand corner of the woodcut. Only two entrance gates are shown—Porta Aurea and Porta Gregis—neither of which have been destroyed; in fact, the outskirts of the city and the surrounding wall give no evidence of a siege, being entirely deserted.

We should feel grateful, in view of past performances on the part of the woodcutters, that this has not been depicted as a medieval European city; for with its abundance of muezzin towers and mosques, occasionally surmounted by a crescent, its squat and square abodes and dearth of vegetation, we are truly reminded of a Middle Eastern city.

Let us enter at the Porta Gregis. Immediately on our right, is the house of St. Anne (Dom(us) S. Ane), and diagonally across the street the domicile of Pilate (Dom(us) Pilatum). We proceed northward, and where the highway broadens into a plaza we see the house of Herod (Dom(us) Herod), also on our right. So far all have been squat, square structures with flat roofs. But as we go on we come to an elaborate building resembling a mosque. It has a large open forecourt and is flanked by a minaret on one side, a nondescript tower on the other. It is the uppermost structure in the picture, and bears the inscription "Calvarie."

Had we veered to the left from the plaza before the House of Herod, we should have passed a structure on our right inscribed with the words "Dom(us) Divitis" (?)—and changing our course to the north, we would have entered the "Porta vet(us)" leading into a sepulcher or tomb resembling an ink bottle in form, and whose inscription is doubtful. From the rear of this tomb a rather steep road leads upward and apparently down behind the city. As we ascend we meet two armed warriors on horseback, and another on foot. They have apparently been up to mischief for on either side of the road two huge square towers have been broken off at their bases, and toppled over in opposite directions. Just before we caught up with the first of these horsemen, we passed (on our left) the "Atria Soldanis,"—probably the atrium or forecourt to the Sultan's Palace.

Had we here turned westward (instead of proceeding to the north), and made our way down the hill to the left, we should have encountered the House of Caiaphas, the Temple of Mary (Teplu(m) Marie), another house of Anne, or the house of another Anne, as the case may be (Dom(us) Ane), and another structure of doubtful inscription.

So far our journey has been rather uneventful except for some of the disturbed masonry. But suddenly it becomes apparent that the grotesque structure, center left, entitled, "Teplu(m) Salomo(n)is," or "Temple of Solomon" is ablaze. In the left forecourt are two Turks engaged in friendly conversation, and in the forecourt to the right three or four persons promenade about as though they neither saw the flames, felt the heat, nor smelled the smoke of the conflagration that is engulfing the Temple.

To the extreme right of the panorama the way leads to Bethlehem, the direction being inscribed on a gabled house nestling between three towers. At the left of the city a road leads to an unnamed castle.

Mr. Bullen, in his observations on the Chronicle, remarks that the interest of this woodcut lies solely in its anachronisms, and to be sure there are such to the most superficial student of the architecture of the various periods and countries. Note for instance the Gothic spires that have been affixed to the lower stories of the two minarets on the left. But the greatest anachronism occurs at the extreme left, on the Mount of Satan (Muasatana), an elongated sugar-loaf affair, upon the summit of which appear two sketchy figures—one in a long robe and halo, the other in the nude and horned, the horns resembling the antennae of an insect. We are at once reminded Luke 4:5-9:

And the devil taking him up into a high mountain, showed him all the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time. And the devil said to him, All this power will I give you, and the glory of them; for that is delivered to me; and to whomsoever I will I give it. If you therefore will worship me, all will be yours. And Jesus answered and said to him, Get behind me, Satan: for it is written, You shall worship the Lord your God, and him only shall you serve. And he brought him to Jerusalem, and set him on a pinnacle of the temple, and said unto him, If you are the Son of God, cast yourself down from here,....

(See also Matthew 4:1-11)

It is apparent from the text of Luke, as well as that of Matthew, that these gospels narrate that Satan twice tempted Jesus by this means, once taking him on a high mountain to show him the kingdom of the world, and again bringing him to Jerusalem and setting him on a pinnacle of the temple. The eminence upon which the figures stand is a pinnacle, but not the pinnacle of a temple, while on the other hand the ascending roadway, and the doors opening into the pinnacle contradict the theory of its being a natural formation. The fact remains, however, that we are at Jerusalem and that Satan is showing the Jesus the city. It is uncertain whether at this particular time Satan is offering Jesus "all the kingdoms of the world" if Jesus will worship him, or whether he is tempting him to cast himself down from the pinnacle in order to prove that he will be saved by God.

According to the chronicler, Jerusalem was destroyed five times. And, according to other writers, many more. Which of these destructions the artist had in mind is uncertain but the nearest one to the time of Jesus is that which occurred in 70 CE, when the city was besieged by Titus and was totally razed to the ground.

The Fifth Age of the World

Folio LXIII recto

Here begins the Fifth Age of the World, extending from the time when the Jews went into captivity at Babylon, and enduring to the Birth of Christ—a period of 590 years. But some compute the time differently, reckoning the correct time of the Babylonian captivity from the eleventh year of the reign of Zedekiah (Sedechie). According to Eusebius, the seventy years of the captivity ended in the second year of Darius. But Josephus and St. Jerome reckon from the thirteenth year of King Josiah (Josie) to the third year of King Cyrus. Some reckon from the last year of King Jehoiachin (Joachim) to the last year of Cyrus. But, correctly understood, the seventy years which end in the third or last year of Cyrus are really the years of the Jewish captivity; while the period ending with the second year of Darius is in fact the time when the Jews had entirely left the country. According to the calculations of the Holy Scriptures, the Babylonian captivity occurred 4610 years from the beginning of the world; 2369 years from the Flood; 1427 years from the birth of Abraham, and in the twenty-eighth year of the reign of Tarquinius, the Roman king, and while Astyages reigned among the Medes, Europus

Who is king Europus? According to Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology (s.v. Europus, vol. 2, p. 108), Europus was "a son of Macedon and Oreithyia, the daughter of Cecrops, from whom the town of Europus in Macedonia was believed to get its name." Justin's Epitome (7.1) gives us additional context:

Macedonia was formerly caned Emathia, from the name of king Emathion, of whose prowess the earliest proofs are extant in those parts. As the origin of this kingdom was but humble, so its limits were at first extremely narrow. The inhabitants were called Pelasgi, the country Paeonia. But in process of time, when, through the ability of their princes and the exertions of their subjects, they had conquered, first of all, the neighbouring tribes, and afterwards other nations and peoples, their dominions extended to the utmost boundaries of the east. In the region of Paeonia, which is now a portion of Macedonia, is said to have reigned Pelegonus, the father of Asteropaeus, whose name we find, in the Trojan war, among the most distinguished defenders of the city. On the other side a king named Europus held the sovereignty in a district called Europa.

Rev. John Selby Watson, Epitome of the Philippic History of Pompeius Trogus; London, 1853

among the Macedonians, Alyattes (Alyacte) among the Lydians, Vaphre [Called Vaphres by Eusebius, Apries by Jerome, and Hophra by Jeremiah (Jeremiah 44:30)]. among the Egyptians, and Nebuchadnezzar (Nabushodonosor) the First among the Chaldeans.

Here begins the captivity of the Hebrews that occurred with the destruction of Jerusalem and endured for seventy years. As the people of Israel for a long time had practiced idolatry and had spilled the blood of the innocent, God determined to destroy this race, and he ordained that this people should be in Chaldean captivity for seventy years, so that by the expiration of that time a new people, unencumbered with such sins, should go to Jerusalem to rebuild it.

Folio LXIII verso

After the people of Israel returned from Babylonia (Babilone) their leaders were Jeshua (Ihseus) the high priest, who was the head, and Zorubbabel (Zorobabel), who was the prince. This arrangement was adhered to until the time of Herod, the high priests being supreme and the princes being subordinate to them. However, according to the prophecy of Jacob, the princes were selected from the tribe of Judah: The scepter will not be taken from Judah, nor the leader from his thigh. [Genesis 49:10, substituting only the singular for 'thigh' (femore) for the Vulgate's plural (femoribus)]. They came in great numbers to Jerusalem to rebuild the Temple. They gathered together the people of the entire country and built an altar on its former site, and kept the feasts of the tabernacle. He (Jeshua?) began to rebuild the Temple, but he died soon afterwards. [The gathering of the people under Jeshua and Zorobabel after their return from the Babylonian captivity, the erection of the altar, and the festivities in celebration of their homecoming are set forth in Ezra 3:1-11].

Salathiel (Salatiel) (in the Year of the World 4634) [The phrase in the parenthesis is not found in the German edition]. was a son of Jeconiah (Iechonie), king of Judah. He was born to him after the Babylonian captivity, as Matthew the evangelist states. [Shealtiel, also called Salathiel, was the father of Zerubbabel (Ezra 3:2; Neh. 12:1; Hag. 12:1, 12, 14; 2:3, 23). According to Chr. 3:17, Shealtiel was the eldest son of king Jeconiah. According to Matthew and Luke (Matthew 1:12; Luke 3:27), he was one of the ancestors of Jesus].

Joachim (Joachim), the priest, was a son of Jeshua the high priest. As Josephus states he was also called Josedech. Haggai (Aggeo) and Zechariah (Zacharia) prophesied in the time of Zorubbabel, and assisted him in rebuilding the city and the Temple. After the Temple was completed they observed the Passover with countless sacrifices. [Neh. 12:10, 26 and Ezra 5:1].

Zorubbabel (in the Year of the World 4659) [The phrase in the parenthesis is not found in the German edition]. dedicated the Temple according to the commandment of God. Afterwards he was highly regarded by the Jews for a long time; and he was made a prince of the people by King Cyrus. He was the first to bring the Jews out of Chaldea and back into their own land. With the permission of Cyrus he began the erection of the Temple. [Zerubbabel, or Zorobabel, son of Shealtiel, of the royal race of David, held an official position at Babylon and was the leader of the first colony of Jews that returned from the Babylonian captivity in 536 BCE. Cyrus committed to his care the sacred vessels of the Temple, with which he returned to Jerusalem, with valuable gifts of gold and silver, goods and beasts; and with Jeshua the high priest, and perhaps with the prophets Haggai and Zechariah (Ezra 1:11). He had also a royal order for the timber and stones needed for the rebuilding of the Temple. He laid the foundations of the Temple and restored the worship of God with the usual sacrifices. He completed the Temple four years later, restored the courses and maintenance of the priests and Levites, and secured a registration of the returned Jews. The genealogy of both Joseph and Mary is traced to him (Matthew 1:13; Luke 3:27)].

We have nothing from Abiud (in the Year of the World 4709) [The phrase in the parenthesis is not found in the German edition]. and his descendants to the time of Joseph, except what Matthew has recorded. Therefore we are certain of nothing except that Abiud begot Eliakim, who begot Zadoc (Sadoch) &c, as Matthew testifies in the beginning of his gospel. [Matthew 1:13-16].

Haggai (Aggeus) is the eleventh of the prophets, and he wrote his book of prophecies at this time. He recorded the return of the people, the building of the Temple, the renewal of the city, and the laws of the priesthood. He died soon after the Temple was built, and was buried in the graves of the priesthood. [Haggai is one of the minor prophets. He probably accompanied Zerubbabel in the first return of the Jews from Babylon 536 BCE. He prophesied in the second year of Darius Hystaspis (BCE 520), urging his countrymen to resume the building of the Temple, which had been interrupted for about 14 years, and was at last suspended. The Jews became indifferent, and excused themselves from building until the end of the 70 years. Haggai's reproof aroused them for a time, but they soon became despondent, and he was charged with a second message of encouragement].

Malachi (Malachias) the prophet was renowned at this time; and Malachi (which means angel) was the name given him because of his good life; for when he prophesied, the angel of the Lord came and spoke the same words. [Malachi (messenger of Jehovah) was the last of the minor prophets. He probably prophesied about 416 BCE, at a time of great disorder among the priests. He reproves the people for taking strange wives, for inhumanity to their brethren, for divorcing their wives, and for neglect in paying tithes and first fruits. He also inveighed against the priests. Christians believed that he foretold the coming of John the Baptist and the two-fold coming of Jesus].

The Hellespontian (Sibyl) [The Latin edition of the inexplicably leaves out the word 'Sibyl' (found to her left in the woodcut—Sibilla Helespo(n)ti(n)a—and included in the German edition]. was born in the land of Troy. She was clad in old peasant dress, an old veil upon her head, hanging down upon her shoulders. She speaks thus: From the heights of heaven he looked down upon the humble, and in the last days he will be born of a Hebrew virgin and will lie in a cradle.

Folio LXV recto

Nebuchadnezzar was a son of Nebuchadnezzar the Great and was the third king of Chaldea. He obtained the kingdom after the death of his father in the 18th year of the Jewish captivity. He reigned ten years and was of a magnanimous disposition. He was very mighty, and initiated more royal works than his father.

Evil-merodach was a brother of said Nebuchadnezzar, and a son of Nebuchadnezzar the Great. He was the fourth king of Chaldea, and obtained the kingdom in the 28th year of the Jewish captivity, after the death of his brother who died without heirs. And he reigned 18 years. He released Jehoiachin (Joachim) from captivity and afterwards made him mighty. He left three sons. [For previous text and note on Evil-merodach see Folio LXII verso].

Servius Tullius was the sixth Roman king, and he began to reign in the ninth year of the Jewish captivity. He reigned 34 years. Although his mother was a servant, nevertheless he succeeded in acquiring the kingdom. This noble child was brought up by Tanaquil, the housewife of Tarquinius, and by her sage advice came to rule the empire. He levied the first tax in the city. He added three hills, the Quirinal, Viminal, and Esquiline to the city, surrounded them with walls and moats. Later he was murdered by the servants of the haughty Tarquinius, his son-in-law, at the instigation of his own daughter. [Servius Tullius was the sixth king of Rome. His mother, Ocrisia, was one of the captives taken at Corniculum, and became a female slave of Tanaquil, the wife of Tarquinius Priscus. He was born in the king's palace, and notwithstanding his servile origin, was brought up as the king's son, since Tanaquil by her powers of divination had foreseen the greatness of the child; and Tarquinius placed such confidence in him that he gave him his daughter in marriage; and entrusted him with the exercise of the government. His rule was mild and beneficent; and so popular did he become that the sons of Ancus Marcius, fearing that they should be deprived of the throne which they claimed as their inheritance, procured the assassination of Tarquinius. But Tanaquil, pretending that the king's wound was not mortal, told the people the king would recover in a few days, and had commanded Servius to discharge the kingly office in the meantime. Servius immediately began to act as king to the great satisfaction of the people; and when the death of Tarquinius could no longer be concealed, Servius was already in firm possession of the kingly power. His greatest deeds were those of peace, and posterity looked upon him as the author of all its civil rights and institutions. Tradition credits him with a new constitution for the Roman State. He extended the boundaries of the city to include the Quirinal, Viminal and Esquiline hills. He established an important alliance with the Latins, by which Rome and the cities of Latium became the members of one great league. By his new constitution, which gave the plebs political independence, Servius incurred the hostility of the patricians, who conspired with L. Tarquinius to deprive him of his life and of his throne. His death was the subject of a legend: Servius soon after his succession gave his two daughters in marriage to the two sons of Tarquinius Priscus. L. Tarquinius, the elder, was married to a quiet and gentle wife; Aruns, the younger, to an aspiring and ambitious woman. The character of the two brothers was the very opposite of the two wives who had fallen to their lot; for Lucius was proud and haughty, but Aruns unambitious and quiet. The wife of Aruns, feeling that her husband would tamely resign the sovereignty, resolved to destroy both her father and husband. She persuaded Lucius to murder his own wife, and she murdered her own husband; and the survivors straightway married. Tullia now urged her husband to murder her father; and it is said that their design was hastened by the belief that Servius entertained the thought of laying down his kingly power, and establishing the consular form of government. The patricians were equally alarmed at this scheme; and when the conspiracy was ripe, Tarquinius entered the forum arrayed in the kingly robes, seated himself in the royal chair of the senate-house, and ordered the senators to be summoned to him as their king. At the first news of the commotion, Servius hastened to the senate-house and, standing in the doorway, ordered Tarquinius to come down from the throne. Tarquinius sprang forward, seized the old man, and flung him down the stone steps. Covered with blood, the king tried to hasten home; but before he reached it he was overtaken by the servants of Tarquinius, and murdered. Tullia drove to the senate-house and greeted her husband as king; but her transports of joy struck him with horror. He ordered her to go home, and as she was returning, her charioteer pulled up and pointed out the corpse of her father lying in his blood across the road. She commanded him to drive on; and the blood of her father spurted over the carriage and on her dress; and from that day forward the street bore the name Vicus Sceleratus, or Wicked Street. The body lay unburied, for Tarquinius said scoffingly, "Romulus too went without burial;" and this impious mockery is said to have given rise to the surname of Superbus ('The Proud' or 'Haughty'). Servius reigned forty-four years. His memory was long cherished by the plebians].

Tarquinius, a son of Tarquinius Priscus, and a son-in-law of Servius Tullius, was haughty and ambitious to rule. In the 44th year of the Jewish captivity, after the death of his father-in-law, he was made a Roman king; and he reigned 35 years. He undertook to usurp the kingdom of Servius, his ancestor, by force rather than abide his time, and caused to be slain the foremost of the city, who were related to his father-in-law, together with the son of Tarquinia, his sister. And he committed many other tyrannies. This arrogance of the king the Roman people endured to the very end of his insolence, yet did not take the kingdom away from his heirs. He was the one who dishonored the beautiful Lucretia, in consequence of which she stabbed herself. On that account the kingdom did away with kings. He was finally driven out of the kingdom and murdered by Porsemia. [L. Tarquinius Superbus commenced his reign without any of the forms of election. He promptly abolished the rights conferred on the plebians by Servius. At the same time senators and patricians whom he mistrusted, or whose wealth he coveted, were put to death or driven into exile. He surrounded himself with a bodyguard, by means of which he was able to do as he pleased. His cruelty and tyranny obtained for him the name Superbus. Yet he raised Rome to great influence and power. It became the head of the Latin confederacy. In the midst of his prosperity Tarquinius fell from power through a shameful deed of one of his sons. Tarquinius and his sons were besieging Ardea, a city of the Rutulians. Here, as the sons and their cousin Tarquinius Collatinus, the son of Egerius, were feasting together, a dispute arose about the virtue of their wives. As there was no activity in the field, they mounted their horses to visit their homes by surprise. They first went to Rome where they surprised the king's daughters at a splendid banquet. They then hastened to Collatia, and there, though it was late in the night, they found Lucretia, the wife of Collatinus, spinning amid her handmaids. The beauty and virtue of Lucretia fired the evil passions of Sextus. A few days later he returned to Collatia, where he was hospitably received by Lucretia and her husband's kinsmen. In the dead of the night he entered her chamber with a drawn sword; by threatening to lay a slave with his throat cut beside her, whom he would pretend to have killed in order to avenge her husband's honor, he forced her to yield to his wishes. As soon as he departed, she sent for her husband and father. They found her in agony and sorrow. She asked them to avenge her dishonor; then she stabbed herself to death. They carried the corpse to Rome, and all classes were inflamed. The king and his family were banished from the city. War followed, some siding with the tyrant, others opposing him. His sons were slain, his allies defeated, and according to tradition Tarquinius fled to Aristobolus at Cumae, where he died a wretched and lonely death].

Belshazzar (Balthasar), son of Evil-merodach, king of Chaldea, began to reign after his father; and he reigned 17 years. In the first year of his reign Daniel the prophet had his fourth vision. After that Belshazzar was taken prisoner, the city was surrendered to Cyrus the king of Persia, and razed to the ground, so that no sign of it remains. Cambyses, son of Cyrus, built the city that now exists, in another place. [Belshazzar was the last king of Babylon. During the siege of the city he gave a sumptuous entertainment to his courtiers, impiously making use of the Temple furnishings (of which Nebuchadnezzar had plundered the Temple of Jerusalem) as drinking vessels. In the midst of the festivities, to the terror of the king, a light miraculously appeared, writing on the wall the words Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin. Daniel explained the mystery as presaging the king's death and the kingdom's overthrow, which took place in the course of the succeeding night, when Darius the Mede captured the city (Dan. 5:25-31)].

Babylon, the great city, was captured and deprived of its power—a city which was the first and greatest of the world; it is not only hard to believe that it was built by human hands, but equally so that it was destroyed by them. The destruction was accomplished by Darius and Cyrus, the first kings of Persia.

1. Nebuchadnezzar (Nabuchodonosor) II.
2. Evil-merodach.
3. Regusar (Ragusar).
4. Sabadardacus.
5. Belshazzar (Balthasar), the last king of the Chaldeans at Babylon, who ruled jointly with his father when Babylon was besieged by Cyrus in 538 BCE. It was he who saw the handwriting on the wall, which was interpreted by Daniel.

1. Servius Tullius.
2. Tarquinius (Lucius).

(C) DESTRUCTION OF BABYLON

Destruction of Babylon, a woodcut 4¼" x 6-1/8". This catastrophe is certainly not the work of Darius or Cyrus. A whole city is falling on its side and sinking into the ground. There is not a soul about—no human agency in action, no besieged and no besiegers. Nor can we believe this to be the wicked city of the Chaldeans, destroyed by the Persians more than five centuries before the Christian era. Christian churches with architecture, Roman and Gothic, built centuries later, are going down in the cataclysm. The walls of Babylon with their medieval turrets are almost completely sunk into the ground. The woodcut would have served better for an earthquake at Nuremberg than the destruction of Babylon.

Folio LXV verso

At this time, as Orosius says, the night was almost converted into day; and a hail of very hard stones rained down from the clouds.

Here begin the weeks of Daniel (as Bede notes), concerning which scholars have had great controversies and misunderstandings among themselves.

When in the sixth year of Darius the Temple of the Lord was completed, Joiakim (Joachim), the high priest, together with the other priests, praised God by the blowing of trumpets and high festivities.

THE TEMPLE OF SOLOMON WAS COMPLETED IN THE 7th YEAR OF DARIUS, THE KING OF PERSIA.

Eliashib (Elizaphat), a high priest of the Hebrews, came to this honorable office, as Eusebius says, after his father Joiakim; and he held it for 32 years. He is deserving of much praise, for by his wisdom he obtained from Artaxerxes the Persian king, for the servants of the church, freedom from tax and tribute, and the power to change the judges.

Eliakim (Eliachim), in the Year of the World 4759. [This statement does not occur in the German edition].

Joiada (Judas), the fourth high priest, lived in the time of Mordecai, and to him he wrote letters from the city of Susa (Susis) in Persia concerning the good luck attending certain days. He was a man of great learning and piety, but he met much opposition.

Jonathan (Iohannes), son of Joiada the high priest, and fifth high priest of the Hebrews, had a brother named Jesus (Iesus), who coveted the office of high priest; and in that he was encouraged by Vagosus, a prefect beyond the seas, to whom he was specially related. He drew his brother into an argument, and enticing him into the Temple, killed him. As a result of which Vagosus carried away the treasures of the Temple. [Jeshua begat Joiakim, who begat Eliashib, who begat Joiada, who begat Jonathan, who begat Jaddus (Neh. 12:10-11)].

Azor, in the Year of the World 4809. [This statement does not occur in the German edition].

Of this Sadoc (Sadoch; referring to the portrait opposite) (in the Year of the World 4859) [The phrase in the parenthesis does not occur in the German edition]. we know nothing except what Matthew has mentioned of him in the genealogy of Christ, in his first chapter. []

Jeremiah (Hieremias) prophesied for the last time in Egypt; and as he there admonished the people for their sins he was stoned at Tahpanhes (Taphnas) and was buried at the same place. This is where the Pharaoh lived for a time. [This is a repetition of a portion of the text as found at Folio LV verso].

Ezekiel (Ezechiel), the prophet, having admonished certain people, and by doing making them angry against him, was dragged by horses over the stones until his brains fell out. He was buried in the grave of Shem, the son of Noah, and of Arphaxad (Arphaxat) his (Shem's) son. [A variation of the theme at Folio LXI verso].

Zecharias (Zacharias) and Haggai (Aggeus), in the second year of Darius, upbraided the people because they were too lax in the rebuilding of the Temple; and they admonished Zorobabel (Sorobabel), and in consequence he spoke to the king, who gave his assent to the work. And the people were aroused to complete the Temple. After many good works and the completion of the Temple, Zecharias died; and he was buried beside Haggai, the prophet.

Lucretia (Lucrecia) was a Roman matron, and above all women chaste, beautiful, elegant, and famous. She was the wife of Collatinus, and killed herself because her chastity was violated by Sextus Tarquinius, son of the haughty Tarquinius. Therefore Tarquinius was driven out; and so ended the Roman line of kings—seven in number, who reigned over a period of 240 years. [The seven Roman kings were Romulus, Numa Pompilius, Tullius Hostilius, Ancus Martius, Tarquinius Priscus, Servius Tullius, and Lucius Tarquinius (Folios LVI recto and verso, and LXV recto)].

1. Eliashib (here called Elizaphat), son of Joiakim.
2. Joida (Joiade, or Judas).
3. Jonathan (Johannes), son of Joiada.

(B) LINEAGE OF CHRIST

The Lineage of Christ is here continued from Folio LXIV verso:

1. Solomon's Temple (Templum Salomonis), a small woodcut, is injected into the genealogic panel without explanation. It represents a circular structure with a low dome, and is approached by a grand staircase. In addition to this there are several small structures in the nature of entries or forehalls to the Temple. The main building is crowned by a tri-lobed object resembling a fully developed tomato.
2. Eliakim (Eliachim), son of Abiud, Folio LXIV verso.
3. Azor, son of Eliakim.
4. Sadoc (Sadoch), son of Azor.

(C) JEREMIAH, EZEKIAL AND ZECHARIAS

Jeremiah (Hieremias), Ezekiel (Ezechiel) and Zechariah (Zacharias) are each represented by a very small woodcut. The portraits are commonplace, though the German edition, as it does in so many of these cases, replaces all three with different portraits.

(D) LUCRETIA

Lucretia is honored by a distinctive portrait, hardly adaptable to any other subject. Headdress and gown are strictly medieval. With her right hand she firmly holds a sword, proportionately at least thirty inches long, which she has plunged into her body, just below the waist line, and it has come out of her back, the point of the sword being as high as the top of her head. Throughout her suicide she retains the elegantia that the Chronicle ascribes to her.

Folio LXVI recto

OF THE BUILDING OF THE TEMPLE

A number of enlightened men have written upon the beauty and mighty architecture of the Temple and its ground plans; and particularly so was the divine prophet Ezekiel; for in the twenty-fifth year of the Babylonian captivity, which was also the thirty-third year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, in the beginning of the year, on the tenth day of which, the hand of the Lord was upon Ezekiel. And a spirit took him up on a high mountain in the land of Israel, and indicated to him the construction of this city on a mount, and of the Temple.

The Vision of the Temple, given in the last nine chapters of Ezekiel, is, as its title makes clear, a vision and description of the new temple which Ezekiel saw from a high mountain in the 25th year of the Captivity and the 14th after the destruction of the holy city. Although a few commentators maintain it was but a description from memory of Solomon's Temple, the majority hold that it has to do with future events. These latter differ according as they see in it a mere prophetic picture of Zerubbabel's Temple, or a vague announcement of some future blessing, or some kind of Messianic prophecy. Its historical foundation is undoubtedly the first Temple and the hidden springs of the sacred mount, but upon this foundation the writer builds a superstructure of allegory (at least that is the way it was read by late Christians).

As some authorities observe, the description of the new Jerusalem and its temple is not to be taken literally. It is but a visionary city and temple that are here dealt with. And although the vision remained a dream, it seems to have had its influence on the plan of the actual Temple of the future. This is to be noted in the emphasis laid throughout on the sacrosanct character of the sanctuary. The whole sacred area covered by the Temple and its courts is to be protected from contact with secular buildings. How the vision came about is thus set forth in the Book of Ezekiel 40:1-5:

In the five and twentieth year of our captivity, in the beginning of the year, in the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth year after that the city was struck, in the selfsame day the hand of the Lord was upon me, and brought me to there. In visions God brought me into the land of Israel, and set me upon a very high mountain, by which was as the frame of a city on the south. And he brought me there, and behold, there was man, whose appearance was like the appearance of brass, with a line of flax in his hand, and a measuring reed; and he stood in the gate. And the man said to me, Son of man, behold with your eyes and hear with your ears, and set your heart upon all that I shall show you. . . . Declare all you see to the house of Israel.

And since his vision of the city on the mount and of the Temple as shown him by the spirit is somewhat vague and obscure, we have been obliged to amplify it to some extent by illustrations. Although certain teachers have looked upon this as a vision of the spiritual temple of Christ and of the Church, yet Victor has interpreted it as a material temple, which, according to the ancient Hebrews, was built by Zerubbabel (Zorobabel) and Nehemiah (Neemias) in conformity with Ezekiel's vision, on the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity. Although some hold a contrary view, the more modern Hebrews asserts that this vision will be fulfilled in the future Messiah, who will rule with power. So we will show the Temple by illustrations and but a small amount of text.

VISIONARY TEMPLE OF EZEKIEL

'The First Figure of the Temple Edifice as Shown to Ezekiel over the Mountain' (Prima figura edificii templi ostensa Ezechieli super montem). This is a very simple drawing consisting of three squares, one within the other, and representing the inner, middle and outer walls of the Temple, the three spaces within each square being respectively designated as follows:

1. Locus vulgi in hoc spatio per circuitum; or 'the place of the multitude, which is in this surrounding space.'
2. Atrium exterius in hoc spatio per circuitum; or 'outer court which is in this surrounding space.'
3. Atrium interius; or 'inner court.'

(B) THE SECOND FIGURE TO FACILITATE UNDERSTANDING

'The Second Figure, to Facilitate Understanding' (Secunda figura ad facilius capiendum), consists of a design similar in general outline to the first illustration, but to it are added the following details:

1. The directions in which the walls face, namely, East (Oriens), North (Aquilo), West (Occidens), and South (Auster), are given in Latin. It will be noted in this and succeeding designs that North appears on our right, South on our left; East is at the lower margin of the design, West at the upper.
2. The gates are shown as at right angles they pass through the middle of the three walls in succession on all sides except the West (Occidens), which has no gate. The three sets of gates are thus indicated:
 1. Tres portae orientales, or 'three eastern gates';
 2. Tres portae aquilonares, or 'three northern gates';
 3. Tres portae australes, or 'three southern gates'.

(C) THE SUCCEEDING TWO FIGURES REPRESENT THE ORNAMENTATION OF THE GATE

'The Succeeding Two Figures Represent the Ornamentation of the Gate' (Sequentes duae figurae ornatum portae repraesentant) is respectively the ground plan and front elevation of the East Gate:

1. The Ground Plan, entitled Figura repraesentans situm portae orientalis, porticus &c ut in glosa. Et idem intelligendum de aliis duabus portis eiusdem muri qui sunt similes ('Figure representing the location of the East Gate, the porch, etc, as in the caption.

The same must be understood concerning the other two gates of the same wall, which are similar'), begins at the lower end of the illustration, where we find ourselves on the outside of the 'East side of the outer wall' (Latus orientale muri exterioris). Through this we pass by the 'East Gate of the outer wall' (Porta orientalis muri exterioris), into an open space marked Oriens ('East'), and here we find ourselves at the entrance of a 'forecourt' (Vestibulum), on either side of which are 'three little chambers' (Tres thalami). Having gained access to the porch or forecourt, we pass through the 'East Gate of the middle wall' (Porta orientalis muri medii). On either side of this gate are circles, inscribed to indicate that here is the façade, front or brow (Situs frontis) of the gate. Beyond this is the 'Porch of the East Gate of the outer court against the middle wall' (Porticus portae orientalis atrii exterioris muri medii).

2. The Front Elevation of the East Gate is represented by a drawing entitled Aspectus altitudinis portae orientalis atrii exterioris, et idem intelligendum de aliis duabus ('Front elevation of the East Gate of the outer court, and the same must be understood concerning the other two'). At the lower end of this elevation we find the outer wall, and behind it, on either side a small house with tiled roof, no doubt intended to represent the three little chambers mentioned by Ezekiel and shown in the ground plan opposite. A medieval door with ornamental hinges admits us through the middle wall, above which are chambers which are designated:
 1. Mansio superior portae orientalis, altitudinis XXV cubitorum ('Upper abode of the East Gate, 25 cubits in height'); and
 2. Mansio inferior altitudinis XXV cubitorum ('Lower abode, 25 cubits in height'). On either side of these chambers is a circular turret, also two stories in height, with crenellated crown and cone-shaped roof, on the apex of which is a knob out of which proceed three palm branches. Ezekiel makes no mention of turrets, unless the word "posts" is to be so interpreted. He states that "upon each post were palm trees" (40:16, 22, 26, 37). Upon each of these turrets is the inscription, Frons portae altitudinis L cubitorum ('Front of the gate, 50 cubits in height'). The author explains that in speaking of the gate of the castle these turrets are called the frons ('front' or 'forehead') (Folio LXVII recto). Schedel and his woodcutters have attempted to work out this visionary temple of Ezekiel in terms of medieval architecture, and in doing so they have added many details, both in text and by way of illustrations, which were not envisaged by the prophet. Compare with Ezekiel 40-48.

Folio LXVI verso

ILLUSTRATIONS

VISIONARY TEMPLE OF EZEKIEL

These illustrations occupy all of Folio LXVI verso, without text except as noted on the illustrations themselves, which appear in the following order:

(D) GROUND PLAN OF THE POSTERIOR GATE

The first illustration covers the full width of the page and about one-fourth of its depth. It has no title itself, though a title for the entire page is given in the illustration of the elevation below it. There, the two lines of text, with two straight lines above and below the words, reads: Figura posterioris partis edificii templi secundum lineas fundamentales Ezechielis XII ('Figure of the rear part of the Temple edifice according to the groundplan measurements, Ezekiel 12'). This Biblical reference has no application to the subject in hand. True, chapter 12 treats of a vision of the prophet, in the course of which Ezekiel was informed that "the cities that are inhabited shall be laid waste, and the land shall be desolate." (Ezekiel 12:20); while the Temple vision is covered by chapters 40-48. The cardinal points as given in this illustration are: Auster (South), found on the left; Aquilo (North), on the right; Occidens (West), found at the top of the plan, and Oriens (East), at the bottom. The drawing shows the following details:

1. The Walls:
 1. Outer Wall: Murus exterior australis ('Outer wall to the south'); Murus exterior occidentalis ('Outer wall to the west'); and Murus Aquilonaris exterior ('Outer wall to the north'). All these designations refer to the same wall, of which only that portion is shown which confines the rear structures of what we may call a Temple city.
 2. Middle Wall: Murus medius australis ('Middle wall to the south'); Murus medius occidentalis ('Middle wall to the west'); and Murus Medius aquilonaris ('Middle wall to the north'). What has been observed with reference to the Outer Wall is also true here.
 3. Wall of the Outer Court: Murus atrii exterioris ('Wall of the Outer Court'), the inscription found at the foot of the plan, refers to a wall which is not to be confused with the outer and middle walls above referred to. It is the wall which divides the portion of the Temple here shown from that lying below it (See complete plan, Folio LXVII verso). The passage through this wall really connects with a chamber one hundred cubits square, not here shown, which contains the Altar of the Burnt Offerings. And so, through this passage we proceed upward (actually westward), to inspect the rear of the Temple structure, remembering that the word "temple" includes a number of buildings in the manner of a city.
2. The Promenade: Deambulatorium, longitudinis C cubitores, latitudinis X ('Promenade, length 100 cubits, width 10'). Immediately before us is the Temple proper.
3. The Temple: We enter through the Porticus (porch), to either side of which are circular structures, round towers, designated as coclea. From the porch we enter the Sanctum, and from thence we proceed to the Sanctum Sanctorum, or Holy of the Holies, which none but the high priest might enter, and he only once a year, on the day of solemn expiation. So by way of the Sanctum and porch we leave these inner chambers to examine the Temple exterior. All about it on three sides, south, west, and north, are a number of small chambers, twenty-four, according to count, which connect with one another in the interior, but to which, according to the plan, there is no access from either sanctum, or from the outside. The text does not enlighten us on this point, nor does Ezekiel give us any description of these twenty-four chambers. In a long court to the left of the Temple structure and its accompanying little chambers, we find the inscriptions Longitudo edificii centum cubitorum ('Length of the edifice 100 cubits'), and Appenditia templi australia ('Appendages to the Temple on the south'). On the right, in a similar elongated court, are the inscriptions Appenditia templi aquilonaris ('Appendages to the Temple on the north'); the second being the words Longitudo centum cubitorum ('Length 100 cubits'). Above the structure (west) are the words Appenditia templi occidentalis ('Appendages to the Temple, on the west'). In this latter case the dimension is not given. No doubt the small chambers, in series, constitute the "appendages" or wings, about the Temple structure, to which these inscriptions refer; for there is no such inscription at the Temple front where we enter, and where of course there are no such chambers.

4. Outbuildings: The chronicler states that there were two other buildings, each 100 cubits in length and 50 cubits in width, one of the south (left), the other to the north (right), and each 20 cubits removed from the Temple itself (Folio LXVII recto). What their use was we do not know. Each building has two large chambers with an outside entrance but no communicating doors. We consider first the structure to the left (or south) of the Temple proper: It is inscribed Latitudo L cubitorum ('breadth fifty cubits'). The chamber immediately before us (east) contains the words Pars orientalis edificii australis ('East part of the edifice to the south'); while the adjoining chamber is inscribed Pars posterior edificii australia ('Rear part of the edifice to the south'). Let us next consider the structure to the right (north): the chamber immediately before us (east) is inscribed Pars orientalis edificii aquilonaris ('East part of the edifice to the north'); while the adjoining chamber is entitled Pars posterior edificii aquilonaris ('Rear part of the edifice to the north'). Over the breadth of this building are the words Longitudo L cubitorum ('Length fifty cubits'), which should have read Latitudo L cubitorum ('Breadth fifty cubits').

(E) ELEVATION OF THE EAST GATE AND APPENDAGES

Elevation of the East Gate and Appendages. Immediately below the ground plan of the rear portion of the Temple structure (Folio LXVI verso) is the Aspectus altitudinis templi portae orientalis et appenditorum secundum ipsum Ezechielem XII ('Elevation of the east gate of the Temple, and its appendages, according to Ezekiel XII itself'). The illustration portrays a medieval structure, the general features of which give the impression of a castle, or other fortified place; but the windows and doors are purely gothic, even to the extent of stained glass and a rose window above the door. The structure is three stories in height and flanked on either side by towers of the same altitude, designated coclea. The walls are crenellated, and the roofs of the towers cone-shaped; but the palm branches are omitted. The stories of the structure are inscribed:

1. Mansio templi inferior habens XL cubitos altitudinis. ('Lower abode of the Temple, having an altitude of 40 cubits').
2. Mansio media templi habens XL cubitos in altitudine. ('Middle abode of the Temple which has a height of 40 cubits').
3. Mansio templi superior habens 40 cubitos altitudinis. ('Upper abode of the Temple which has a height of 40 cubits').

To the left of this imposing façade, and apparently but not actually leaning against the same, is a miniature three-story appendage or wing, beside which we find this inscription: Haec appendentia stant retro coclea sed qui non possunt sic depingi. Ideo hic posita sunt ('These appendages stand behind the tower, but they are not able to be depicted thus. Therefore they are placed here').

(F) ELEVATION OF THE NORTH EDIFICE

Elevation of the North Edifice. To the right of the foregoing, being the lower right hand corner of the page is a small three-story structure with crenellated walls but no towers. It is entitled Aspectus edificii aquilonaris secundum altitudinem et longitudinem secundum Ezech. XII. Et simile edificium debet imaginari situatum esse in parte australi templi ('Elevation of the north edifice according to its height and length, according to Ezekiel XII. And a similar edifice should be imagined to have been situated on the south part of the Temple'). All this undoubtedly refers to the outbuildings on either side of the Temple itself, and which are shown on the ground plan of the rear portion of the Temple properties (Folio LXI verso, first illustration).

Folio LXVII recto

When the Jews were taken into captivity at Babylon with Jehoiachin (Joachim) king of Judah, the divine prophet Ezekiel, together with Mordecai (Mordecheo), was also taken there. In the eleventh year of Zedekiah, Jerusalem and the Temple were destroyed. Fourteen years later, Ezekiel had his vision of the future. The Temple, as the illustrations show, was made up of various houses, like a city. Its walls were fortified like those of a city. The mount on which the city was built was lower in the south than in the north. And the angel stood in the gate of the outer wall, and spoke; and he measured with a rod larger than an ordinary one. One side of the Temple faced east, another west; one north, the other south. In all there were three walls—inner, middle and outer. The space between the middle and inner walls was called the outer forecourt; and the space between the middle and outer walls was a place for the common people; for pagans also came to worship there. The whole square structure was built in part on level ground and in part on the slope of the mount. No distinction is here made in the illustration between elevated and level ground, but both are shown as one view. To clarify the matter, the first illustration is given.

In the middle of the outer wall to the east was an opening ten cubits wide; likewise in the second and third walls; and these gates faced each other. In the sides of the walls facing to the north and to the south were similar gates, as the second illustration shows.

Because of the slope of the mount, the east gate had steps; and so the common people of the city were obliged to ascend seven steps to the gate. The court before the opening in the middle wall had a width of five cubits from east to west, and a length of fifteen from north to south; and it also had a fore-structure at the opening of the middle wall, and it led from a part of the inner wall, over the middle, into the forecourt outside, eight cubits. And the height of the fore-structure was fifty cubits, measured from the ground. Beside the two small rear doors of the gate are two towers to adorn the entrance, which in case of the gates of a castle are called the foreheads (frontes). The towers are sixty cubits high and at their apex are carved knobs and palm leaves. Before those towers were six chambers. These details are illustrated by two drawings: The first, according to scale, shows the position of the gate, forecourt, chambers and front; the second, the elevation of the forecourt and the front of the east gate. The superstructure over the gate has two chambers, one above, the other below, with narrow windows. Behind the gate of the second wall, between the middle and the third wall, was a paved court, about which were thirty treasure chambers; ten to the south side, and containing one hundred cubits; four in part of the outer court, and four at another end of the same gate, and these, together with the gate, also contained one hundred cubits. The other two were at the chambers of the gate, against the east side of the inner court, one on either side. These, together with the chambers, contained one hundred cubits. To distinguish between the chambers and treasure chambers, the latter were red. [Ezekiel 40:6-19]. The gates to the north and south were like the east gate; and the appearance of the gates and forecourts was also similar to the inner and outer walls. Ingress to the front of the structure was by various gates. There they washed the tables of flesh to be used in the sin offering. Beside this were two walls, on either side of the entrance; and before these, in the fore-structure or forecourt, were two columns as in Solomon's Temple. However, the length of the walls of the Temple was one hundred cubits, the height one hundred twenty; the width within the walls, twenty cubits. The two walls contained twelve cubits; the pillars along the walls, ten cubits; the width of those before these, eight cubits; and the wall there about had ten cubits. Altogether, according to computation, this gives seventy cubits, as Ezekiel shows. After this, on the inside, was the Sanctum Sanctorum (Holy of Holies). The other part, on the inside, was called the Temple, as in the tabernacle of Moses the outer part was called the tabernacle. The wall, which was not very high and did not support upper chambers, divided the Sanctum and Sanctum Sanctorum. The length was twenty cubits. There were also six apses on the outside of the Temple toward the east. Also on the north side, which is much longer. Likewise toward the south, which has the same length, there were thirty apses. To the east there were none, for here was the entrance to the Temple. There were also columns outside the walls, as in other buildings, three toward the west, two on the ends, and one in the middle; and they were five cubits distant. They had holes in three ends, one above the other, wherein drains were laid, as prescribed. The first was six cubits from the ground, and likewise distant, one from the other; and so in the elevation of the walls of the Temple there were eighteen cubits. The lower chamber of the Temple to the first tabernacle was (as in the Temple of Solomon) thirty cubits; and so the light might come through the windows without hindrance, there remained ten cubits. Beside the Temple, to the north and to the south, were two buildings twenty cubits from the Temple walls. They were one hundred cubits in length and fifty in breadth. To make these matters understood, three drawings are given: The first shows the rear, according to ground plan; the second shows the front elevation; the third shows the elevations of the buildings to the north and south, which are alike. The altar was made in sections; the first, on the ground, called the foundation, was one cubit in height; the second, recessed by one cubit, was two cubits high and was called the small hole; the third, also recessed, was four cubits, and was called the great hole; the fourth, also four cubits high, was called Ariel (Arieb). So the height of the altar from the ground was eleven cubits. Water flowed as from three live springs from the Sanctum Sanctorum down through the Temple, slightly to the right; and from there down to the forecourt of the Temple, and then to the inner forecourt from west to east. Some say that the waters, before they flowed to the forecourt, were externally divided into four branches, and thereafter, as one stream, came from the inner walls of the east gate. Some disregard this theory. And so were completed the structure and appurtenances of the Temple. Now follows one illustration of the whole structure, which has already been shown in sections, according to the ground plan of all these things.

(G) Consolidated Ground Plan of the Temple Structures.

Covering all of Folio LXVII verso is a consolidated ground plan of the Temple and all its appurtenant structures. The marginal directions are indicated in the usual manner: At the foot of the drawing is Oriens ('East'); at the top is Occidens ('West'); to the left, Auster ('South'), and to the right, Aquilo ('North').

1. The Three Walls

○ Outer Wall:

1. At the top of the plan (West): Murus exterior in circuitum habens in quolibet laterum quingentos calamos ('Exterior wall roundabout, having on each of its side's fifty calamos' [Calamos are reeds. The Hebrew reed is supposed to have been about eleven feet long].).
2. At the foot of the plan (East): Latus orientale muri exterioris ('East side of the outer wall').
3. To the right (North): Latus aquilonare muri exterioris ('North side of the outer wall').
4. To the left (South): Latus australi muri exterioris ('South side of the outer wall').

○ Middle Wall:

1. The middle wall has but one inscription, found at the head of the plan: Murus medio cuius determinato quantitas in circuitum quattuor laterae est incerta ('Middle wall, the extent of whose boundary roundabout, on its four sides, is uncertain').

- Inner Wall:

1. And so the inner wall has but one inscription: Murus interior in circuitum cingens atrium ('Inner wall which girds the courtyard roundabout').

2. Gates and Outer Courts

The Temple grounds face east, as indicated at the foot of the plan. The three walls, outer, middle and inner, each have gates to the east, north and south, which are in direct line with one another. There are no openings in outer or middle wall to the west, although there seems to be a west gate leading from the rear of the inner court in the direction of the Temple proper.

The gates through the outer wall all bear the same inscription, Porta muri exterioris ('Gate of the outer wall').

The gates through the middle wall, leading to a tiled court or pavement in each case, are designated on the left and right sides of the drawing as Porta atrii exterioris ('Gate to the outer court'). This inscription is omitted in case of the East gate because the line of direction which runs through that gate occupies the place where such inscription would have to appear. The paved courts are called "outer" because they are to the outer side of the great central court in which the altar is located. The gates through the middle and inner walls are indicated to have been of the same construction, with one minor exception which will be noted presently. In case of the middle wall, we approach each gate through a vestibule (Vestibulum), on either side of which are three small chambers (Tres thalami). On either side of the gate itself is a circular tower or turret, which are designated by the word frons, meaning 'front', 'forehead', or 'brow' of the gate; for, as the chronicler reminds us in the text, these turrets or towers, in technical phrase, are called the forehead in case of a castle. As we leave the outer vestibule and pass through the gate of the middle wall we find ourselves on a porch (Porticus). And as we stand on this porch, inside the middle wall, there lies before us, whether we have entered by the east, north or south, a paved area or outer court. These outer courts are respectively inscribed as follows:

- Pavimentum orientale ('East Pavement')
- Pavimentum australe ('South Pavement')
- Pavimentum aquilonare ('North Pavement')

3. Inner Court and Its Gates

In the center of the plan and girded by the inner wall we find the Atrium interius centum cubitorum in quadrato ('Inner court which is one hundred cubits on each of four sides'). There are four gates, including the rear passage to the Temple itself and which is really not a gate. The gates proper that lead into the inner court from the three outer pavements on the east, north and south, are similar in construction and detail to the gates through the middle wall. As we leave the pavement and approach the inner court we come upon a vestibule (vestibulum), and before we pass through the inner wall we proceed to a porch (porticus), to either side of which are three small chambers (Tres or 3 thalami). Note that the porch in this instance is on the outside of the wall while in case of the middle wall the porch was on the inside and the vestibule on the outside. The gates through the inner wall, from the right and the left, are designated as Porta atrii interioris ('Gate of the inner court'). These words do not appear on the east gate, probably for lack of room.

The principal piece of furniture in this inner court was the 'Altar of the Burnt Offering' (Altare holocausti).

4. Smaller Courts and Chambers

1. In each of the four corners of the middle wall a small court (Atrium) is indicated. For what it was used is not mentioned in the text nor by the prophet.
2. According to Ezekiel, the man "whose appearance was like the appearance of brass, with a line of flax in his hand, and a measuring reed" took him to the east gate of the grounds, and having entered, he brought him "into the outward court, and lo, there were chambers, and a pavement made for the court round about: thirty chambers were upon the pavement." (Ezekiel 40:17) And so on either side of the East Pavement or court we find a series of 'fifteen treasure chambers' (Gazophilatia quindecim).
3. "And without the inner gate was the chambers of the singers in the inner court, which was at the side of the north gate; and their prospect was toward the south: One at the side of the east gate having the prospect toward the north." (Ezekiel 40:44) And so we find indicated on the ground plan, in the lower right hand corner (north east corner) of the central or inner court two small chambers entitled Gazophilatia cantorum ('Chambers of the Singers').

"And he said to me, This chamber whose prospect is toward the south is for the priests, the keepers of the charge of the house." (Ezekiel 40:45) And so we find also indicated in the central or inner court, in the lower left hand (southeast) corner of it an apartment entitled Gazophilatia latium sacerdotum minorum ('Side chamber for the lesser priests').

"And the chamber whose prospect is toward the north is for the priests, the keepers of the charge of the altar: these are the sons of Zadok among the sons of Levi, which come near to the Lord to minister unto him." (Ezekiel 40:46) This chamber is indicated in the upper right hand corner of the inner court in close proximity to the altar, and is entitled Gazophilatia filiorum Sadoch ('Chamber for the sons of Zadok').

5. The Temple

Three chapters of Ezekiel (41-43) are devoted to a description of the Temple proper, and in connection with the illustrations on the verso of Folio LXVI we have already described the rear portion of the consolidated plan, which was there given separately. If we follow the irregular line on the consolidated plan which begins at the east or lower portion of it, we find ourselves passing through the gate of the outer wall, the vestibule gate and porch of the inner wall, over the pavement of the outer court in the east, through the vestibule, porch and inner wall, through the inner court, and as we veer slightly to the left we pass the altar, make our exit through the rear door of the inner court and find ourselves on the promenade before the porch of the Temple proper. And so we proceed through the Sanctum, and do not find ourselves halted until we reach the door of the Sanctum Sanctorum. And here our journey ends.

The irregular line beginning at the Sanctum Sanctorum probably represents the stream of water flowing through the precincts of the Temple, and out of the East Gate of the outer wall.

Folio LXVIII recto

Verona or Bern, the beautiful and picturesque city of the Venetians, lying against the mountains (as Justinus [Justinus = Justin. See note to Folio XLVIII verso]., quoting Trogus Pompeius, says) was, with Milan (Mediolanum), Brescia (Brixia) [Brixia, the modern Brescia, was originally a town in Gallia Cisalpina on the road from Comum to Aquileia, through which the river Mella flowed. It submitted to the Romans in 225 BCE, and in 27 BCE Augustus founded a civil colony here. It was plundered by Attila in 425 CE, but became the seat of a duchy in the Lombard period. In 1258, it fell into the hands of Eccelino of Verona and belonged to the Scaligers (della Scala) until 1421, when it came under the Visconti of Milan and in 1426 under the dominion of Venice]. and Bergomum, [Bergamo, anciently Bergomum, was originally the tribal center of the Orobii in Gallia Cisalpina, between Comum and Brixia. It is located at the foot of the alps northeast of Milan. After destruction by Attila, it became the capital of a Lombard duchy. From 1264 to 1428 it was under Milan, but then became Venetian, and so it remained until 1797]. built by the Gauls, who were conquered by the Romans; although some, including Siccardo of Cremona, says that it was built earlier, and after the destruction of Troy. Through it flows the Athesis, [Athesis, the Adige or Etach, rises in the Rhaetian Alps, flows past Verona and into the Adriatic]. by which it is made picturesque and secure. The river is of use in the transportation of merchandise and fruit. The fields about it produce good fruit—all sorts of apples, oil, various kinds of wine, as well as wool, out of which the soft and beautiful Italian cloth is made; and in this the Italians by reason of good pastures carry on an extraordinary trade. The fields and meadows give city and country a natural and pleasant aspect. Balbus, a high mountain, produces various kinds of herbs and roots and these are gathered to promote the health of the living. In the fields are natural springs. The Romans also found this city agreeable and set up an amphitheater and other buildings there. Many high structures, beautiful temples and strongholds were erected, including the castles of the kings of the Goths and Lombards. Wine is grown here which has an exceptionally agreeable taste. This wine (as Cassiodorus [Cassiodorus, Magnus Aurelius, was a distinguished statesman and one of the few men of learning at the downfall of the Western Empire. He was born about 468 CE, and came of an ancient and wealthy Roman family. He enjoyed the full confidence of Theodoric the Great and his successors, and under a variety of different titles he conducted for a long series of years the government of the Ostrogothic kingdom. At 70 he retired to the monastery of Viviera, which he founded in his native province, and there passed the last 30 years of his life. His time was devoted to study and the composition of elementary treatises on history, metaphysics, the seven liberal arts and divinity. His leisure hours were employed in the construction of philosophical toys, such as sun-dials, water-clocks, etc]. states) was brought in ships on the Athesis and over the sea to Rome by Theodoric (Theodatum) [Theodoric, surnamed the Great, king of the Ostrogoths, was at first an ally of Zeno, the emperor of Constantinople but was afterwards involved in hostilities with him. In order to get rid of Theodoric, Zeno gave him permission to invade Italy, and expelled the usurper Odoacer from the country. Theodoric entered Italy in 489, defeated Odoacer in three great battles, and finally became master of Italy, ruling it for 33 years till his death in 526. His long reign was prosperous and beneficent. He was a patron of literature, and among his ministers were Cassiodorus and Boethius, the two last writers who can claim a place in the literature of ancient Rome], the third king of the Ostrogoths, who highly prized it. There is also much history connected with the place. Attila, king of the Goths, burned and destroyed the city. Here also Alboin (Alboninus) [Alboin, king of the Lombards and barbarian conqueror of northern Italy, succeeded his father Audoin about 565. The Lombards at that time were engaged in constant war with the Gepidae. Alboin finally destroyed them, slew their king Cunimund in battle, and married his daughter Rosamund. On April 1, 568 he assembled his people with a great number of allies to cross the Alps and form a new settlement in Italy—a migration rather than an invasion. The Roman defenses were overrun and Lombard rule was established in northern Italy. But Alboin was murdered at the instigation of his wife whom he insulted by making her drink wine from her father's skull.], the first king of the Lombards, was killed by his wife Rosamund. And here the Emperor Rudolphus defeated the Emperor Berengarius, and killed him. Here also the noble House of La Scala was in power, and ruled illustriously for seventy years. [The reference is to the great Della Scala family, whose name is Latinized to Scaliger, and is given in the German as "von der Leiter", there being a ladder in the coat of arms. To this family belonged two great scholars, Julius Caesar Scaliger (1484 to 1558), and Joseph Justus Scaliger (1540 to 1609), the greatest scholar of his day. For a fuller consideration of this house, see Folio CCXXIII verso]]. Then the city came into the hands of the Venetians. Here, as in other noted cities, flourished distinguished men. Zeno was the first bishop of Verona. He wrote much in interpretation of the Old and the New Testaments. [St. Zeno, or Zenone, the eighth bishop of Verona, was famous for his learning and for the piety of his life. According to some traditions he reduxit Veronam ad baptismum ('led Verona back to baptism,' i.e., rechristianized the city). His writings have come down to the present day, and besides their doctrine and devotion, also have some literary merit. He died about 380 or 390]. Eusebius states that Aemilius Marius was a poet of Verona, and that he died in Asia. And later came Catullus, the poet, [Valerius Catullus, a Roman poet, was born at Verona, or in the immediate vicinity, in 87 BCE. He inherited considerable property from his father, who was the friend of Julius Caesar. His extant works consist of 116 poems— lyrics, elegies, epigrams, etc; while the Wedding of Pellus and Thetis, in 409 hexameter lines, is a 'little epic'.

He adorned all he touched, and his shorter poems are characterized by original invention and felicity of expression. In fact, Catullus is now considered one of the greatest of all Roman poets]. and the two Plinys, as well as Guarino, a celebrated orator [Guarino da Verona (1370-1460) was one of the restorers of classical learning. He was born at Verona, and studied Greek at Constantinople, where for five years he was the pupil of Manuel Chrysolaras. In 1436 he became professor of Greek at Ferrara, where he died in 1460. His principal works are translations of Strabo and of some of the Lives of Plutarch, a compendium of the Greek grammar of Chrysolaras, and a series of commentaries on Persius, Juvenal, Martial, and on some of the writings of Aristotle and Cicero]. ; and there were many others.

Verona is an important town in what was anciently Gallia Cisalpina, on the river Athesis, now called the Adige. It belonged to the Cenomani, a Gaulish tribe, whose chief town was Brixia. It became a Latin colony in 89 BCE. Its territory stretched as far as Hostilia on the Padus (Po), thirty miles to the south. It lay on the road between Mediolanum and Aquileia, while here diverged to the north the roads over the Brenner. It was the birthplace of the poet Catullus. In 69 CE, it became the headquarters of the legions which were siding with Vespasian. It was defended by a river along two-thirds of its circumference. The existing remains of walls and gates date back to the year 265. The emperor Constantine, while advancing toward Rome from Gaul, besieged and took Verona (312); it was here too that Odoacer was defeated in 499 by Theodoric the Goth, known to the German writers as Dietrich von Bern, after whom the town was named Dietrich Bern, to distinguish it from Berne in Switzerland. He built a castle at Verona, and frequently resided there. He enlarged the fortified area by constructing a wall and ditch (now called Adigetto), to the southwest of the amphitheatre, and also built baths and restored aqueducts, which had long been out of use.

In the Middle Ages Verona gradually grew in size and importance. Alboin, the Lombard king, captured it in 568, and it was one of the chief residences of the Lombards and later of the Frankish monarchs. It rose to importance under the rule of the Della Scala family. The first prominent member of this family and founder of his dynasty was Mastino I, della Scala, who ruled over the city from 1260 till his death in 1277. Verona had previously fallen under Ezzelino da Romano (1227-1259). Alberto della Scala was succeeded by his eldest son Bartholomew, who was confirmed as ruler of Verona by popular vote, and died in 1304. It was at this time that Romeo and Juliet are said to have lived. Alboino, the second son, succeeded his brother, and died in 1311, when the youngest son of Alberto, Can Grande, who since 1308 had been joint-lord of Verona with his brother, succeeded to the undivided power. Can Grande was the best and most illustrious of his line, and is specially famous as the hospitable patron of Dante. The dynasty lasted for rather more than a century.

In 1387 Gian Galeazzo Visconti, duke of Milan, became by conquest lord of Verona. Soon after his death the city fell by treacherous means into the hands of Francesco II, di Carrara, lord of Padua. In 1404-5 Verona, together with Padua, was finally conquered by Venice, and remained subject to the Venetians until the overthrow of the Republic by Napoleon in 1797, who ceded it to Austria in the same year with the rest of Venetia.

The Roman remains of Verona surpass those of any other city in northern Italy. The most conspicuous of them is the great amphitheatre, which closely resembled the Colosseum in Rome. Its axes measured 505 and 404 feet. It was partly thrown down by an earthquake in 1183, and was subsequently used to supply building materials. The interior, with seats for about 25,000 people, has been restored.

Folio LXVIII verso

THE BEGINNING OF THE KINGDOM OF THE PERSIANS [This title does not exist in the German edition].

Cyrus the first and mightiest king of the Persians, in this year, being the 30th of the Captivity of the Jews, and the 55th Olympiad, founded the kingdom and empire of Persia; and he reigned 30 years. He was a grandson of Astyages, king of the Medes by his daughter Mandane. As Herodotus and Justinus state, Cyrus defeated this same Astyages, and added his kingdom to Persia. After subjugating many of the cities that had been antagonistic to him, he made war against Belshazzar, king of Chaldea and Babylonia, and defeated him; and soon afterwards he destroyed Babylon. Cyrus then marched against Croesus, the Lydian king, who had given aid to the Babylonians, defeated him, and deprived him of all his wealth of empire, reducing him to poverty. After he had subjugated Asia, that is, almost all the lands to the East, he attacked the Scythians, who were then under the leadership of Queen Tomyris (Tamiris). In the first engagement he defeated and killed her son and his entire army. When Tomyris learned of the death of her only son and the defeat of her people, she did not cry as women in general do, but assembled and encamped the remainder of her people in a manner to give the impression that she had no faith in the mountains, and luring Cyrus into the narrow passes of the high mountains, killed him and his force of two thousand, not a man escaping. She had a search made for the corpse of Cyrus, and when found, had his head struck off and submerged in a vat which she had prepared for the purpose, filled with the blood of his own people, as a fitting grave for the haughty king. And she said: Cyrus, take the blood for which you have always thirsted! But his body was taken to the city of Pasargadae and buried in a park. The following epitaph was placed upon the grave: O man, I am Cyrus, king of Asia, who founded the Persian Empire.

Cyrus I was the founder of the Persian Empire. The account of Herodotus best preserves the Persian legends and romances interwoven in the history of his life. Cyrus was the son of Cambyses, a noble Persian, and of Mandane, daughter of the Median king Astyages. In consequence of a dream, which seemed to portend that his grandson should become the master of Asia, Astyages sent for his daughter, when she was pregnant; and upon her giving birth to a son, he committed the child to Harpagus, his confidential attendant, with orders to kill the babe. But Harpagus gave the child to a herdsman who was to expose it. However, since the herdsman's wife had brought forth a still born child, they substituted the latter for Mandane's child, which they reared as their own. When the child was ten years of age, his true parentage was discovered, and Cambyses sent for the child, in whose person he discovered the son of his daughter Mandane. The king forgave the herdsman, but revenged himself on Harpagus by serving up to him at a banquet the flesh of his own son. When Cyrus grew up, he conspired with Harpagus to dethrone his grandfather. They defeated him and the supremacy of Persia passed to Cyrus. He next overthrew the Lydian monarchy, subdued the Greek cities in Asia Minor, made war against the Assyrians, and captured Babylon. In his later attempt to subjugate the Massagetae, a Scythian people, he was slain, as related in the Chronicle. In the East Cyrus was long regarded as the greatest hero of antiquity, and hence the fables by which his history is obscured.

His sepulcher at Pasargada was visited by Alexander the Great; and although the tomb has perished, his name is found on monuments at Murghab, north of Persepolis.

Persia is a country in Asia Major and derived its name from Perseus, [Perseus, the famous Argive hero, was a son of Zeus and Danae, and grandson of Acrisius. He occupies an important place in Greek mythology as the slayer of the Medusa, rescuer of Andromeda, etc]. grandson of Acrisius, [Acrisius was a son of Abas, king of Argos. Danae, his daughter, was the mother of Perseus by Zeus, who defeated the plans of her father to keep her a virgin, by coming down upon her in her prison chamber in the form of a shower of gold]. king of the Argives. He made Persepolis (Persipolim) the capital of the kingdom. This city was later burned by the Greeks, who conquered the country. Persia borders on Carmania, Bactria and Media, and is divided into many small countries. Quintus Curtius (Curcius) [Quintus Curtius was the Roman historian of Alexander the Great. Nothing is known of his life. Some place him as early as Vespasian, others as late as Constantine. The earlier date is more probable. His work, ('The Accomplishments of Alexander the Great') consisted of ten books. The first two are lost, and there are many gaps in the remaining eight. Although taken from good sources, the author frequently shows his ignorance of geography, chronology and tactics]. writes of this in his fourth book on the history of Alexander the Great. The country is largely mountainous, and because of the heat and wind it is not productive. It is said there are many wealthy cities in it, such as Persepolis and Pasargada, [Pasargada was the oldest of the two capitals of Persia, the other and later one being Persepolis. Pasargada is said to have been founded by Cyrus the Great on the spot where he gained his victory over Astyages. The tomb of Cyrus stood there in the midst of a beautiful park. Persepolis was situated in the heart of Persia, in the region called Hollow Persia, not far from the border of the Carmanian desert, in a beautiful and healthy valley. The city stood on the north side of the Araxes, and had a citadel on the level surface of a rock. It was enclosed by triple walls, rising one above the other to the height of 16, 58 and 60 cubits, within which was the palace with its royal sepulcher and treasures. In the palace Alexander the Great found immense riches, which were said to have accumulated from the time of Cyrus. It had been greatly enlarged and adorned by Darius I and Xerxes, and preserved its splendor till the Macedonian conquest, when it was burned. Alexander set fire to the palace, as the story goes, with his own hand, at the end of a revel, at the instigation of Thais the courtesan in 331 BCE. It was not, however, so entirely destroyed as some historians think, for it appears frequently in subsequent history, both ancient and medieval. It is now deserted, but its ruins are considerable]. and many others, which lie in the uppermost region of Gabiana (Gabiis). Several rocky mountains, which Cambyses (Cambises), the king's son, later added to the kingdom, lie between Persia and Susa, which contained many great buildings erected by Arphaxat. And although the kingdom of Cyrus was formerly great, it was afterward broken up by the Macedonians and reduced in size. Nimrod (Nembroth) the giant was the first to teach the Persians to worship the sun and fire as gods, and to make sacrifices to the moon and Minerva. But now they have given up this idolatry, and follow the law of Mohammed (Mahumeteam legem). From this city, as Pliny states in book 15, comes the fruit called Persica. [Persica, the Latin name for the peach, which belongs to the almond family. The peach is a native of Persia, though now cultivated in all temperate climates]. This region or the city of Persepolis is glorified by the victories of that most holy martyr and knight, Saint George. [The legend of St. George comes from the East. Although we generally associate him with England, the particular veneration paid him in that country dates from the time of Richard I, who in the wars of Palestine, placed himself and his army under the especial protection of St. George. It was not until 1222 that his feast was ordered to be kept as a holiday throughout England; and the institution of the Order of the Garter, in 1330, seems to have completed his inauguration as a patron saint. Previous to the Normans, Edward the Confessor was the patron saint of England. St. George is particularly honored by the Greeks, who place him as a captain at the head of the noble army of martyrs, with the title of The Great Martyr. The reverence paid him in the East is of such great antiquity that one of the first churches erected by Constantine was in honor of St. George, and this within twenty years after the Saint's death, as is supposed. This is the same St. George who slew the dragon. He was a native of Cappadocia, and was born of noble Christian parents. He is said to have lived in the time of Diocletian and to have been a tribute in the army. It is related that in travelling to join his legion he came to a certain city, called Selene, in Libya, which was being greatly troubled by the ravages of a monstrous dragon. And to this St. George put an end. At this time Diocletian issued his edict against the Christians, which was affixed to the gates and temples in public places. Other men read it in terror, but St. George tore it down and trampled it under foot. For this he suffered martyrdom, enduring all manner of torture, finally being dispatched by the sword. According to legend St. George was condemned to martyrdom by Dacian, the proconsul. Unfortunately the chronicler does not give the authority upon which he connects the saint with the city of Persepolis].

Anaximander, philosopher and celebrated scholar, was at first a disciple of Thales (Taletia), and in time (as Eusebeus states) he became his successor in his school. He was the first to teach things about the heavens and invented the notation of the hours. He first described the course of the earth and the sea, and the circuit of the heavens. Therefore Pliny in his second book called him a master of the stars. He died at the age of 64. [Anaximander of Miletus was born in 610 BCE and died in 547, in his 64th year. He was one of the earliest philosophers of the Ionian school, and the immediate successor of Thales, its first founder. He first used the Greek word denoting the origin of things, or rather the material out of which they were formed. He was a careful observer of nature, and was distinguished by his astronomical, mathematical and geographical knowledge]. There is also another Anaximander of Miletus, a historian of no mean reputation, of whom Laertius writes.

Anaximenes, a philosopher and scientist, was a disciple of the Anaximander last mentioned. He contended that the air was the origin (of all things), and that the stars do not move but pass by the earth endlessly. He died on the day (as Laertius says) Sardis was taken. [Anaximenes of Miletus was the third in the series of Ionian philosophers. He flourished about 544 BCE; but as he was the teacher of Anaxagoras (c. 480 BCE), he must have lived to a great age. He considered air to be the first cause of all things, the primary form, as it were, of matter, into which the elements of the universe are resolvable].

Ezra (Esdras), a pious and learned man, was esteemed and regarded as a second Moses by the people. He, together with others, was the first to return from Babylonia; but prompted by fatherly concern, he went back there in order to be of service to many more people in bringing them back also. At this time he restored the laws and other holy books which the Chaldeans had burnt; and he also gave to the world a blessed testament in the form of books setting forth new experiences, and clearly written. After accomplishing this work with the aid of the Holy Spirit, he again returned with a great throng to Jerusalem, having the royal consent to teach the people. He died at a venerable age and was buried there.

Ezra (Greek from Esdras) was a celebrated priest and leader of the Jewish nation. He was "a ready scribe in the law," a learned, able, and faithful man, and appears to have enjoyed great consideration at the Persian court. During the eighty years embraced in his narrative, most of the reign of Cyrus passed, and the whole reign of Cambyses, Smerdis, Darius, Hystaspis, Xerxes, and eight years of Artaxerxes. From the last king he received letters, money, and very considerable help, and went at the head of a large party of returning exiles to Jerusalem in 487 BCE (Ezra 7). Here he instituted many reforms in the conduct of the people and in the public worship, and established synagogues, with reading of Scriptures and prayers (Ezra 8-10; Neh. 8). After this he generally believed to have written the books of Chronicles, Ezra, and part of Nehemiah; and to have collected and revised all the books of the Old Testament which form the present canon. In his work he was aided by Nehemiah and probably Malachi.

The Book of Ezra contains a history written partly in Chaldea, of the return of the Jews from the time of Cyrus (ch 1-6); then, sixty years later, and comprising a single year (ch. 7-10), an account of his own subsequent proceedings. There are two apocryphal books ascribed to him under the name of Esdras.

Darius was a cousin of Astyages, who gave him the kingdom. Both were defeated by Cyrus, who was the first king of the Persians, and the monarchy was added to Persia. He defeated the Babylonians and slew Belshazzar, elevated Daniel, and permitted Israel to return and to rebuild the Temple; and he took good care of these captives. Cyrus bestowed Hyrcania on Astyages, and Media upon Darius.

Nehemiah was a cupbearer to Artaxerxes the king of Persia, and was sent by him to restore the walls of Jerusalem. This he did during the captivity. He was a very good and pious man. When he accomplished this work of God, and found a miraculous fire, he dedicated the wall and returned to the king. Afterwards he again returned to Jerusalem. There he died and was buried beside the wall which he had constructed. [Nehemiah was of the tribe of Judah. He was born at Babylon during the captivity, and held the office of cupbearer to the Persian king Artaxerxes at Susa. Touched by the calamitous state of the colony of Jews which had formerly returned to Jerusalem, he laid their case before God in penitent and importunate prayer, and at length begged the king to permit him to go to Jerusalem and aid in rebuilding it. He was accordingly sent there as governor about 444 BCE, and directed his attention chiefly to the task of rebuilding the walls. The enmity of the Samaritans, under which the colony had formerly suffered, was not increased. Under great difficulties the wall was completed in one year. Nehemiah also instituted many civic improvements. In 432 BCE he returned to his post at the court of Babylon, but was later recalled to Jerusalem to reform certain growing irregularities—neglect of the Temple services, breaches of the Sabbath, intermarriage with pagans, etc. The Jews who had married pagan wives, he compelled to abandon them, or quit the country. He rededicated the Temple, suppressed usury and exaction from the poor, fed the destitute, and provided for the Temple service.]

Cambyses (Cambises), son of Cyrus, and second king of Persia, assumed the throne in the sixtieth year of the Jewish captivity and he reigned eight years. By Ezra he is called Artaxerxes or Ahasuerus (Assuerus) [], and in the Book of Judith he is referred to as the ancestor of Nebuchadnezzar. He forbade the building of the city of Jerusalem and its Temple. After he assumed the sovereignty he acted with military distinction and justice, but with an admixture of cruelty and haughtiness toward his subjects; and in the latter qualities he excelled his father. He subjugated the Ethiopians, conducted many wars through Holofernes, journeyed to Egypt and there overran many lands, and there he built a second Babylon. Valerius says that Cambyses caused an unjust judge to be flayed, and his skin to be stretched upon the judgment seat, and he appointed the judge's son to sit on it as a judge in his father's place. [Cambyses, second king of Persia, reigned 529-522 BCE. In 525 he conquered Egypt; but an army which he sent against the Ammonians perished in the sands, and the forces which he led in person against the Ethiopians were compelled by failure of provisions to return. On his return to Memphis he treated the Egyptians with great cruelty, insulting their religion and killing their god Apis with his own hands. He acted tyrannically toward his own family and the Persians in general. He caused his own brother Smerdis to be murdered; but a Magian impersonated the deceased prince and set up a claim to the throne. Cambyses promptly set out from Egypt against the pretender, but died at Ecbatana in Syria of an accidental wound. His crimes provoked the rebellion in which the pseudo-Smerdis secured the throne].

Mordecai (Mardocheus), the holy man, was at this time highly renowned throughout the kingdom of Persia. He flourished in the year 295, according to the Latin reckoning. [Mordecai, one of those who returned from the Babylonian captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7)].

Smerdis, third king of Persia, reigned seven months in the sixty-eighth year of the Jewish captivity, for Cambyses died without heirs. Patizithes (Patizetes), whom Cambyses had placed in charge of his possessions, proclaimed as king his own brother, who had the same name and bore a likeness to the king, and he killed the elder one. Because of this treacherous deceit, Darius, the son of Hystaspis (Histaspis), soon afterwards killed this second Smerdis and his brother Patizithes; and after three days he himself was made king of the Persians.

Smerdis, son of Cyrus, was murdered by order of his brother Cambyses. The death was kept a profound secret; and accordingly when the Persians became weary of the tyranny of Cambyses, one of the Magians, name Patizithes, who had been left by Cambyses in charge of his palace and treasures, availed himself of the likeness of his brother to the deceased Smerdis, to proclaim this brother king, representing him as the younger son of Cyrus. Cambyses heard of the revolt while in Syria, but he died of an accidental wound in the thigh as he was mounting his horse to march against the usurper.

The Persians acknowledged the pseudo-Smerdis as king, and he reigned for seven months without opposition. The leading Persian nobles were not, however, free from suspicion, and this suspicion was increased because the king never invited any of them to the palace, and never appeared in public. Among these nobles was Otanes, whose daughter Phaedima had been one of the wives of Cambyses, and had been transferred to his successor. The new king had some years before being deprived of his ears by Cyrus for some offense. Otanes persuaded his daughter to ascertain whether her master had really lost his ears. Having ascertained that such was the fact and given the information to her father, the latter formed a conspiracy, and in conjunction with other Persian nobles, succeeded in forcing his way into the palace, where they slew the false Smerdis and his brother Patizithes in the eighth month of their reign, 521. The usurpation of the false Smerdis was an attempt on the part of the Medes, to whom the Magians belonged, to obtain the supremacy, of which they had been deprived by Cyrus. The assassination of the false Smerdis and the accession of Darius Hystaspis again gave the ascendancy to the Persians; and the anniversary of the day on which the Magians were massacred, was commemorated among the Persians by a solemn festival, called Magophonia. On this day no Magian was allowed to show himself in public. The nature of the transaction is also shown by the revolt of the Medes that followed the ascension of Darius.

Holofernes, a general of the hosts of Nebuchadnezzar, subjugated much territory for him; and finally marched against Bethulia; and there he was slain in his bedchamber by Judith, a widow of rare disposition and incredible beauty, and all his hosts dispersed. After she had done away with Holofernes she was held in esteem by the Jews to such an extent that for the rest of her days she was honored and elevated by praises of her victory and everlastingly prized. And when she had attained the age of one hundred and fifty years she was buried beside her husband with great pomp and lamentations. [According to the Book of Judith, one of the books of the Apocrypha, Arphaxad, king of Ecbatana fortified his city. Nebuchadnezzar, king of the Assyrians at Nineveh, made war against him, and summoned all who dwelled in the lands between Persia and Memphis to his aid. They refused. Vowing vengeance, he marched alone against Arphaxad and destroyed him. Later he appoints Holofernes general over his army, and sends him against the nations which refused to aid him. He lays siege to Bethulia, a city of the Israelites. They lose heart and urge Ozias and the rulers to give way. Now in those days there lived a widow named Judith, of rare piety and beauty. She blames Ozias and the rulers for considering submission, and urges them to place their trust in God. The rulers excuse themselves, and Judith promises to do for them something that shall go down to all generations. She decks herself bravely and goes to the camp of Holofernes accompanied by her maid, who carries a bottle of wine, a cruse of oil, and a bag filled with parched corn and fine bread and cheese. She tells him that her nation cannot be punished, neither can the sword prevail against them, except they sin against their God, but that now they are about to eat all those things which God charged them not to eat, and that they will therefore be delivered into his hands. She offers to show the way to the town, and to lead him until he comes to Jerusalem. Holofernes is pleased and invites her to a banquet, and she accepts. He drinks deeply and is left alone with her. Praying to God for strength, she smites off his head with his own scimitar; and putting the head into her bag of victuals, she hastens to Bethulia. The next morning the Israelites fall upon their besiegers, who, finding their leader dead, lose heart and flee in wild disorder. After a long life Judith dies at the age of 105 years, and was buried at Bethulia in the cave of her husband Manasseh.]

Judith

Judith is here represented by a special woodcut. She wears the headdress and garb of the time of woodcutter. Her veil flutters about her, and in her right hand she holds a sword on the extreme sharp point of which is poised, like a marshmallow for toasting, the head of Holofernes. His eyes are closed in death, his mouth is wide open. The other hand of the heroine is engaged in bestowing a blessing.

With the exceptions of the portrait of Ezra (labeled Edras, a misspelling of Esdras) and the special woodcut of Judith and Holofernes, all of the portraits on this page are different in the German edition of the Chronicle.

In the 224th year after the building of the city of Rome, when the line of the Roman kings came to an end, the people appointed consuls in the place of kings, who were to govern for but one year so that in the passage of years they would not become too arrogant. Of these we will here mention the foremost. The first two conducted a war against Porsena (Porsemia) [Porsena or Porsenna, Lars, king of the Etruscan town of Chisium, marched against Rome at the head of a vast army in order to restore Tarquinius Superbus to the throne. But the campaign did not accomplish its object], king of the Etrurians. Brutus had two sons who wanted to re-establish the kingship. Brutus caused them to be beaten with rods and then to be killed with an axe. Collatinus was relieved of his office, for it was decided that the name of Tarquinius was to be banished from the city of Rome. [L. Junius Brutus was the son of M. Junius and Tarquinia, the sister of Tarquinius Superbus. His elder brother was murdered by Tarquinius, and Lucius escaped his brother's fate only by feigning idiocy, from which he received the name Brutus. The story of the rape of Lucretia, wife of L. Tarquinius Collatinus, by Sextus the son of Tarquinius Superbus, and the consequent expulsion of the latter and his sons has already been related. It was Brutus who incited the Romans to this course, and it was he and Tarquinius Collatinus who were set up as the first consuls to govern the empire in lieu of a king; but as the people could not endure the rule of any of the hated race of the Tarquins, Collatinus resigned his office and retired from Rome to Lavinium].

The Cumaean Sibyl (Sibylla Cumana), who lived in the time of Tarquinius Priscus, is clad in a dress of gold, and has a tall open book in her hand, and also a book in the left hand, resting on her knee. Her head is bare. She foretold that out of eternity a miraculous birth would take place in this world through a virgin; and that the iron people would come to an end and a golden people would spring up. [Sibyls were first mentioned by the chronicler at Folio XXXV verso, and two others were spoken of later (Folios XLVI verso and LVI verso). The mention of the Cumaean Sibyl at this point is apparently intended merely as a description of the opposite portrait, which, however, in no way conforms to the description. In the portrait she has no book in either hand, nor on her knee. She is not bareheaded, but wears a flowing veil. Her hands are in an attitude of gesture].

These two Romans (referring to woodcut opposite) defeated the Sabines and were accorded a triumph; but Valerius died poor.

The reference is apparently to P. Valerius Publicola and Posthumus. Publicola took part in the expulsion of the Tarquins, and was thereupon elected consul with Brutus (509 BCE). He secured the liberties of the people by several laws and ordered the lectors to lower the fasces before the people as an acknowledgement that their rights were superior to those of the consuls. He became a great favorite with the people, receiving the surname Publicola ('Honored by the People' or 'Guardian of the People'). He died in 503.

In the opposite portrait Publicola is associated with Postumus without text reference to the latter.

Two hundred twenty-five years after the building of Rome, the Romans, having been defeated by the Sabines, elected a regent whom they called a dictator, with authority and powers greater than those of the consuls. This was a worthy office.

Manlius (Manilius) Torquatus, son of Laelius Manlius, made war against the Gauls. He slew a Gaul who challenged him, took away his golden necklace, and put it about his own neck. For this reason he and his descendants were called Torquati, which means necklace.

T. Manlius Imperiosus Torquatus, son of L. Manlius Capitolinus Imperiosus, dictator in 363 BCE, was a favorite hero of Roman story. Manlius is said to have been dull of mind in his youth, and was brought up by his father in the country. When the tribune M. Pomponius accused the elder Manlius on account of the cruelties he had practiced in his dictatorship, he endeavored to excite public enmity against him by representing him as a cruel and tyrannical father. As soon as the younger Manlius heard of this he hurried to Rome, obtained admission to Pomponius early in the morning and compelled the tribune by threatening him with instant death to take an oath to drop the accusation against his father.

In 361 Manlius served under the dictator T. Quintus Pennus in the war against the Gauls, and in this campaign earned immortal glory by slaying a gigantic Gaul, from whose dead body he took the chain (torquis) which had adorned him, and placed it about his own neck. From this circumstance he obtained the surname Torquatus. He was dictator in 353 and again in 349. He was also consul three times. Torquatus and his colleague P. Decius Mus gained a great victory over the Latins at the foot of Vesuvius, which established forever the supremacy of Rome over Latium. Shortly before the battle, when the two armies were encamped opposite one another, the consuls published a proclamation that no Roman should engage in single combat with a Latin on pain of death. But the young Manlius, the son of the consul, provoked by the insults of a Tuscan noble, accepted his challenge, slew his adversary, and bore the bloody spoils in triumph to his father. Death was his reward. The consul would not overlook this breach of discipline, and the unhappy youth was executed by the lector in the presence of the assembled army. This severe sentence rendered Torquatus an object of detestation among the Roman youths as long as he lived; and the recollection of his severity was preserved in after ages by the expression Manliana imperia.

The Senonian Gauls were by nature a cruel and uncivilized people, and by reason of their great stature and their weapons a frightful race born, as it seems, for the extinction of mankind and the destruction of the city of Rome. These barbarians leveled and devastated the whole city with fire and sword for six months. [The Senones were a powerful people in Gallia Lugdunensis, who dwelt along the upper course of the Sequana (Seine). Their chief town was Agendicum, afterwards called Senones (Sens). A portion of this people crossed the Alps about 400 BCE, in order to settle in Italy; and as the greater part of Upper Italy was already occupied by other Celtic tribes, they were obliged to penetrate a considerable distance to the south, and took up their abode on the Adriatic Sea between the rivers Utis and Aesis (between Ravenna and Ancona) after expelling the Umbrians. In this country they founded the town of Sena. They extended their ravages into Etruria; and it was in consequence of the interference of the Romans, while they were laying siege to Clusium, that they marched against Rome and took the city in 390 BCE. From this time we find them engaged in constant hostilities with the Romans, till they were at length completely subdued and the greater part of them destroyed by the consul Dolabella in 283]. At that time Manlius, awakened by the cry of a goose, drove down the hill those who were attempting to enter the city by night. [When Rome, in 390 BCE, was taken by the Gauls, the Roman consul Marcus Manlius took refuge in the Capitol. One night when the Gauls endeavored to ascend the Capitol, Manlius was aroused from his sleep by the cackling of the geese. Hastily collecting a body of men, he succeeded in driving off the enemy, who had just reached the summit of the hill. From this heroic deed he is said to have received the surname Capitolinus. In 385 he defended the cause of the plebians, who were suffering from their debts and the cruel treatment of their harsh patrician creditors. The patricians accused him of aspiring to royal power, and he was thrown into prison by the dictator Cornelius Cossus. The plebians put on mourning for their champion, and were ready to take up arms in his behalf, when the patricians became alarmed and released Manlius; but this act of concession made him bolder, and he instigated the plebeians to open violence. In the following year the patricians brought him to trial on a charge of high treason. He was condemned, and the tribunes threw him down the Tarpeian rock. The members of the Manlia gens accordingly resolved that none of them should ever bear in future the praenomen of Marcus].

Popilia, a Vestal virgin, was, by reason of the loss of her virginity, buried alive.

In the time of these two Romans (referring to a dual portrait of Marcus and Aeneas Manlius), occurred the Vientian (Vegetian) wars in which as many of the victorious Romans fell as defeated Vientians. [Veii (Veiens, Veientis or Veientanus) was one of the most powerful and ancient cities of Etruria, situated on the river Cremera, about 12 miles from Rome. It possessed a strongly fortified citadel, built on a steep hill. It was one of the twelve cities of the Etrurian Confederacy, and apparently the largest of all. It was about seven miles in circumference, equal in size to Athens, and was a powerful city at the time of the foundation of Rome. The Veientians were engaged in almost constant hostilities with Rome for more than three and one half centuries, and there is a record of fourteen distinct wars between the two peoples. Veii was at length taken by the dictator Camillus after a siege which is said to have lasted ten years. The city fell into his hands, according to the common story (doubted by Livy and Plutarch), by means of a cuniculus or mine that was dug all the way from the Roman camp under the city into the citadel of Veii. So well built was the city that the Romans were anxious after the destruction of their own city by the Gauls in 390 BCE to remove to Veii; but the eloquence of Camillus against this plan finally prevailed. So Veii was abandoned; but after the lapse of ages it was colonized by Augustus, and made a Roman municipium. But by the time of Hadrian the city again sank into decay. From this time Veii disappears entirely from history. It stood in the neighborhood of the present Isola Farnese].

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE OFFICE OF DICTATOR

In the ninth year after the conclusion of the Roman line of kings (as Eusebius states) the new office of Dictator was established in Rome; also that of Master of the Horse, who was subordinate to the dictator in all things. Largus became the first dictator, and Sp. Cassius the first Master of the Horse. The dictator was superior in power to the consuls against the enemies of the state.

A dictator in ancient times was an extraordinary magistrate in the Roman commonwealth. The earlier official title was magister populi ('Master of the People [i.e., the infantry]') as opposed to his subordinate, the magister equitum ('Master of the Horse [i.e., the cavalry]'). Emphasis was thus placed on the military aspect of the dictatorship, and, in fact, the office seems to have been instituted for the purpose of meeting a military crisis too serious for the annual consuls with their divided command. The repression of civil discord was one of the motives for the institution of a dictatorship. This function of the office is attested by the internal history of Rome. In the crisis of the agitation at the time of the Licinian laws (367 BCE) a dictator was appointed. The dictator appointed to meet the dangers of war, sedition, or crime, was described as "the administrative dictator." For minor purposes we find dictators appointed to hold elections, to celebrate games, to establish festivals, and to drive the nail into the temple of Jupiter – an act of natural magic that was believed to avert pestilence. These dictators retired from office as soon as their function was completed; but the administrative dictator held office for six months.

The powers of a dictator were a temporary revival of those of the kings, with some limitations. He was never concerned with civil jurisdiction. His military authority was confined to Italy; and his power of life and death was limited. By the lex Valeria of 300 BCE he was made subject to the right of criminal appeal within the limits of the city. However, all the magistrates of the people were regarded as his subordinates. The dictator was nominated by one of the consuls. But the senate claimed authority over the magistrates, and suggested not only the nomination but also the name of the nominee. After the nomination, the imperium of the dictator was confirmed by a lex curiata. To emphasize the superiority of this imperium, the dictator might be preceded by 24 lectors, and, at least in the earlier period of the office, these lectors bore the axes, the symbol of life and death, within the city walls.

The first dictator is said to have been created in 501 BCE; the last of the "administrative" dictators belongs to the year 216 BCE. The epoch of the Second Punic War was marked by experiments with the office, such as the election of Q. Fabius Maximus by the people, and the co-dictatorship of M. Minucius. The emergency office of the early and middle republic has little in common with the dictatorship as revived by Sulla and by Caesar. That of the former took on the form of a provisional government. Sulla was created dictator "for the establishment of a republic." Caesar's renewed dictatorships created a temporary monarchy, whatever may have been his wishes as to its permanency. Ostensibly to prevent its further use for such a purpose, M. Antonius in 44 BCE carried a law abolishing the dictatorship. The term is used in our day to designate a tyrannical ruler.

This happened first when Porsena (Porsemia), king of Chisium (Clusium) (that was an Etruscan state) had tried with his army to restore Tarquinius Superbus. And so that this might not occur, a dictator stopped him. But when peace had been made, Porsena became friends with the Roman people and retreated with the highest honors. [For the interesting history between Porsena and Rome, see Livy, ('From the Founding of the City') 2.9-15. This sentence and the two sentences preceding it are not in the German edition of the chronicle]. Quintius (Quincius) Cincinnatus [L. Quintius Cincinnatus was a favorite hero of the old Roman republic, and a model of old Roman frugality and integrity. He lived on his farm, cultivating the land with his own hand. He was born about 519 BCE and played a conspicuous part in the civil and military transactions of the period in which he lived. He particularly distinguished himself as a violent opponent of the plebeians. In BCE 460 he was appointed consul suffectus in the room of P. Valerius. Two years afterward, according to the common story, Cincinnatus was called from the plough to the dictatorship, in order to deliver the Roman consul and army from the perilous position in which they had been placed by the Aequians. The story of the manner in which he effected this is given in Livy. During his dictatorship, in defiance of the tribunes, he held the comitia for the trial of Volscius, whose evidence had condemned his son Caeso, and whom he now charged with perjury. The accused went into voluntary exile. After holding the dictatorship for 16 days, Cincinnatus returned to his farm. In 439 BCE, at the age of 80, he was again appointed dictator to oppose the alleged machinations of Spurius Maelius. This is the last event recorded of him]. was later taken away from his plough by the Roman consuls, and made dictator; and he was one of the most noted. He accepted the office reluctantly. He not only rescued the besieged Romans, but brought countless spoils of war back to Rome, and many prisoners. Thus, with the expedition completed, he returned to his oxen, understanding that the victory was secure. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle].

Under the consulship of this Valerius (referring to the portrait opposite), the exiled citizens and the fugitive slaves invaded the capitol and burned it. It was a gruesome war, and the consul himself was slain. Publicola as well, who was also a Roman patrician, to whom the name previously had been Publius Valerius, at this time, when the Tarquins had been expelled, together with Brutus was made consul in place of Collatinus (as mentioned above). He himself, when the battle had been engaged in which Brutus died, killed fifteen thousand three hundred men from the army of the Tarquins. And with this victory he was the first of the consuls who, carried in his chariot, celebrated a triumph, a thing that provided a very lovely spectacle to the common people without any envy. He was, moreover, a man of great justice and fairness. [The last four sentences in this paragraph are not in the German edition of the chronicle].

ILLUSTRATIONS

(A) LINEAGE OF THE ROMAN CONSULS

The Lineage of the Roman Consuls begins here. It consists of a panel of the following portraits:

1. Brutus and Tarquinius (Tarquinius) Collatinus, jointly the first consuls of Rome, until the latter was forced to resign; represented by a commonplace double portrait of two men facing one another and gesturing.
2. Valerius Publicola and Postumus, a commonplace dual portrait of men in medieval dress.
3. Largus, first dictator, a rather imposing portrait of a distinguished looking medieval citizen—gesturing as usual.
4. The Decem Tribuni, a group of ten magistrates of ancient Rome, injected into the lineage of the Roman consuls. They are represented by a small group-portrait.
5. Marcus and Aeneas Manlius; dual portrait of not particular significance.
6. Valerius, apparently a relative of Valerius Publicola; represented by a woodcut of an old man.

(B) THE CUMAEAN SIBYL

The Cumaean Sibyl has been assigned a portrait that does not agree with the text of the Chronicle. The portrait here used has already done service for the Sibyl Persica, Folio XXXV verso.

(C) MANLIUS TORQUATUS

Manlius (Manilius) Torquatus, strangely represented holding an open book instead of being portrayed as a soldier.

(D) POPILIA THE VESTAL VIRGIN

Popilia the Vestal Virgin; small woodcut of a rather sad looking middle-aged woman, without headdress or veil, arms folded.

Aratus (Aracus), the highly renowned astrologer and poet, distinguished himself, as Augustine states, in that, together with Eudoxus, he comprehended and described all the stars. However, Augustine states that this is contrary to the Scriptures, in which God spoke to Abraham, saying: Look at the stars, count them if you can. But how can they all be counted since they cannot all be seen? And as Aratus was not unfamiliar with astrology, he wrote an excellent book of beautiful verses on the subject [Aratus was the author of two Greek astronomical poems, which have generally been joined together, as if parts of the same work. The design is to give an introduction to the knowledge of the constellations, with the rules for their risings and settings; and of the circles of the sphere, amongst which the milky way is reckoned. The positions of the constellations, north of the ecliptic, are described by reference to the principal groups surrounding the North Pole (the Bears, the Dragon and Cepheus), while Orion serves as a point of departure for those to the South. The immobility of the earth, and the revolution of the heavens about a fixed axis are maintained; the path of the sun in the Zodiac is described; but the planets are introduced merely as bodies having a motion of their own, without any attempt to define their periods; nor is anything said about the moon's orbit. The opening of the poem asserts the dependence of all things upon Zeus. From the general lack of precision in the descriptions it would seem that Aratus was neither a mathematician nor an observer; or, at any rate, that in this work he did not aim at scientific accuracy. Such is the first poem, which consists of 732 verses. The second, consisting of 422 verses, is made up of prognostications of the weather from astronomical phenomena, with an account of its effects upon animals. The style of these two poems is distinguished by the elegance and accuracy of their diction, resulting from a study of ancient models; but it lacks originality and poetic elevation; and variety of matter is excluded by the nature of the subjects. Several other poetical works on various subjects, as well as a number of prose epistles, are attributed to Aratus; but none of them have come down to us], to which Cicero gives witness in the first book of his On the Orator: "It is established among scholars that Aratus, a man ignorant of astrology, has spoken about the sky and the stars in the most ornate and finest lines of poetry." [Cicero, ('On the Orator'), 1.16. The German edition of the does not cite the quote from Cicero's text, nor does it even mention the actual book by Cicero, stating only: "to which Cicero gives witness."]

In the midst of the city of Rome appeared a horrible gap or crevice, and the soothsayers interpreted this as portending the burial of a living person. Then at Rome (as Livy states), the earth opened up in a public place, and a wide chasm was formed without displacement of the soil or other force; and it could not be filled with any material. Marcus Curtius heard about this, and he thought of the temples of the gods in the vicinity. He mounted his beautiful horse, and fully accoutered, he leaped into the chasm for love of his country. And when he died the chasm closed. [Mettus or Mettius Curtius (Marcus Curcius), a distinguished Sabine, fought with the rest of his nation against Romulus. According to one tradition, the Lacus Curtius, which was part of the Roman forum, was called after him, because in the battle with the Romans he escaped with difficulty from a swamp into which his horse had plunged. But the more usual tradition respecting the name of Lacus Curtius is that in 362 BCE the earth in the forum gave way, and a great chasm appeared, which the soothsayers declared could only be filled up by throwing into it Rome's greatest treasure; that thereupon M. Curtius, a noble youth, mounted his steed in full armour; and declaring that Rome possessed no greater treasure than a brave and gallant citizen, leaped into the abyss; upon which the earth closed over him].

Aesop (Esopus) Adelphus, the highly renowned poet and teller of fairy tales, flourished in the time of Cyrus, the Persian king. He was a Greek, intelligent and witty, and composed excellent fables, which Romulus afterwards translated from the Greek tongue into Latin and sent to his son Tibertinus. In his stories Aesop taught people how they were to conduct themselves; and to this end he gave speech to the birds, trees and irrational animals. If these fables are carefully studied, one will find in them not only matter for admonishment and laughter, but for sharpening of one's wits. It is said that Aesop was slain in the first year of Cyrus.

Aesop, author of Fables about animals, generally with a didactic purpose, which have given their name to a whole class of stories, lived about 620 to 560 BCE. According to tradition he was the slave of Iadmon of Samos and met with a violent death at the hands of the inhabitants of Delphi. When a pestilence came upon them the Delphians offered a reward for his death, and it was claimed by Iadmon, grandson of Aesop's old master. Herodotus, who is authority for this (2.134), does not state the cause of Aesop's death; but various reasons have been assigned by later writers – his insulting sarcasms, embezzlement of money entrusted to him by Croesus for distribution at Delphi, and the theft of a silver cup.

Aesop must have been freed by Iadmon, or he could not have conducted the defense of a Samian demagogue (Aristotle, Rhetoric 2.20). Legend says that he afterwards lived at the court of Croesus, where he met Solon, and dined in the company of the Seven Sages of Greece with Periander at Corinth. The obscurity in which the history of Aesop is involved has induced some scholars to deny his existence altogether.

Very recently Rinutius, a certain learned man, translated all those fables, together with the life of Aesop himself, most accurately into Latin for cardinal Antonius of the holy parish church Chrysogonus (Crisogonus). [Saint Chrysogonus (San Crisogono in Italian) is a church in Rome (Trastevere) dedicated to the martyr Saint Chrysogonus. The church was one of the tituli (as the notes), the first parish churches of Rome, known as the Titulus Chrysogoni. It was probably built in the 4th century under Pope Silvester I (314–335), then rebuilt in the 12th century by John of Crema].

ELECTION OF THE DECENVIRS (TEN MEN) AT ROME

In the twelfth year of the kingdom of Artaxerxes, and 300 years [The German edition of the changes this number of years to 202]. after the building of the city of Rome, when Menevius and P. Saxtillus Capitolinus were consuls, the Romans decided to suspend the power of the consuls, and elected ten men by whom the city was to be ruled without tumult. The period of their rule was a happy one (as Livy says); but they later exceeded their authority and fell. After a year had elapsed, they were removed because of the misdeeds of Claudius Appius. [Appius Claudius was consul in 451, and on the appointment of the decimvir in that year, he became one of them, and was reappointed the following year. His real character now betrayed itself in the most tyrannical conduct toward the plebeians till his attempt against Virginia led to the overthrow of the decemvirate. Appius was impeached by Virginius, but did not live to abide his trial. He either killed himself, or was put to death in prison by order of the tribunes. For more on the 'Ten Men' and their period of rule (451-449 BCE), see Livy, ('From the Founding of the City') 3].

THE LAWS OF THE TWELVE TABLES

Inasmuch as the Romans had no laws up to this time, and a dispute arose between the tribunes, who judged various matters for the common people, and the consuls, the Romans, in the 13th year of Artaxerxes, sent messengers to Athens, who not only brought back the laws of Solon, but also the laws and customs of other Greek cities. From these laws ten tables were prepared, and two tables were added to those by the Romans; so originated the celebrated Law of the Twelve Tables, in which the entire law was codified.

TRIBUNES AND AEDILES CREATED AT ROME [The German edition of the titles this section "ELECTION FROM AMONG THE COMMONS."]

Greed for riches gave rise to a fourth conflict; so the common people created magistrates. Fabius Ambustus, the father of two (daughters), gave one to Sulpicius, a man of patrician blood, and the other to a plebeian. [According to the story recorded by Livy, ('From the Founding of the City') 6.34, Marcus Fabius Ambustus had two daughters, of whom the elder was married to Ser. Sulpicus, and the younger to C. Licinius Stolo. The younger daughter (Fabia) induced her father to assist her husband in obtaining the consulship for the plebeian order, into which she had married]. The tribunes of the people were created in the 16th year of Artaxerxes [Here Artaxerxes II is meant. He ruled from 404-358 BCE].; and although this office was not of particular importance, it was greatly respected in the state. [The office of tribune is one that was born of the oppression of the people by rulers against whom they rebelled. In compromise the people were allowed to choose their own magistrates from their own order, who were to have the power of opposing with effect every measure which they might judge in anyway prejudicial to their interest. These new magistrates were to be elected annually. At first they were five in number, but in time they were increased to ten. They were called tribunes because the first of them was chosen from among the tribune militum of the different legions. Their authority was confined to the city limits and one mile beyond the walls. Two officers, called Aediles, were appointed to aid them. The Aediles had charge of the public buildings, and later, also of the games, spectacles, and other matters of police within the city. By the appointment of the tribunes the aristocracy was to a certain extent weakened, and the government took on even more distinctive aspects of a 'representative-democracy.']

Veturia, the mother of Coriolanus, the Roman consul, was an old woman at this time. By good works she lengthened her years to eternal youth. When Coriolanus without cause besieged the city, and refused to see the embassies that were sent to him, and would not listen to the high priests, his mother diverted him from his stubborn anger and from the course which he had entered upon. He abandoned the siege and released the city. In gratitude to those women the Romans erected a temple; and afterwards no honor was withheld from the women by the men. And the Romans ordained that the people should stand up for the women, and give them the right of way; a custom which to this day is still observed by the respectable. It was also considered fit and proper for the women to wear gold, purple dresses, and golden girdles and ornaments. [Coriolanus is the hero of one of the most interesting early Roman legends (and a later life by Plutarch, which in turn was the basis of Shakespeare's play,). His original name was C. Marcius, and he received the surname Coriolanus from the heroism he displayed at the capture of the Volscian town of Corioli. But his haughty bearing toward the common people excited their fear and dislike, and when he was a candidate for the consulship they refused to elect him. After this, when there was a famine in the city, and a Greek prince sent corn from Sicily, Coriolanus advised that it should not be distributed to the commons until they should give up their tribunes. For this he was impeached and condemned to exile in 491 BCE. He now took refuge among the Volscians, and promised to assist them in a war against the Romans. He was appointed general of the Volscian army, took many towns, and advanced unresisted until he came to the Cluilian dyke close to Rome in 489. Here he encamped, and the Romans in alarm sent to him embassy after embassy, consisting of the most distinguished men of the state. But he would listen to none of them. At length the noblest matrons of Rome, headed by his mother Veturia, and Volumnia, his wife, with his two little children, came to this tent. His mother's reproached, and the tears of his wife and the other matrons, bent his purpose. He led back his army, and lived in exile among the Volscians till his death; though other traditions relate that he was killed by the Volscians on his return to their country].

Marcus Curtius (Curcius), the noble Roman youth, fully accoutered and mounted on his beautiful steed, is depicted in the act of plunging into the great chasm that opened in the earth in the region of the forum, as related in the text and accompanying note. Rider and horse are sinking into the earth, which immediately closed over them, sealing the gap. The title is unusually large for such a relatively small-sized image.

Darius, a son of Hystaspis (Histaspis), the fourth king of the Persians, began his reign in the 70th year of the Jewish captivity; and, together with six other nobles, slew Smerdis and his brother Patizithes (Patizitem). They agreed among themselves that the one whose horse should neigh first on the following morning should become king of Persia. Darius so arranged matters with his master of the stables that his horse neighed before all the others, and in consequence, he was presently chosen king. When he received the kingdom, he married Atossa (Atosam), the daughter of Cambyses. By her he begot Xerxes and other sons. He gave Zerubbabel (Zorobabel) authority to lead the Jews back to Jerusalem, to restore to them the vessels of the Temple, and to give them annually twenty talents of silver. And so the Temple was built. Before Darius died, Egypt seceded from him.

Darius, king of Persia (521-485 BCE), was the son of Hystaspis. He was one of the seven Persian chiefs who destroyed the usurper Smerdis (Folio LXIX recto and note). The chiefs agreed that the one of them whose horse neighed first at the appointed time should become king, and by this token Darius was chosen. He married Atossa and Arystone, the two daughters of Cyrus, and Parnis, daughter of Cyrus's son Smerdis, and Phaldime, daughter of Otanes, one of the seven chiefs. He set his vast empire in order, dividing it into twenty satrapies, assigning to each its amount of tribute. Persia proper was exempted from all taxes except such as it had been accustomed to pay. The Babylonians revolted but were put down. Later Darius invaded Scythia, marching far into the interior of modern Russian; but after losing a number of men by famine, and being unable to meet the enemy, he was obliged to retreat.

On his return to Asia Darius sent part of his forces under Magabasus, to subdue Thrace and Macedonia, which thus became subject to the Persian Empire. The most important event in this reign was the commencement of the great war between the Persians and the Greeks. In 501 the Ionian Greeks revolted; they were assisted by the Athenians, who burnt Sardis. Thereby they provoked the hostility of Darius. In 492 Mardonius was sent to invade Greece with a large army, but he lost a large part of his fleet and land forces. He was recalled, and Artaphernes appointed to command the invading army but they were again defeated, this time by Miltiades at Marathon. Darius now called out the whole force of his empire to subdue Greece, but after three years of preparation his attention was diverted by the rebellion of Egypt. He died in 485, leaving the execution of his plans to his son Xerxes.

Xerxes (Xerses), son of Darius and Atossa, and fifth king of Persia, began to reign in the 104th year of the Jewish captivity; and he reigned twenty years. He appeared to be the successor of his father's wishes, to honor and worship the God of Israel. He treated the Israelites with kindness and was very friendly to Esdra, the priest. Yet he followed his father's cruelty and grimness. He conquered Egypt, and became the ruler of entire Asia. He swept over Greece with war and an innumerable host of warriors. He burned Athens and killed many people. But finally he was twice wounded by Leonidas, the Spartan prince, and pursued so strongly that he, whose ships formerly swarmed over the seas, was barely able in fear to make good his escape on a small fishing craft. Some time later he was slain by Artabanus, his commander. [Xerxes was king of Persia from 485 to 465 BCE. His father Darius had died in the midst of his preparations against Greece, which had been interrupted by the revolt of the Egyptians. The first care of Xerxes was to reduce these people to submission. This done, he returned to Persia, leaving his brother as governor of Egypt. In the spring of 480 he set out from Sardis on his memorable expedition against Greece. He crossed the Hellespont by a bridge of boats, and continued his march through the Thracian Chersonese till he reached the plain of Doriscus. His land forces contained forty-six nations. In his march through Thrace and Macedonia he received further accession of strength, and when he reached Thermopylae his land and sea forces are said to have amounted to 2,641,610 fighting men (obviously an exaggeration!). Xerxes continued his march through Thrace. After joining his fleet at Therme, he marched through Macedonia and Thessaly without meeting with any opposition until he reached Thermopylae. Here the Greeks opposed him. His fleet was overtaken by a violent storm and he lost at least 400 ships of war, as well as an immense number of transports. He attempted to force his way through the pass of Thermopylae, but was repulsed again and again by Leonidas, until the treachery of a Greek from neighboring Malis, named Ephialtes, enabled him to fall on the rear of the Greeks. Leonidas and his Spartans refused to leave, and were all slain. Then followed the memorable battle of Salamis, in which the Greeks won a glorious naval victory. Xerxes witnessed the battle from a lofty seat on the shore, but only to behold the defeat and dispersion of his mighty fleet. He became alarmed for his own safety and resolved to leave Greece immediately. Leaving behind Mardonius, who undertook to complete the conquest with 300,000 of his troops, Xerxes returned to Sardis. And though the war continued for several years longer, the invasion proved a failure in the end. In 465 Xerxes was murdered by Artabanus, who aspired to the kingship of Persia. He was succeeded by his son Artaxerxes I].

Artabanus, the sixth king of Persia, began to reign; and he reigned for seven months, which the historians call a year. Since Xerxes had died and had left behind two sons, Darius and Artaxerxes (Artaxerses), Artabanus instigated the younger brother to slay the elder one, saying that the elder brother had slain their father. But Vado (Vagabasus), who had knowledge of this evil deed, disclosed all to Artaxerxes, who in consequence of that mustered his troops as if about to count them. Artaxerxes, pretending that his armor was too short, went about to exchange it for that of Artabanus, who was among them. But when Artabanus was exposed, he and his seven sons were stabbed to death by order of Artaxerxes. And so the latter avenged himself upon Artabanus for the death of his father and brother. [Artabanus was a Hyrcanian, and commander of the bodyguard of Xerxes, whom he treacherously assassinated in 465 BCE, with a view of setting himself upon the Persian throne. According to Aristotle he had previously killed Xerxes' son Darius, and was afraid that the father would avenge him. According to Ctesias, Justin and Diodorus, he killed Xerxes first, and then pretended that Darius had murdered him, and instigated his brother Artaxerxes to avenge the deed. During the first four months of the reign of Artaxerxes I, Artabanus was the ruling power in the state; for this reason some erroneously reckon him as king for seven months. However, as soon as Artaxerxes learned the truth about the murder of his father and brother, he slew Artabanus and his sons.]

Artaxerxes, the seventh king of the Persians, reigned forty years. He was the most handsome of men; but his arms were so long that they reached to his knees; for this reason he was called Longimanus (Long-hands). From the very beginning he levied heavy taxes upon the Persians, for he spent much gold and silver in the construction of buildings in which to deposit tribute money and the interest that accrued from it, in anticipation of public needs. Being an advocate of peace, all men loved him. Ezra, the priest and highly enlightened prophet, brought renown to his kingdom. Nehemiah was his and Darius' cupbearer.

Artaxerxes I, surnamed Macrocheir in Greek ('Long-hand') and translated as Longimanus in Latin ('Long-hands') because his right hand was longer than his left, was the younger son of Xerxes, and was raised to the throne in 465 BCE by the vizier Artabanus, the murderer of his father. After a few months he became aware of the crimes of the vizier, and slew him and his sons. On the whole his reign was peaceful, and he was famed for his mild and magnanimous character. Nepos says he was exceedingly beautiful and valiant. According to Nehemiah, his cupbearer, he was kind, but a rather weak monarch. His reign was disturbed by several insurrections. The war with Athens was terminated in 448, Cyprus and Egypt being ceded to the Persians. In his reign the Jewish religion was definitely sanctioned by law in Jerusalem on the basis of an edict granted by the king to the Babylonian priest Ezra in 458 BCE, and the appointment of Nehemiah as governor of Judea in 445 BCE.

Artaxerxes died in December 425. A great many tablets dated from his reign have been found in Nippur, and a few at other places in Babylonia; but inscriptions of the king himself are not extant. His grandson mentions his buildings in Susa.

Democritus of Abdera (Aberides) [Democritus was born at Abdera in Greece. His father possessed so much property and wealth that he was able to entertain Xerxes on his march through Abdera. The tradition that he blinded himself that he might be less disturbed in his pursuit is probably the invention of a later age, fond of anecdotes of that character. His studies embrace the natural sciences, mathematics, mechanics, grammar, music, philosophy, and various useful arts. With Leucippus he invented the atomic theory of matter. For his biography see note, Folio XXII verso], the philosopher, flourished at this time. At first he listened to Chaldean Magi, and even as a child he became well versed in theology and in astrology. He journeyed to Persia by sea to study geometry there, and later went to Chaldea and to Athens to acquire knowledge of spiritual matters. At Athens he made the acquaintance of Socrates. He finally returned home, a very learned man; and he gave away his paternal inheritance for the common good. Democritus said that he preferred that peace of mind which poverty affords, rather than to be enslaved by the cares of wealth. He betook himself to a small garden by the city wall in order that he might observe nature in solitude, and, as Cicero says in the fifth book of his Tusculum Disputations, so that his mind might prove more productive. In order that he might not see the conduct of evil disposed citizens, he put out his own eyes. He lived 109 years. From his aphorisms we consider this one best: It is more agreeable to keep moderation in your life than excess in another; for moderation is the medicine of necessity.

Heraclitus, the philosopher, was held in esteem at this time. His books were so obscure that they were hardly understood by other philosophers. Toward the end of his life he was asked to say something remarkable; but he answered not. Instead, he twirled his finger about in a steady motion. According to Macrobius, he stated that the soul was a spark of stellar existence. [Heraclitus of Ephesus, was a philosopher, generally considered as belonging to the Ionian school, though he differed from their principles in many respects. In his youth he traveled extensively, and after his return to Ephesus the chief magistracy was offered to him, which however, he transferred to his brother. He appears afterwards to have become a complete recluse, rejecting even the kindnesses offered by Darius, and at last retreating to the mountains, where he lived on pot herbs. Some time later he was compelled by illness, consequent on such meager fare, to retire to Ephesus, where he died at the age of sixty. He flourished about 513 BCE. He wrote a work that contained his philosophical views. From the obscurity of his style he gained the title of the Obscure or the Riddler. He considered fire to be the primary form of all matter; but by fire he meant to describe only clear light fluid, "self-kindled and self-extinguished," and therefore not differing materially from the air of Anaximenes. His most famous utterance, cited in several authors, but most famously by Plato (402a), is: "You can't step twice into the same river." His ideas on flux and paradox/the unity of opposites still provoke philosophical discussion today].

Folio LXXI recto

Themistocles, an Athenian philosopher, was highly regarded in these times, not only in the art of letters, but also in deeds of valor and in naval warfare. Following his advice, the Athenians defeated Xerxes in a naval battle. Even as a child, by reason of his natural intelligence, he always took note of exceptional matters. Ever seeking to satisfy his zeal for learning, and to comprehend beautiful sayings, he spent no time in play or misbehavior. He was ambitious for honor, and sought to become the ruler of the city. When asked by a certain person whether he should give his daughter in marriage to an accomplished poor man or to a securely rich one, he replied: I prefer a man lacking money to money lacking a man. [Themistocles, the celebrated Athenian, was born about 514 BCE. In youth he was impetuous, but displayed great intellectual powers and a lofty ambition for political distinction. He began his career by setting himself in opposition to those who had most power, among whom Aristides was the chief. The fame which Miltiades acquired by his generalship at Marathon made a deep impression upon him, and he said that the trophy of Miltiades would not let him sleep. In 483, his rival Aristides was ostracized (an event to which Themistocles had contributed). From this time on he was the political leader in Athens. In 481 he was Archon Eponymus. He persuaded the Athenians to employ the silver from the mines of Laurium in building ships instead of distributing it among the citizens. He was sure that it was only by a fleet that Athens could repel the Persians and obtain the supremacy in Greece. Later, as the commander of the Athenian fleet, he defeated Xerxes, and to his courage the Greeks owed their salvation from Persian dominion. This victory established his reputation among the Greeks. He was honored by the Spartans, who gave Eurybiades the palm of bravery, and Themistocles the palm of wisdom and skill, with a crown of olive and the best chariot the Spartans possessed. On his advice the Athenians then fortified Athens and the port of Piraeus. But the reputation of Themistocles suffered under accusations of enriching himself by unfair means, and in 471 he was ostracized from Athens and retired to Argos. Under charges of treasonable correspondence with the enemy, he fled from Argos to Corcyra, and then to Epirus, where he took refuge in the house of Admetus, king of Molossi, who refused to surrender him up. He finally reached the coast of Asia in safety. Xerxes was now dead, and Artaxerxes was on the Persian throne. The new king received Themistocles at his court, and in the hope of using him against the Greeks, gave him a handsome allowance, after the Persian fashion, and made him governor of the Persian province of Magnesia where he spent the rest of his life. He has a star turn in the second half of Herodotus', and was the subject of one of Plutarch's biographies—the two most important sources for his life].

Aristides, the Athenian philosopher, a most excellent man, flourished at this time (so Cicero relates in the third book of his On Duties). He was a man of such virtue and righteousness in matters concerning the common good that he acquired the name of the Just. He was so highly regarded by Plato that among all the celebrated men who flourished at Athens he considered Aristides alone worthy of praise. They say that he died so poor that he did not leave enough to pay his burial expenses. [Aristides, an Athenian, surnamed the "Just" was of an ancient aristocratic family. He was the political disciple of Cleisthenes (founder of the Athenian democracy), and partly on that account, partly from personal character, opposed from the first to Themistocles. He fought as the commander of his tribe at Marathon in 490 BCE, and in 489 was made Archon. In 483 he was ostracized, probably in consequence of the triumph of the maritime and democratic policy of his rival. He was still in exile in 480, when the battle of Salamis was fought, but did good service on that occasion by dislodging the enemy with a band of soldiers raised and armed himself from the islet of Psyttaleia. He was recalled from exile in the following year and appointed general, commanding the Athenians at the battle of Plataea. In 477 he and his colleague Cimon obtained for Athens the command of the maritime confederacy. He died after 471, the year of the ostracism of Themistocles, and very likely in 468. He died so poor that he did not leave enough to defray his funeral expenses. Plutarch wrote a biography on Aristides].

Anaxagoras, the philosopher, was also at this time held in regard in the city of Clazomenae [Clazomenae was an important city of Asia Minor on the north coast of the Ionian peninsula on the gulf of Syrna. It had considerable commerce, was celebrated for its temples, and still more as the birthplace of Anaxagoras. Under the Romans it was a free city]. He was so zealous for learning that he gave his entire paternal inheritance to his friends, and went to distant lands in search of knowledge. When he returned to his home after a long absence and saw his father's estates lying in waste, he said, I would not be safe if these riches had not been dissipated. When asked whether he was concerned about his fatherland, he replied, I carry no small but great cares about my fatherland; and he pointed his finger to heaven. When asked to what purpose he was created, he replied, To observe the sun, moon, and heaven. To one who informed him of the death of his son, he said, You tell me nothing new, for I knew he was mortal when I begot him. At the age of 72 years he was imprisoned by the Athenians and put to death by a drink of poison, because he called the sun, which they worshipped as a god, a fiery stone. [Anaxagoras, a celebrated Greek philosopher of the Ionian school, was born at Clazomenae in Ionia in 500 BCE. He gave his property to his relatives, in order to devote his life to higher ends. He went to Athens at the age of 20, and there he remained for 30 years. He became the teacher of the most eminent men of the time, including Euripides and Pericles. His doctrines gave offense to the religious feelings of the Athenians, and he was accused of impiety by the enemies of Pericles. It was only through the eloquence of Pericles that his life was spared; but he was sentenced to pay a fine of five talents and to go into exile from Athens. He retired to Lampsacus, where he died in 428, at the age of 72. Anaxagoras was dissatisfied with the philosophic system of his predecessors who had endeavored to explain nature and its various phenomena by regarding matter in its different forms and modifications as the cause of all things; but Anaxagoras, on the other hand, conceived the necessity of seeking a higher cause, independent of matter, and this he considered to be mind, thought or intelligence].

Empedocles, also an Athenian philosopher, flourished in esteem at this time. He was so accomplished in song that by his sweet singing he calmed down an angry and raging youth (a guest of Empedocles) who was about to pursue another guest who had complained against his father. He taught that in all the manifold forms of nature there are three things: Disdain of affluence; zeal for future salvation, and enlightening of the mind. Of these nothing is more honorable than the first; nothing more real than the second; and for the quick acquisition of both, nothing more necessary than the third. He caused himself to be cremated on the supposition that the soul is immortal. [Empedocles, of Agrigentum in Sicily, flourished about 444 BCE. Although of an ancient and wealthy family, he joined the revolution in which Thrasydaeus, the son and successor of Theron, was expelled. He was magnanimous in the support of the poor, severe in the persecution of the aristocrats, and declined the sovereignty which was offered him. His brilliant oratory, his penetrating knowledge of nature, his reputation for marvelous powers in curing disease, his exertions in removing marshy districts and in averting epidemics, spread a luster around his name. He was called a magician. He traveled in Greece and Italy, and made a stay at Athens. His death is said to have been marvelous, like his life. One tradition has it that he was removed from the earth, like a divine being; another, that he threw himself into the flames of Mount Aetna, that by his sudden disappearance he might be believed to be a god; but it was added that the volcano threw up one of his sandals, and thus revealed the manner of his death. His works were all in verse, the most important being a didactic poem on nature. He believed in the migration of souls. He first established the number of four elements, which he called the roots of all things].

Sappho (Sappho) [Sappho, surprisingly, has two entries in the . In addition to the one here, Schedel previously devoted a short paragraph to her in the Fourth Age at Folio LXI verso, where she follows Pythagoras. The two entries are quite different (e.g. in the former she is strangely called Sappho Crexea).], born in the city of Lesbian [Sappho was born on the island of Lesbos. 'Lesbian' is an adjective describing any citizen or place on that island]. Mytilene (Mitilena), another poetess, lived in high esteem at this time. She was the offspring of honorable and famous parents, and was, therefore, of (such) a noble disposition that, in the bloom of youth and beauty, she was not content only to write in prose but, spurred on by the widening passion of her spirit and by the vivacity of her innate talents, and with a zeal for learning, she ascended the steep slopes of the lofty peak of Parnassus. And with happy daring she joined the welcoming Muses. What more (is there to say)? By that passion of hers it has turned out that all the way up to our day her poetry, very famous in the testimony of the ancients, is (still) shining. She did not hesitate to bring forth lyric melodies. Therefore a bronze statue was erected in her memory. And she herself was counted among the famous poets. Nevertheless, her works were lost through the neglect of our ancestors.

All but the last sentence in the Latin edition of the Chronicle is taken from Boccaccio. The German edition, in fact, removes it, in addition to changing (mostly abridging) some of the Latin text's information on Sappho:

Sappho, a native of Lesbian Mytilene, another poetess, lived in high esteem at this time. She was the offspring of honorable and noble parents, and was therefore of a noble disposition. In the bloom of her youth she was of beautiful stature. In her passion and zeal for learning, she cast herself down from the heights of Mount Parnassus. She left behind many of her lovely poems. Therefore a bronze statue was erected in her memory.

The German entry on Sappho is less florid and more logical than the Latin text. There are no non-sequitur sentences in this version, and the removal of the last line eliminates problems with the claim that Sappho's poetry is still "shining in our (i.e. Boccaccio's or Schedel's) own day" when it didn't really exist in the West before the year 1500 (after that period, especially in the 19th and 20th centuries, many fragments were discovered in Egypt). The German version thus shows clear evidence of a strong editorial hand.

Zeuxis (Zeusis), a great painter, was at this time (as Eusebius states) in great renown. He acquired such great riches that he gave away his paintings, saying that they were priceless and therefore not for sale. As Pliny states in book 35 of his Natural History, he brought the painter's brush to great glory. And he acquired so much wealth that he decided to give away as gifts his own works. And he was saying that they could not be exchanged for a price that was of sufficient worth.

Cf. Schedel's source, Pliny, Natural History 35.36:

Opes quoque tantas adquisivit, ut in ostentatione earum Olympiae aureis litteris in palliorum tesseris intextum nomen suum ostentaret. Postea donare opera sua instituit, quod nullo pretio satis digno permutari posse diceret, sicuti Alcmenam Agragantinis, Pana Archelao. And he acquired such great wealth that he advertised it at Olympia by displaying his own name embroidered in gold lettering on the checked pattern of his robes. Afterwards he set about giving away his works as presents, saying that it was impossible for them to be sold at any price adequate to their value: for instance he presented his Alcmena to the city of Girgenti and his Pan to Archelaus. (H. Rackham, Pliny, Vol. IX; Loeb Classical Library, 1957; pp. 307, 309)

This sentence along with the preceding two are not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Moreover he painted, as the same Pliny says, a child carrying grapes, to which (fruit) the birds flew. And he became angry, and said, I painted the grapes better than the child, for if I had created a child, the birds would have feared it. He is also given credit by Quintilian for having discovered shadows. There also lived at this time a highly celebrated artist named Parrhasius, who entered upon a contest with the aforementioned Zeuxis. For as Zeuxis exhibited his grapes, painted with such skill that the birds flew to them, Parrhasius brought forth a curtain painted with birds, and Zeuxis thought they were in truth birds. But when the curtain was moved away, and it was seen to be a painting, the mistake was understood. So Zeuxis yielded the palm to his rival Parrhasius, for he had deceived him with the birds. [Zeuxis, the celebrated painter, who excelled all his contemporaries except Parrhasius, was a native of Heraclea (probably of the city of that name on the Euxine), and flourished 424-400 BCE. He came to Athens soon after the Peloponnesian War, when he had already achieved a great reputation, although but a young man. He spent some time in Macedonia, at the court of Archelaus, for whom he decorated the royal palace at Pella with paintings, probably soon after 413. He painted a picture of Helen of Troy for the city of Croton in Magna Graecia. He also visited Sicily, where he gave away his paintings to the Agrigentines. Again we find him at Olympia where he made an ostentatious display before the eyes of all Greece, of the wealth which his art had brought him, by appearing in a robe embroidered with his own name in letters of gold. After acquiring a great fortune he adopted the custom of giving away his pictures because no adequate price could be set upon them. The time of his death is unknown. The picture of Helen is his masterpiece, and for this he had as models the five most beautiful virgins of Croton. It was painted for the city's temple to Hera. The art of accurate imitation of still life was carried almost to perfection by Zeuxis and his younger rival Parrhasius. The well-known story of the trial of skill, if not literally true, indicates the opinion which was held in ancient times of their powers of imitation. In this contest Zeuxis entered his painting of a bunch of grapes, so realistic that the birds flew at the picture to eat the fruit. Confident of victory, he called upon his rival no longer to delay to draw aside the curtain to show his picture; but the picture of Parrhasius was the curtain itself, which Zeuxis had mistaken for a real drapery. On discovering his error Zeuxis honorably yielded the palm to Parrhasius, saying that he had himself deceived birds but that Parrhasius had deceived an artist].

(A) SAPPHO (SAPHO) THE POETESS

(B) ZEUXIS AND PARRHASIUS

Zeuxis and Parrhasius are portrayed by a single woodcut. Zeuxis is seated at a table, his arms folded. Before him lies a picture, which may or may not be his painting of Helen of Troy, but certainly not of a bunch of grapes. His expression is one of deep thought and disappointment. He may be meditating upon his defeat, and apparently his grapes have turned sour. Yet we may be wrong. Possibly he is just a weary sitter, having his portrait painted; for to the right is another artist busily engaged at his easel, with palette and brush in hand. This must be the triumphant Parrhasius. Surely Parrhasius is not painting his famous curtain, which Zeuxis mistook for a real one; for the canvas is a very small one. And after all, he seems to be painting the sitter behind his easel, a rather awkward position in which to pose a subject.

Toulouse (Tolosa), a city lying within the mountainous regions of Gaul, was founded by the Trojan, Tolosus. Now when the Romans took the city, they established themselves there in residence and improved it with a large market-house, capitol, and other buildings, of which some are still to be seen there. It lies near the Narbonensian city which was built by the associates of Aeneas, and is not far from Aquitania and the Sonciatic [The Senones are probably here meant. They were a powerful people in Gallia Lugdunensis, who dwelt along the upper course of the Seine. Augustus divided Gaul into four provinces – Gallia Narbonensis, the same as the old Provincia; Gallia Aquitania, extending from the Pyrennes to the Loire; Gallia Lugdunensis, the country between the Loire and the Seine and Saone – so called from the colony of Lugdunum (Lyon); and Gallia Belgica, between the Seine, Saone and the Rhine]. people. Here Paulus, the disciple of Saint Paul, performed miracles and rests in peace. It is a capital city, and through Pope John XXII was first endowed as an archbishopric. Castles were erected there, and the city became subject to the arch-episcopal jurisdiction. It is subject to the king of France. A university has also been built there. Here also is the body of Saint Saturninus and various relics of the apostles, which are held in great veneration. He was the first bishop there. He was taken by the pagans and thrown down all the steps from the top of the capitol building, and his head was crushed, his brains were beaten out, and his whole body was torn to pieces. And so at this place he breathed out his worthy soul to Christ. [Toulouse (Tolosa), a town of Gallia Narbonensis, was situated in Garumna, near the Aquitanian frontier. It was subsequently made a Roman colony, surnamed Palladia. It was a large and wealthy town, and contained a celebrated temple in which it is said there was deposited a great part of the booty taken by Brennus, leader of the Senonian Gauls, from the temple at Delphi. Town and temple were plundered by the consul Q. Servilius Caepio in 106 BCE; but the subsequent destruction of his army and his own unhappy fate were regarded as a divine punishment for his sacrilege. The city stands on the right bank of the Garonne, and is the capital of the department of Haute-Garonne in southwestern France. The church of St. Sernin, or Saturnin, whom legend represents as the first preacher of the gospel in Toulouse, where he was perhaps martyred about the middle of the third century, is the largest Romanesque basilica in existence, being 375 feet in length by 210 feet in breadth. In the crypts are many relics, which, however, were robbed of their gold and silver shrines during the Revolution. Toulouse is the seat of an archbishopric, a court of appeal, a court of assizes, and a prefect].

Tours (Turo), a capital of Gaul, was built by Brutus, king of the Britons. He named it Turon after his grandson Turnus, who was there slain in battle by Aewalfredo (Gualfredo), Duke of Aquitania. It is a great industrial city on the river Loire (Liger), which divides the Bituriges [The Bituriges were a numerous and powerful people in Gallia Aquitania, and in early times were supreme over the Celtic tribes of Gaul]. from the Hediis(?). Above it is a sea that gives it shipping advantages. It is also an arch-episcopal seat, to which eleven other bishops, chiefly in Celtica, are subject. And although the region retains the tribal name of Brittany, yet it lies in the kingdom of France. Although the city is very rich and has many estates, it also contains many ordinary buildings. It had many excellent and virtuous men, renowned for their piety. One was the most holy bishop Martinus, who awakened three persons from the dead. Another was Perpetuus, also a bishop of marvelous holiness. [Tours (Turo, but correctly Turoi), on the Loire River, was originally called Altionos, and later Caesarodunum. It was the chief town of the Turones, a people in the interior of Gallia Lugdunensis. Tours became Christian about 250 CE through the preaching of Gatien, who founded the bishopric. When Gratian made tours the capital of Lugdunensis Tertia, it became an archbishopric. In the fifth century the official name of the city was changed to Civitas Turonorum. It fell to the Visigoths in 473, and later became part of the Frankish dominion under Clovis. The arts flourished in tours during the Middle Ages. In the 17th and 18th centuries it was the capital of the government of Touraine. Balzac was a native of Tours. Today the city, a university town, is noted primarily for its medieval cathedral (Cathedral of St. Gatien, also known simply as Tours Cathedral) and its central position in the heart of the Loire Valley with its numerous chateaux].

Milan (Mediolanum), the mighty city of the Insubres, [The Insubres were a Gallic people who crossed the Alps and settled in Gallia Transpadana in northern Italy. Their chief town was Mediolanum (present day Milan). They were a powerful tribe, but were conquered by the Romans shortly before the Second Punic War. It was taken by the Romans in 222 BCE and later became the residence of the emperors of the West, till the coming of Atilla, who plundered the town and induced the people to transfer the seat of government to the strongly fortified Ravenna. Mediolanum was one of the foremost cities of the empire, and on the fall of the Western empire it became the seat of Theodoric the Great and the capital of the Ostrogothic kingdom, surpassing even Rome in population and prosperity. It received a fearful blow in 539 CE, when, having sided with Belisarius, it was taken by the Goths under Vistiges, a great part of it destroyed and the inhabitants put to the sword. It again became important under the Lombards]. located on this side of the mountainous region of Gallia, and mother of other cities, had its origin, as narrated by Livy of Padua and Trogius Pompeius, with the Gauls, who under their commander Brennus marched into Italy. Many say this city was not built in the reign of king Assuerus by the Senonian Gauls, but was enlarged and improved by them. Yet others say it was built in the time of Joshua, the judge of the Hebrews, and was illustrious in the time of the Trojans. Then when the Sicambri, [The Sicambri (Sygambri, Sugambri, Sigambri or Sycambri) were one of the most powerful peoples of Germany at an early time. They belonged to the Istaevones, and dwelt originally north of the Ubii on the Rhine, from where they spread toward the north as far as Lippe. They were mentioned by Caesar, who invaded their territory. They were conquered by Tiberius in the reign of Augustus, and a large number of them were transplanted to Gaul, where they received settlements between the Maas and the Rhine as Roman subjects. The portion who remained in Germany withdrew farther south, probably to the mountainous country in the neighborhood of the Taunus, a large range of mountains, at no great distance from the confluence of the Moenus (Main) and the Rhine. Shortly afterwards they disappear from history, and are not mentioned again till the time of Ptolemy, who places them much farther north, close to the Bructeri and the Langobardi, somewhere between the Vecht and the Yssel. At a still later period we find them forming an important part of the confederacy known under the name of Franci]. a people of Germany in the time of Samson, the judge, marched toward Milan with hostile intent, they were intercepted by Julius the Insubrian king; and they made peace, and entered into an alliance to become a single people and kingdom. Until the time of Brennus [Brennus was the leader of the Senonian Gauls. In 390 BCE he invaded Italy. He defeated the Romans at the Allia, some twelve miles from Rome. He then appears to have delayed a day or two, giving the Romans time to fortify the Capitol; he then sacked Rome, besieged the Capitol for six months, accepted the offer of the defenders to ransom themselves, and then, probably departed safely with his booty. It is difficult to disentangle the facts of this invasion from the legends. We may or may not believe the massacre of the Patricians in their chairs; the night attack on the Capitol, the sacred geese and the exploits of Manlius; the false weights at the paying of the ransom, and the hurling by Brennus of his sword into the scales, with the famous words, "Vae Victus." Livy says that at the time of the payment, Brennus and his forces were wiped out by Camillus]. it was not a large city, but he increased it in a wonderful manner. It is the industrial center of the entire country of Lombardy, and it has a very fertile soil. Hercules Maximianus [Maximianus was Roman emperor from 286 to 305 CE. He was born of humble parents in Pannonia, and had acquired such fame in the army that Diocletian selected this rough soldier for his colleague, as one whose abilities were likely to prove valuable in the disturbed state of public affairs. Accordingly, he created him first Caesar (285), and then Augustus (286), conferring at the same time the honorary appellation of Herculus, while he himself assumed that of Jovius. After having been reluctantly compelled to abdicate, at Milan (305), he was again invested with the imperial title by his son Maxentius, in the following year (306) to whom he rendered the most important service in the war with Severus and Galerius. Having been expelled from Rome shortly afterwards by his son, he took refuge in Gaul with Constantine, to whom he had previously given his daughter Fausta in marriage. Here he again attempted to assume the imperial throne, but was easily deposed by Constantine in 308. Two years afterwards he endeavored to induce his daughter Fausta to destroy her husband, and was in consequence compelled by Constantine to put an end to his own life]. improved the city with battlements, surrounded it with another wall, enlarged the city, and named it Herculeum, after himself. In honor of Hercules he also built a temple, now dedicated to Saint Lawrence. After a long period of prosperity the city sustained a misfortune; for, while Saint Ambrose was still a bishop, it suffered from the Arian heresy.

Arianism was the belief of Arius, a presbyter of the church of Alexandria, who died in 336 CE. He held that Christ was the first and noblest of all created beings, but that, as there was a time when he did not exist, he was not the Eternal Son of God, and that there was no Trinity, as the Son was of the same substance as the Father.

Clovis, king of the Franks, was baptized at Rheims with 4000 of his followers in CE 496. He accepted the orthodox faith; on the other hand Ulfilas and those who had received Christianity through his influence were adherents of Arianism, a form of faith which had been declared heretical by the Council of Nicaea in 325 CE.

Later the tyrant Atilla marched into Italy, and ravaged Milan. After its reconstruction the city was at peace for a brief period, but was then overrun by the Lombards. However, after Charles the Great subdued the Lombards, the city flourished for 360 years, but was then leveled to the ground by Frederick Barbarossa. Afterwards the Milanese, with the help of the Parmensians [Parmensians, the inhabitants of Parma or Parmensia (originally in Gallia Cispadana)]. and Placentians [Placentians, the inhabitants of Placentia or Placentinus, now Piacenza. Formerly a Roman colony in Cisalpine Gaul], rebuilt their city with such zeal that in three years the city became richer, mightier, and stronger than it formerly was, and increased marvelously. Pope Alexander writes that Milan has a very good natural position; that it suffers neither from extremes of heat nor cold—for that reason it is very habitable, has good air and fresh wholesome water; that it has 17 beautiful seas and 60 waterfalls which give moisture to the soil in this region. How the city flourished is indicated by the great temples which stood there, and which still stand there—the royal houses; the nobility of its celebrated buildings; its mighty lords and the assemblies of the clergy; the swarm of travelers and of the learned; its industries and trade in weapons, cloth, and many kinds of garments. The above named pope also states that Barnabas, a disciple with Paul, was the first bishop there; and not long after him came Saint Ambrose, who converted Saint Augustine to the Faith. In recent times the lords built a very tall castle there and a very praiseworthy hospital and a church to Our Lady was erected there. And they adorned the city in many other ways.

Milan was an important place from remote antiquity. It was founded by the Celts, and during the Roman period rose to be one of the chief cities of northern Italy, and in the fourth century it was often the residence of the emperors, particularly of Constantine the Great (324-37) and Theodosius (379-95) whose edicts in favor of Christianity were issued from there. The Lombard kingdom was overthrown by Charlemagne, whose successors ruled over the country by means of governors. It was against the walls of the Lombard cities that the power of the Hohenstaufen was broken. Their league was headed in 1167 by Milan, which was soon rebuilt after its destruction by Frederick Barbarossa in 1162. Feuds between the nobles and the people led in 1277 to domination by the Visconti, who by successful wars and diplomacy gained possession of a great part of northern Italy, and who proved famous patrons of the arts and sciences. Gian Galeazzo Visconti (1378-1402) founded the Cathedral of Milan and the Certosa of Pavia. In 1450 the condottiere Francesco Sforza forced his way into power. He built the Castle and the Ospedale Maggiore, and invited Italian and Byzantine scholars to his court. Still more brilliant was the court of Lodovico Sforza, surnamed il Moro, who in 1477 usurped the guardianship of Francesco's grandson, Gian Galeazzo Sforza. During his sway Bramante and Leonardo da Vinci came to Milan, raising it to the pinnacle of its artistic fame. The marriage of the Emperor Maximilian I with Bianca, Gian Galeazzo's daughter, and Lodovico's diplomatic alliance with Charles VIII of France ushered in a European war for the possession of upper Italy. Expelled by Louis XII in 1499, Ludovico ended his days in a French prison, but the victory gained by Charles V at Pavia in 1525 resulted in the cession of the duchy to his son Philip II of Spain. In 1714 the War of succession transferred the duchy to the House of Austria. An insurrection in 1848 compelled the Austrians to vacate the city, and the patriotic agitations which ensued were happily ended by the desired union with the new kingdom of Italy in 1859.

The plain around Milan is extremely fertile, owing to the richness of the alluvial soil deposited by the Po, Ticino, Olona, and Adda, and to the excellent system of irrigation. From the cathedral roof it presents the appearance of a vast garden divided into square plots by rows of mulberry or poplar trees. To the east, this plain stretches as far as the eye can see towards Venice and the Adriatic; on the southern side the line of the Apennines from Bologna to Genoa closes the view; to the west rise the maritime Cottian and Graian Alps; while northward are the Pennine, Helvetic and Rhaetian Alps.

The principal architectural attraction is the Cathedral of Milan, built of brick cased in marble from the quarries that Gian Galeazzo Visconti gave in perpetuity to the cathedral chapter. Begun in 1386, it was then the largest church in existence, and now, after St. Peter's at Rome and the cathedral of Seville, it is the largest church in Europe. It covers an area of 14,000 square yards and has a capacity of 40,000 people. The interior is 486 feet long, 189 feet wide; the nave is 157 feet high, and the distance from the pavement to the top of the tower is 356 feet. The style is a very elaborate Gothic. The cathedral is regarded by the Milanese as the eighth wonder of the world. The roof, marble like the rest of the building, is adorned with 98 turrets, and the interior with upwards of 2,000 statues in marble. The stained glass windows in the choir are said to be the largest in the world. The church is cruciform in shape, with double aisles and a transept, the latter also flanked with aisles. The interior is supported by immense pillars.

The Castel Sforzesco, or Castle of Milan, stands in the Parco Nuovo. It was built in 1450 by Francesco Sforza on the site of the one erected by Galeazzo II. Visconti (1355-1378), and demolished in 1447 by the populace after the death of Filippo Maria Visconti. After many vicissitudes it was restored – including especially the splendid entrance tower by Antonio Averulino (Filarete, 1451-1453), destroyed by a powder explosion in 1521 – in the 15th century style, and it is now a most imposing structure.

Xerxes (Xerxes), the second of that name, eighth king of Persia, reigned only two months; and after him Sogdianus, the ninth king, reigned only seven months. Because of these brief periods there is nothing memorable to mention. [Xerxes II, the only legitimate son of Artaxerxes I, succeeded his father as king of Persia in 425, but was murdered after a reign of only two months by his half-brother Sogdianus, who thus became king. Sogdianus was one of the illegitimate sons of Artaxerxes I. Sogdianus, however, was murdered in turn, after a reign of seven months, by his brother Ochus, who reigned under the name of Darius II].

Jesus (Iesus), son of Sirach (Syrach), a Hebrew, wrote the Book of Ecclesiasticus, in which he treated of the virtues, both spiritual and moral in a very beautiful manner. He called the book Ecclesiasticus because it speaks of and teaches everything that concerns spiritual discipline and ethics. [Jesus, son of Sirach, was the author of (or 'The Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach'), one of the most valuable of the Apocryphal books. It resembles the books of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and Job in its ethical characteristics. The author was a Jew, and he wrote the book probably early in the third century, although the Greek translation was issued about 132 BCE. It was originally written in Hebrew, and in this language about one half of it has recently been discovered in Egypt and published. It is one of the works that gives us a vivid idea of the Wisdom literature produced in the centuries preceding the Christian era].

Herodotus, a Greek historian, to be extolled above all others in Greece, at this time wrote his books of history. [Herodotus, Greek historian, and father of history, was born at Halicarnassus, a Doric colony in Caria, in 484 BCE. He later spent time in Athens, and was honored by being allowed to settle in the newly created Athenian colony at Thurii, in Italy, where he died. Where he wrote his history is not definitely known; but Lucian relates that he read his work to the assembled Greeks at Olympia, which was received with such universal applause, that the nine books of the work were in consequence honored with the names of the nine muses. On almost every page of his work he records the results of his personal observations and inquiries (the Greek word 'historia' means 'inquiry'). He spent much time in many parts of Greece, and in Asia Minor and Syria. He probably traveled extensively in Egypt and the lands of the Middle East. The object of his work is to give an account of the struggles between the Greeks and the Persians, and the second half of his history in particular is a brilliant recounting of the various Persian invasions of Greece, culminating in Xerxes' massive expedition in 480 BCE. His work concludes with the taking of Sestos by the Greeks in 478 BCE. The history is full of digressions and episodes, the most famous being book 2, which is almost entirely devoted to Egyptian history, culture, sociology, anthropology, and religion]. After he read them in the public assemblies at Athens, he attained to great honor as one (whose style), as Quintilian [Quintilian (M. Fabius Quintilianus), most celebrated Roman rhetorician, was born in Spain in 40 CE, attending lectures at Rome in his youth. Pliny the Younger was one of his pupils. He is also celebrated as the first public instructor to receive a regular salary from the imperial exchequer. After devoting twenty years to his profession, he retired to private life and died at about seventy-eight years of age. His greatest work is a complete system of rhetoric in twelve books]. says, is sweet and brilliant. Pliny, in book 12 of his Natural History, says that he wrote a history. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle].

Darius, surnamed Nothus (Notus), tenth king of Persia, reigned 29 years. After he ascended the throne, he waged severe wars against the Athenians and put them to flight, so that afterwards they dared not resist him. In the tenth year of his reign the Egyptians seceded from him. [Darius II was king of Persia from 424-405 BCE. He was called Ochus before his accession, and then named Nothus ('Bastard'), from his being one of the bastard sons of Artaxerxes I. He obtained the throne by murdering his brother Sogdianus. Darius was governed by eunuchs, and the weakness of his government is shown by the repeated insurrections of his satraps. In 414 the Persians were expelled from Egypt].

Sophocles, the Athenian tragic poet, was by reason of his great ingenuity called the divine poet by Cicero. In the last days of his life he sent his poetry to be read before an assembly of the learned; and when he heard that he was the victor, he died for joy. [Sophocles, the celebrated tragic poet, was born in 495 BCE in the village of Colonus, about one mile from Athens. His first appearance as a dramatist took place in 468, under peculiarly interesting circumstances. On this occasion, so the story goes, at the age of 27, he came forward as the rival of Aeschylus, whose supremacy had been maintained through an entire generation. The solemnities of the Great Dionysia (the festival in honor of the god Dionysus held in March in Athens) were rendered more imposing by the occasion of the return of Cimon from the expedition to Scyros, bringing with him the bones of Theseus. Public expectation was so excited respecting the approaching dramatic contest, and party feeling ran so high that Apsephion, the Archon Eponymus, whose duty it was to appoint the judges, had not yet ventured to proceed to the final act of drawing the lots for their election, when Cimon with his nine colleagues in the command, having entered the theater, the Archon detained them at the altar, and administered to them the oath appointed for the judges in the dramatic contests. The first prize was awarded to Sophocles, the second to Aeschylus, who was so mortified that he left Athens and retired to Sicily. From this time on Sophocles held the supremacy of the Athenian stage, until Euripides came forth as a new rival and won the first prize in 441. The following year Sophocles brought forth the earliest of his extant dramas, , a play which gave the Athenians such satisfaction, especially on account of the political wisdom which it displayed, that they elected him one of the ten generals that year (Pericles was also one). Sophocles died in 406 at the age of 90].

Artaxerxes (Artaxerses), the second of that name, whose nickname was Mnemon (Memnon), whom the Hebrews call Assuerus, was the eleventh king of the Persians for 40 years. He was the son of the above named Darius (II), and the mightiest of all those who had preceded him, for he ruled over 127 provinces from India to Ethiopia. In the third year of his reign he made a great feast and dined his subjects in a wonderful tabernacle. And the queen Vasci (Vasti), who declined to come, he deposed, and gave the honor to Hester, and made her queen in the former's place. [Artaxerxes II, nicknamed Mnemon (Greek for 'ever-mindful,' 'having a good memory'), from his good memory, succeeded his father Darius II, and reigned from 405-359 BCE. Cyrus, his younger brother, and supported by Greek mercenaries, invaded upper Asia. Cyrus fell in battle in the neighborhood of Cunaxa, near Babylon. Notwithstanding perpetual conflicts with the Greeks, the Persian empire maintained itself by the internal discord among the Greeks themselves, which was fomented by Persian money. The peace of Antalcidas (388 BCE) gave the Persians even greater power and influence than they possessed before. But Persia too was suffering from internal disturbances, and Artaxerxes had to carry on frequent wars with his tributary princes and satraps, who endeavored to make themselves independent. His attempts to recover Egypt failed. Toward the end of his reign he put to death his eldest son Darius, who had formed a plot to assassinate him. His last days were still further embittered by the unnatural conduct of his son Ochus, who caused the destruction of two of his brothers in order to secure the succession of himself. Artaxerxes was succeeded by Ochus, who ascended the throne as Artaxerxes III].

Artaxerxes (Artaxerses) the Third, also known as Ochus, and a son of Assuerus (Artaxerxes II) by Hester, was the twelfth king of Persia, and reigned for 26 years. He was so serious and cruel a man that by his acts he earned for himself an everlasting place in the memory of the Persians. He recalled to power Nectanabis [Nectanabis II came to the throne of Egypt in 361 BCE. For some time he defeated all the attempts of Artaxerxes III (Ochus) to recover Egypt, but he was at length defeated himself, and despairing of making any further resistance, he fled into Ethiopia in 350. He was the third king of the Sebennite dynasty, and the last native sovereign to rule over Egypt], the king of Egypt, who had been driven into Ethiopia. Suspecting a conspiracy among his subjects, he spared neither his relatives nor the princes (of his realm) from murder and death, disregarding blood and tribal relations, and age. Nor did he himself escape divine vengeance, for he was slain by his own people. [Artaxerxes III, also called Ochus, reigned from 359-338 BCE. In order to secure his throne, he began his reign with a merciless extirpation of the members of his own family. A reckless despot, the great advantages which the Persian arms gained during his reign, were alone due to his Greek generals and mercenaries. By this means he put down the revolt of the satrap, Artabazius, reduced the Phoenicians and several towns which had revolted in Cyprus, and finally Egypt, in 350. The reins of government were entirely in the hands of Bagoas, the eunuch, and of Mentor, the Rhodian. Finally he was poisoned by Bagoas, and was succeeded by his youngest son Arsēs].

Arsēs (Arsanus Ochus), the king's son, and thirteenth king of Persia, reigned 4 years and had many sons about whom Herodotus makes mention [There is no mention of this king or his sons in Herodotus'. Th phrase, "about whom Herodotus makes mention," in fact, is not found in the German edition].; but of him we hear nothing memorable. [Arsēs was the youngest son of Artaxerxes III (Ochus). He was raised to the Persian throne by the eunuch Bagoas, after he had poisoned Artaxerxes in 339 BCE; but he too, was murdered by Bagoas in the third year of his reign, when he attempted to free himself from the bondage in which he was kept. After the death of Arsēs, Bagoas made Darius III king]. But Jaddua (Jaddus) the sixth Jewish priest, in this year, succeeded his deceased father Johanan in the priesthood; and he held the office 50 years—a good man and a lover of peace. [Jaddua, the son of Jonathan, was high priest of the Jews, and officiated a considerable time after the Captivity. He is believed to be the same who lived in the time of Alexander the Great, and is the last of the high priests mentioned in the Old Testament].

Parmenides, an Athenian philosopher, fled the company of humankind and lived on a mountain ridge in the Caucasus. He first discovered logic, and was a master of Zeno.

Parmenides was a distinguished Greek philosopher, but a native of Elea (not Athens), in Italy. According to Plato, Parmenides at the age of 65 came to Athens to the Panathenaia (the annual festival in honor of the patron goddess of the city, Athena), accompanied by Zeno, then 40 years old, and became acquainted with Socrates, who at that time was quite young. Parmenides was regarded with great esteem by Plato and Aristotle; and his fellow citizens thought so highly of him, that every year they bound their magistrates to obey the laws which he had enacted for them. The philosophical opinions of Parmenides were developed in a didactic poem in hexameter verse entitled On Nature, of which only fragments remain. In this poem he maintained that the phenomena of sense were delusive, and that it was only by mental abstraction that a person could attain to the knowledge of the only reality, a One and All, a continuous and self-existent substance, which could not be perceived by the senses. His insights have haunted philosophers for millennia.

Zeno, the Eleatic philosopher, also a native of Elea (modern day Velia) in Italy, was one of the favorite disciples of Parmenides. His famous logical paradoxes have provided philosophers, mathematicians and writers from the time of Aristotle to the present with much to think about.

Darius, son of the aforementioned Arsanus (Arses), was the last king of the Persians. He received the rule in the first year of the empire of Alexander, and he reigned six years. And as he was the mightiest, and nothing oppressed his royal majesty, he undertook a war with Alexander with varying fortune. But Alexander finally defeated him. He was slain by his own relatives, and thus ended his own life and the kingdom of Persia as well. [Darius III (336-331 BCE) was the last king of Persia. He was the son of Arsames and Sisygambis, and a descendant of Darius II. He was raised to the throne by the eunuch Bogoas, after the murder of Arses. Alexander the Great defeated him in a number of successive engagements. While Alexander was pursuing Darius into the Parthian desert, the king was murdered by Bessus, satrap of Bactria].

Melissus, the philosopher, native of the island of Samos, was a disciple of Parmenides. Aristotle often remembered him. He taught the virtues he practiced. [Melissus of Samos, a Greek philosopher, the son of Ithageneis, was according to common account, the commander of the fleet opposed to Pericles in 440 BCE. But he is not mentioned by Thucydides, and ought probably to be placed much earlier, as he is said to have been connected with Heraclitus, and to have been a disciple of Parmenides. It appears from the fragments of his work, which was written in prose, and in the Ionic dialect, that he adopted the doctrines of Eleatics].

Brennus (Brenus) [We have already encountered Brennus at Folio LXXII recto and will shortly see him appear again in the], leader of the Senonian Gauls, son of Monuchris, king of the Angles, in the 13th year of the reign of Artaxerxes (Assuerus) left his own land with an army of three hundred thousand Gauls and invaded Italy. And after driving the ancient Etruscans into exile and having occupied their cities, he (according to the reports of Polycritus (Policrates) and Justin) threw down the foundations of many cities, as soon will be described. [The German edition of the removes this paragraph devoted to Brennus].

Folio LXXIII recto

Hippocrates, a son of Heraclides (Eraclidis), as Galen (Galienus) in the first (book of his commentary) of (Hippocrates') Regimen of Acute Diseases (though some say that he was a son of Asclepius), and a disciple of Pythagorus (Pitagore), a prince among all physicians, born in the island of Cos (Choo), was highly renowned at this time. He brought back to light the study of medicine that was lost for a long time, and which lay hidden for five hundred years after the death of Aesculapius. He greatly disdained all sensual pleasures. And (as Saint Jerome writes) he bound all his disciples by an oath of secrecy, to modesty in dress, and to good morals. He was (so they say) small of body and well built; had a large head and was slow of movement. He was a man of many ideas, slow of speech, and slender fare. He lived ninety-five years. His teaching was this: He who would be free should not desire that which he may not have. He who would have what he desires should not wish to have that which he may not have. He who would live here in peace should become like one who is invited to a feast, and who is thankful for all that is placed before him, and does not grumble because of the lack of anything. [Hippocrates was the most celebrated physician of antiquity. He was born on the island of Cos about 460 BCE. He belonged to the family of Aesclepiadae, and was the son of Heraclides, who was also a physician. His mother's name was Phaenarete, who was said to be descended from Hercules. He was instructed in medical science by his father and by Herodicus. He wrote, taught, and practiced his profession at home; traveled in different parts of Greece. He is said to have died at Larissa in Thessaly, about 357, at the age of 104. He had two sons and a son-in-law, all of whom followed his profession, and who are supposed to have been the authors of some of the works in the Hippocratic collection. This is all we know of the life of Hippocrates, but much has been added by way of stories, clearly fabulous. Thus he is said to have stopped the plague at Athens by burning fires throughout the city, by suspending chaplets of flowers, and by the use of an antidote. The writings that have come down to us under the name of Hippocrates were composed by several different persons, and are of very different merit. They are more than 60 in number, but of these only a few may be by his hand as opposed to those written later by members of his school. The ancient physicians wrote numerous commentaries on the works in the Hippocratic collection. Of these the most valuable are the commentaries of Galen. Hippocrates divided the causes of diseases into two principal classes; one comprehending the influence of seasons, climates, water, situation, etc, and the other the influence of food, exercise, etc. He considered that while heat and cold, moisture and dryness succeeded each other throughout the year, the human body underwent certain analogous changes, which influenced the diseases of the period. He supposed that the four fluids or humors of the body (blood, phlegm, yellow bile and black bile) are the primary seat of the disease; that health is the result of the due combination (Greek crasis = 'mixing') of these and that, when this combination was disturbed, disease was the consequence; that, in the course of a disorder that was proceeding favorably, these humors underwent a certain change in quality, which was the sign of returning health as preparing the way for the expulsion of the morbid matter (Greek crisis); and that these morbid matters (crises) had a tendency to occur at stated intervals, which were for this reason called "critical dyas." Hippocrates apparently had much experience and knew how to turn it to best account; and the number of moral reflections and sayings that we meet with in his writings, some of which (as, for example, "Life is short, but the Art (of Medicine) is long") have acquired a sort of proverbial notoriety (especially in their somewhat incorrectly understood Latin translations; e.g, Vita brevis, ars longa = 'Life is short, Art long'). The Hippocratic Oath, which in modified form is still taken by medical students when they become doctors, is another of his lasting legacies.]

Zeno, an Attic philosopher from Cyprus, the Greek city, with many Phoenicians as neighbors, was the son of Napeus (or, as others say, of Demeus). Apollonius of Tyre [Apollonius of Tyre was a Stoic philosopher who lived in the reign of Ptolemy Auletes. He wrote a history of Stoic philosophy from the time of Zeno]. said that he was lean of body, straight in build, and had dark skin. His limbs were swollen, weak and sickly. For this reason Chrysippus called him an Egyptian palm. Therefore he shunned many meals. He enjoyed fresh figs grown in the sun. He was a disciple of Crates (Cratis), Stilpo (Stilpionis), and Xenocrates. Together with Cytheus [No such person exists, as far as we know. Perhaps 'Cytheum' is a garbled remembrance of his hometown, Citium]. the philosopher he was a teacher of the Stoic school. They said that the greatest possession is that which is honorable; for nothing will prevent such a person from living righteously and in virtue. Zeno was considered so worthy by the Athenians that the keys of the city were entrusted to him. And they honored him with a golden crown and a bronze statue. His fellow-citizens did likewise. He had many excellent students, particularly Antigonus, to whom he wrote letters from time to time. To a talkative youth he said, We have two ears and but one mouth so that we may hear much and say little. He died at 90 years of age, in good health and without affliction. [Zeno, a native of Citium in Cyprus, was the founder of Stoic philosophy. He began to study philosophy at an early age. According to some he was rich, according to others poor; but whichever is right, his moderation and contentment became proverbial. He studied under Stilpo of the Megaric school; also under Cronus, Philo, Zenocrates and Polemo. Zeno studied philosophy for 20 years, and after having developed his peculiar philosophic system, he opened his school in a certain porch (Stoa Poecile 'The Painted Stoa') in Athens, which at an earlier time was a meeting place of poets. From this place his disciples were called Stoics. Antigonus Gonatus, king of Macedonia, was an admirer of Zeno. The Athenians placed the greatest confidence in him, depositing with him the keys to their fortress, as the most trustworthy man. The date of his birth and death are unknown. He is said to have still been alive in 260 BCE and to have died at the age of 98 years].

Socrates, the highly renowned Athenian philosopher, of the village of Alopece, was the son of Sophroniscus and Phaenarete (Phanarete), his father being a sculptor, his mother a midwife. As some say, he was at first an attendant upon Anaxagoras, and later of Archelaus. [Archelaus was a philosopher, probably a native of Athens, though others say he was born at Miletus. He flourished about 450 BCE. His philosophic system is remarkable as forming a point of transition from the older to the newer form of philosophy in Greece]. He was the master of Plato. He was the first to discover the art of ethics, and he flourished at this time. As Cicero writes, he called the art of wisdom down from heaven, and set it down in the cities, and brought it into the houses. He urged the investigation of good and evil, of morals and life. Therefore (as Solinus states) he was not esteemed the wisest man by the opinion of the people alone, but also by the oracle of Apollo. He was an alert, extraordinary and excellent orator who first opened the field of public speaking with Aeschinus (Eschino), his disciple, as Favorinus states. To obtain wisdom, he traveled even when old, through the most distant regions of the earth. And although he was the most wise, he made no pretensions to knowledge. Therefore he often said (a thing which Jerome often said to Paulinus), This one thing I know, that I know nothing. Socrates was also a man of marvelous chastity, righteousness, and other virtues. In his seal was written (as it is said) A man's friend is his wisdom; but a man's enemy is his stupidity. Among many others of his teachings was this: Manage a strange business in such a way that you do not forget your own. As you wish to appear, so should you be. Finally he was accused of laughing at the oaks, dogs, and roebucks that the Greeks worshipped as gods. For this he was put to death with a dose of poison. But after his death the Athenians repented, and they set up a golden image of him in the temple in his memory. [Socrates, the celebrated Athenian philosopher, was born c. 470 BCE in the Attic deme of Apolece, near Athens. In his youth he was said to have followed the profession of his father, attaining some proficiency as a sculptor. He was robust and possessed great endurance. He went barefoot at all seasons of the year and wore the same homely clothing, no matter what the season. He was very ugly looking, having a flat nose, thick lips, and prominent eyes like a satyr or Silenus. He filled no political office until 406, when he was a member of the senate of Five Hundred. He was man of great moral courage. Much of his life was devoted exclusively to teaching, to the neglect of more material things. Yet he never opened a school nor delivered a lecture; but everywhere, in the market place, the workshop, etc, he sought opportunities for awakening people of all ages to moral consciousness and self knowledge. He fought pretensions and conceit of knowledge in order to pave the way for correct knowledge. He incurred the bitter hatred of the mentally proud, to whom he therefore appeared an intolerable bore. He was persecuted and finally impeached for corrupting the youth and despising the tutelary deities of the State, and for putting new ones in their places. He was found guilty and condemned to death. He drank the cup of hemlock that was given to him, and died with composure and cheerfulness in his seventieth year (399 BCE). His friends and followers, who included Xenophon and Plato, wrote many works about him. Because of them (especially the latter), Socrates is, after Jesus, remembered today as perhaps the most important figure from antiquity (at least in the Western world), and can be said to be (unknown to himself) the beginning of various philosophical schools of thought through his various students/disciples (e.g, Plato, Antisthenes), and their students/disciples (e.g, Aristotle, Diogenes)].

Isocrates, by birth a Greek, was a celebrated orator and disciple of Gorgias. He was an excellent teacher of many natural philosophers, as Macrobius says. And so Quintilian says that he was well versed in many branches of oratory, and better practiced in debate than war. He was a follower of all lovers of good oratory, short on invention, devoted to things honorable, and so industriously labored in the collecting and assembling of literature that he became careless. Among other works he wrote a book in which he says: You should so behave toward your parents as you would have your children behave toward you. You should hold your word more sacred than your possessions. He lived 94 years.

Isocrates (436-338 BCE), an Attic orator, was the son of Theodorus, a successful manufacturer of musical instruments. He received the best education that Athens could provide. He took no part in public life, for which he was unfitted in physique as well as temperament, and he withdrew to Chios. He had already started teaching rhetoric, having lost his fortune in the tumult of the Peloponnesian Wars. He returned at about the time of the restoration of the democracy in 403. For the next ten years he continued to write occasional speeches for the law courts. He himself despised this branch of his work. His real vocation was teaching, and at about 392 he founded his famous school near the Lyceum, where for the rest of his life he may be said to have had the Greek-speaking world from the Black Sea to Sicily for his pupils. There is a tradition that at the panegyric contest on the death of Mausolus of Caria in 351, there was not a competitor who had not been trained by Isocrates. In the meanwhile he was also active as a publicist.

Isocrates amassed considerable wealth in his profession, and fulfilled the usual public services of the rich man at Athens. His political views were in accord with the prevailing tendency of Greek political thought at the time. Whatever may be thought of his political tenets, there is no doubt of his place in the history of literature. He was regarded by the Greeks as representing the smooth or florid school of prose style. His real eminence consists in the fact that by giving an artistic finish to the literary branch of rhetoric, he set a standard in form and rhythm for prose style. This is his legacy to Cicero, and through him to the modern literature of Europe. His extant works consist of 21 speeches or discourses and 9 letters.

Thucydides, a Greek historian, and a certain very serious man, also (lived) at this time, as Eusebius states. And Quintilian adds: He is dense and concise and always hastening forward. [This sentence, from Quintilian's (10.73), is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. Thucydides, and later also Herodotus, were taught to speak in Latin by Lorenzo Valla (Laurentius Vallensis). [Lorenzo Valla (Laurentius Vallensis; 1407-1457), was a celebrated (and controversial) Italian humanist, philosopher, and literary critic. Pope Nicholas V (r. 1447-1455) commissioned him to translate the historians Thucydides and Herodotus (Schedel's fanciful way of putting it—"were taught to speak in Latin"—is one of his best phrases in all the)]. Their works are still held in great esteem. [Thucydides, historian of the Peloponnesian War (431-404 BCE), was born near Athens about 460 BCE. He was one of those who suffered from the terrible plague at Athens, and one of the few who recovered. An aristocrat and military officer, he commanded an Athenian squadron of seven ships at Thasos (424), when he failed to relieve the city of Amphipolis from the brilliant Spartan general Brasidas; and, condemned (unfairly) after this event as a traitor, took refuge in exile, and retired to his Thracian estates. He lived in exile twenty years, and probably returned to Athens in 404. He must have died soon after 400. Thucydides was, in certain ways, the first modern, 'critical' historian. He removes the element of religion from his work, and focuses primarily on the militaristic, economic, sociological, and psychological aspects of the events of his day. The speeches that he puts into the mouths of the various political figures at the time are masterpieces of philosophical thought and sophistic rhetoric (often at the same time). Together with Herodotus, his predecessor of only a few years, he mapped out the limits of the field of history and historiography (adding also his special interests and talents in the field of political science)].

Folio LXXIII verso

Xenophon, a philosopher and distinguished commander of the army of the Athenians, the son of the Athenian Gryllus, was a modest man, incredibly handsome, of good morals, and agreeable to all. He was a disciple of Socrates and a rival of Plato. When he heard the first two books of Plato on the general welfare and care of the State, he was opposed to their ideas and wrote against them; and when Plato heard of that he was affected. He was the first to take note of the things Socrates had said, and brought them to general attention; and he, first of all philosophers, wrote a history. He was also a strict military commander who brought the army back home from the remotest parts of Babylonia through dangerous territory and barbarian nations without loss. He lived to the age of 89 years. [Xenophon (c. 435-354 BCE), Greek historian, essayist, and military commander, was the son of Gryllus, an Athenian knight. He came under the influence of Socrates at Athens. As he recounts in his celebrated military memoir, , in 401 he accepted the invitation of Proxenus of Boeotia, a commander of Greek mercenaries, to join him at Sardis and take service under the Persian prince, Cyrus, ostensibly against the Pisidians, but really against Cyrus's own brother, King Artaxerxes Mnemon. After the failure of this bold scheme and the death of the rebel prince at Cunaxa, Xenophon succeeded Proxenus in the command of the Ten Thousand Greeks. He became the life and soul of the army in his march of 1500 miles, as they fought their way against the ferocious tribes through the highlands of Armenia and the ice and snow of an inclement winter; and with such skill did he lead them that within five months they reached Trapezus, a Greek colony on the Black Sea, and ultimately Chrysopolis (Scutari) opposite Byzantium (399). He secured for his soldiers permanent service in the Lacedaemonian army against the Persians. Sentence of banishment was passed against him from Athens for thus taking service with Sparta. In 396 he formed a close friendship with Agesilaus, the Spartan king, and accompanied him in his eastern campaign; was in his company when he returned to Greece to conduct the war against the anti-Spartan league of Athens, Corinth, and Thebes, and witnessed the battle of Coronea. He went back with the king to Sparta, where he resided on and off until the Spartans presented him with an estate at Scillus, a town taken from Elis. And here he spent some twenty years of his life indulging his taste for literary work and the pursuits of a country gentleman. But the break-up of Spartan ascendancy after the battle of Leuctra drove him from his retreat. The Athenians who had now joined the Spartans against Thebes repealed his sentence of banishment. He settled at Corinth, where he died. His writings are divided into four classes: historical, technical and didactic, politico-philosophical, and ethic-philosophical].

Archytas (Archita) of Tarentum, the son of Mnesagoras (or, as Aristoxenus said, of Histiaeus) (Estei), was a Pythagorean philosopher highly celebrated at this time, and in all branches of ethics was looked upon as a marvel. By a letter that he wrote to Dionysius he saved the life of Plato who was to be put to death. He also wrote many things, among which is the following: There is no greater plague than the carnal pleasures of the body, whose desires are excited to foolish and unrestrained uses. From these arise betrayal of the fatherland and destruction of the common good. There is no vice, no evil action, to which licentiousness does not lead. [Archytas of Tarentum was a distinguished philosopher, mathematician, general and statesman. He lived about 400 BCE, and onwards, so that he was a contemporary of Plato, whose life he is said to have saved by his influence with the tyrant Dionysius. He was seven times the general of his city, and he commanded in several campaigns, in all of which he was victorious. After a life which secured to him a place among the very greatest men of antiquity, he was drowned while upon a voyage on the Adriatic. As a philosopher he belonged to the Pythagorean school, and he appears to have been himself the founder of a new sect. He paid much attention to mathematics. To his theoretical science he added the skill of a practical mechanician, and constructed various machines and automata, among which his wooden flying dove in particular was the wonder of antiquity. He also applied mathematics with success to musical science, and even to metaphysical philosophy. Plato was indebted to him for some of his views; and Aristotle is thought by some writers to have borrowed of him the idea of the categories, as well as some of his ethical principles. (This entry on Archytas was taken word-for-word by our translator and indefatigable note gatherer, Walter Schmauch, without attribution—it was a more innocent time—from Smith's 1870 , Vol. 1, pp. 273-4 s.v. Archytas.])

Plato, the most celebrated philosopher at this time (as Eusebius writes), was the most renowned of all philosophers, and the most brilliant. He was born at Athens to his father Ariston and his mother Perictione (Perictonia) (or as others say, Potone (Petona)), on the same day that Apollo was born at Delos (as Apollodorus states). His mother was of the line of Solon, and his father was descended from Codrus, [Codrus was the last king of Athens]. the son of Melanthus. Plato had two brothers, Adeimantus and Glaucon, and a sister named Petona, from whom sprang Speusippus, the philosopher. He learned grammar and literature with Dionysius the Grammmarian, while Aristone supervised his physical exercise in the gymnasium. Plato at first learned to paint, and also wrote poetry, as well as tragedies. Because of the lordly appearance of his body he was called Plato; although he was first named after his ancestor Aristocles. He studied under (literally 'listened to') Socrates, but upon his death he studied under Cratylus (Crathylus) and Hermogenes, and then, at the age of 29, took himself to Megara to (study with) Euclid; and afterwards he went to Cyrene to study under Theodorus. He later traveled to Egypt where he heard the priests and prophets. On this journey Euripides was his traveling companion. Then he returned to Athens and lived in the Academy. He made three voyages to Sicily, and while fleeing to escape the menace of death, he was sold (into slavery). Being asked how one may attain to wisdom, he replied: Not by waiting for something that may never come to pass, nor by dwelling on the past. Plato, at last, died while seated at a feast at the age of 81.

Plato was born at Athens or in the neighboring islands of Aegina about 429 BCE. Paternally he boasted descent from Codrus, maternally from Solon. He was originally named after his grandfather Aristocles, but because of his fluency of speech, or the breadth of his chest, he received the name by which we know him (Platon = 'broad [shoulders/chest?]'). When a youth he is said to have competed in the Isthmian and other games. He did not devote himself to philosophy until later, probably after he was drawn to those in Socrates' circle. He received instruction from some of the most distinguished teachers. In his twentieth year he started listening to Socrates, becoming one of his most ardent admirers. After the latter's death he withdrew to Megara where he probably composed several of his dialogues. Through friendship for the mathematician Theodorus, he went to Cyrene. He also visited Egypt, Sicily, and the Greek cities in Lower Italy in his quest for knowledge. During his residence in Sicily he became acquainted with the elder Dionysius, but very soon fell out with the tyrant (and, we are told in later, probably legendary, accounts that he was sold by the tyrant into slavery). After his return he taught gratuitously. A narrow circle of his disciples assembled in his garden at simple meals. From his house came his nephew Speusippus, Xenocrates of Chalcedon, Aristotle, Heraclides Ponticus, Hestiaeus of Perinthua, Philippus the Opuntian, and other men from many parts of Greece. With the exception of two visits to Sicily, Plato was occupied from the time he opened his school in the Academy in giving instruction and in the composition of his works. He died in 347 at the age of 82 years. According to his last will and testament, his garden remained the property of the school and passed, considerably increased by subsequent additions, into the hands of the Neo-Platonists who kept as a festival his birthday as well as that of Socrates. (This entry on Plato was taken, and massively abridged, by our translator and indefatigable note gatherer, Walter Schmauch, without attribution—it was a more innocent time—from Smith's 1870 Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities, Vol. 3, pp. 392-405 s.v. Plato.)

Plato is, perhaps, the most famous and influential philosopher in the western tradition. In addition, he is a master prose stylist (his Symposium, for example, in addition to being the most sophisticated—and influential—exploration of the idea of 'love' in western civilization, is also one of the greatest of all literary works from the ancient world).

Antisthenes, the Athenian philosopher, first heard the orator Gorgias, [Gorgias of Leontini, Sicily, was a celebrated rhetorician, orator, sophist and philosopher. He was born about 480 BCE and lived to be about 109 years old, so it is said]. and later became associated with Socrates. He lived in Piraeus and walked 40 stadia [40 stadia are equal to approximately 4.5 miles] to hear him. From Socrates he learned patience and serenity. Antisthenes originated the sect of the Cynics and was a master among them. He derided the haughty and pompous Plato; and when he heard Plato speak ill, he remarked: It is edifying to hear evil when you have been virtuous yourself. Antisthenes wrote many books on various subjects. According to Jerome (when writing his Against Jovinian [Jerome's ('Against Jovinian') was a polemical treatise in two volumes written in 393 CE to counter pagan pride in pagan culture. It was titled 'Against (the monk) Jovinian', because that monk had asserted, among other things, the equality of virginity and marriage. The citation is from 2.344].) Antisthenes, after hearing Socrates, made this observation to his disciples: Go forth and seek a master for yourselves, for I have found one for myself; for all this learning is nonsense, and what you know amounts to nothing. [Antisthenes, an Athenian, was the founder of Cynic philosophy. He was a disciple, first of Gorgias, and later of Socrates, whom he never abandoned. He taught in the Cynosarges, a gymnasium for Athenians born of foreign mothers; this is probably the origin of the name Cynics, although others derived the name from the doglike behavior and neglect of all forms and usages of society by its adherents. His writings, chiefly dialogues, were numerous, his style pure and elegant, and he possessed considerable wit and sarcasm. Being an enemy of all speculation he opposed Plato. His philosophical system was confined almost entirely to ethics. He showed contempt for luxury and the comforts of life by his mean clothing and hard fare. The Stoics later sprang from his school. (This entry on Antisthenes was abridged by our translator and indefatigable note gatherer, Walter Schmauch, without attribution—it was a more innocent time—from Smith's 1870 , Vol. 1, pp. 207-208 s.v. Antisthenes. It has been every so slightly modified by the current editor.)].

Speusippus, Athenian philosopher, was the son of Eurymedon and a nephew of Plato by the latter's sister. He was master of Plato's school for eight years. He was easily angered and extended his hand to pleasures. Indeed, he gave his hand to the doctrine of Epicurus. For these faults Diogenes, the philosopher, severely criticized him. Having become afflicted with paralysis, he begged Xenocrates to take his place as teacher. According to Plutarch he died from an accumulation of lice. Timotheus says he was lean of body. He left many books and dialogues. Favoronius says that Aristotle bought his books for three talents, and that Simonides wrote a biography of him. He was the first to discover how to make large receptacles out of thin wood. [Speusippus, the philosopher, native of Athens, was a son of Plato's sister Potone, and succeeded Plato as president of the Academy, over which he presided for eight years. He developed the doctrines of his master in a number of works, all of which are now lost].

Pavia (Papua), a city of Cisalpine Gaul, whose more ancient name was Ticinum, was (as Pliny says) built by the peoples called Laevi (Levi) and Maricii, who lived on the other side of the mountains; but as the historian Paulus Longobardus states, it was begun and its foundations laid in the time of Assuerus (Artaxerxes II) the king of Persia, by the Senonian Gauls. However, the region had been occupied as a village for a long time by the Insubres of Gaul. The city lies in the region of the Ticinus, the river that flows out of Lake Verbanus. [Verbanus Lacus (Lake Maggiore), one of the principal lakes of Northern Italy]. Over this river a beautiful stone bridge was built; and the city was named Ticinum after the river. It was here that the celebrated Scipio obtained his victory over Hannibal. In this city, because of its location and wholesome climate, the Ostrogothic and Lombardian kings loved to dwell. For this reason it has a history, and many deeds were wrought there; and therefore also it rivaled Milan in greatness, age and esteem. Now, however, Milan excels Pavia, although both were now and then celebrated and illustrious. The city was ravaged by Attila, the king of the Huns. When sometime afterwards it regained its strength, Odoacer [Odoacer, usually called king of the Heruli, was the leader of the barbarians who overthrew the Western empire in 476 CE. He took the title of king of Italy, and reigned till his power was overthrown by Theodoric, king of the Goths. Odoacer was defeated in three decisive battles by Theodoric (489-490) and took refuge in Ravenna, where he was besieged for three years. He at last capitulated on condition that he and Theodoric should be joint kings of Italy; but Odoacer was soon afterwards murdered by his rival], the king of the Heruli (Erolorum), besieged Orestes [Orestes was regent of Italy during the short reign of his infant son Romulus Augustulus (475-6 CE). He was born in Pannonia, and served for some years under Attila; after whose death he rose to eminence at the Roman court. Having been entrusted with the command of an army by Julius Nepos, he deposed this emperor, and placed his son Romulus Augustulus on the throne; but in the following year he was defeated by Odoacer and put to death], there, took him prisoner and put him to death; and he also cruelly destroyed and wasted the city. The defeat of the Roman citizens at this time was so great that the like of it has not occurred elsewhere since the decline of the Roman Empire. But while Rudolf, Duke of Burgundy afflicted the Italian kingdom, the Hungarians, under their commander Salade, in the time of Pope Stephen the Seventh, overran Italy and laid siege to this city, captured it, and ravaged it with fire and sword. In the meantime Pope Agapitus, and the nobility and people of Italy, asked Otto I of Germany to come to Italy; after which Italy began to recover from the oppressions which it had suffered for a long time. Petharit, the Lombard king, here built the cloister of Saint Agatha; and Theodolinda the queen, the Church of Our Lady. Luitprandus (Linthprandus), king of the Lombards, caused the bones of St. Augustine to be brought to Pavia from Sardinia. And with wonderful alacrity a tomb of very white marble was prepared. The same king also called the monastery of St. Peter the Ciel d' Oro (cellula aurea); and in the region where the kings often held court, he erected the monastery of St. Anastasias the martyr. And so here also Gondiberta, the queen, erected the Church of St. John the Baptist; and bishop Peter, the friend of King Luitprandus, the Church of St. Savini. Later still Gian Galeazzo Maria Visconti, the first duke of Milan, industriously devoted himself to the adornment of this city; and after he erected many buildings there, he also built a mighty castle in lordly style, with a large library; and beside the castle was a large forest supplied with game and enclosed by walls. In the midst of this forest he caused to be erected at great expense a tall Carthusian monastery and his tomb. The circumference of the forest is one hundred and twenty cubits. At this time Pavia has in its university many men celebrated in the spiritual arts, jurisprudence, philosophy and medicine. Many illustrious men were also born there, such as Syrus the bishop, highly esteemed in learning and holiness; Ennodius, the most eloquent poet; Antonius Guainerius, the most famous doctor of his age, who composed many works for medicinal cures; Cattonis, Saccus, Silanus; Nigrus, and others. [Pavia, was originally called Ticinum, after the Ticinus (now the Ticino) on whose left bank it is located. This was an important river in Gallia Cisalpina. It rises in Mons Adula, and after flowing through Lacus Verbanus ('Lake Maggiore'), it falls into the Po near Ticinum. It was upon the bank of this river that Hannibal gained his first victory over the Romans by the defeat of P. Scipio in 218 BCE. The chronicler seems to have the situation reversed. Ticinum was a town of the Laevi, or, according to others, of the Insubres. It was subsequently a Roman municipium; but it owed its greatness to the Lombard kings, who made it the capital of their dominions. The Lombards gave it the name of Papua, which it still retains under the slightly changed form of Pavia].

Hermes of Egypt, the philosopher, by our people called Mercury, at one time a disciple of Plato, was celebrated during this time. Although an old man, he was well versed in all branches of learning. By reason of his great knowledge and art he was surnamed Hermes Trismegistus (Trimegestus), that is, three times greater. He wrote many books giving information of things divine; and, among others, a book on the perfect word. And he said—as it is well known in the eighth book of (Augustine's) City of God—that the gods of the pagans were dead people. [Hermes Trismegistus is the reputed author of a great variety of works, some of which are still extant. The Greek god Hermes was identified with the Egyptian Thot, or Theut, as early as the time of Plato. The New Platonists regarded the Egyptian Hermes as the source of all knowledge and thought, and hence called him Trismegistus. A vast number of works on philosophy and religion, written by the New Platonists, were ascribed to Hermes; from which it was pretended that Pythagoras and Plato had derived all their knowledge. The most important of these works is entitled Poemander, apparently in imitation of Pastor of Hermas. It treats of nature, of the creation of the world, the deity, his nature and attributes, the human soul, knowledge, etc].

Apuleius of Madaura in Africa (Apuleius Aphar Madaurensis), also a disciple of Plato, was famous at this time. This same person wrote many books; for within him were combined a peculiar surplus and grace of knowledge and the means of expression. He wrote books about the golden ass, Metamorphoses, that they call a Greek fable; the four books of his Florida; On the God of Socrates; a book On the World, etc. [This sentence and the preceding one are not in the German edition of the chronicle]. An aphorism of his was the following: Nothing is more like God than a man perfectly good in his soul. [Apuleius of Madaura in Africa, was born about 130 CE. He received the first rudiments of education at Carthage, and afterwards studied the Platonic philosophy at Athens. He traveled extensively in Italy, Greece, and Asia, becoming initiated in most mysteries. He returned home, but soon thereafter journeyed to Alexandria. On his way he was taken ill at the town of Oea, and was hospitably received into the house of a young man, Sicinius Pontianus, whose mother, a very rich widow of the name of Pudentilla, he married. Her relatives being indignant that so much wealth should pass out of the family, impeached Apuleius of gaining the affection of Pudentilla by charms and magic spells. The cause was heard before the proconsul of Africa in 173, and the defense spoken by Apuleius is still extant. Of his subsequent career we know little except that he declaimed in public with great applause. His most important work is the novel the (also called), apparently intended as a satire on the hypocrisy and debauchery of certain priests, fraudulent pretenders to supernatural power, and the general profligacy of public morals. (This entry on Apuleius was abridged by our translator and indefatigable note gatherer, Walter Schmauch, without attribution—it was a more innocent time—from Smith's 1870 , Vol. 1, pp. 248-250 s.v. Apuleius.)]

Plotinus, a philosopher, also a disciple of Plato, and a teacher of Porphyry (Porphirius), also flourished at this time. He was skilled in all the arts of virtue, and fortified himself in all the divine ordinances with righteousness, strength, moderation and wisdom. He believed that arbitrary fortune could be overcome by the intelligence of his wisdom. Therefore he selected as his seat a place where he would be removed from the unrest of all human activities and severed and relieved from all envy of good fortune. This man did not permit himself to be overcome by any desire, and he wrote a beautiful book of the virtues; and he said that the rational soul, which as he did not doubt has its residence in the seats of heaven, has no superior in nature, and is subject to God alone; for as the sun lights the moon, so God gives light to the soul. [Plotinus was the originator of the Neo-Platonic school of philosophy. He was born at Lycopolis in Egypt in 203 CE. Of his life his disciple Porphyry wrote a biography that has come down to us. From him we learn that Plotinus began to study philosophy at the age of 28 years, and for eleven years remained under the instruction of Ammonius Saccas. In his 39th year he joined the expedition of the emperor Gordian (242) against the Persians, in order to become acquainted with the philosophy of the Persians and Indians. After the death of Gordian he fled to Antioch, and from there to Rome (244). For the next ten years he gave only oral instruction to a few friends, but was at length induced to commit his instructions to writing. In 264 Porphyry came to Rome, and joined himself to Plotinus. By this time twenty-one books had already been written by Plotinus. During the six years that Porphyry lived with Plotinus at Rome, the latter at the instigation of Amulius, Porphyry wrote twenty-three books on the subjects discussed in their meetings, to which nine were later added. In all, Plotinus wrote fifty-four books, and those he committed to the care of Porphyry for correction. On account of the weakness of his sight Plotinus never read them through a second time, to say nothing of making corrections. Porphyry divided the fifty-four books into six Enneads or sets of nine books each. Plotinus lived very modestly, and his hours of sleep were restricted to the briefest time possible. He was regarded with admiration and respect by men of science, philosophers and statesmen. He enjoyed the favor of the emperor Gallienus, and the empress Salonina. He died in 262. His philosophical system is founded on Plato's writings, with the addition of various tenets drawn from the philosophy and religions of the Persians and Indians].

Diogenes (Dyogenes) of Sinope was a great philosopher (according to Diocles). He was the son of Hicesias, a banker. He left his fatherland and went to Athens, where he found Antisthenes. He estranged himself from all pleasures. He was the first to wear a double mantle on account of the cold; and in it was a pocket in which he carried his food. He wrote and requested a man to build a small room for him; but as the man was slow about it, Diogenes used a tub as a house. In cold weather he turned the opening to the south; and in summer, toward the north. In summer he rolled himself in hot sand, while in winter he embraced statues covered with snow. He once saw a child drinking out of the hollow of its hand, so he threw down his own ordinary cup and said, A child has surpassed me in scornfulness. He said all things are of the gods, and the wise are the friends of the gods. At one time he sat in the sun, and Alexander spoke to him, saying, State what you desire. Diogenes answered, Make no shadow upon me. And it is said that Alexander stated, If I were not Alexander, I should wish to be Diogenes. This, among other things, was his teaching: If someone gives you advice with kindness, you should listen to him in kindness. He later died in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus. [Diogenes, the Cynic philosopher, was born at Sinope in Pontus, about 412 BCE. His father was a banker, who was convicted of certain illegal transactions, in consequence of which Diogenes left Sinope and went to Athens. His youth is said to have been spent in dissolute extravagance; but at Athens his attention was arrested by the character of Antisthenes, who at first drove him away, but soon relented. His new pupil soon plunged into the most frantic excesses of austerity and moroseness. In summer he used to roll in the sand, and in winter he embraced statues covered with snow. He wore coarse clothing, lived on the plainest food, slept in porticoes or on the street, and finally, according to a well-known story, took up his residence in a tub belonging to the Metroum, or temple of the Mother of the Gods. In spite of his eccentricities, Diogenes was respected at Athens, and apparently was privileged to rebuke anything of which he disapproved. He seems to have ridiculed and despised all intellectual pursuits that did not directly and obviously tend to some immediate practical good. He abused literary men for reading about the evils of Odysseus, and neglecting their own; musicians for stringing the lyre harmoniously, while they left their minds discordant; men of science for troubling themselves about the moon and stars, while they neglected what lay immediately before them; orators for learning to say what was right, but not to practice it. On a voyage to Aegina, Diogenes was taken prisoner by pirates and carried to Crete to be sold as a slave. He was purchased by Xenias of Corinth, over whom he acquired such influence that he soon received his freedom, was entrusted with the care of his master's children, and passed his old age in his house. During his residence at Corinth his famous interview with Alexander is said to have taken place. The king said, "I am Alexander the Great;" to which the philosopher replied, "And I am Diogenes the Cynic." Alexander then asked him whether he could oblige him in any way. Diogenes replied, "Yes, you can stand out of the sunshine." We are further told that Alexander admired Diogenes so much that he said, "If I were not Alexander, I should wish to be Diogenes." The cynic died at Corinth in 323 at the age of 90. (This entry on Diogenes was abridged by our translator and indefatigable note gatherer, Walter Schmauch, without attribution—it was a more innocent time—from Smith's 1870 , Vol. 1, pp. 1021-1023 s.v. Diogenes.)]

Philip (Philippus), son of king Perdiccas (Perdice), was the twenty-third king of the Macedonians; he reigned for 27 years. He was a warrior, and with his strength conquered Armenia, Bithynia, Thrace and Thessaly. He was a man of friendly address, more loved than feared. Yet he was a man of valor, although too fond of wine. However, after his intoxication wore off, he was moderate in his dealings. Once upon a time, in order to protect his kingdom, he had marched away some distance when Nectanabis, then king of Egypt, and a man most skilled in astrology, fled to Philip in fear of the Persians; but when Nectanabis saw Olympias, the very beautiful wife of Philip, he violated her through deceit by means of black magic (in which he was highly learned); for in the night that Olympias conceived she dreamed that she was struggling with a huge snake. And after the return of Philip, Olympias gave birth to Alexander, a son. Although she acknowledged to her husband that she had not born the child by him, but by a huge snake, yet Philip reared Alexander as his own beloved son. And, once Alexander had been born, he wrote Aristotle: You are to know that a son has been born to me; therefore thanks be given the gods, not only because he was born, but also because he was born in your lifetime. I hope that through your teachings he will become worthy. Afterwards Aristotle took the son under his care, and there he remained for five years. Later he tamed a wild horse and rode it without fear. Seeing this, Philip said that he had learned by the answers of the gods that Alexander would reign after him. Therefore he gave him a royal chariot, horses, and a certain amount of gold. Alexander started a war against the king of the Peloponnesians; and from there he brought home to his father the crown of victory. When he later received the reins of government, he called himself king of all lands and of the world. [Philip II of Macedon was the youngest son of Amyntas II and Eurydice. He reigned from 359-336 BCE. He was born in the year 382, and was brought up at Thebes, to where he had been carried as a hostage by Pelopidas; and there he received a careful education. Upon the death of his brother (not his father as the chronicler states) Perdiccas III, who was slain in battle, Philip obtained the government of Macedonia, at first merely as regent and guardian of his infant nephew Amyntas; but at the end of a few months he was able to set aside the claims of the young prince and to assume the title of king. His military exploits are too numerous to mention here; suffice to say that he conquered all of Greece, and attempted to unify it. In the course of his preparations for an Asiatic expedition against the Persian Empire, Philip was murdered at a grand festival which he held at Aegae to solemnize the wedding of his daughter with Alexander of Epirus. He died at 47 in the 24th year of his reign, and was succeeded by his son Alexander the Great].

Alexander the Great (Magnus), the twenty-fourth king of the Macedonians, began to reign in the last year of Arsanus (Arses), the Persian king; and he reigned 12 years and 6 months. He began to reign at the age of 20 years. After Philip the king died, Alexander soon subjugated Illyria (Illiria) (which now we call Slavonia (Sclavonia)), devastating it with fiery zeal. He conquered the islands of the Romans, and sailed to Africa and completely vanquished it. He then marched into hostile Syria and devastated it. He attacked Damascus and captured Sidon. He then moved swiftly against Jerusalem. There he honored the high priest of the Jews, marched into the city and allowed the Jews their freedom. In the meantime he silenced many hostile peoples, and allayed much discord in the East. By those accomplishments he attained to such power that he entered Greece without difficulty. Afterwards he resumed the war that his father had begun against the Persians. While upon this expedition he learned that the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedaemonians had allied themselves with the Persians; but he armed his forces and speedily subdued Greece. And as the Athenians were the first to secede from him, so they were the first to suffer and rue the day. However, through Anaximenes the Wise they and Alexander again became reconciled, so that he restored to them freedom and peace. He set fire to the hostile Theban cities and reduced the Lacedaemonians to submission. He also marched into Egypt and there built a wonderful city, which he named Alexandria after himself. Afterwards, when he marched against the Persians, Darius disdained his youth; and Olympias, the mother of Alexander, sent him a message to come to her, for she was very ill. He returned homeward, and on the way conquered Phrygia. As he proceeded from greater Asia through the Hellespont into Asia Minor and reached home, he found his mother recovering. In consequence of that he again assembled his forces, and when he had subjugated all the regions along the river Euphrates, he made a bridge over which he marched; and he approached the city of Persepolis, in which Darius the king of the Persians resided. Alexander had thirty-two thousand footmen, four thousand five hundred horsemen, and 182 ships; and it seemed doubtful that he could conquer the world with such a small force. But Alexander decided that such a precarious war required not strong young men, but older men—such as had been men at arms under his father and had fought for him. So his warriors consisted of select men, and his leaders were likewise. No man was a commander under sixty years of age. In consequence none of them thought of flight in battle, but only of victory. Against them Darius sent six hundred thousand men; but those were defeated, no less by the wisdom of Alexander than by the strength of the Macedonians, and were forced to flight. After this victory the greater part of Asia joined Alexander. Later Alexander learned that Darius was again proceeding against him with a great and mighty army. So he took advantage of a narrow pass and hastened over Mt. Taurus, coming to the city of Tarsus. Being attacked by illness, he rested there. In the meantime Darius came up with three hundred thousand infantry and one hundred thousand cavalymen in the lead. But by this time Alexander had recovered, and he turned his forces against the enemy. And a battle of great daring took place, in which both kings were wounded; and the result was long doubtful, until Darius decided to flee. In consequence of this battle the Persians were defeated; one hundred sixty thousand infantrymen and ten thousand cavalymen were slain; and forty thousand were made prisoners. Of the Macedonians there fell 130 men on foot and 150 on horse. In the camp of the Persians was found a large quantity of gold and other forms of wealth. Among the prisoners were the mother, wife, sister and two daughters of Darius. And when Alexander saw the wealth of Darius, he was seized with wonderment; and he began to love Barsine (Bersane) because of her elegant manners. By her a child was born to him, and it was named Hercules. Darius fled to Babylonia. From there he offered Alexander a great sum of money for the release of the prisoners. Alexander desired no money, but the kingdom. Having given up hope of peace, Darius again prepared for war against Alexander, enlisting four hundred thousand footmen and one hundred thousand horsemen. And there was a battle. The Macedonians fought with fixed determination; and the Persians decided to die rather than suffer defeat. It has seldom happened that in a single engagement so much blood was shed. And when Darius saw that his troops were defeated, he also decided to die; but those nearest him desired him to flee. By this battle Alexander conquered the empire of Asia. He was so fortunate that from this time on no one dared resist him.

Darius was captured by his own people and, in order to gain favor with the conqueror, he was bound in golden chains. Then, pierced with many wounds, he died. And so ended the kingdom of Persia which had endured through 14 kings for 254 years. Afterwards he subjugated Hyrcania (Hircaniam) and the Mardians (Mardos). There the queen of the Amazons with 300 hundred thousand women [Justin's text (12.3), from which Schedel is compiling this section, says that only 300 women accompanied the Amazon queen]. encountered him. After these things he sought India, where King Porus (Porrus) was captured, and he obtained the kingdom of the Indians. Finally, when he had returned to Babylon, he gave himself over to leisure for many days. And then, when he had accepted a cup in the midst of drinking, suddenly, just as if struck by a spear, he groaned. He died of a poisoned drink given to him by Cassander, the son of Antipater, and which was so strong that it could not be kept in a vessel of bronze or iron, but in the hoof of a horse. And on the fourth day, sensing that his death was most certain, he said that he knew that he himself would suffer the fate of his ancestors. At last he ordered his body to be buried in the temple of Ammon (Hammontis). When he was asked what heir there should be to the Empire he responded: the most worthy. On the sixth day, being unable to speak, he took his ring from his finger and gave it to Perdiccas (Perduce). And so passed away Alexander, at the age of 33 years and one month; a man of superhuman power and endowed with magnanimity.

Alexander the Great, son of Philip II and Olympias, was born at Pella in 356 BCE. His early education was committed to Leonidas and Lysimachus; and he was also placed under the care of Aristotle, who acquired an influence over his mind and character, which manifested itself to the latest period of his life. At the age of 16 Alexander was entrusted with the government of Macedonia by his father when Philip was obliged to leave his kingdom to march against Byzantium. He first distinguished himself, however, at the battle of Chaeronea (338), where the victory was due mainly to his impetuosity and courage. On the murder of Philip (336), Alexander ascended the throne, at the age of 20, and found himself surrounded by enemies. He first put down rebellion in his own kingdom, and then rapidly marched into Greece. His unexpected activity overawed all opposition; Thebes, which had been most active against him, submitted when he appeared at its gates; and the assembled Greeks at the Isthmus of Corinth, with the sole exception of the Lacedaemonians, elected him to the command against Persia, which had previously been bestowed upon his father. He now proceeded against the barbarians of the north, marched across Mount Haemus, defeated the Tribali, and advanced as far as the Danube, which he crossed; and on his return subdued the Illyrians and Taulantii. A report of his death having reached Greece, the Thebans once more took up arms. But a terrible punishment awaited them. Alexander took Thebes by assault, destroyed all the buildings with the exception of the house of Pindar, slew most of the inhabitants, and sold the rest as slaves. He now prepared for his great expedition against Persia. In the spring of 334 he crossed the Hellespont, with about 35,000 men, of which 30,000 were foot and 5,000 horse; and of the former only 12,000 were Macedonians. Alexander's first engagement with the Persians was on the river Granicus in Mysia (May 334), where they were entirely defeated by him. This battle was followed by the capture or submission of the chief towns on the west coast of Asia Minor. Halicarnassus was not taken till late in the autumn, after a vigorous defense by Memnon, the ablest general of Darius, and whose death in the following year relieved Alexander from a formidable opponent. He now marched along the coast of Lycia and Pamphylia, and then north into Phrygia and to Gordium, where he cut or untied the celebrated Gordian knot, which it was said, was to be loosened only by the conqueror of Asia. In 333 he marched from Gordium through the center of Asia Minor into Cilicia.

Darius meantime had collected an army of 500,000 or more men, whom Alexander defeated in the narrow plain of Issus. Darius escaped across the Euphrates, but his mother, wife and children fell into the hands of Alexander, who treated them with the utmost respect.

Alexander now directed his arms against the cities of Phoenicia, most of which submitted; but Tyre was not taken until after an obstinate defense of seven months. Next followed the siege of Gaza, which again delayed Alexander two months. According to Josephus, Alexander then marched to Jerusalem, intending to punish the people for refusing assistance; but he was diverted by the high priest, and pardoned the people. Alexander next marched into Egypt, which willingly submitted, for the Egyptians hated the Persians. At the beginning of 331, Alexander founded at the mouth of the west branch of the Nile the city of Alexandria.

In the spring of the same year (331) Alexander set out to meet Darius, who had collected another army, said to have amounted to more than a million men. They met in the plains of Gaugamela, and the Persians were completely defeated. Darius fled to Ecbatana in Media. Alexander was now the conqueror of Asia, and began to adopt Persian habits and customs, by which he conciliated his new subjects. He next marched to Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, and, according to some accounts, is said to have fired the palace in the revelry of a banquet, at the instigation of Thais, and Athenian courtesan.

At the beginning of 330 Alexander marched from Persepolis into Media, in pursuit of Darius, whom he followed into the deserts of Parthia, where the king was murdered by Bessus, satrap of Bactria, and his associates. Bessus escaped to Bactria, and assumed the title of king of Persia. In 329 Alexander marched into Bactria against Bessus, whom he pursued across the Oxus into Sogdiana, where Bessus was betrayed to him and put to death. At the beginning of 327 Alexander took a mountain fortress, in which Oxyartes, a Bactrian prince, had deposited his wife and daughters. The beauty of Roxana, one of the latter, captivated the conqueror and he made her his wife.

Alexander did not leave Bactria till late in the spring of 327, and crossed the Indus, probably near the modern Attock. He defeated Porus, an Indian king, at the Hydaspes, but restored to him his kingdom, and treated him with distinguished honor. He founded two towns, one on each bank of the Hydaspes: One he called Bucephala, in honor of his horse Bucephalus, who died here, after carrying him through many victories; and the other Nicaea, to commemorate his victory. From there he marched across the Acesines (the Chinab) and the Hydraotes (the Ravee), and penetrated as far as the Hyphasis (Garra). This was the furthest point he reached, for the Macedonians, worn out by long service, and tired of the war, refused to go on; and Alexander was obliged to lead them back. He returned to the Hydaspes, sailing down the river with about 8,000 men, while the remainder marched along the banks in two divisions. He reached the Indian Ocean about the middle of 326, and reached Susa in 325. Here he allowed himself and his troops some rest. Anxious to form his European and Asiatic subjects into one people, he assigned Asiatic wives to about 80 of his generals, and gave them rich dowries. He himself took a second wife, Barsine, the eldest daughter of Darius, and according to some accounts, a third, Parysatis, the daughter of Ochus. About 10,000 Macedonians followed the examples of their leaders. Alexander also enrolled large numbers of Asiatics among his troops, directed his attention to the increase of commerce, made the Euphrates and Tigris more navigable by removing obstruction, etc. On his way to Babylon, Alexander was met by ambassadors from every part of the known world. He entered Babylon in the spring of 324, intending to make it the capital of his empire. But on his return to Babylon he was attacked by a fever probably brought on by his recent exertions in the marshy districts about the city, and aggravated by the quantity of wine he had drunk at a banquet given to his principal officers. He died in 323 after an illness of eleven days, at the age of 32, after a reign of 12 years and 8 months.

The German edition of the Chronicle abridges this paragraph substantially (only half of its text is kept).

Folio LXXXV verso

Jaddua (Jadus), the sixth priest of the Jews, possessed the priesthood for 50 years. He was a pious man and a lover of peace. When Alexander was angry with the Jews and decided to destroy Jerusalem, this Jadus went forth in his priestly robes to meet him. In consequence of that Alexander put aside his anger, dismounted from his steed, invoked the name of God, and honored the priest. Now as Alexander went into the city they brought him Daniel's prophecy concerning himself. After it was read to him, he was filled with great joy and with greater confidence to fight against Darius. He gave the Jews freedom in the observance of their laws and relieved them from the payment of tribute in the seventh year. [According to Nehemiah 12:12, Jeshua begot Joiakim, who begot Eliashib, who begot Joiada, who begot Jonathan, who begot Jaddua (Jadus). See also 12:22. If this was the Jaddua of whom the legend of Josephus is that he went forth from Jerusalem at the head of the priests to meet Alexander the Great, and tender to him the submission of the city, his name must have been subsequently added to the list as made up by Ezra].

Onias, son of Jaddua (Iadi), and of the Hebrews the seventh priest, succeeded his father in the priesthood in the second year of Ptolemy's reign; and he occupied it 17 years. During his time the laws were well observed by the Jews, and the city of Jerusalem was occupied in peace; and therefore the pagan kings held the city and Temple in great esteem, adorned it, and gave it great gifts.

BEGINNING OF THE KINGDOM OF THE SYRIANS.

Syria, a country in Asia, is bordered on the East by the river Euphrates, on the West by the Little Sea (i.e, the Mediterranean) and Egypt; on the north by Armenia and Cappadocia; and on the south by Arabia.

Seleucus, one of the commanders under Alexander, obtained the Syrian kingdom after Alexander's death; but he was driven out by Antigonus. After the death of Antigonus and the defeat of his son Demetrius, he was reinstated by Ptolemy. After that he reigned 32 years, and was constantly engaged in wars until his eightieth year; and at that point he finally died. [Seleucus (surnamed Nicator) was the founder of the Syrian monarchy (312-280 BCE). He was the son of Antiochus, a Macedonia of distinction among the officers of Philip II, and was born 358 BCE. He accompanied Alexander on his expedition to Asia, and distinguished himself in the Indian campaigns. After the death of Alexander (323) he espoused the side of Perdiccas, whom he accompanied on his expedition against Egypt; but he took a leading part in the mutiny of the soldiers that ended in the death of Perdiccas. In the second partition of the provinces that followed, Seleucus obtained the wealthy and important satrapy of Babylonia. In the war between Antigonus and Eumenes he afforded efficient support to the former; but after the death of Eumenes (316) Antigonus began to treat the other satraps as his subjects. Thereupon Seleucus fled to Egypt, where he induced Ptolemy to unite with Lysimachus and Cassander in a league against the common enemy. In the war that ensued Seleucus took an active part. At length, in 312, he recovered Babylon; and it is from this period that the Syrian monarchy is commonly reckoned to commence. Soon afterwards Seleucus defeated Nicanor, the satrap of Media. He gradually extended his power over all the eastern provinces that had formed part of the empire of Alexander. In 307 he formally assumed the regal title. In league with Ptolemy, Lysimachus and Cassander, he decisively defeated Antigonus at Ipsus (301) and in this battle Antigonus was slain. In the division of the spoils Seleucus was rewarded with the greater part of Asia Minor, including Syria. His empire now was the largest of those that had formed part of Alexander's dominions. Feeling it difficult to exercise control over so vast an empire, he consigned the government of all the provinces beyond the Euphrates to his son Antiochus. In 288, the ambitious designs of Demetrius (now become king of Macedonia) once aroused the common jealousy of his adversaries, and led Seleucus again to unite with Ptolemy and Lysimachus against him. Demetrius was driven out of his kingdom. Seleucus crossed the Hellespont to take possession of the throne of Macedonia which had become vacant by the death of Lysimachus; but he advanced no farther than Lysimachus, when he was assassinated by Ptolemy Ceraunus, to whom as the son of his old friend and ally, he had extended a friendly protection. Seleucus died in his 78th year, and in the 32nd year of his reign. He appears to have carried out with great energy the projects originally formed by Alexander and himself, for the Hellenization of his Asiatic empire. He founded Greek or Macedonian colonies in almost every province, which became so many centers of Greek civilization.]

Antigonus, son of Philip the king, and brother of Alexander, began to reign after him in Asia; and he reigned 18 years. He was one of the generals of Alexander and a very haughty man, and so he practiced much war, in which he was finally defeated. His son Demetrius ran away in flight and sought his own safety. [Antigonus, king of Asia, surnamed the One-eyed, was a son of Philip of Elymiotis and father of Demetrius Poliorcetes by Stratonice. He was one of the generals of Alexander the Great, and upon the latter's death received a substantial part of the empire. On the death of the regent Antipater in 319, he aspired to the sovereignty of Asia. In 316 he defeated Eumenes and put him to death. He carried on war against Seleucus, Ptolemy, Cassander and Lysimachus. By the peace of 311, he was allowed to have the government of all Asia. The peace lasted but a year. He invaded Egypt, but was compelled to retreat. His son Demetrius carried on a successful war against Cassander in Greece, but he was compelled to return to Asia to assist his father, against whom Cassander, Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Lysimachus, had formed a fresh confederacy. Father and son were defeated at Ipsus in Phrygia in 301. Antigonus fell in the battle at the age of 81 years.]

Sarabella, the governor, erected a superfluous temple on Mount Gerizim and appointed Manasseh, the brother of Jaddua, as priest there; and he was his son-in-law. And here began the Jewish schism or division; for to him many were attached, called Samaritans, who were banned. The schism lasted until the Temple was destroyed by the Romans. [The Samaritans were descendants of the Cuthites, Avvites, Sepharvites, and Hamathites, established by Sargon in Samaria after he had put an end to the Israelite kingdom. They were instructed in a form of the Hebrew religion (which they grafted on to their own worship) in order to appease the "God of the land" (2 Kings 17:24). The enmity between Jews and Samaritans began to make its appearance immediately after the return from the Captivity. The Samaritans endeavored to prevent the rebuilding of Jerusalem (Ezra 4:7; Nehemiah 4:7), and from time to time their aggressions and insults to the refounded Jewish State are recorded by Josephus. After the battle of Issus the Samaritans offered assistance to Alexander, and were allowed to build a temple at Gerizim, where they sacrificed after the manner of the Jews, though they were quite ready to repudiate Jewish origin, rite and prejudice whenever occasion arose (Josephus, , 12.5—admittedly a biased account). The temple was destroyed by Hyrcanus. The disputes between the Jews and Samaritans were finally referred to Rome. Throughout the gospel history the ill feeling is conspicuous; the Samaritans were "strangers" (Luke 17:18), and considered 'third-class' Jews by the Judeans. Vespasian inflicted a crushing blow upon them by massacring 11,600 on Mount Gerizim. From this and other sufferings later inflicted by Zeno and Justinian they never recovered].

Antiochus Soter (Sothor), a son of Seleucus the king, and second king of Syria, reigned 19 years. After him the succeeding kings of Syria were surnamed Antiochus. [Antiochus Soter reigned from 280-261 BCE, and was the son of Seleucus I, founder of the Syrian kingdom of the Seleucidae. He married his stepmother Stratonice, with whom he fell violently in love and whom his father surrendered to him. He fell in battle against the Gauls in 261].

Alexander the Great, who was extinguished in the flower of his age and victory (in consequence of which every man and all Babylonia were cast into silent mourning), by his last will named twelve who had been with him since his youth as successors to his kingdom. But the twelve were not able to agree, and in consequence there were endless wars, and the last will of Alexander could not be made effective. After the dispersion of the others, these four obtained the kingdom according to the prophecy of Daniel: Seleucus reigned in Syria, Ptolemy in Egypt, Philip in Macedonia, and Antigonus in Assyria.

Folio LXXVI recto

Demas, the Athenian philosopher, flourished in the time of Alexander. He withstood Alexander at the time the latter besieged the city of Athens and tried to take it; and he counseled the Athenians not to give it up. But after Alexander had taken the city, Demas attached himself to Alexander with friendly solicitude. But when the Athenians were about to sacrifice to Alexander, he said: See that you do not lose the earth while you are waiting upon the heavens. This was his saying: When a friend asks me to borrow money, I will lose both the friend and the money. [Demas is unknown outside of Water Burley's (1275-after 1343; also known by his Latin name Gualteri Burlaeus) Liber de vita et moribus philosophorum ('Book on the Life and Character of the Philosophers'), ch. 62: Demas. The entire passage is taken (slightly abridged) from this chapter of Burley's work].

Quintus Curtius (Curcius), the philosopher, criticized Alexander because he asked him to accord him divine honors; and he said to him: If you are a god, give us the gift of immortality; and take it not from us. But if you are a human being, then think of it yourself and lay aside all else. [Quintus Curtius was not a philosopher, nor a contemporary of Alexander the Great. He was, in fact, a Roman biographer of Alexander who lived sometime in the period between Augustus and Constantine (i.e., anywhere from three to six centuries after the death of Alexander!)].

In these days, when Alexander was born, the Romans were frightened by dreadful signs. For one saw the sun fighting with the moon; and rocks sweated blood. In the daytime many moons appeared in the sky. The night in large measure yielded to the day. Rocks fell from the clouds; and hail beat the earth for seven days, far and wide, with a mixture of stones, the residue of slate and shells.

Olympias (Olimpias), the mother of Alexander, was slain; and she suffered death unmoved by any womanly fear. [Olympias, wife of Philip II of Macedonia, and mother of Alexander the Great, was the daughter of Neoptolemus I, king of Epirus. She married Philip in 359 BCE. His numerous relationships and the jealousy of Olympias occasioned frequent disputes between them; and when he married Cleopatra, niece of Attalus (337) Olympias withdrew from Macedonia, taking refuge with her brother Alexander, king of Epirus. She was believed to have lent her support to the assassination of Philip in 336. After his death she returned to Macedonia, where she enjoyed a great influence through the affection of Alexander. On his death she again withdrew from Macedonia, where her enemy Antipater held undisputed control, and took refuge at Epirus. Here she lived in exile until the death of Antipater (319) presented a new opening to her ambition. She gave her support to the new regent Polysperchon, in opposition to Cassander, who had formed an alliance with Euridice, the wife of Philip Arrhidacus, nominal king of Macedonia. In 317 Olympias resolved to obtain supreme power in Macedonia. She invaded the country along with Polysperchon, defeated Euridice, and put her and her husband to death. She followed up her vengeance by the execution of Nicanor, the brother of Cassander, as well as of one hundred of his leading partisans among the Macedonian nobles. Cassander, who was at that time in the Peloponnese, hastened to turn his arms against Macedonia. Olympias on his approach threw herself (together with Roxana and the young Alexander) into Pydna, where she was closely blockaded by Cassander throughout the winter. In the spring of 316 she was compelled to surrender to Cassander, who caused her to be put to death. Olympias was not without something of the grandeur and loftiness of spirit that distinguished her son, but her ungovernable passions led her to acts of sanguinary cruelty that must forever disgrace her name. (This entry on Olympias was abridged by our translator and indefatigable note gatherer, Walter Schmauch, without attribution—it was a more innocent time—from Smith's 1870 , Vol. 3, pp. 22-23 s.v. Olympias.)]

Of Philip and his kingdom there is no mention in the Holy Scriptures; but there is mention of the kings of Egypt and Syria; for these were at times favorable to the Jews, and at times not. The reason was this: Those kings fought almost continually with the Egyptians. Israel lay in the middle, and there they fled when they were in danger. And Ptolemy followed hard upon them. Therefore they (the Jews?) were dispersed among other peoples.

Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, the first king of Egypt after Alexander the Great, reigned 40 years. He was the son of a certain common soldier whose name was Lagus. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. He left Egypt, Africa and a large part of Arabia to his descendants; and the kings of Egypt who followed him were therefore called Ptolemy. [Ptolemy I, surnamed Soter ('Savior') but more commonly known as the son of Lagus, reigned 323-285 BCE. His father Lagus was a Macedonian of ignoble birth, but his mother Arsinoe had been a concubine of Philip of Macedon, on which account it seems to have been generally believed that Ptolemy was in reality the offspring of that monarch. Ptolemy is mentioned among the friends of the young Alexander, whom he accompanied throughout his campaigns in Asia, and was always treated by the king with great favor. On the division of the empire after Alexander's death (323) Ptolemy obtained the government of Egypt. He enlarged his dominion by conquests. He allied himself with Cassander and Lysimachus. The latter years of Ptolemy's reign appear to have been almost entirely devoted to the arts of peace, and to promoting the internal property of his dominions. In 285 he abdicated to his son Ptolemy Philadelphus, the child of his latest and most beloved wife, Berenice. Two years later the father died. By his able and vigorous administration he laid the foundation of the wealth and prosperity that Egypt enjoyed for a long time. He laid the foundation of the Library and Museum of Alexandria, which his son fostered after him. He surrounded himself with literary men and artists, and was himself an author. He composed a history of the wars of Alexander, which is frequently cited by later writers and is one of the chief authorities that Arrian made the groundwork of his own history. (This entry on Ptolemy I was abridged by our translator and indefatigable note gatherer, Walter Schmauch, without attribution—it was a more innocent time—from Smith's 1870 , Vol. 3, pp. 581-586 s.v. Ptolemy I.)]

Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, reigned 38 years. He was the youngest son of Ptolemy Lagus. His father, before his death, abdicated to him, and by the example of his goodness the father caused the people to love the son. And as this Ptolemy was the most learned in all the arts, and had Straton, the philosopher, for a teacher, he founded the most celebrated library in all the world; and this endured to the time of the first Alexandrine war with the Romans. He released from Egyptian bondage about one hundred twenty thousand Jews and sent them back to Jerusalem, together with all the vessels that belonged to the Temple service, as a reward to Eleazar the high priest for the Holy Scriptures the he placed in the library. Ptolemy's mother was Berenice (Beronice), and his wife was Arsinoe (Asinoe). By her he begot Euergetes and Berenice, a daughter, whom he espoused to Antiochus, son of Seleucus. [Ptolemy Philadelphus (285-247 BCE) was the son of Ptolemy I by his wife Berenice. His long reign was marked by few events of a striking character. He was engaged in wars with his half-brother Magus, and frequently engaged in hostilities with Syria, which were terminated toward the close of his reign by a treaty of peace, by which Ptolemy gave his daughter Berenice in marriage to Antiochus II. His chief care was directed to the internal administration of his kingdom and the patronage of literature and science. The Museum of Alexandria, founded by his father, became the abode of all the most distinguished men of letters of the day, and in the library attached to it were accumulated all the reassures of ancient learning. Philadelphus founded new cities or colonies in great number in different parts of his dominion. He raised Egypt to great power and wealth. (This entry on Ptolemy II was abridged by our translator and indefatigable note gatherer, Walter Schmauch, without attribution—it was a more innocent time—from Smith's 1870 , Vol. 3, pp. 586-587 s.v. Ptolemy II.)]

1. Jaddua (Jadus);
2. Onias (Onyas), son of Jaddua. New portraits, in each of which the priest wears a mitre with crown superimposed. Each has a sceptre. Why the crowns are introduced is not clear. Neither was a king and neither holds an orb.

(B) LINEAGE OF CHRIST (Continued)

To the Lineage of Christ, here continued from Folio LXIV verso, is now added Achim (Achym), who is not mentioned in the text. Achim is an abbreviation of Jehoiachim, the name of an ancestor of Jesus, in the genealogical register five degrees removed from Joseph (Matt. 1:14). He is there mentioned as Achim, son of Sadoc, with whom the line ended at Folio LXV verso.

(C) MONARCHY OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT

The Monarchy of Alexander the Great is represented by a genealogical arrangement of vines, of which he is the central figure. With long hair and unkempt beard, wearing an odd felt hat of many folds, and in full medieval armor of an ornate pattern, he stands astride a branch. His left hand rests on a pointed shield that he holds in position on the ground before him. It is emblazoned with three bells, probably just the random notion of the woodcutter. In his right hand Alexander holds a heavy branch, which proceeds to his right shoulder, there branching off into two forks, the first branch proceeds to the left terminating with:

1. Antigonus, who firmly holds one of the extremities of the vine in his right hand; his sceptre is in his left. He is bearded, weary looking old man, and wears a crown. He was a son of Philip II, and a brother to Alexander. As one of the generals of the latter he received a substantial portion of Alexander's empire upon his death.
2. Seleucus I holds the other extremity of the fork, as though about to break a wishbone with Antigonus. It will be remembered Seleucus was a son of Antiochus, an officer of distinction under Philip II, who accompanied Alexander in his Asiatic campaign. On the division of the empire after Alexander's death, Seleucus was rewarded with a great part of Asia Minor, and thus became the founder of the Syrian monarchy. He is here represented crowned, and with sceptre in hand. Below Seleucus is his son and successor.
3. Antiochus Soter, second king of Syria.

The second branch proceeds over Alexander's head to the opposite Folio (LXXVI recto) to

1. Ptolemy Lagus, surnamed Soter, commonly called the son of Lagus, a Macedonian of ignoble birth. He was the first Ptolemy of Egypt. Being a friend and able general under Alexander, he shared as such in the partition of his empire; and thus he became the king of Egypt. In his right hand he holds one of the branches that proceeds from the hand of Alexander. He wears a crown and carries a sceptre. After a long reign he abdicated in favor of his son.
2. Ptolemy Philadelphus, portrayed just below his father.

The main branch on which Alexander stands proceeds to

- Olympias and Nectanabis (Nectabanus), respectively the mother and putative father of Alexander. According to the chronicler Nectanabis became enamored of Olympias, the wife of Philip, and in the latter's absence, taking on the form of a serpent, took advantage of Olympias. The birth of Alexander was the result. In this dual portrait the mother of Alexander appears with crown and sceptre, and a branch proceeds from her waist to Alexander. She has the appearance of a very weak and distressed woman. Behind her stands Nectanabis, pointing a finger at the queen.

(D) PHILIP OF MACEDON

Philip of Macedon, who looked favorably upon Alexander, even though not his own son, is portrayed by a separate and distinct woodcut set beside his spouse though not directly connected with Alexander.

(E) GREEK PHILOSOPHERS (Continued)

1. Demas.
2. Quintus Curtius.

(F) BATTLE OF THE SUN AND MOON

Battle of the Sun and Moon. The former is shining forth in all its heated glory, while the moon, a narrow crescent (and there is a "Man in the Moon"), seems to be giving up the battle in the torrid heat of the sun.

Folio LXXVI verso

Camillus Furius made war upon the Veientes [See Veii, Folio LXIX verso, and note], and for ten years the Romans subjected them to severe attacks. But in the time of Fabius, the Senonian Gauls defeated the Romans within eleven miles of the city of Rome. Then under Brennus, [See Brennus, Folio LXXII recto, and note]. their king, they proceeded against Rome, nearly extinguishing the Roman name and taking the city. Nor was it possible to protect the Capitol against them. And when the Romans were suffering from famine, Camillus, who was in exile in a neighbouring city, attacked the Gauls unexpectedly, and gave them a severe defeat. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. They accepted one thousand pounds of gold, which was paid to keep them from besieging the Capitol. In consequence of that they departed. But Camillus followed them, and so pressed them that he recovered the gold twice paid them and all knightly honors. And he was honored as a second Romulus.

Furius Camillus was one of the great heroes of the Roman republic. He was censor in 403 BCE, and was consular tribune for the first time in 401, and for the second time in 398. In 396 he was dictator and gained a glorious victory over the Faliscans and Fidenates, took Veii, and entered Rome in triumph, riding a chariot drawn by white horses. In 394 he was consular tribune for the third time, and reduced the Faliscans. In 391 Camillus was accused of having made an unfair distribution of the booty of Veii, and went voluntarily into exile at Ardea. The next year (390) the Gauls took Rome, and laid siege to Ardea (See Senones, Folio LXIX verso, and note). The Romans in the Capitol recalled Camillus, and appointed him dictator in his absence. He hastily collected an army, attacked the Gauls, and defeated them completely. His fellow citizens saluted him as the Second Romulus. In 389 he was dictator for a third time, and defeated the Volscians, Aequians, and other nations. In 386 he was consular tribune for the fourth time; in 384 for the fifth; and in 381 for the sixth time. In 363 he was appointed dictator for the fourth time to resist the rogations of C. Licinius Stolo. In the next year, 367, he was dictator a fifth time, and though eighty years of age, he completely defeated the Gauls. He died of the pestilence in 365. Camillus was the great general of his age, and the resolute champion of the patrician order. His history, like that of most great national heroes, has been interwoven with many legendary and traditional fables.

This paragraph is a very slight abridgment taken from Eutropius' Breviarium historiae Romanae ('Abridgement of Roman History') 1.20. Eutropius' text is a complete compendium, in ten books, of Roman history from the foundation of the city to the accession of the emperor Valens (364-378 CE), Eutropius' contemporary.

Quintius Cincinnatus (Cincinatus), having been found in his field and called from the plow, was made a dictator; and he relieved the besieged city of the enemy and received Praeneste. [See L. Quintus Cincinnatus, Folio LXIX verso].

In the time of these consuls (?) the city was visited by pestilence every two years. In order to drive away this pestilence, the authorities set up shameful plays or spectacles. And so in order to eliminate bodily illness a plague of the soul was sought. [This paragraph undoubtedly refers to one of the dual portraits on this page. Three pairs of consuls are portrayed, but not named in the text].

In the time of these two consuls (?) many people were killed by poison administered by Roman women. Of these same women, 370 in number were betrayed by a maid; and when their crimes were discovered they were put to death by the poison which they themselves had brewed.

In the 388th year after the founding of the city of Rome, Gaius (Gayus) defeated the Gauls as they rushed into war again.

Marcus, with 60,000 Romans, put the Gauls to flight and defeated them with severe losses. [Marcus Valerius Corvus (c. 370-270 BCE), Roman general of the early republican period. According to the legend a raven settled on his helmet during his combat with a gigantic Gaul, and distracted the enemy's attention by flying in his face. He was twice dictator and six times consul, and occupied the curule chair twenty-one times. In his various campaigns he defeated successively the Gauls, the Volscians, the Samnites, the Etruscans and the Marsians. His most important victory (343) was over the Samnites at Mount Gaurus.]

Under these consuls, Publius Cornelius and Marcus Curius, the Samnite war came to an end. This war lasted for 49 years with much disaster to the Romans until not an enemy in Italy distressed the power of Rome anymore.

P. Cornelius Rufinus was consul in 290 BCE, with M. Curius Dentatus, and in conjunction with his colleagues brought the Samnite War to a conclusion, and obtained a triumph in consequence. Rufinus was consul a second time in 277, and carried on the war against the Samnites and the Greeks in Southern Italy. The chief event of his second consulship was the capture of the important town of Croton. In 275, Rufinus was expelled from the senate on account of his possessing ten pounds of silver plate. The dictator Sulla was descended from him.

M. Curius Dentatus is said to have derived his cognomen Dentatus from the circumstance of having been born with teeth in his mouth. He was a favorite hero of the Republican Republic, and was celebrated in later times as a noble specimen of old roman frugality and virtue. He was consul in 290 BCE with Rufinus as already stated, and was associated with him in the Samnite war. In 283 he fought as praetor against the Senones. In 275 he was consul a second time, and defeated Pyrrhus near Beneventum so completely that the king was obliged to leave Italy. In a third consulship he conquered the Lucanians, Samnites and Brutians, who still continued in arms after the defeat of Pyrrhus. He retired to his small farm that he cultivated with his own hands, and rejected all favors. He was censor in 272, executing public works of great importance.

These two consuls fought against the Latins. Decius Murena, consul, was killed and Manilius Torquatus triumphed. [In 340 BCE P. Decius Mus was consul with T. Manlius Torquatus, and he and his colleague had the conduct of the great Latin War. The two consuls marched into the field, and when they were encamped opposite the enemy near Capua, a vision appeared to each in the night, announcing that the general of one side and the army of the other were dedicated to the Gods of the Dead and to Mother Earth. They thereupon agreed that the one whose wing first began to waiver should dedicate himself and the army of the enemy to destruction. The decisive battle took place at the foot of Vesuvius; and when the troops of Decius, who commanded the left wing, began to give way, he resolved to fulfill his vow. He called for the pontifex maximus, M. Valerius, and repeated after him the form of words by which he dedicated himself and the enemy to the Gods of Death, with his toga wrapped around his head and standing upon a weapon; he then jumped upon his horse, wearing the cinctus gabinus or sacrificial dress, rushed into the greatest concentration of enemy troops, and was slain, leaving the victory to the Romans. Such is the common story of the death of Decius]. His son disobeyed the orders of the consuls by attacking the enemy; and although he obtained a victory, he was beaten with rods and beheaded for insubordination. [See T. Manlius Imperiosus Torquatus, Folio LXIX and note].

Under the consuls Dolabella and Domitius (Domicio), the Lucani, Brucii, and Samnites, together with the Etruscans and Senonian

Gauls, made war against the Romans. Seven tribunes and eighteen thousand Roman warriors were slain. But when they marched against Rome they were destroyed by Cornelius Cenuus and the consul Dolabella. [P. Cornelius Dolabella Maximus was consul in 283 BCE with Cn. Domitius Calvinus, and in that year conquered the Senones, who had defeated the praetor L. Caecilius, and murdered the Roman ambassadors. Owing to the loss of the consular Fasti for that time we do not hear of his triumph, though he undoubtedly celebrated his victory by a triumph. In 279 he, together with C. Fabricius and Q. Aemilius, went to Pyrrhus as ambassadors to effect an exchange of prisoners].

Fabricius, a man worthy of remembrance, would not permit himself to be influenced against Rome by the cunning or flattery of Pyrrhus (Pirrh), the king. In fact, he renounced the part of the empire offered to him by the king. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. So Pyrrhus said, It is more difficult to divert this man from his honesty than to change the sun from its course. Therefore it is no wonder that the Romans, with such morals, have conquered because of the strength of their warriors. [C. Fabricius Luscinius was one of the most popular heroes in Roman history, and, like Cincinnatus and Curius, is the representative of the purity and honesty of 'the good old times.' In his first consulship, 282 BCE, he defeated the Lucanians, Bruttians and Samnites, gained a rich booty, and brought into the treasury more than 400 talents. Fabricius probably served as legate in the unfortunate campaign against Pyrrhus in 280; and at its close he was one of the ambassadors sent to Pyrrhus at Tarentum to negotiate a ransom or exchange of prisoners. The conduct of Fabricius on the occasion formed one of the most celebrated stories in Roman history, and was embellished in every way by subsequent writers. So much seems certain—that Pyrrhus used every effort to gain the favor of Fabricius; that he offered him the most splendid presents, and endeavored to enter him into his service, and accompany him to Greece; but that the sturdy Roman was proof against all his seductions, and rejected all his offers. On the renewal of the war in the following year (279) Fabricius again served as legate, and shared in the defeat in the battle of Asculum. In 278 he was consul a second time, and had the conduct of the war against Pyrrhus. The king was anxious for peace; and the generosity with which Fabricius sent back to Pyrrhus the traitor who had offered to poison him, afforded an opportunity for opening negotiations, which resulted in the evacuation of Italy by Pyrrhus. Fabricius then subdued the allies of the king in the south of Italy. He was censor in 275, and distinguished himself by the severity with which he attempted to repress the growing taste for luxury. Ancient writers love to tell of the frugal way in which he and his contemporary Curius Dentatus lived on their hereditary farms, and how they refused the rich present offered them. Fabricius died as poor as he had lived].

This Papirius, while still a boy, responded cleverly to his mother in order to conceal the secret of the council. For with his mother urging him to reveal what secret of the senate he had heard there when he was admitted with his father, he told her what had been debated: Whether it was best for one man to have two wives, or one woman to have two husbands. Since many of the matrons were rushing together in a shameless assembly two days later, the boy tells the matter to the senate. And the boy was praised. And it was decreed that no child any longer be admitted to the council of the senate except that one. When he became a man, he turned out to be a very brave and warlike man. [Papirius is a name born by the members of a Roman gens (Papiria), originally plebeian and afterward patrician. The first consul of this name was L. Papirius Cursor, who held that office five times, and that of dictator twice. He was the chief hero of the second Samnite War (326-304 BCE), an exceptional commander and a man of strength and virtue. In 324, in the capacity of dictator, he condemned his magister equitum, Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, for joining in battle with the enemy contrary to his commands, and only allowed himself to be swayed from inflicting the death sentence through the combined pleas of his father, the senate, and the people. His son, of the same name, who was consul in 293, conducted a victorious war against the Samnites; and in his second consulate (273) he completed the subjugation of the Samnites, and celebrated a triumph over the Tarentians, Samnites, Lucanians and Bruttians].

LINE OF ROMAN CONSULS

The line of Roman consuls is here continued from Folio LXIX verso. As the consuls were appointed in pairs, so they here appear in dual portraits as follows:

PANEL I.

1. Furius Camillus and Quintius Cincinnatus, both of whom are mentioned in the text.
2. Lucius Gemicus and Quintus Servilius, neither of whom are mentioned in the text.
3. Gaius Sulpicius and Marius Valerius, of whose victories over the Gauls the text makes very brief mention.
4. Manlius Torquatus and Decius (Mus), both mentioned in the text.
5. Fabricius (Lucinus) and Papirius, both referred to in the text.

PANEL II

1. Claudius Marcus and Valerius Flaccus, neither of whom are mentioned in the text.
2. Fabius Maximus and Quintus Decius, neither of whom are referred to in the text.
3. Publius Cornelius Ruffinus and Marcus Curius Dentatus, each of whom is given brief mention.
4. Dolabella (P. Cornelius Dolabella Maximus) and Domitius (Domitius) (Cn. Domitius Calvinus), both mentioned in the text.

There is a striking similarity in all these portraits. All are in medieval dress. Most of the characters wear hats or caps; a few are bareheaded. All are gesturing—'arguing' in pairs, with the possible exception of Domitius, who listens to his co-consul with hands interlocked. Every man is waist-deep in the cup of a flower, which is true of almost every bust portrait in the Chronicle.

Antiochus, the second of that name, surnamed Antiochus Theos, son of Antiochus I, was the third king of Syria; and he reigned 15 years. His first wife was Laodice. He carried on a very strenuous war with Philadelphus, the king of Egypt. He made peace by marrying Berenice, the daughter of the same king of Egypt. [Antiochus Theos (261-246 BCE) was the son of Antiochus I, surnamed Soter. The Silesians gave him the surname Theos ('God' or 'Divine') because he delivered them from their tyrant Timarchus. He carried on war with Ptolemy Philadelphus of Egypt, which was brought to a close by his putting away his wife Laodice. In revenge Laodice caused Antiochus and Berenice to be murdered. He was succeeded by his son Seleucus Callinicus].

Eliud, son of Achim (Achym), in the Year of the World 4959. [This sentence does not appear in the German edition].

Antiochus Galericus, third of the name, and fourth king of Asia and Syria, reigned 20 years. He was the son of Antiochus Theos, and his first wife Laodice, who poisoned her husband and killed Berenice together with her children. And this Galericus, her son, she made ruler in the place of his father. Therefore Euergetes made war on Syria. And afterwards Ptolemy killed him. He left Seleucus and Antiochus the Great to succeed him. [Antiochus Galericus was Seleucus II (surnamed, not Galericus, as the chronicler states, but Callinicus). He was the eldest son of Antiochus II (surnamed Theos) by his first wife Laodice. The first step of his administration, or rather that of his mother Laodice, was to put to death his stepmother Berenice, together with her infant son. In order to avenge his sister, Ptolemy Euergetes, king of Egypt, invaded the dominions of Seleucus, made himself master of Antioch, all of Syria, and carried his arms unopposed beyond the Euphrates and Tigris. Seleucus held himself aloof; but when Ptolemy was recalled by domestic disturbances at home, Seleucus recovered the greater part of the provinces he had lost. He then became involved in a war with his brother Antiochus Hierax, who attempted to obtain Asia Minor as an independent kingdom for himself. Antiochus was decisively defeated, obligated to quit Asia Minor, and took refuge in Egypt. Seleucus undertook an expedition to the East to reduce the revolted provinces of Parthia and Bactria. He was, however, defeated by Arsaces, king of Parthia, in a great battle to which the Parthians attribute their independence. After the expulsion of Antiochus, Attalus, king of Pergamon, extended his dominions over Asia Minor. In an expedition to recover these provinces Seleucus was accidentally killed by a fall from his horse in the twenty-first year of his reign. He left two sons, who succeeded him, Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus, surnamed the Great.]

Josephus the Jew was a pious and great minded man, and influenced the Jewish people to excellent things. After he had collected taxes and tribute for twenty-three years from Syria, Phoenicia and Samaria, he died leaving behind his son Hyrcanus (Hircano). Hyrcanus continued as collector of tribute for Ptolemy. From childhood Josephus was marvelously virtuous and intelligent. At the age of thirteen years he showed a bright state of mind. Wishing to test him, his father sent him on a two days' journey to an isolated place with three hundred yoke of oxen to cultivate the soil; but he hid away the halters necessary to secure them. Under these circumstances the youth, considering his age, exhibited great ingenuity. He slaughtered ten yoke of oxen, divided the meat among the shepherds, and out of the skins he made halters for the other oxen; and he cultivated the soil as his father had directed. Therefore, on his return to his home he was praised very much.

Flavius Josephus (37-95 CE), Jewish historian and military commander, born in the first year of Caligula, was a precocious student of the law, and made trial of the three sects of Judaism – Pharisees, Sadducees and Essenes – before he reached the age of 19. Then, having spent three years in the desert with the hermit Banus, who was probably an Essene, he became a Pharisee. In 64 he went to Rome to intercede on behalf of some priests, his friends, whom the procurator Felix had sent to render account to Caesar for some insignificant offense. Making friends with Alityrus, a Jewish actor, who was a favorite of Nero, Josephus obtained an introduction to the empress Popaea and effected his purpose by her help. His visit to Rome enabled him to speak from personal experience of the power of the Empire, when he expostulated with the revolutionary Jews on his return to Palestine. But they refused to listen; and he, with all the Jews who did not fly the country, were dragged into the great rebellion of 66. In company with two other priests, Josephus was sent to Galilee under orders to persuade the ill-affected to lay down their arms and return to an allegiance with Rome, which the Jewish aristocracy had not yet renounced. Having sent his two companions back to Jerusalem, he organized the forces at his disposal, and made arrangements for the government of his province. His obvious desire to preserve law and order excited the hostility of John of Giscala, who endeavored vainly to remove him as a traitor to the national cause by inciting the Galileans to kill him and by persuading the Sanhedrin at Jerusalem to recall him.

In the spring of 67 the Jewish troops, whom Josephus had drilled so sedulously, fled before the Roman forces of Vespasian and Titus. He sent to Jerusalem for reinforcements, but none came. With the stragglers who remained, he held a stronghold against the Romans by dint of his native cunning, and finally, when the place was taken, persuaded forty men, who shared his hiding place, to kill one another in turn rather than commit suicide. They agreed to cast lots, on the understanding that the second should kill the first, and so on. Josephus providentially drew the last lot and prevailed upon his destined victim to live. Their companions were all dead in accordance with the compact; but Josephus at any rate survived and surrendered. Being brought before Vespasian, he was inspired to prophesy that Vespasian would become emperor. When this prophecy was fulfilled, he was liberated, assumed the name of Flavius, the family name of Vespasian, and accompanied his patron to Alexandria. He returned to Rome, was awarded a pension, and was made a Roman citizen, receiving an estate in Judea. The Jewish War, oldest of his extant writings, was written towards the end of Vespasian's reign (69-79). The Jewish Antiquities, a history of the Jews from the Creation to the outbreak of the war with Rome, was finished in the year 93. He also wrote a narrative of his own life to defend himself against the accusation that he had caused the Jewish rebellion.

Simon (Symon), son of Onias the priest, and nicknamed "the Just," was the eighth high priest of the Jews. He received the office on his father's death, and held it for sixteen years. By reason of his piety, righteousness and kindness to his fellow citizens, he was called "the Just." [Josephus, , 12.2].

Eleazar (Eleazarus), the high priest, brother of Simon the Just, took the priestly office after the death of his father, and while his brother's son Onias was still a child; and he held the office for 17 years. He sent to Ptolemy Philadelphus 72 of the most learned men to interpret the law; but we say 70.

And the seventy-two interpreters sent by Eleazar from Jerusalem to the said king of Alexandria, at the latter's request, were well received by him. And when the rolls upon which the Law was written in golden letters were shown to the king, he provided a separate room for each interpreter. And in seventy-two days they brought him the Law translated from the Hebrew into the Greek tongue, and so clearly (as Augustine testifies) that no doubt remained as to the words or their meaning. This translation, confirmed by the Jews, Demetrius delivered to the king. And the king had the seventy-two brought before him. He thanked them, and sent them home; and to each of them he made a present of three fine garments, of two talents of gold, of a cup of the value of one talent, and of the furniture of the room in which they were feasted. [The (Seventy) is the oldest Greek version of the Old Testament. Its name, often represented by the Roman numerals LXX, is derived from the tradition that the translators numbered 70 or 72. According to Josephus, six elders from each tribe were sent to Alexandria with a copy of the Law requested by Ptolemy Philadelphus, and translated it in seventy-two days. Accounts of the translation vary but agree that it was made at Alexandria, begun under the early Ptolemies, about 285 BCE, and that the Pentateuch was translated first. The whole of the Old Testament seems to have been complete in Greek in the time of Ptolemy (VII) Physcon, about 130 BCE. Internal evidence suggests that it was made by different persons at different times from Egyptian Hebrew manuscripts, and by Alexandrian Jews more or less imperfectly versed in Hebrew. The books of Moses are the best translated. The version is faithful in substance as a whole, but contains many errors. The chronology differs materially from that of the Hebrew text, adding, for example, 606 years between the creation and the deluge. The importance of the is that it was the text upon which the first generations of Christians based their teachings and understandings of the meaning of God and Jesus in their religion. For this reason it is, perhaps, the most important translation ever made].

Onias, the second of that name, son of Simon the Just, the eleventh priest of the Hebrews, officiated for 9 years. He was of a mean disposition, stingy with money. Through love of the Law or through miserliness he refused to pay tribute to Euergetes; and thereby the whole Jewish land was placed in danger. But Josephus restored peace among the nobles, and Ptolemy placed him over Judea.

Those three, Jason, Menelaus and Alchimus, were of the priestly class; but are not to be placed in the priestly line because of their idolatry, evil works and practices.

Alexandria, the large city that lies in Egypt, was built (as Justinus writes in book 11) by Alexander the Great 320 years before the Coming of Christ. For when Alexander journeyed to Jupiter Ammon [Ammon was originally an Ethiopian or Libyan deity, and later an Egyptian one. The real Egyptian name was Amun or Ammun. The Greeks called him Zeus Ammon, the Romans Jupiter Ammon, and the Hebrews Amon. The most ancient seat of his worship was Meroe, where he had an oracle; from there it was introduced into Egypt, where the worship took the firmest root at Thebes in Upper Egypt, which was therefore frequently called by the Greeks Diospolis, or the city of Zeus. Another famous seat of the god, with a celebrated oracle, was in the oasis of Ammorium (Siwah) in the Libyan Desert. The worship was also established at Cyrenaica. The god was represented either as a ram, or as a man with a ram's head. It seems clear that the original idea of Ammon was that of a protector and leader of the flocks. The Ethiopians were a Nomad people, flocks of sheep were their principal wealth, and it is perfectly in accord with the notions of the Ethiopians and Egyptians to worship the animal that is the leader and protector of the flock]. to consult him on the future and to get information as to his origin, he built Alexandria on his return, and arranged that it should be a place of residence for the Macedonians and to be the capital of Egypt. He built three cities named after him, namely, one in Egypt, which some call Canopicum; a second in Asia, and a third in Scythia on the river Tanais. Alexandria was so called because Alexander built it. His name and grave were venerated by Julius and Augustus, the Roman emperors. The city has a circumference of 333 furlongs. It is intersected by small streets on which horses and wagons pass. There are two wide streets in the middle, which intersect one another. The city (as Josephus states) is protected by impenetrable wildernesses, by harborless seas, by rivers, and by wooded swamps. Once upon a time it was very beautiful. It is still fortified by ornate towers and strong, high walls; but the interior is just a heap of ruins and deserted buildings. For a while it contained pagan temples; and Christian churches were still to be seen there. The city had many royal buildings, for each king adorned it with beautiful structures according to his own taste. Where the palace of Alexandria formerly stood there is now a very tall monument made of a single stone, and having a sharp point. It resembles a tower. There is also a Church of St. Mark, in which the Jacobites live; for St. Mark the Evangelist was the first to preach the Christian religion there. When the apostles made him a bishop there, he erected many churches. Upon his death Amanus succeeded him. Many men learned in the Holy Scriptures came from here; such as Philo, by birth a Jew, who wrote much that is useful; Clemens, the priest; the most excellent priest, Origen; Athanasius, the bishop there; Didimus, Theophilus, and many others. Outside the city are two marble monuments to indicate the place where St. Catherine, the virgin and martyr, was beheaded. The Venetians have two industrial establishments there. The Genoese also have one for their merchants and their wares; also the Catalanians, in the king of Sicily's court. And they also have beautiful little churches, in which holy things are accomplished. The Turks, Tartars and other pagans have their ornate houses, which are closed at night by the Saracens. At one point the city is surrounded by the great sea (i.e. the Mediterranean); at another it is bordered by wonderful gardens with fertile soil, watered by the Nile. The Saracens now have custody of the harbor. There are two hills in the city, from which approaching ships can be seen. It is said that pigeons were trained here to carry messages back and forth, so that those in the city were more secure against the enemy. For the pigeons (as Pliny says) were messengers in important matters. It is said that Brutus the Roman tied messages to the feet of pigeons during the Mutinian siege, and thus sent messages to the Roman army.

Alexandria is the name given to several cities founded by or in memory of Alexander the Great. One of them, the capital of Egypt under the Ptolemies, was ordered by Alexander the Great to be founded in 332 BCE. It was built on a narrow neck of land between the Lake Mareotis and the Mediterranean, opposite to the Isle of Pharos, which was joined to the city by an artificial dyke, called Heptastadium, which formed, with the island, the two harbors of the city, that on the northeast of the dyke being named the Great Harbor (now the New Port), that on the southwest Eunostos (the Old Port). These harbors communicated with each other by channels, and there was a canal from Eunostos to the Lake Mareotis. The city was built on a regular plan, and was intersected by two principal streets about 100 feet wide, the one extending 30 stadia from east to west; the other across this, from the sea towards the lake, to the length of 10 stadia. At the eastern extremity of the city was the royal quarter, and at the other end, outside the city, was the cemetery. A great lighthouse was built on the island of Pharos in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus. Under the care of the Ptolemies, as the capital of a great kingdom and of the most fertile country on earth, and commanding by its position all the commerce of Europe with the East, Alexandria soon became the most wealthy and splendid city of the Roman world. Greeks, Jews, and other foreigners flocked there, and its population probably amounted to somewhere between 500,000 and 750,000 people. But a still greater distinction was conferred upon it through the foundation, by the first two Ptolemies, of the Museum, an institution in which men devoted to literature were maintained at the public cost, and of the Library which contained 90,000 distinct works, and 400,000 volumes, and the increase of which made it necessary to establish another library in the Serapium (Temple of Serapis), which reached 28,000 volumes, but which was destroyed by the bishop Theophilus, at the time of the general overthrow of the pagan temples under Theodosius (389 CE). The great Library suffered severely by fire when Julius Caesar was besieged in Alexandria, and it was finally destroyed by a lieutenant of the Caliph Omar in 651 CE. When Egypt became a Roman province, Alexandria was made the residence of the prefect of Egypt. It retained its commercial and literary importance, and became also a chief seat of Christianity and of theological learning.

Much (all?) of this passage on Alexandria in the Latin edition of the Chronicle is taken from the work of Felix Fabri (c. 1437-1502), a Dominican monk from Germany who in 1480 and again in 1483 journeyed to the Holy Land, Arabia, and Egypt—his last visit being exactly one decade before the publication of the Chronicle. Published three years after his second visit to those lands, his nearly 1500-page text, whose title was Fratri Felici Fabri evagatorium in Terrae Sanctae, Arabiae et Egypti peregrinationem ('The Wanderings of Brother Felix Fabri in his Pilgrimage to the Holy Land, Arabia, and Egypt'), included the very first printed Coptic alphabet anywhere, and had a profound influence on European scholars in the 15th and 16th centuries.

Folio LXXVIII recto

Demosthenes was the prince of all the orators of Greece. And by the authority of Hermippus [There are several individuals who have this name in the ancient world. This one must be the philosopher and biographer from Smyrna who lived c. 250-200 BCE], it is indicated that his father manufactured swords. And from the testimony of Juvenal (we learn) that his father, blinded with the soot of a blazing mass, sent Demosthenes from coal and tongs and making swords, and from the forge and dingy Vulcan to learn rhetoric. [] And he, drinking in the fluent eloquence from Plato, became the greatest orator. His eloquence was praised by Aeschines (Eschines) (who from his youth was a student and lover of Socrates). Valerius says of him that when Philip, the Macedonian king, besieged the city of Athens and asked the Athenians to give him ten orators, Demosthenes counseled the Athenians by means of a fable: The wolves advised the shepherds to make friends with them and to give them their dogs in settlement of the dispute. And after the wolves had received the dogs from the shepherds, the wolves tore the flocks to pieces. And so Philip would treat the Athenians. When the Athenians heard this, they followed the advice of Demosthenes; and so the city was saved from danger. [Schedel incorrectly attributes this story to Valerius Maximus. In fact, it is found in ('The Etymologies or Origins') 1.40.7 of Isidore of Seville (c. 560-636). Isidore's work was the most popular compendium in medieval libraries. Its popularity continued unabated in the Renaissance, as at least 10 printed editions of it between 1470 and 1530 clearly attest]. To one who asked him how to speak, Demosthenes replied: Speak of nothing but what you know well.

Demosthenes, greatest of Athenian orators, was born about 385 BCE. At the age of 7 he lost his father, who left him and his younger sister to the care of guardians, relatives and friends. The guardians squandered the estate and neglected his education. He nevertheless received instruction from Isaeus. It is very doubtful whether he was taught by Plato and Isocrates, as some suppose. In time he came forward as a speaker in the public assembly. His first effort was ridiculed, for he labored under great physical disadvantages. His voice was weak, his utterance defective. It is said he spoke with pebbles in his mouth to cure himself of stammering; that he repeated verses of the poets as he ran uphill, to strengthen his voice; that he declaimed on the seashore to accustom himself to the noise and confusion of the popular assembly; that he lived for months in an underground cave, constantly writing out the history of Thucydides, to form a standard for his own style. By 355 he acquired a reputation as a public speaker, and his eloquence soon gained him the favor of the people. He clearly saw Philip's resolve to subjugate Greece, and therefore devoted all his hours to resist the aggressions of the Macedonian. For 14 years he continued his struggle against Philip, and neither threats nor bribes could turn him from his purpose. His first Philippic, delivered in 352, was his earliest attempt to arouse his countrymen. His three Olynthiac orations, delivered three years later, had the same purpose, but without results. In the meantime the aggressions of Philip continued until by 338 he had seized Elatea. The Athenians heard of his approach with alarm; and succeeded, mainly through the efforts of Demosthenes, in forming an alliance with the Thebans. However, the allied forces were defeated by Philip in a decisive battle which ended Greek independence in the same year. Demosthenes was present at the battle, and fled like thousands of others. For this he was later reproached, but the Athenians, judging better of his conduct, requested him to deliver the funeral oration over those who had fallen, and celebrated the funeral feast in his house.

The death of Philip in the year 336 roused the hopes of the patriots of Greece, and Demosthenes was the first to proclaim the joyful tidings of the death of Philip of Macedon, and to call upon his countrymen to unite their strength against Macedonia. But the youthful Alexander compelled the Athenians to sue for peace. He demanded the surrender of Demosthenes and other leaders of the popular party, and with difficulty allowed them to remain at Athens. In the course of events, however, Demosthenes was forced into exile; but not for long. On the death of Alexander the Greek states rose against Macedonia. Demosthenes was recalled from exile, and his return to the city was a glorious triumph. His voice rang out like a trumpet, calling Greece to arms. In the following year (322) the battle of Crannon decided the Lamian War against Greece. Antipater, as a condition on which he would refrain from besieging Athens, demanded the surrender of the leading patriots, and this of course included Demosthenes. The condemned men fled to Aegina, but Demosthenes went on to Calauria, a small island off the coast of Argolis. He took refuge in an ancient sanctuary, the temple of Poseidon. Here he was pursued by the emissaries of Antipater. He thereupon took poison, and died in the temple.

Aristotle, prince of all philosophers, and a master of natural philosophy, was a native of the small town of Stageira (Stragyrá). His father was Nicomachus, who was a teacher of medicine and held an important position under Amyntas, the Macedonian king, and father of Philip. Aristotle's mother's name was Phaestias (Phestiada), a woman of noble birth. Aristotle spent his youth in Macedonia, and (as they say) came to Athens at 17 years of age. He was a student of (literally "listened to") Plato for 20 years. He left no body of knowledge behind that he did not treat perfectly. After the death of Plato he went to Hermias, the tyrant of Atarneus, and there he stayed three years. Afterwards King Philip recalled him to Macedonia and put Alexander under his instruction for ten years. When Alexander marched into Asia with his army, Aristotle returned to Athens, and there he had a school for thirteen years. He caused to be written on his seal (as one says): Wiser is he who conceals what he knows, than he who exposes what he does not know. Aristotle was versatile and (as Jerome says) was undoubtedly a leader in his knowledge of the entire realm of nature. But finally, through envy, he was accused by other natural philosophers of speaking evil of the gods; and being concerned that he might suffer the same fate as Socrates, he made no effort to defend himself, but fled to Chalcide. There he flourished in the full exercise of all his faculties and strength of mind. And he lived 62 years, and died there. [Aristotle the philosopher was born at Stageira, a town in Chalcide in Macedonia, in 384 BCE. His father Nicomachus was physician in ordinary to Amyntas II, king of Macedonia, and the author of several treatises on subjects connected with the natural sciences. His mother Phaestis (or Phaestias) was descended from a Chalcidian family. His father's studies may account for Aristotle's investigations of nature, an inclination which is perceived throughout the son's life. Aristotle lost his father at 17. In 367 he went to Athens to pursue his studies, and there became a pupil of Plato, who named him "the intellect of his school." Aristotle lived at Athens for 20 years, till 347. During the last ten years of his residence at Athens he gave instruction in rhetoric. On Plato's death he left Athens, returning to live with his friend Hermias of Atarneus. When Hermias was killed by the Persians, Aristotle fled to Mytilene. Two years later he became the instructor of Alexander the son of Philip, then thirteen years of age. On Alexander's accession to the throne Aristotle returned to Athens, assembling about him a large number of distinguished scholars, to whom he lectured on philosophy. His school soon became the most famous in Athens, and he presided over it for thirteen years. During that time he also composed the greater part of his works. In these labors he was assisted by the kingly liberality of his famous pupil, who not only presented him with 800 talents, but also caused large collections of natural curiosities to be made for him, to which posterity is indebted for his. After Alexander's death Aristotle was looked upon with suspicion as a friend of Macedonia, and the charge of impiety was trumped up against him; but he escaped to Chalcis in Euboea where he died the same year (322)].

Epicurus was, according to the testimony of Metrodorus, an Athenian philosopher. Heraclitus says that he was raised on Samos. He came back to Athens at the age of eighteen, when Xenocrates was teaching at the Academy, and Aristotle had his school at Chalcide. But after the death of Alexander, and with Macedonian and Greek affairs against king Perdiccas in a bad way, he went to his father at Colophon. There he gathered disciples and returned to Athens under Anaxicrates. After he, with others, had taught for some time, he originated the sect called after him. And although one called Epictetus (Epitectus) strove against him, all other philosophers were agreeable to him. [Epictetus (c. 55–c. 135 CE) was a famous Greek Stoic philosopher who lived more than three centuries after Epicurus, so he could only in a metaphorical sense 'strive against' Epictetus. Perhaps the chronicler suggests that] In his native land he was honored with bronze statues. Diocles says that Epicurus lived on a very scant diet. He was born seven years after the death of Plato, and died at Athens at the age of 72 years by a stone blocking the exit of his urine. [Epicurus was born in 342 BCE on the island of Samos. At 18 he came to Athens, and there probably studied under Xenocrates, who at that time was head of the Academy. After a short stay Epicurus went to Colophon, and later resided at Mytilene and Lampsacus, in which places he taught philosophy for five years. At 35 he again went to Athens and established a philosophical school, called after him, the Epicurians. there he spent the remainder of his life with numerous friends and pupils. His mode of living was simple, temperate and cheerful; and the aspersions of comic poets and later philosophers opposed to him, describing him as a person of sensual pleasures, do not seem entitled to credit. He took no part in public affairs, and died at the age of 72 after a long and painful illness, which he endured with true philosophic patience and courage. He is said to have written 300 volumes, and of these the most important was , in 37 volumes. All his works are lost except some fragments of this one. He made ethics the most important part of his system, since he regarded human happiness as the ultimate end of all philosophy. Pleasure with him was not a mere momentary and transitory sensation, but he conceived it as something lasting and imperishable, consisting in pure and noble mental enjoyments, free from all influences which disturb one's peace of mind. Peace of mind was his sumum bonum].

Callisthenes (Callistenes), the celebrated philosopher, was a disciple of Aristotle and flourished at this time. He often earnestly chided Alexander the Great and spoke to him: If you are God, you should show it by your goodness toward mankind, and not take it away. If you are a human being, always keep in mind what you are. At these remarks Alexander took offense and ordered him put to death. He caused him to be locked up with a dog in a dreadful cave. [Callisthenes, a relative and pupil of Aristotle, accompanied Alexander the Great on his expedition into Asia. In his intercourse with Alexander he was arrogant and forward, taking every opportunity of exhibiting his independence. He expressed his indignation when Alexander adopted Oriental customs, and especially at the requirement of the ceremony of adoration. He thus rendered himself very obnoxious to the king, and was finally accused of being privy to the plot of Hermolaus to assassinate Alexander. After being kept in chains for seven months he was either put to death or died of disease. He wrote an account of Alexander's expedition; a history of Greece in ten books and other works, all of which have perished].

Xenocrates, the Chalcedonian philosopher, was the son of Agathenor. From early youth he was a disciple of Plato; and (as Laertius states) was slow-witted. In comparing Aristotle and Xenocrates, Plato said: One needs a bridle and the other spurs. In other respects, he was always of a solemn and grave character and expression. He lived much in the Academy, and when at times he went into the city, an entire crowd of insolent people would watch as he passed by in order to bother him. At one time Phryne (Philene), a courtesan, who had been intentionally sent to him in his room by some people, was begging him (to share) part of his bed, and he allowed it. But at last, in spite of all her entreaties, she departed without having been able to succeed in her purpose, saying as she left that she had not come from a man but from a statue. Although he was a strict and exacting person, he scorned excessive pride. And as he often inclined to meditation, he consumed many an hour in silence. He succeeded Speusippus in the Academy, and led that school for twenty-five years. He died at night, after injuring himself with a pan, at the age of 82.

Xenocrates was a native of Chalcedon. He was born in 396 BCE, and died in 314, at the age of 82. He attached himself first to Aeschines the Socratic, and afterwards, while still a youth, to Plato, whom he accompanied to Syracuse. After his return to Athens he was repeatedly sent on embassies to Philip of Macedonia, and at a later time to Antipater during the Lamian War. He is said to have lacked quick apprehension and natural grace; but these facts were more than compensated by persevering industry, pure benevolence, freedom from all selfishness, and a moral earnestness, which obtained for him the esteem and confidence of the Athenians. He became President of the Academy even before the death of Speusippus, who was bowed down by sickness, and he occupied that post for 25 years. Of his numerous works only the titles have come down to us.

Schedel's mini-biography of Xenocrates comes from a Latin translation by Ambrose the Camaldulian (born Ambrogio Traversari, 1386-1439) of Diogenes Laertius' Lives and Opinions of Eminent Philosophers, a work probably written sometime c. 225-250 CE.

Ptolemy Euergetes, son of Philadelphus, and the third Egyptian king, reigned 26 years. He avenged his sister Berenice, whom Antiochus Galericus and his mother Laodice had deprived of the kingdom of Syria Cicilia; and he devastated a part of Asia and came away with countless spoils of war.

Ptolemy III (surnamed Euergetes), king of Egypt, was the eldest son of Ptolemy II (Philadelphus). When a mere child he was betrothed to Berenice, the daughter of Magas; but it was not till after the death of Magas, and the assassination of Demetrius the Handsome, who had made himself master of Cyrene, that their nuptials were solemnized. Ptolemy succeeded quietly to the extensive dominions of his father, and to these he now reunited Cyrene in right of his wife. On learning of the death of his father Philadelphus, Antiochus II, the king of Syria, put aside his wife Berenice, the daughter of the Egyptian king, and recalled his former wife Laodice, who soon sacrificed to her resentment, both her faithless husband and her rival Berenice and her infant son. Ptolemy appears to have taken up arms on receiving the first news of danger to his sister; but finding himself too late to save her he invaded Syria at the head of a large army to avenge her fate. The cruelties of Laodice, and the unhappy fate of Berenice, excited general disaffection, and many cities voluntarily joined Ptolemy. Neither the youthful Seleucus nor his mother were able to oppose the progress of the Egyptian king, who made himself master of the whole company south of Mt. Taurus. But instead of crossing the ridge and pursuing Seleucus himself, he turned eastward, crossed the Euphrates, advanced as far as Babylon and Susa, receiving the submission of all the upper provinces of Asia. But in the course of his conquests he was recalled to Egypt by news of seditions. On his return he carried with him an immense booty, including all the statues of the Egyptian deities which Cambyses had carried to Babylon from Persia. In elation his Egyptian subjects bestowed upon Ptolemy the surname Euergetes—'the Benefactor.' While he was making his conquests in the east, his fleets were reducing the maritime provinces of Asia. After his return to Egypt, the provinces in the east soon fell back into the hands of Seleucus, but Ptolemy retained the maritime regions and a great part of Syria.

Euergetes is scarcely less celebrated than his father as patron of literature and science. He added largely to the Alexandrian Library. General opinion is that he died a natural death, although some are of the opinion that he was poisoned by his son. He reigned 25 years in uninterrupted prosperity. By his wife Berenice he left three sons—Ptolemy, who was his successor; and Magas and Arsinoe, afterwards married to her brother Ptolemy Philopater.

Ptolemy Philopator, the fourth Egyptian king, reigned 17 years. He killed his father and strangled his brother. From these crimes he was called Philopator. [Philopator means 'Father-Lover'—obviously ironic in this case]. And just as he was indifferent to the affairs of his kingdom, so too was he lazy and neglectful in the rule of it. He gave himself up to carnal pleasures, in consequence of which Antiochus the Great, the king of Syria, was able to subdue many cities. But when he later recovered all he had lost and had plundered the kingdom of Antiochus, in which matters luck was with him, he finally fell into debaucheries, and after the murder of his wife Euridice, he became promiscuous in his intercourse with voluptuous women. He died and left a son five years of age. The dissolute women (who had slept with him) were hanged to avenge the murder of the queen, while the Alexandrians sent (the boy) to the Romans so that they might take care of the orphan.

Ptolemy IV (surnamed Philopater), king of Egypt, was the eldest son and successor of Ptolemy Euergetes. He lacked the virtues of his father, and his reign initiated the decline of the Egyptian kingdom. One of his earliest acts was to put to death his mother, Berenice, and his brother Magas (of whose influence and popularity with the army he was jealous), as well as his uncle Lysimachus, the brother of Ptolemy Euergetes. In all these murders his minister Sosilius was his ready instrument, and probably his adviser. Having thus, as he conceived, secured himself from all danger from domestic enemies, Ptolemy gave himself up to a life of indolence, luxury, and sensual indulgence, while he abandoned to Sosilius the care of political affairs. But Sosilius was as incompetent as his master. The army was neglected, and the kingdom was allowed to fall into a state of disorder. Of this condition Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, was not slow to avail himself. But Ptolemy roused himself, and in the end defeated Antiochus at Raphia on the borders of the desert. Peace was finally established, the indolent, luxury loving Ptolemy preferring to return to his life of ease rather than follow up his successes. And now he gave himself up entirely to every species of vice and debauchery. He died in 205, after a reign of 17 years, leaving only one son, a child five years of age.

Steeped in vice and debauchery as he was, Philopator appears to have inherited something of the love of letters for which his predecessors were so conspicuous. The schools continued to flourish in his reign, and he was on intimate terms with philosophers and men of letters.

Dion of Syracuse was a noble philosopher. He was slain in the city of Syracuse after being involved for a long time in the tyrannies of both Dionysiuses. For Dionysius the Elder demanded of Dion that he give him his sister Aristomache in marriage. By her two sons were born to him, Hipparus and Niseus, and as many daughters. One of these daughters he gave his son Dionysius, to whom he left the kingdom; and the other he gave to the uncle Dion. Aside from his noble birth, the good reputation of his parents, and his praiseworthy character, he was a man of good learning, versed in all the arts and of personal virtue. From his father he received by inheritance many possessions that he himself, through the gifts of the tyrant, increased. And, therefore, he loved Plato so much that he devoted himself to him. Nor was Plato less delighted by him.

Dion, a Syracusan, was the son of Hipparinus, and a relative of Dionysius. His sister Aristomache was the second wife of the elder Dionysius; and Dion himself was married to Arete, the daughter of Dionysius by Aristomache. Dion was treated by Dionysius with the greatest distinction, and was employed by him in many services of trust. Of this close connection he seems to have availed himself to amass great wealth. He made no opposition to the succession of the younger Dionysius to his father's power, but he became an object of suspicion to the youthful tyrant, to whom he also made himself personally disagreeable by the austerity of his manners. Dion was apparently a man of stern and proud character, and having become an ardent disciple of Plato when that philosopher visited Syracuse in the reign of the elder Dionysius, he carried to excess the austerity of a philosopher, and viewed with undisguised contempt the debaucheries and dissolute pleasures of his nephew. From these he endeavored to withdraw him by persuading him to invite Plato a second time to Syracuse; but the philosopher, thought received at first with the utmost distinction, failed in obtaining a permanent hold on the mind of Dionysius; and the intrigues of the opposite party headed by Philistus, were successful in procuring the banishment of Dion. He retired to Athens, where he lived in habitual intercourse with Plato and his disciples; but Plato having failed in procuring his recall (for which purpose he visited Syracuse a third time), and Dionysius having confiscated his property, and compelled his wife to marry another person, he attempted to expel the tyrant by force. He sailed from Zacynthus with a small force and obtained possession of Syracuse without opposition, while Dionysius was in Italy, leaving Dion undisputed master of the city in 356 BCE. His despotic character, however, soon caused great discontent, and the people complained with justice that they had only exchanged one tyrant for another. He caused his chief opponent, Heraclides, to be put to death, and confiscated the property of his adversaries. Callippus, an Athenian, who had accompanied him to Greece, formed a conspiracy against him, and caused him to be assassinated in his own house in 353.

Schedel's mini-biography on Dion is taken (with significant abridgment) from Cornelius Nepos (c. 100-24 BCE), Liber de Excellentibus Ducibus Exterarum Gentium ('Lives of the Eminent Leaders of Foreign Nations') 10.1.1-2, 10.2.3:

1.1. Dion, Hipparini filius, Syracusanus, nobili genere natus, utraque implicatus tyrannide Dionysiorum. Namque ille superior Aristomachen, sororem Dionis, habuit in matrimonio; ex qua duos filios, Hipparinum et Nisaeum, procreavit totidemque filias, nomine Sophrosynen et Areten; quarum priorem Dionysio filio, eidem, cui regnum reliquit, nuptum dedit, alteram, Areten, Dioni. 2 Dion autem praeter nobilem propinquitatem generosamque maiorum famam multa alia ab natura habuit bona, in his ingenium docile, come, aptum ad artes optimas, magnam corporis dignitatem quae non minimum commendat, magnas praeterea diuitias a patre relictas, quas ipse tyranni muneribus auxerat.

2.3 Quem Dion adeo admiratus est atque adamavit, ut se ei totum traderet. Neque uero minus ipse Plato delectatus est Dione.

The last two sentences (a paraphrase of Nepos 10.2.3) are not in the German edition of the chronicle.

The Cimmerian Sibyl (Sibilla Chimica), was a native of Italy. She is clothed in a sky-blue dress. Her golden locks are spread over her shoulders, and she is young. She spoke thus: In the first appearance of Virgo will arise a girl of beautiful countenance, with long locks of hair, seated on a chair of rushes, nursing a child, giving it its own broth to eat, consisting of milk sent from heaven.

Anaximenes, the great rhetorician, was the master of Alexander in the art of speaking. He is said to have written the history of Alexander. Of him Valerius [] says: When once upon a time Alexander, in a rage, was about to destroy the city of Lampsacus (Lausatum [A (spelling?) mistake for Lampsacus].), Anaximenes came to meet him; and Alexander knew he would plead for the city. Alexander had sworn that what Anaximenes would ask of him he would refuse. So Anaximenes spoke to Alexander: I pray you to destroy Lausatum. And thus the city was saved. The same is said to have occurred with reference to Athens. [Anaximenes of Lampascus, accompanied Alexander the Great to Asia, and wrote a history of Philip of Macedon; a history of Alexander the Great; and a history of Greece in 12 books, from the earliest mythical ages down to the death of Apaminondas. He also enjoyed a great reputation as a rhetorician, and was the author of a scientific treatise on rhetoric, usually printed among works of Aristotle].

Carneades (Carneides), the philosopher, is said to have flourished at that time when he, together with Diogenes, was sent by the Athenians to the Roman senate. He was so taken up with learning and meditation that while seated at the table he forgot to bring his hand to his mouth; and Melissa (Mellissa), whom he had with him in the capacity of a wife, guided his hand in taking sustenance; for his life was nourished by his soul, and he appeared to be encased, as it were, in a foreign body. And finally, in the hundredth year of his life, he ended his philosophizing, as Valerius Maximus in his fourth book sets it down.

Carneades, a celebrated philosopher, born at Cyrene, about 213 BCE, was the founder of the third or new Academy at Athens. In 155 he was sent by the Athenians to Rome with Diogenes and Critolaus to deprecate the fine of 500 talents which had been imposed on the Athenians for the destruction of Oropus. At Rome he attracted great notice by his eloquent declamations on philosophical subjects, and it was here that he delivered his famous orations on Justice. He contended that justice was not a virtue, but a matter of compact for the maintenance of civil society. Thereupon Cato moved the senate to send him home to his school, and save the Roman youth from his demoralizing doctrines. He died in the year 129 at the age of 85. He was a strenuous opponent of the Stoics, and maintained that neither our senses nor our understanding supply us with a sure criterion of truth. The Diogenes here referred to is Diogenes the Babylonian, a Stoic philosopher, native of Seleucia in Babylonia. The third ambassador, Critolaus, also studied philosophy at Athens, and succeeded Ceos as the head of the Peripatetic school.

Carneades was a hard-working and long-serving soldier of wisdom. After he had completed ninety years, the end of his living and his philosophizing was the same. So marvelously had he devoted himself to the operations of learning that when he had lain down to take a meal, wrapped in thought he would forget to stretch out his hand to the table. But Melissa, whom he had in lieu of a wife, adjusted her duty so as on the one hand not to interrupt his studies and on the other to minister to his fasting, adapting her own hand to the necessary uses. So Carneades enjoyed life only with his mind, enveloped by a quasi-alien and superfluous body. The same, when about to hold a debater with Chrysippus, used to purge himself with hellebore with a view to bringing forward his own intellectual resources with more concentration and rebutting those of Chrysippus with greater vigour. What draughts did Diligence make attractive to men anxious for true glory!

(D. R. Shackleton Bailey, Valerius Maximus, Vol. II; Loeb Classical Library, 2000; pp. 233, 235)

The order of the mini-biographies devoted to Anaximenes and Carneades are switched in the German edition of the Chronicle (most likely due to the different arrangement of the woodcuts devoted to these two men).

Sextilia, a vestal virgin, was buried alive at the Porta Collatina [Porta Collatina ('The Collatine Gate') is mentioned only by Festus (37): Collatia oppidum fuit prope Romam . . . a qua porta Romae Collatina dicta est. He has probably confused Collatina with Collina. The Via Collatina diverged to the southward from the Via Tiburtina outside the Porta Tiburtina. The Porta Collina is a gate in the Servian wall at the north end of the agger, named Collina, because it was on the collis Quirinalis]. for the loss of her virginity by her own fault.

Sextilia, who according to tradition was buried alive in 273 BCE, is an illustration of the fate of a vestal virgin who neglected her vow of chastity. Vesta was the Roman hearth goddess. In an early community fire was hard to make, and therefore it was desirable that at least one fire should be kept always burning. This duty would naturally devolve upon the chief or king, and the actual maintenance of the fire would naturally fall to his young daughters, since slaves, if he had any, would hardly be trusted with a duty considered holy, while he and his sons would be out most of the day, and his wife would be busy with the household. Much of the actual preparation of food would also fall upon the daughters, as soon as they were old enough, for a Roman housewife in early days might not grind corn or cook food for her husband. For these reasons we get, in early historical times, besides the private cult of Vesta, a public cult of a sacred royal hearth, never allowed to go out, tended by girls, called Vestal Virgins, whose service begins when they are from six to ten years old, and lasts originally for five years, till they are old enough for marriage, or at least betrothal. The earliest cult of this kind is supposed to have been that at Lavinium; the most famous was at Rome.

In the Republican times, the pontifex maximus took the place of the king for many sacred purposes. The Vestals, whose number was six, and whose term of service had now been lengthened to 30 years, were in his charge, being freed from the potestas of their own fathers. They must, when chosen, be of the required age, free-born of free and respectable parents (although later, daughters of freedmen were eligible), having both parents alive, and free from physical and mental defects. If a vestal let the fire go out she was beaten. If found guilty of unchastity, she was subjected to an ordeal which amounted to a horrible form of capital punishment; she was shut up with a little food in an underground chamber which was covered over with earth.

Besides tending the fire, the vestals also prepared the sacred foodstuffs for ritual purposes. They also had the custody of various holy objects. They took part in ceremonies of various kinds, beside Vesta's own elaborate daily ritual.

The shrine of Vesta stood in the forum, near the Regia, or palace of the kings. It was not technically a temple but a round structure, a stone imitation of the primitive "bee-hive" hut.

Xenophilus, the Pythagorean philosopher, a native of Chalcedonia (Calcidonem), was greatly esteemed at this time. He was a man who, so they say, had never experienced any human misery when he was still alive at the age of 105. Then, at the highest splendor of knowledge and perfection, he died. [Very little is known of this individual with the exception that he may have been a student of Pythagoras].

Folio LXXIX recto

Arcesilaus (Archiphilas) was a philosopher with whom the sect of the Academicians began. He had a poor sick friend, who for shame would not make his condition known. But when Arcesilaus learned of this, he gave secret assistance to his friend. Without his knowledge he placed a small bag of money under his pillow so that he would consider it as something he had found rather than as a gift.

Arcesilaus, here called Archiphilas, was the founder of the New Academy, and flourished c. 200 BCE. In his youth he came to Athens to study rhetoric, but becoming the disciple first of Theophrastus, and afterward of Crantor, he found his inclination led to philosophical pursuits. Not content, however, with any single school, he left his early masters and studied under skeptical and dialectic philosophers. He was not without reputation as a poet, and several of his puns and witticisms have been preserved, which give the idea of an accomplished man of the world rather than a grave philosopher. Although his means were not large, many tales are told of his generosity. His enemies accused him of the grossest profligacy, and it must be confessed that the accusation is slightly confirmed by the circumstance that he died at the age of 76 from a fit of excessive drunkenness.

On the death of Crantor, Arcesilaus succeeded to the chair of the Academy, in the history of which he makes so important an era. In his time philosophy was absorbed in the single question of the grounds of human knowledge. According to Cicero he summed up his opinion in the formula "that he knew nothing, not even his own ignorance." Arcesilaus is also said to have restored the Socratic method of teaching in dialogues. The Stoics were his chief opponents. The New Academy does not seem to have doubted the existence of truth in itself, but our capacity to obtain it.

These two consuls (referring to the dual portrait of Torquatus and Decius) fought with Alexander against the king of Egypt.

This Aemilius with the Romans waged a most just war against the Tarentines; and so with Pyrrhus, king of the Greeks, bringing aid to the Tarentines, he fought for more than four years. Finally, with Pyrrhus defeated, and having died miserably in his country, the Tarentines entered into a peace treaty with the Carthaginians. And from this the Punic Wars had their beginnings. [A paragraph of extreme historical compression. Pyrrhus (318-272 BCE) was king of Epirus in Greece, and, in one of his many bids to expand his empire, assisted the Greek city-state of Tarentum in southern Italy in 280. Some of his battles, though successful, cost him such staggering losses (most notably against the Italian town of Asculum in 279), that the phrase 'Pyrrhic victory' was created to describe a victory that was so costly that it had become, in reality, a loss].

Marcus Valerius, nicknamed Corvinus, was a Roman youth of truly excellent spirit and singular virtue no less unworthy than Camillus. And he himself, though still a youth, engaged in battle against a man of Gaul who was singularly distinguished by his size and his armor. And while he, in armor, proceeded into the middle (of the field to do battle), and had not yet guarded his hand with his shield, a raven suddenly sat on his shield and, from the beginning of the battle, never departed from Valerius' shield. And with the tip of its beak and its talons it did not stop wounding the eyes of the Gaul until Valerius had killed the enemy terrified by such a monstrous portent. And with him dead, immediately the raven vanished from sight. And Valerius then was called by the name Corvinus. [According to legend, Marcus Valerius (who was reputed to have lived to 100 years of age, c. 370-270 BCE) acquired the nickname Corvinus (corvus = 'Raven') because, when serving as military tribune under Camillus in 349 BCE, he accepted the challenge of a gigantic Gaul to single combat, and was assisted in the conflict by a raven that settled upon his helmet, and flew in the face of the barbarian. He was six times consul and twice dictator, and by his military ability rendered the most memorable services to his country. His most brilliant victories were gained in his third consulship, 343, when he defeated the Samnites at Mt. Gaurus, and at Suessues. In his other consulships he repeatedly defeated the Etruscans and other enemies of Rome. He is frequently referred to by the later Roman writers as a memorable example of the favors of fortune. (Livy, 7.26-42, 10.2-11.)]

These two consuls (referring to a dual portrait of Gemicus and Sempronius) reigned after one another. Gemicus (Gemitius) conquered the Africans (Affros) and Tarentines (Tharentinos); and Sempronius defeated the Pisans (Picentes). In that battle the earth shook as if it dreaded to receive all the blood that was spilled, and few of the Romans who were victorious escaped.

Lucius Papirius, a Roman patrician and very celebrated warrior, was elected dictator by the Roman senate; and he appointed Quintus Fabius Master of the Cavalry. At the command of the Roman senate he undertook a war against the Samnites. Before long the dictator went to Rome, where he was needed; and he instructed Quintus Fabius, the commander, not to engage the enemy in his absence. But after the dictator left, Fabius learned through spies that there was disorder among the enemy. This made him anxious to engage them; and he attacked the Samnites. And to make the battle more violent he removed the bridles from the horses, and spurred them into the enemy. And no power could withstand them. As Livy states, 20,000 of the enemy were slain on that day. Fabius did not make this known to the dictator, but to the Roman senate. The dictator condemned him to death because, contrary to his command, he had engaged the enemy in his absence. But when Fabius was led to execution, he was released through the good will of the people and of the nobility. And there was such a tumult against the dictator that he barely escaped with his life. And although the Samnites afterwards surrounded the Romans in a narrow region and defeated them in a great battle, yet in the following year the Romans defeated the Samnites on the order of the senate with Papirius as their leader. With that victory he celebrated a triumph. [See Folio LXXVI verso (Papirius) and note].

Folio LXXIX verso

Seleucus Ceraunus, the second of the name, the fifth king of Syria, reigned two years. He conducted a large naval expedition against the states that had seceded from his father; but he lost all his ships in a storm, from which he survived with only his bare body and a few companions. After this shipwreck he was defeated by Ptolemy Euergetes and driven toward Antioch. There he sought help from his brother Antiochus. But Antiochus was only 14 years of age, and being concerned for the welfare of the kingdom, Seleucus placed himself at the head of the kingdom on the pretence of protecting the realm. [Seleucus III (226-223 BCE), surnamed Ceraunus (Greek for 'thunderbolt') was the eldest son and successor of Seleucus II. The surname was given him by his soldiers, apparently in ironic derision, as he appears to have been feeble both in body and in mind. He was assassinated by two of his officers, after a reign of only three years, and was succeeded by his brother Antiochus the Great].

These two brothers, Antiochus the Great and Seleucus Ceraunus, both reigned. They wished to avenge the blood of their father and of Onias, whom Euergetes the king of Egypt had slain. Therefore they sent a large and mighty army against Philopator, the son of Euergetes. But Seleucus died before the war began; so Antiochus carried on the war, in the course of which he was compelled to flee and lost almost his entire army. Later, however, he assembled another force against Epiphanes, the son of Philopator and who was then but a child four years of age. Among many others he had with him Philip, the king of the Macedonians. And he prevailed against the generals of the boy Ptolemy (Epiphanes). And Scopas, his (the child's) general, fled. And he captured Judea and many other cities. But as he was unable to defeat the Egyptians by force of arms, he cunningly married off his daughter to Epiphanes, so that he might come into the kingdom as a friend. His scheme was, however, suspected and forestalled.

Antiochus, called the Great, and the fourth person of that name, was the sixth king of Syria. He reigned 36 years. He defeated Ptolemy Philometor. Being very powerful and abundantly wealthy, he caused his soldiers to wear trousers of gold. Hannibal (Annibal) Penuis surrendered to him through fear of the Romans, the city of Carthage, and allied himself with him. But the Romans would not endure the excessive pride of Antiochus and Hannibal; and so they sent L. Cornelius, the consul, and Scipio, surnamed Nasica and Africanus, as emissaries; and they defeated Hannibal and fought Antiochus to the point of suing for peace with the Romans. This was granted him on condition that he leave Europe and Asia and keep himself within the limits of Mt. Thaurus, and, with 20 persons pledged as hostages, pay ten thousand talents annually. But, through greed for treasure he was afterwards lured into Persia by the priests, who killed him in the Temple of Fortune, cut him to pieces limb by limb and cast him out of the temple. [Antiochus (III) the Great (223-187 BCE), second son of Seleucus Callinicus, took the throne on the death of his brother Seleucus Ceraunus at the age of 15. He warred against Ptolemy Philopator, king of Egypt, to obtain Coele-Syria, Phoenicia and Palestine, but was obliged to cede these provinces to Ptolemy after his defeat at Raphia near Gaza, in 217. In 205 he renewed his war against Egypt with some success. In 198 he conquered Palestine and Coele-Syria, which he afterward gave up as a dowry with his daughter Cleopatra upon her marriage with Ptolemy Epiphanes. In 196 he crossed over to Europe, taking possession of the Thracian Chersonese. This brought him into conflict with the Romans, who demanded that he restore the Chersonese to the Macedonian king. He refused to comply, and in this was seconded by Hannibal (Barca) who arrived at his court in 195. Hannibal urged him to invade Italy at once; but Antiochus did not follow this advice. It was not until 192 that he crossed over into Greece. The Romans defeated him in 191 and he was compelled to return to Asia. The following year he was again defeated by the Romans under L. Scipio and compelled to sue for peace, which was granted in 188, on condition of his ceding all his dominion east of Mt. Taurus, paying 15,000 Euboic talents within 12 years, giving up his elephants and ships of war, and surrendering the enemies of Rome; but he allowed Hannibal to escape. In order to raise the tribute money, he attacked a wealthy temple in Elymais, but was killed by the people of the place in 187. He was succeeded by his son Seleucus Philopator].

Seleucus, who was also known as Philopator, the seventh king of Asia and Syria, reigned 12 years, and was a mad, unreasonable and ill-tempered man. He sent Heliodorus to steal the treasures of the Temple. He judged unrighteously, and through the angels he was so chastised that he was barely restored by the prayers of Onias. Since this one left behind no son as his successor, he considered Antiochus, the brother whom he ridiculed, his successor.

Seleucus IV, surnamed Philopator, was the son and successor of Antiochus the Great, ascending the throne without opposition in 187 BCE. However, the defeat of his father by the Romans, and the ignominious peace that followed it, had greatly diminished the power of the Syrian monarchy, and the reign of Seleucus was feeble and inglorious. After a reign of twelve years he was assassinated by one of his own ministers, Heliodorus, who conceived the idea of possessing himself of the sovereignty. The true heir, in fact, was Demetrius, the son of Seleucus (the chronicler is incorrect; he did leave an heir behind), now being retained in Rome as a hostage. The kingdom was thus seized by the younger brother of Seleucus, Antiochus IV Epiphanes, even though an infant son, also named Antiochus, was formal head of state for a few years until Epiphanes had him murdered.

The last sentence in the mini-biography on Seleucus IV is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

The seven sons of Maccabeus, with their mother and Eleazer and many others, crowned with martyrdom. Before the incarnation of the Son of God, as martyrs they suffered intense pain unto death for the sake of the laws of God.

In the 19th year of Epiphanes was that victory of the Jews over Antiochus the Great about whom is said in 2 Maccabees: Having been delivered by God out of great dangers, we give him great thanks, forasmuch as we ourselves have fought against such a king. [The quote is from 2 Maccabees 1.11. This paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle].

Eleazar in the Year of the World 5009. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle].

Simon, son of Onias the high priest, 12th high priest of the Jews, sat (in office) for twelve years. He was a pious man, and is much praised in Chapter 50 of the Book of Ecclesiasticus. He improved the Temple and enlarged the city, brought salvation to his people, and saved them from injury. He finally died, leaving his son Onias as his successor.

Onias the Great, son of Simon, attained the office of high priest and held it for 29 years. Due to the oppressions of the tyrant Antiochus, he and many Jews fled to Egypt; and there he built a temple in likeness of the Temple at Jerusalem; by doing this he committed a great sin. He died and left a son who was still an infant.

Simon was the son of Onias, and he secured the priestly office after the flight of his father. When the prince of priests died, he left three sons, Onias, Jesus, and John, who came to three principalities of the priesthood.

Onias the Pious was a holy man, pleasing to God and mankind. He was finally slain by Andronicus; but the king, distressed by the death of this most righteous man, caused the murderer to be seized, stripped of his purple robe, and to be beaten with until he died.

Folio LXXX recto

Siena (Sena), now second among the cities of Etruria in power and possessions, is located in a very pleasant region; and as Polycrates writes in his sixth book was built by the Senonian Gauls 382 years before the coming of Christ, in the time of Brennus, when he marched in to Italy. There is evidence that those of Sena resembled the Gauls and Britons (in whom they had their origin) in appearance and bearing, in the anointing or smearing of their limbs, in their beauty of countenance and color, and also in their folkways; although the passage of time, the influence of the skies, the location, and their intercourse with their neighbors, with whom they intermingled in blood and manners, have in large part produced a change in them. As no mention is made of this city in the writings of the ancients, and as no signs of antiquity appear therein, it may be reckoned among the modern cities. Some say that Charles (Carolus), whose nickname was Hammer (Maleo) [Charles Martel (in Latin Carolus Martellus; c. 688-741) was the ruler of the Franks. He is best remembered for winning the Battle of Tours in 732, which has traditionally been understood as a historical turning-point, for it was by that victory that Islamic expansion into Europe—after rapid success in the Iberian peninsula—was halted. Charles' nickname is derived from the Latin word malleus, which means 'hammer.'], founded this city; but in the praiseworthy cloister of Saint George de Alga (built by the glory-deserving Pope Eugenius when he was about to leave the world, and paid for with his own money which he inherited paternally), there is to be found an old book, in which it is written that Pope John XVIII built this city out of the bishoprics of Perugia (Perusina), Chiusi (Clusiensi), Arezzo (Aretina), Fesula (Fesulana), Florence (Florentina), Volaterra (Volaterrana), six communities, and gave it the name Siena (Sena), which means six. The city lies on a hill, and by reason of its height, resembles an island; but in the upper region of the city the land is improved with gardens and greens. There are at hand in this city very splendid buildings, such as a beautiful university, a market, a gate, the royal palace, and a very rich and well-regulated hospital. The city is also provided, far and wide, with towers and defenses. Governed by the best laws, there are no coarse or inhospitable people there. The soil is productive in fodder, and consequently supports many oxen, wild goats, and sheep. It also produces grain, wine, oil, and an abundance of fruits of all kinds. It is 800 stadia distant from Rome. This city possessed a galaxy of stars—the holy Saint Bernardinus, whose holy relics work manifold miracles daily in the city of Aquila. He, first of all, brought the order of St. Francis to its present flourishing state. The city was also favored with Hugo, the physician and natural philosopher, who after the death of Jacobi Forli, was considered the most learned and enlightened among all his contemporaries; also Frederick, the learned jurist, who left much advice in matters of jurisprudence; also Aeneas Silvius, the poet, thereafter honored with the papal office and called Pius. It is adorned by very many men and priests of refined knowledge. [This sentence is replaced in the German edition of the with the following: "There, too, by reason of the prominence of the city, a Council (Concilium) was held."] There are many mountainous regions and fields between the river Umbro and the Sea of Danaus, or the river Palias which flows out of that sea; also the very ancient city of Clusium, of which Pliny writes much, and which once upon a time was called Camers (Carmon) and is now subject to the city of Siena and enriched by it.

Siena (Sena) was a town in Etruria and a Roman colony. It was on the road from Clusium to Florentia and is mentioned only in the time of the emperors. According to one tradition, Siena was founded by Senius, son of Remus, who brought with him the image of Lupa, the she-wolf suckling the twins, which still remains the city's badge. When he offered to sacrifice to his gods, a dense black smoke arose from the altar of Apollo, and a pure white smoke from that of Diana—in commemoration of which was made the balzana, the black and white shield of the Comite that we still see upon Siena's gates and public buildings. There are two other shields associated with it: a blue shield with the word "Libertas" in gold letters, and a red shield with a white lion rampant.

Siena's epoch of greatness begins with the twelfth century. The people became associated in arts or guilds, resembling those of Florence, whose representatives sat in councils of the Republic. Throughout the greater part of the 12th and 13th centuries Siena was engaged in serious wars with Florence, brought on by the controversy between Guelfs and Ghibellines and by commercial rivalry. In 1552 Siena became a free city under the protection of Emperor Charles V.

Folio LXXX verso

Ptolemy Epiphanes, the fifth king of the Egyptians, reigned 24 years. At the beginning of his reign he was not more than four years old. After he became of age he was neither wise nor strong, and therefore Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, undertook the conquest of his kingdom and began to make war upon it. But the princes of the realm stood by Ptolemy and protected the whole kingdom. Onias, the high priest of the Jews also came to protect him. But when he became of age Antiochus (Antiochus IV Epiphanes), the noble son of Antiochus the Great, clandestinely betrothed his sister to him; and she bore him two sons. [Ptolemy (V) Epiphanes was the son and successor of Ptolemy IV. At the death of his father in 205 BCE, he was but five years of age and Philip of Macedon and Antiochus III of Syria determined to take advantage of his minority, and entered into an alliance to divide his kingdom between them. Antiochus conquered Coele-Syria, while Philip reduced the Cyclades and the cities in Thrace that had remained subject to Egypt. In this emergency the Egyptian ministers had recourse to the powerful intervention of the Romans, who commanded both monarchs to refrain from further hostilities, and to restore all the conquered cities. In order to evade this demand without openly opposing the power of Rome, Antiochus concluded a treaty with Egypt, by which it was agreed that the young king should marry Cleopatra, the daughter of Antiochus, and receive back the Syrian provinces as her dower. This treaty was made in 199, but the marriage ceremony was not solemnized until six years later. The administration of Egypt was placed in the hands of Aristomenes, a man in every way worthy of the charge. As early as 196, the young king was declared to be of full age and his coronation was solemnized with great magnificence. It was on this occasion that the decree was issued which has been preserved to us in the celebrated inscription known as the Rosetta stone, which afforded the key to discovery of hieroglyphics. In 193 the marriage of Ptolemy to the Syrian princess Cleopatra was solemnized at Raphia. Ptolemy, however, refused to assist his father-in-law against the Romans in the war that was about to break out, and he continued steadfast in his alliance with Rome. But he derived no advantage from the treaty that concluded it, and Antiochus still remained in the possession of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia. As long as Ptolemy remained under the influence of Aristomenes, his administration was equitable and popular; but gradually he became estranged from his able minister, and threw himself more and more into the power of flatterers and vicious companions, until at length he was induced to rid himself of Aristomenes, who was compelled to take poison. He attempted to recover Coele-Syria from Seleucus, the successor of Antiochus, but having, by an unguarded expression, excited the apprehensions of some of his friends, he was poisoned in the 24th year of his reign at the age of 29. He left two sons, who afterward ascended the throne under the names of Ptolemy Philometor and Euergetes II, and a daughter, who bore her mother's name of Cleopatra]. When Antiochus heard this, he came to Egypt in person to see his sister Cleopatra and her sons, and he planned to kill Ptolemy at dinner. And when he attempted to subjugate the entire land of Egypt, he was driven out by the Egyptians. When two years later he besieged Alexandria, the Roman emissaries compelled him to yield and leave Egypt. [Antiochus IV Epiphanes was the son of Antiochus (III) the Great. He carried on a war with Egypt from 171-163 BCE with great success, in order to obtain Coele-Syria and Palestine, which had been given as a dowry to his sister; and he was preparing to lay siege to Alexandria in 168 when the Romans compelled him to retire. Perhaps at the instigation of several of his high-ranking Hellenizing Jewish officials, Antiochus IV attempted to introduce rather forcefully the worship of the Greek divinities to the peoples of Jerusalem (in an attempt to unite the peoples of his empire around a common religious set of beliefs?); but this led to a rising of the Jewish people under Mattathias and his sons the Maccabees, which Antiochus was unable to put down. He attempted to plunder a temple in Elymais in 164, but he was repulsed, and died shortly afterwards in a state of raving madness, which the Jews and Greeks equally attributed to his sacrilegious crimes. His subjects gave him the name of Epimanes ("the Madman") in parody of Epiphanes].

Ptolemy Philometor, the sixth king of the Egyptians, reigned 35 years, and was the son of the sister of Antiochus. He was altogether a lazy man, and his mother's brother made war on him. Therefore he sent his messengers to Rome for assistance. And so the Romans sent Pompilius (Popillius), the consul, to Antiochus demanding that he keep out of Egypt. Antiochus received him with a kiss; and when Pompilius had executed his commission, he offered Antiochus the choice of peace or war; and by this sternness the king was brought to obey the Roman consul. Afterwards Ptolemy gave his daughter in marriage to king Alexander (Balas), and later took her back and gave her in marriage to Demetrius; and he warred against Alexander, putting him to flight. When the head of Alexander was sent to him by the Arabian king three days later, he died for joy. [Ptolemy (VI) Philometor was the eldest son of Ptolemy V, Epiphanes. He was but a child when his father died in 181 BCE, and during his minority the regency was assumed by his mother Cleopatra. By her able administration she maintained the kingdom in a state of peace; but after her death, in 173, the chief power fell into the hands of Eulaeus and Lenoeus, both corrupt and incapable. They rashly engaged in war with Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, hoping to recover the provinces of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia. Their army was totally defeated by Antiochus, who advanced without opposition as far as Memphis in the year 170. The young king himself fell into the hands of the enemy but was treated kindly, as Antiochus hoped by that course to make himself master of Egypt. When the younger Ptolemy learned of the captivity of his brother, he was at Alexandria with his sister Cleopatra, and he assumed the kingship as Euergetes II, and prepared to defend the capital. Antiochus laid siege to Alexandria but was unable to take it, and withdrew to Syria after establishing Philometor as king of Memphis, retaining in his own hands the frontier fortress of Pelusium. This last circumstance, together with the ravages committed by the Syrian troops, awakened Philometor, who had hitherto been a mere puppet in the hands of the Syrian king, to a sense of his true position, and he hastened to make overtures of peace to his brother and sister at Alexandria. It was agreed the two brothers should reign together, and that Philometor should marry his sister Cleopatra. This arrangement did not suit Antiochus, who immediately resumed hostilities, and he advanced a second time to the walls of Alexandria, when he was met by a Roman embassy, headed by M. Popillius Laenas, who haughtily commanded him to immediately desist from hostilities. He dared not disobey, and withdrew to his dominions in 168. Dissension soon broke out between the brothers, and Euergetes expelled Philometor from Alexandria. Thereupon Philometor went to Rome in person, and the Romans appointed deputies to reinstate him in his power. This was effected without opposition; but they settled that Euergetes should have Cyrene as a separate kingdom. Euergetes, however, soon laid claim to Cyprus as well, and in this he was supported by the Romans. Philometor refused to surrender the island, and in the war which ensued, Euergetes was taken prisoner by his brother, who not only spared his life, but sent him back to Cyrene on condition that he content himself with that kingdom. The attention of Philometor from this time on appears to have been directed to the side of Syria. Demetrius Soter having sought during the dissensions between the two brothers to make himself master of Cyprus, Ptolemy now supported the usurper Alexander Balas, to whom he gave his daughter in marriage in the year 150. But when Ptolemy advanced with an army to the assistance of his son-in-law, Cummonius (the favorite and minister of Alexander) formed a plot against the life of Ptolemy; whereupon the latter took away his daughter Cleopatra from her faithless husband, and bestowed her hand on Demetrius Nicator, the son of Soter, whose cause he now espoused. In conjunction with Demetrius he warred against Alexander, whom he defeated in a decisive battle, but he died a few days later from a fall from his horse in this battle (146). He reigned 35 years from the period of his first ascension, and 18 years from his restoration by the Romans. He left three children: (1) A son, Ptolemy, who was proclaimed king after his father's death, as Ptolemy Eupator, but was put to death almost immediately by his uncle Euergetes; (2) a daughter, Cleopatra, married first to Alexander Balas, then to Demetrius II, king of Syria; and (3) another daughter named Cleopatra, who was afterwards married to her uncle Ptolemy Euergetes].

Capronia (Caproma) Monialis, a vestal virgin, was hanged because she lost her virginity.

Titus Livius, a writer of tragedies, was at this time highly renowned. By reason of his ingenuity and intelligence, he was freed by Livius Salinator (Salivatore), whose books he was teaching.

Livy (Titus Livius), was a celebrated Roman historian. Jerome's Chronicle, from which our chronicler has lifted this paragraph word for word, has misnamed his intended subject, Livius Andronicus, a writer of tragedy and epic (indeed, he 'translated' Homer's Odyssey into Latin, employing Saturnian verse). This Andronicus was Rome's first poet. According to Smith (Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology, s.v. Andronicus, Livius, Vol. 1, p. 175), Andronicus was:

The earliest Roman poet, as far as poetical literature is concerned; for whatever popular poetry there may have existed at Rome, its poetical literature begins with this writer. (Quintilian 10.2.7.) He was a Greek and probably a native of Tarentum, and was made prisoner by the Romans during their wars in southern Italy. He then became the slave of M. Livius Salinator, perhaps the same who was consul in 219 BCE, and again in 207. Andronicus instructed the children of his master, but was afterwards restored to freedom, and received from his patron the Roman name Livius. During his stay at Rome, Andronicus made himself a perfect master of the Latin language, and appears to have exerted himself chiefly in creating a taste for regular dramatic representations. His first drama was acted in 240 BCE, in the consulship of C. Claudius and M. Tuditanus (Cicero, Brutus 18); but whether it was a tragedy or a comedy is uncertain. That he wrote comedies as well as tragedies is attested beyond all doubt. The number of his dramas was considerable, and we still possess the titles and fragments of at least fourteen. The subjects of them were all Greek, and they were little more than translations or imitations of Greek dramas. He is said to have died in 221, and cannot have lived beyond 214. As to the poetical merit of these compositions we are unable to form an accurate idea, since the extant fragments are few and short. The language in them appears yet in a rude and undeveloped form, but it has nevertheless a solid basis for further development. Cicero (Brutus 18) says, that in his time they were no longer worth reading, and that the 600 mules in the Clytemnestra and the 3000 craters in the Equus Trojanus ('Trojan Horse') could not afford any pleasure upon the stage. (ad Famil. 7.1) In the time of Horace, the poems of Andronicus were read and explained in schools; and Horace, although not an admirer of early Roman poetry, says, that he should not like to see the works of Andronicus destroyed. (Horace, Epistulae 2.1.69)

Minucia, the vestal virgin, was convicted of unchastity and buried alive.

Theophrastus the Chresian [The word chresius used to describe Theophrastus is meaningless. Perhaps it is related to the equally meaningless word used to describe Sappho (crexea) at Folio LXI verso. Since both were from the town of Eresus (or Eressos, on the island of Lesbos), it is possible that chresius/chrexea are corruptions of 'Eresus.'], was a philosopher, and, according to the testimony of Athenodorus [Athenodorus (c. 74 BCE-7 CE) was a Stoic philosopher. He was born in Canana, near Tarsus (in modern-day Turkey). A student of Poseidonius of Rhodes, he is perhaps most famous for being the teacher of Octavian (the future Caesar Augustus) at Apollonia.] in his book on the Peripatetics, the son of a fuller. [The word "Chresian" and the phrase "and, according to the testimony of Athenodorus in his book on the Peripatetics, the son of a fuller" are not in the German edition of the chronicle]. In his own country he first heard Leucippus, his fellow citizen. Then, after he had heard Plato, he took himself to Aristotle. When that one (Aristotle) went to Chalcide, he (Theophrastus) succeeded him as the president of his school. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. He was a man of high intelligence, exceptional industry, and wonderful speech; and although he was formerly called Tyrtamus (Tyranno), yet because of his divine eloquence, Aristotle called him Theophrastus. He published about three hundred books. He had (according to Pamphilus) about two thousand disciples who came to listen to him. Among these were Nicomachus, the son of Aristotle, and Menander, the comic playwright. And this he always said: The most valuable thing is time. He died at the age of 85. [Theophrastus, Greek philosopher, was a native of Eresus in Lesbos, and studied philosophy at Athens, first under Plato and later under Aristotle, who is said to have changed his original name of Tyrtamus to Theophrastus ('the Divine Speaker') to indicate the fluent and graceful address of his pupil. Aristotle named Theophrastus his successor in the presidency of the Lyceum, and in his will bequeathed to him his library and the originals of his own writings. He was a worthy successor of his great master. When the philosophers were banished from Athens, Theophrastus also left the city; but he returned when the law was repealed. He continued to teach at Athens until the time of his death in 287 BCE, having presided over the Academy about 35 years. He is said to have closed his life with the complaint respecting the short duration of human existence—that it ended just when the insight into its problems was beginning. He bequeathed his library to Neleus of Scepsis. Theophrastus exerted himself to carry out the philosophical system of Aristotle, to throw light upon the difficulties contained in his books, and to fill up the gaps in them. His greatest contribution, perhaps, are his two surviving treatises on botany, which had a profound influence on the Middle Ages, and were the most important studies in this field for nearly eighteen hundred years].

Menander, the comic poet and disciple of Theophrastus, is the one of whom Quintilian says: In my opinion this Menander must have been an industrious reader to acquire all this learning. He treated all forms of life. He was highly qualified in verse and diction and spoke ably on all matters and of persons and their inclinations. For these reasons Ovid thought that he would last forever. And the Apostle Paul reveals that he himself had read this man when he says to the Corinthians: Bad company corrupts good morals. 1 Corinthians 15.

Menander of Athens, born in 342 BCE, was the most distinguished playwright of New Comedy. Alexis, the comic playwright, was his uncle and no doubt instructed his nephew in the rules of composition of comic drama. His character must have been greatly influenced by his intimacy with Theophrastus and Epicurus, of whom the former was said to be his teacher, and the latter his intimate friend. His taste and sympathy were entirely with the philosophy of Epicurus, and in an epigram he declared that "as Themistocles rescued Greece from slavery, so Epicurus from unreason." From Theophrastus, on the other hand, he must have derived much of that skill in the discrimination of character which we so much admire in the Characters of the philosopher, and which formed the great charm of the Comedies of Menander. Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, was one of his admirers, and he invited the poet to his court at Alexandria; but Menander seems to have declined the honor. He died at Athens in 291. His comedies were imitated by the Roman comic playwrights, particularly Terence. Indeed, through his Roman successors (and their successors in the medieval period all the way up to the 21st century) he can be seen as the father of situation comedy.

The last two sentences of this paragraph (beginning with "For these reasons Ovid...") are not in the German edition of the chronicle. The citation from Paul is 1 Corinthians 15.33.

Menippus, a cynic philosopher, was by race Phoenician and by social position a slave. His master was Bachus, a certain man from the Pontus. He was (as Hermippus relates) a constant moneylender; but through his enemies he lost all he had. On account of this he hanged himself. [Menippus, a cynic philosopher, and originally a slave, was a native of Gadara in Coele-Syria who flourished about 250 BCE. He amassed great wealth as a moneylender but was defrauded of it all and committed suicide. We are told that he wrote nothing serious per se, but that he discussed serious subjects in a spirit of ridicule, and especially delighted in attacking rival philosophical schools such as the Epicureans and Stoics. Strabo called him the "serious-jokester". His works, named in honor of their creator Menippean satire, mixed prose and verse, and constituted an entirely new genre of literature. Though now lost, their influence on later writers was profound. Varro, Seneca (his , or "Pumpkinification," is the only near-complete classical Menippean satire to survive), Petronius (Satyricon). Apuleius (Golden Ass) and Lucian were all his heirs in the ancient world. Modern descendants of Menippean satire include Voltaire, Diderot, E.T.A. Hoffmann, Swift, Rabelais, and Lewis Carroll (to name a few)].

Demetrius, nicknamed Phalereus, was a philosopher and disciple of Theophrastus (Thephrasti); a clever disputant and orator. He was somewhat impetuous (as Cicero says), but gentle. And after he had been with the Athenians for 10 years, because of his exceptional virtue he was honored with 360 statues of bronze, for he had increased greatly the revenues and buildings of the city. But later on, when in his absence the statues were broken by those jealous of him, he said: Yet they have not destroyed my virtue because of which they erected the statues. He also said that eloquence has as much power in a state as a weapon has in war. [Demetrius Phalereus, so called from his birthplace, the Attic demos of Phalerum, where he was born about 345 BCE. His parents were poor but by his talents and perseverance he rose to the highest honors at Athens, and became distinguished as an orator, statesman, philosopher and poet. He was educated, together with the poet Menander, in the school of Theophrastus. In 317 the government of Athens was entrusted to him by Cassander, and he discharged the duties of his office for 10 years with such general satisfaction that the Athenians conferred on him the most extraordinary distinctions, and erected no less than 360 statues in his honor. But during the latter period of his administration, he seems to have become intoxicated with his good fortune, and abandoned himself to dissipation. When Demetrius Poliorcetes approached Athens in 307, Demetrius Phalereus was obliged to take to flight, and his enemies induced the Athenians to sentence him to death. He went to Ptolemy Lagi at Alexandria, with whom he lived for many years on the best of terms, and it was probably owing to the influence of Demetrius that the great library at Alexandria was formed. But his successor Ptolemy Philadelphus was hostile toward Demetrius, because he had advised his father to appoint another of his sons as his successor. He banished Demetrius to Upper Egypt, where he is said to have died from a snakebite].

Folio LXXXI recto

In the 477th year of the founding of the city of Rome [The 477th year of the founding of the city corresponds to 277 BCE], the name of the city was highly renowned; but its arms had not been carried beyond Italy. Rome then had a population of 292,334 inhabitants. And although the Romans from the beginning of their city had never been at war, they now entered upon a conflict with the Africans [Both in the German and the Latin editions of the the Carthaginians are referred to in this manner], firstly, under Appius Claudius and Quintus Fabius, the consuls, in Sicily. And Appius Claudius triumphed over the Africans and king Hieron of Sicily. [This introduces the first of the Punic Wars, which raged between Rome and Carthage in the 3rd and 2nd centuries BCE. The conflict began during the consulship of Appius Claudius and Quintus Fabius, who conducted the war against the Carthaginians in Sicily. Incidentally, it must be noted that the lineage of the Roman consuls, as given in the , is by no means complete. These officials were elected annually, two for each year, and their number is legion, as can be readily appreciated by consulting the table supplementing Arnold's , William Smith's , and works of a like nature. The consuls and dictators who appear in the are only a very small number selected by Schedel].

Under these consuls the Punic War against Hannibal the elder began. [This sentence does not appear in the German edition].

During the consulship of Gnaeus (Gneo) and Caius (Gayo) the Romans fought at sea with sharp-pointed ships. Cornelius (the Gnaeus mentioned above) was betrayed, but Duilius (the Caius mentioned above) defeated the Carthaginian commander, captured 31 ships, and sank 14; he took 7,000 prisoners, and slew 3,000 of the enemy. The Romans had never enjoyed a more satisfying victory because although they had been undefeated on land, now they were also very powerful on sea.

Cn. Cornelius Scipio Asina (here called Gnaeus), and Caius Duilius were consuls in 260 BCE, and participated in the first Punic War. The author's reference to a naval battle with "sharp-pointed ships," may be thus explained: The old method of attempting to sink or disable an enemy ship by piercing her just below the water, with a brazen beak affixed to every ship's bow, was still universally practiced during their time. The system of fighting, therefore, brought the ships close together; and if the fighting men on one side were superior, boarding, if possible, assured victory. This was therefore the Roman goal, and for the purpose they contrived a sort of drawbridge thirty-six feet long and four wide, with a low parapet on each side. This bridge was attached by a hole at the end of it to a mast twenty-four feet high, erected on the ship's prow; and the hole was large and oblong, so that the bridge not only played freely all round the mast, but could be drawn up so as to lie close and almost parallel to it. The end of the bridge was hoisted by a rope passing through a block at the masthead. The bridge was let fall on the enemy's ship at whatever quarter she appeared; and as a ship's beak was commonly her only weapon, an enemy ventured without fear close to her broadside or her stern, as if she were there defenseless. When the bridge fell a strong iron spike, fixed at the bottom of it, was driven home by the mere weight of the fall into the deck of the enemy's ship, and held it fast; whereupon the soldiers in two files rushed over the bridge and boarded the enemy vessel. And thus equipped the Roman fleet put to sea. It was commanded by one of the consuls, Cn. Cornelius Scipio; but as he allowed himself to be taken with seventeen ships in an ill-advised attempt on the Liparaean Islands, his colleague Duilius was called upon to conduct the fleet. He came upon the Carthaginians under the command of Hannibal; and they advanced confident of victory. But the 30 ships that formed the Carthaginian advanced squadron, including that of Hannibal himself, were immediately grappled by the Roman bridges, boarded and taken. Hannibal escaped in his boat to the main line of battle; but the character of the reception received by their first division startled the Carthaginians; and when they found their approach endangered by these bridges from every angle, they were seized with a panic and fled. Their total loss is said to have amounted to about 50 ships, 3,000 slain, and 7,000 prisoners. Some authors speak of "grappling irons, by means of which the enemy's ship might be drawn, and the sea fight thus changed into a land fight;" but the bridges are probably meant.

The phrase "because although they had been undefeated on land, now they were also very powerful on sea" is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Crispus [There is no stoic philosopher called Crispus. The chronicler, or his source, must mean Chrysippus (c. 280–c. 207 BCE), the so-called second founder of Stoicism after Zeno], a Stoic [Stoicism is a school of Hellenistic philosophy founded in Athens by Zeno of Citium in the early third century BCE. It was incredibly influential throughout all of antiquity]. philosopher, who was from the nation of Elea [Chrysippus was not from Elea (Velia in Latin and Italian), a town in southern Italy, but from Soli (in Cilicia, Asia Minor), and was raised in Tarsus (also in Asia Minor). The pre-Socratic philosopher Zeno, who lived in the fifth-century BCE (and who is not the founder of Stoicism) was from Elea. Perhaps the fact that the two philosophers were called Zeno, and that Chrysippus was considered with the second Zeno to be the founder of Stoicism, is what caused the confusion. In any case, the German edition of the does not include the phrase "who was from the nation of Elea."], flourished at this time. At the age of eighty he wrote a book so subtle that a long life is required to understand it, so Valerius gives witness in his 8th book. [] From his rather angry sayings the following one is very famous: The wise man is in need of nothing, yet is deserving of many things; the fool, on the contrary, is deserving of nothing, and, not knowing how to make use of anything, he lacks all things. [Seneca cites this quote of Chrysippus (to whom he ascribes it) in ('Moral Epistles') 9.14] Zeno [Zeno (334-262 BCE) was a Greek philosopher from Citium, Cyprus, and the founder of the Stoic school of philosophy that he taught in Athens from around 300 BCE. Stoicism, which took its name from the fact that Zeno used to teach in the ('Painted Porticoe') of Athens, along with the ideas of Plato's Academy, Epicureanism, and the philosophy of the Cynics, was one of the four great philosophical schools of thought of the ancient world. Its general principals placed great emphasis on the goodness and peace of mind that would arise from living a life of virtue in accordance with nature. After Zeno's death it quickly became the most popular philosophical way of life in the Hellenistic and Roman worlds], also a philosopher at this time, said, What is said in your sole presence should be buried with you. These two were authors of the Stoic sect. [This last sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle].

These two consuls (referring to the portraits of Lucius Scipio and C. Florus Aquillius) fought with Hanno, the Carthaginian commander; and they devastated Corsica and Sardinia, and Scipio took away many thousands of people as prisoners and celebrated a triumph. [Lucius Cornelius Scipio and C. Florus Aquillius were consuls in 259 BCE, the 6th year of the first Punic War. Scipio drove the Carthaginians out of Sardinia and Corsica, defeating Hanno, the Carthaginian commander, and obtaining a triumph in consequence. The province assigned to Florus was Sicily, where he watched the movement of Hamilcar. Florus triumphed in 258].

Polemon, an Athenian philosopher, was in repute at this time. As Laertius states, he was immodest and forward in his youth, and to satisfy his pleasures he carried his money about with him and hid it in obscure lanes and streets. Once while intoxicated and crowned, he stumbled into the school of Xenocrates, who stopped discoursing on the subject in hand, and commenced to lecture on modesty. In consequence Polemon bravely and diligently applied himself to such a degree that he became the successor of Xenocrates in the leadership of the school. [Polemon of Athens was an eminent Platonic philosopher. He was the son of Philostratus, a man of wealth and political distinction. In his youth, Polemon was extremely profligate; but one day, when at the age of thirty years, on bursting into the school of Xenocrates, at the head of a band of revelers, his attention was so arrested by a discourse on temperance, that he tore off his garland and remained an attentive listener. From that day he pursued an abstemious course of life, and continued to frequent the school, of which, on the death of Xenocrates in 315 BCE, he became the head. He died in 273 at a great age. He esteemed the object of philosophy to be to exercise men in things and deeds, not in dialectic speculation. His whole theory was to live according to the laws of nature].

Under these consuls (referring to the portraits of M. Atilius Regulus and Lucius Manlius Vulso) many catastrophes by fire and water almost consumed the city of Rome; and there was war in Africa against Hamilcar, the Carthaginian general, and a battle was fought on the sea, in which he was defeated. Afterwards those consuls proceeded as far as Carthage, and they destroyed many cities. Manlius (Mallius) returned to Rome as a victor, while Atilius Regulus remained in Africa, making war against the Africans and fighting the three Carthaginian generals, namely the two Hasdrubals (Asdrubales) and Atailcar (Atailcarem) [Since there is no historical individual known as Atailcar, the chronicler must have meant Hamilcar]. He vanquished them and slew 17,000 of the enemies. He also killed a marvelously large serpent, whose skin was 120 feet in length. It was shown to many as an object of wonder at Rome. Then the defeated Carthaginians sought peace from the Romans. But later Regulus was in turn defeated. [L. Manlius Vulso Longus and M. Atilius Regulus, consuls in 256 BCE, the 9th year of the first Punic War, defeated the Carthaginians by land and sea in Africa, and landed a large force there. They met with striking success; and after Manlius returned to Rome with half of the army, Regulus remained in Africa with the other half and vigorously prosecuted the war. He defeated the Carthaginian generals Hasdrubal, Bostar, and Hamilcar with great loss, and they retired within the walls of the city. Regulus ravaged the country round about. But in the midst of defeat success came to the Carthaginians from an unexpected source. Xanthippus, a Greek mercenary, pointed out to the Carthaginians their error, and being chosen to lead them, he boldly marched against the enemy in the open country with 4,000 cavalry and 100 elephants. Regulus was totally defeated, 30,000 of his men were slain, scarcely 2,000 escaped to Clypea, and Regulus himself was taken prisoner].

During the consulship of Marcus Aemilius (Emilio) and Paulus Servius, both these Roman consuls sailed to Africa in three hundred ships by way of the city of Clipsea; and soon they came to Carthage. They first defeated the Africans in a naval battle. Aemilius sank one hundred and four ships with the enemy on board, and captured thirty ships and their warriors; in addition he either slew or took 15,000 prisoners, and Africa would have been totally defeated at this time if there had not been a famine, which prevented the army from remaining there any longer. But at Sicily the consuls suffered shipwreck. [Servius Fulvius Paetinus Nobilior and M. Aemilius Paullus, whom the chronicler calls Marcus Aemilius and Paulus Servius, were consuls in 255 BCE. The Romans equipped a large fleet during their consulship, which defeated the Carthaginians in a naval battle, and carried off from Africa the survivors of the army of Regulus; but on its return to Italy the fleet was shipwrecked and most of the vessels were destroyed]. At this time silver money was first coined at Rome.

Folio LXXXI verso

Antiochus, noble or illustrious, reigned 11 years. He was an image of the Antichrist. While he was a hostage at Rome he learned of his father's death and of the laziness of his own brother; and so he secretly fled and, coming to Syria, was there received by several cities. When his brother died he reigned in his place. After the sale of the priesthood, firstly by the advice of Jason and later by that of Menelaus, he ordered pagan names to be applied to the Jews and forbade sacrifices in the Temple at Jerusalem. After his return from Egypt he robbed the Temple at the instigation of Menelaus, and ordered the Jews to sacrifice to idolatrous gods and to adopt pagan customs. He placed an idol of Olympian Zeus (Jovis Olimpi) in the Temple, prohibited circumcision, and slew the circumcisers. The seven brothers and their mother, who would not eat pork, he martyred with various forms of punishment. Finally, when he was about to go to Jerusalem, he fell from a chariot, which broke; and he was consumed by worms, and died a miserable death in a strange land. [For Antiochus IV Epiphanes, see also Folio LXXX verso, and note].

Antiochus Eupator reigned 2 years. He was still a child when his father died. Lysias was his guardian during his youth. They both led forth an army against the Jews, but before long were slain by their own people through fear of Demetrius, the son of Seleucus Eupator. [Antiochus V (Eupator), no doubt here referred to, was nine years old at the time of his father's death, and reigned under the guardianship of Lysias. He was dethroned and put to death by Demetrius Soter, the son of Seleucus Philopater, who had up until this point in time lived at Rome as a hostage].

Demetrius Soter (Sothor), the tenth king of Syria and Asia, reigned 12 years after the murder of his step-son. The son of Seleucus slew Antiochus Eupator and Lysias, and made Alcimus (Alchimum) a priest. He was sent to Jerusalem with Bacchides, and many Jews were slain. He sent Nicanor, who was killed by Judas Maccabeus. And he killed Bacchides the Judean. And, finally, he was conquered by Alexander, who deprived him of life and kingdom at the same time. [Demetrius Soter, who reigned 162-150 BCE, was the son of Seleucus IV (Philopator) and grandson of Antiochus the Great. While yet a child he had been sent by his father to Rome as a hostage, and remained there during the whole reign of Antiochus IV (Epiphanes). After the death of Antiochus, being now 23, he asked to be set at liberty, but being refused, he secretly fled from Rome and went to Syria. The Syrians declared in his favor; and the young king Antiochus V, with his tutor Lysias, was seized by his own guards and put to death. Rome recognized Demetrius as king; but having alienated his own subjects by luxury and intemperance, they sided with an imposter named Balas, who took the name of Alexander. He defeated Demetrius in battle and slew him. Demetrius left two sons, Demetrius Nicator and Antiochus Sidetes].

Mattathias, the priest, a son of Jonathan, the son of Simonides, was honored by the Jews for his learning and enjoyed glorious renown. In his wrath, this holy man slew the sinners; and he had five sons who possessed the same wrath. But he was not a priest, although three of his sons were. When he died he was buried at Modin. [Mattathias, a citizen of Modin, was of priestly descent. When in accordance with the policy of Antiochus IV, the royal officers attempted to establish pagan sacrifices in the town, Mattathias refused to conform, killed the officer and a Jew about to offer sacrifices, leveled the pagan altar to the ground, and fled with his five sons to the mountains. There he was joined by a number of other like-minded individuals. After a few months of vigorous fighting, Mattathias died, leaving the conduct of the revolt to his five sons. Of these Eleazar and John were killed in the succeeding struggle, without having attained official standing. The other three were his successors. (1 Maccabees 2)]

This Judas, the Maccabee, a very brave and war-like man, and a son of Mattathias, was a very stern warrior. He triumphed in Israel, and had no equal before or after that time. His glorious deeds are on display in the books of the Maccabees. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. He was finally defeated in battle. For the sake of the laws of God he suffered death, after having administered the priesthood for three years. [Judas, called Maccabee, or 'the Hammer,' from which surname the entire family came to be known, was essentially a warrior, whose plans involved not only the re-establishment of the Torah, but also, in all probability, the reestablishment of the Jewish State in at least a semi-independent position. He defeated successively the Syrian generals Apollonius and Seron. Antiochus IV then sent Lysias, the imperial chancellor, to put down the revolt, and he in turn sent a large body of troops against Judas, under three generals—Ptolemy, Nicanor and Gorgias. Judas called the fighting men of Galilee together at Mizpah, organized them, and at Emmaus surprised and utterly defeated the forces of Gorgias. Later he defeated a great army under Lysias at Bethzur. In December 165, Judas cleansed the Temple of the Syrian pollutions, and inaugurated the re-established worship with a great feast. For a year and a half he waged war against his enemies on the east of the Jordan, while his brother Simon brought the scattered Jews throughout Galilee back to Judea for safety. His vigorous campaign seems to have alienated 'The Pious,' who had seen their ambitions realized in the re-establishment of the Temple worship. Lysias returned with a great army, completely defeating Judas at Beth-zacharias. He then laid siege to Jerusalem, where the citadel was still in Syrian hands. Jerusalem surrendered but Lysias did not attempt to disestablish the Jewish faith. He appointed Alcimus as high priest, who was received by 'the Pious' as legitimate, although he favored the Greeks. Judas and his party, however, remained in revolt, and when Lysias returned to Syria, undertook war against Alcimus himself. Demetrius I, who had succeeded Antiochus IV, sent Nicanor to put an end to the rebellion; but Judas defeated him and became the supreme head of the Jewish State. Judas sent ambassadors to Rome and thus gained an ally, and Demetrius was asked to desist from fighting the Jews. But the international policy of Judas displeased 'the Pious,' who deserted him; and before the message of the senate could reach Demetrius, Judas had been defeated by the Syrian general Bacchides, at Elasa, and killed (1 Maccabees 3-9:22)].

The Temple was cleansed by Judas and his brothers after it had been dishonored for three years.

Jonathan, the Jewish commander and high priest, ruled over the Jewish people after Judas, for a period of 19 years; and in virtue he was not unlike his brother Maccabee. He was finally betrayed, together with his sons, by Trypho, taken prisoner, and slain. Simon (Symon), his brother, buried his body with lamentation.

Jonathan undertook the leadership of the revolt upon the death of Judas Maccabeus, only to suffer serious defeat east of the Jordan, where he had gone to avenge the killing of his brother John by the 'sons of Jambri.' For a time it looked as if Syria would again establish its complete control over the country. The high priest Alcimus died, and Bacchides, believing the subjecting of Judea complete returned to Syria (160 BCE). The land, however, was not at peace, and in the interests of order, Bacchides gave Jonathan the right to maintain an armed force at Michmash. The fortunes of the Maccabaeian house now rose steadily. As a sort of licensed revolutionist, Jonathan was sought as an ally by the two rivals, Alexander Balas and Demetrius I. He chose Alexander, and when the latter defeated Demetrius, Jonathan found himself a high priest, a prince of Syria, and a military and civil governor of Judea (150 BCE). But the steady advance of Judea was checked by the treacherous seizure of Jonathan by Trypho, the guardian and commanding general of the young Antiochus V, by whom he was executed in 142 (1 Maccabees 9:23).

The last sentence of this paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Aristarchus, a teacher of grammar, was famous in the time of the Maccabees. [Aristarchus of Samothrace, the celebrated grammarian and scholar, flourished in the middle of the second century BCE. He was educated in the school of Aristophanes of Byzantium, at Alexandria, where he himself founded a grammatical and critical school. His specialty was Homer, and he soon became the most influential of all scholars of Homeric poetry. He was also the librarian of the library of Alexandria, and seems to have succeeded his teacher Aristophanes of Byzantium in that role. At an advanced age he left Alexandria and went to Cyprus, where he is said to have died at the age of seventy-two of voluntary starvation, because he was suffering from incurable dropsy. He was, perhaps, the greatest textual critic of antiquity].

Pacuvius (Bacubius) [There is no playwright known as Bacubius, which must be a corruption for Pacuvius (c. 220-230 BCE), a tragic poet who was born at Brundisium and was the nephew of Ennius. Cicero ranked him first among all Roman writers of tragedy], from the town of Brundisium [Ennius (239-169 BCE) was Rome's greatest and most influential early poet and playwright], a writer of tragedies, was a nephew of the poet Ennius by his sister. He was famous first at Rome, and then later as well when he returned to Tarentum (Tharentum). He died at the age of ninety.

Simon, third son of Mattathias, was the Jewish leader and high priest for almost 8 years. He was a spiritual and very wise. From his youth he was of very good conduct. He was at last shamefully killed by his son-in-law. This Simon and Jonathan, brothers of Judas, redeemed from the enemy the body of their brother after he was slain, and buried it at Modin. For Ptolemy had invited him to a banquet, and there murdered him with his two sons. The widow of Simon, with the other two, were put in prison, and with that event ends the first book of the Maccabees. [Simon, another son of Mattathias, succeeded Jonathan when the affairs of the State were in a critical position. He was a successful diplomatist and seldom compelled to resort to war. In 141 BCE he was elected high priest and military commander and civil governor of the Jews. The office of the high priest became hereditary in Simon's family. Like his brother, however, he met a violent death, being killed by his son-in-law at a banquet. (1 Maccabees 13-16:18)].

Folio LXXXII recto

Ptolemy Euergetes, son of Philometor and brother of Cleopatra, was the seventh king of the Egyptians. He reigned 29 years. He was a very evil and cruel man; and through fear of him, his brother and Cleopatra his sister, by means of messengers, surrendered the kingdom to him. When he had acquired his kingdom without any struggle, he became excessively proud; and he murdered his brother's son in the hands of his mother, and strangled all his patrons. And just as his relatives had regarded him as a cruel and bloodthirsty individual, so he became the laughingstock and mockery of the Romans who came there; for (as Justinus writes) he had a deformed face, short body, and a fat belly, resembling an animal. This was accentuated by his manner of dress. He begot children by his sister and by the sister of his wife; and he also forced the daughter of his sister, and he dismembered her son, placed him in a trunk, and at the celebration of his birthday ordered it brought forth. [Ptolemy VII (Euergetes II) or Physcon, that is 'Big Belly' reigned 146-117 BCE. In order to secure undisputed possession of the throne, he married his sister Cleopatra, the widow of his brother Philometor, and put to death his nephew Ptolemy, who had been proclaimed king under the surname of Eupator. A reign thus commenced in blood was continued in the same spirit. Many of the leading citizens of Alexandria who had taken part against him on the death of his brother were put to death, while the populace were given up to the cruelties of his mercenary troops, and the streets of the city were repeatedly deluged with blood. Thousands fled and the population of Alexandria was so reduced that the king invited foreigners to settle there. At the same time that he thus incurred the hatred of his subjects, he rendered himself an object of aversion by abandoning himself to the most degrading vices. He became bloated and deformed in person, and enormously corpulent, whence the Alexandrians gave him the nickname Physcon, by which he is more usually known. His union with Cleopatra was of short duration for he became enamored of his niece Cleopatra (the offspring of his wife by her former marriage with Philometor, and he did not hesitate to divorce her mother and receive her daughter in her stead as his wife and queen. By this he alienated still more the minds of his Greek subjects, and his vices and cruelties at length produced an insurrection at Alexandria. Thereupon he fled to Cyprus, and the Alexandrians declared his sister Cleopatra queen (130). Enraged at this, Ptolemy put to death Memphitis, his son by Cleopatra, and sent his head and hands to his unhappy mother. But Cleopatra having been shortly afterwards expelled from Alexandria, Ptolemy found himself unexpectedly reinstated on the throne (127). His sister Cleopatra fled to the court of her elder sister Cleopatra, the wife of Demetrius II, king of Syria, who espoused the cause of the fugitive. Ptolemy, in revenge, set up against him a pretender, Zabinas or Zebina, who assumed the title of Alexander II. But the usurper was so haughty toward Ptolemy that the latter suddenly changed his policy, became reconciled to his sister Cleopatra, whom he permitted to return to Egypt, and gave his daughter Tryphaena to Antiochus Grypus, the son of Demetrius. Ptolemy died after a reign of 29 years from the death of Philometor, his brother. Although stained with the most infamous vices, Ptolemy retained that love of letters hereditary in the whole race of Ptolemies. In his youth he had been a pupil of Aristarchus, and courted the society of learned men. He himself was the author of memoirs that extended to 24 books. He left two sons, Ptolemy, afterward known as Soter II, and Alexander, both of whom subsequently succeeded to the throne of Egypt; also three daughters, (1) Cleopatra, married to her brother Ptolemy Soter, (2) Tryphaena, wife of Antiochus Grypus, king of Syria, and (3) Selene, who was unmarried at the time of her father's death].

Ptolemy Physcon (Phiston), or Soter, son of Euergetes, and eighth king of the Egyptians, reigned 17 years. At this time Antiochus Tyricenus, the son of Demetrius, and Antiochus Grypus (Griffi), the king's brother, were at war with one another; so for a time one reigned and then the other. During the course of such murderous dissensions over the kingdom of Syria this Ptolemy died, and he left his kingdom to his wife. [The chronicler seems to be confused in the matter of surnames, as the name Physcon was applied to Ptolemy VII (Euergetes II). The Ptolemy now under consideration is Ptolemy VIII (Soter II), also called Philometor, but commonly called Lathyrus ('chickpea'), who reigned firstly from 117 to 107, and later from 89 to 81, a total of 17 years, which agrees with the duration of his reign, according to the chronicler. Although of age at his father's death in 117, he was obliged to reign jointly with his mother Cleopatra, who had been appointed by the will of her late husband to succeed him on the throne. She was desirous of associating with herself her younger son Ptolemy Alexander; but since Lathyrus was popular, she was obliged to give way, and send Alexander to Cyprus. After declaring Lathyrus king, she compelled him to repudiate his sister Cleopatra, of whose influence she was jealous, and to marry his younger sister Selene in her stead. After reigning ten years jointly with his mother, he was expelled by an insurrection of the people, whom she had incited against him (107). His brother Alexander now assumed sovereignty of Egypt, in conjunction with his mother, while Lathyrus was able to establish himself in the possession of Cyprus. He reigned therefore 18 years, while Cleopatra and Alexander reigned in Egypt. After the death of Cleopatra and the expulsion of Alexander in 89, Ptolemy Lathyrus was recalled to Alexandria and was established anew on the throne of Egypt, which he occupied from that point on without interruption until his death in 81. He left only one daughter, Bernice, called also Cleopatra, who succeeded him on the throne; also two sons, both named Ptolemy, who, though illegitimate, became in turn kings of Egypt and Cyprus].

Ptolemy Alexander, ninth king of the Egyptians, reigned 10 years after the expulsion of his brother. He was the brother of the aforesaid Ptolemy Soter. After Cleopatra, the mother, and her eldest son had reigned together for seventeen years, she became dissatisfied with his licentiousness, aroused the people against him, and forced him into exile on the island of Cyprus. She then ordered Alexander, her youngest son, to reign with her in his stead. Afterwards Alexander murdered his mother, and was exiled by the people, and Ptolemy Soter was recalled to the throne. Therefore Alexander made the Roman people heir to the kingdom of Cyrene, left him by his father in his will. [Ptolemy IX (Alexander I) was the youngest son of Ptolemy VII, and reigned jointly with his mother from the expulsion of his brother Lathyrus, from 107-90 BCE. In this year he assassinated his mother; but he had not reigned alone a year, when a general sedition of the populace compelled him to quit Alexandria. He raised fresh troops but was defeated by the rebels. Whereupon Lathyrus was recalled to Egypt, as related in the previous note. In an attempt to make himself master of Cyprus, he was defeated and slain. He left a son, Alexander, who later ascended the throne of Egypt].

Ptolemy Soter, who had been exiled by his mother, recovered his paternal kingdom in the year Alexander was slain by the Egyptians. He reigned 8 years. For when Alexander had killed his own mother, they banished him in revenge for his mother, as has already been written. [The last two sentences of this paragraph are not in the German edition of the chronicle].

Hannibal, son of Hamilcar the Carthaginian general, was made commander of the Carthaginian army at the age of twenty-five. In knowledge, keenness and counsel in meeting dangers he excelled all the other generals. When he became commander he subdued the people of Spain in three years, and placed his brother Hasdrubal over them as governor, while he passed over the Pyrenees and came to the mountains that divide Italy from Gaul, over which no person except Hercules had ever passed. He opened the rocky passes by burning piles of wood and pouring vinegar on them so that a loaded elephant could pass through, where previously hardly a single person had been able to pass; in the same region many persons and elephants were lost in the snow. It is said that Hannibal led into Italy 80,000 foot soldiers, twenty thousand cavalry, and thirty-seven elephants. He proceeded into the plain of Tarentum, and after devastating the whole region lying beyond the mountains, he defeated the Romans in three engagements and conquered many cities. He did likewise in the region of Liguria. After that he marched over the Apennines, and in Etruria, where Florence now is, he was attacked by a disease of the eyes to such an extent that he lost his right eye. Later he slew C. Flaminius. The Romans then sent Fabius Maximus against Hannibal. He (Fabius) disposed of his forces in the mountain heights and concealed them in the forests; and thereby he deceived him and defeated him with the assistance of the Aretinians. And Hannibal ravaged all Italy and molested it for sixteen years. Afterwards he marched into Apulia and defeated the Romans at Cannae. In this battle so many thousands of Romans were slain that Hannibal sent to Carthage three pecks [Peck = Latin modius (a measure of dry goods equal to 2 gallons or 8.81 liters)]. of golden rings that he stripped from the hands of the Roman warriors. And in this battle the Roman consuls were either taken prisoners or slain. And the Romans feared that after this victory Hannibal would soon come to Rome. But Hannibal was compelled to vacate Italy in order to protect his fatherland against Publius Scipio. When the Carthaginians made peace with the Romans, Hannibal was compelled to flee to Antiochus, the king, and still later to the king of Bithynia. There T. Quintus (T. Quintius Flaminius), the legate, followed him; but in order that he would not be captured by the Romans, Hannibal took poison which he carried with him in a ring according to lordly custom. And so by that manner of death he freed himself from the shackles of the Romans. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. He died in the seventieth year of his life. [Hannibal (247- c. 183 BCE), son of Hamilcar Barca, was one of the most illustrious generals of antiquity. At the age of nine, his father took him with him into Spain, and it was there that Hamilcar made him swear eternal hostility to Rome. He received an early training in arms, and was present with his father in the battle in which the latter perished (229). Due to his courage and capacity for war, even as early as his eighteenth year, Hasdrubal (son-in-law and successor of Hamilcar) entrusted Hannibal with the chief command of most of the military enterprises planned by that general. On Hasdrubal's death, the soldiers unanimously proclaimed their youthful leader commander-in-chief, which the government of Carthage forthwith ratified. Hannibal was now in his twenty-sixth year. His first work was to firmly establish Carthaginian power in Spain. Then followed the arduous struggle called the Second Punic War. In the spring of 218 Hannibal quitted his winter quarters and commenced his march for Italy, crossing the Pyrenees and passing along the south coast of Gaul. He crossed the Rhone and soon commenced his passage across the Alps. His army suffered much at the hands of the Gaulish mountaineers, and from the natural difficulties of the road; for it was October, and snow had already commenced to fall in the high Alps. When at length he emerged from the valley of Aosta into the plains of Po, he had but 20,000 footmen and 6,000 horses left. His first encounter with the Romans, which took place near the Ticinus, resulted in the complete rout of the Roman army under Scipio. Likewise was the outcome of a second engagement, after which the Roman army took refuge within the walls of Placentia. Early in the following year Hannibal descended by the valley of the Macra into the marshes on the banks of the Arno. In struggling through these marshes great numbers of his horses and beasts of burden perished, and he himself lost the sight of one eye by a violent attack of ophthalmia. The consul Flaminius hastened to meet him, and a battle was fought in which the Roman army was destroyed and in which the consul himself perished. Hannibal took no less than 15,000 prisoners, and marched on through the Apennines into Ticenum and then into Apulia, where he spent the great part of the summer. When the Roman army, 90,000 strong, under the consuls L. Aemilius Paulus and C. Terentius Varro marched into Apulia, Hannibal gave them battle, again annihilating the Roman army. Between 40,000 and 50,000 men are said to have fallen in the field, among whom was Aemilius Paulus, both consuls of the preceding year, about 80 senators and a multitude of wealthy knights who composed the Roman cavalry. This victory was followed by the revolt from Rome of most of the nations in southern Italy. Hannibal established his winter quarters in Capua, which had espoused his side. But Rome was still unsubdued, and still provided with the means of maintaining a protracted contest. The Romans changed their tactics, and instead of opposing Hannibal with one great army in the field, they hemmed in his movements on all sides, keeping an army in every province in Italy to thwart the operations of his lieutenants, and to check the rising disposition to revolt. In 212 Hannibal took possession of Tarentum, but in the following year lost Capua, which was recovered by the Romans after a long siege. Hannibal was losing ground, and in 209 the Romans also recovered Tarentum. Hannibal's forces gradually became more and more weakened; and his only object now was to maintain his ground in the south until his brother Hasdrubal should appear in northern Italy, an event to which he looked forward with anxious expectation. In 207 Hasdrubal crossed the Alps and descended into Italy, but was defeated and slain on the Metaurus. This was decisive of the fate of the war in Italy. From this time Hannibal abandoned offensive operations, collecting his forces within the peninsula of Bruttium. In these fastnesses of wild and mountainous regions he maintained his ground for nearly four years. Toward the end of 203 he crossed over to Africa to oppose P. Scipio. In the following year (202), the decisive battle was fought near Zama, and Hannibal was completely defeated with great loss. By treaty in the following year Carthage was effectually humbled by Rome. But the enmity of Hannibal remained unabated. He introduced the most beneficial reforms at Carthage, and restored the ruined finances; but having provoked the enmity of a powerful party at Carthage, they denounced him to the Romans as urging on Antiochus III, king of Syria, to take up arms against Rome. Hannibal was obliged to flee from Carthage, and took refuge at the court of Antiochus, who was on the eve of War with Rome. On the defeat of Antiochus, Hannibal fled to the court of Prusias, king of Bithynia. Here for some years he found a secure asylum; but the Romans could not be at ease so long as he lived, and they sent T. Quintius Flaminius to demand his surrender. The Bithynian king was unable to resist, and perceiving that flight was impossible, Hannibal took poison to avoid falling into the hands of his enemies].

Folio LXXXII verso

Four hundred eighty years after the building of the city of Rome blood was seen to come from the earth, and milk from the sky in the form of rain. A serious pestilence lasting for two years occurred at Rome, according to the Sibylline books, in consequence of divine wrath. One does not ask how many died, but how many survived.

A giant colossus, an image of the sun, executed by Chares of Lindus (Clare Lydo), the sculptor, and erected on the island of Rhodes, fell down. It was (as Pliny states) a wondrous statue 70 cubits high, and resembled a tower. Among the Seven Wonders of the World it was said to be the greatest. [See Rhodes, Folio XXVI verso and lengthy note.]

Straton (Strato) of Lampsacus, a natural philosopher, and son of Arcesilaus, was a very eloquent man. He diligently applied himself, above all others, in the natural science that we call physics; and therefore, from this same art, he was called a physicus. He was a tutor of Ptolemy Philadelphus, who made him a gift of eighty talents. He wrote On the Kingdom, On Justice, and On the Gods. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. They say that he was so thin that he died without its being perceived. [Straton (c. 335-c. 269 BCE), son of Arcesilaus, of Lampsacus, was the tutor of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He succeeded Theophrastus as head of Aristotle's Lyceum in 288 BCE, and, after presiding over it for eighteen years, was succeeded by Lycon. He devoted himself especially to the study of natural science, for which reason he obtained the appellation Physicus. Cicero, while speaking highly of his talents, blames him for neglecting the most important part of philosophy, that which has regard to virtue and morals, and giving himself up to the investigation of nature. Straton appears to have held a pantheistic system, the specific character of which cannot be determined. He seems to have denied the existence of any god out of the material universe, and to have held that every particle of matter has a plastic and seminal power, but without sensation or intelligence; and that life, sensation, and intellect, are but forms, accidents, and affectations of matter. Some modern writers have regarded Straton as a forerunner of Spinoza, while others see in his system an anticipation of the hypothesis of monads]. At this time Stilpo (Silphon), the natural philosopher, lost all his possessions and fled naked. And he said, I carry all my possessions with me; for he carried them in his heart.

Stilpo (Silphon; c. 380-c. 300 BCE) was a Greek philosopher from Megara who lived. He was thus a contemporary of Theophrastus and Crates of Thebes (who follows him in the Chronicle). According to one account he engaged in dialectic encounters with Diodorus Cronus at the court of Ptolemy Soter; while according to another he did not comply with the invitation of the king to visit Alexandria. He acquired a great reputation; and so high was he held in esteem that Demetrius, the son of Antigonos, spared his house at the capture of Megara. He is said to have surpassed his contemporaries in inventive power and dialectic art, and to have inspired almost all Greece with a devotion to the Megarian philosophy. He seems to have made the idea of virtue his special consideration. He maintained that the wise man ought not only to overcome every evil, but not even to be affected by any.

His biography, unusually, is continued two paragraphs below in greater detail.

Crates, the Athenian academic natural philosopher, son of Antigenis, was a disciple of Polemon (Palemonus), and his successor in the school. They were so devoted to each other that they always attained to the same art and learning. After death they were placed in the same grave in recognition of their mutual devotion. And Antagorus praised them with this thought in verse: Stranger who passes by, relate that in this mound are buried Crates and Polemon, men celebrated for their kindred minds; out of their divine mouth sacred wisdom flowed, and the elegance of their life was joined to wisdom.

Crates of Athens, was a pupil of Polemo, and his successor in the chair of the Academy about 270 BCE. He was the teacher of Arcesilaus, Theodorus, and Bion Borsythenites.

The German edition of the Chronicle replaces the actual epigram of Antagoras with the following:

Antagorus placed an inscription on the grave, stating how they had lived together in unity of disposition, virtue and wisdom.

Panaetius (Panetius), the natural philosopher, was famous in the time of Scipio at Rome, and was his tutor. He was a philosopher of the Stoic school, and a man whom Cicero imitated in his book On Duties. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. The following thought is his: Those people who live their life in the midst of affairs, and who wish to be helpful to themselves and to others, and who wish to guard against unexpected, constant, and almost daily dangers, must have a mind that is always ready and alert.

Panaetius (c. 185-c.110 BCE), a native of Rhodes, and a celebrated Stoic philosopher, studied first at Pergamum under the grammarian Crates, and subsequently at Athens under the Stoic Diogenes of Babylon, and his disciple, Antipater of Tarsus. He afterward went to Rome where he became an intimate friend of Laelius and of Scipio Africanus the younger. In 144 he accompanied Scipio on the embassy which he undertook to the kings of Egypt and Asia in alliance with Rome. Panaetius succeeded Antipater as head of the Stoic school, and died at Athens sometime before the year 111. His principal work was his treatise on the theory of moral obligation, in three books, from which Cicero took the greater part of his De Officiis. Panaetius had softened down the harsh severity of the older stoics and, without giving up their fundamental definitions, had modified them so as to make them applicable to the conduct of life, and had clothed them in the garb of eloquence.

The citation is taken from Aulus Gellius' Noctes Atticae ('Attic Nights') 13.28.1-4:

Legebatur Panaetii philosophi liber de officiis secundus ex tribus illis inclitis libris, quos M. Tullius magno cum studio maximoque opere aemulatus est. 2 Ibi scriptum est cum multa alia ad bonam frugem ducentia, tum vel maxime, quod esse haerereque in animo debet. 3 Id autem est ad hanc ferme sententiam: "Vita" inquit "hominum, qui aetatem in medio rerum agunt ac sibi suisque esse usui volunt, negotia periculaque ex inproviso adsidua et prope cotidiana fert. Ad ea cavenda atque declinanda perinde esse oportet animo prompto semper atque intento, ut sunt athletarum, qui pancratiastae vocantur. 4 Nam sicut illi ad certandum vocati proiectis alte brachiis consistunt caputque et os suum manibus oppositis quasi vallo praemuniunt membraque eorum omnia, priusquam pugna mota est, aut ad vitandos ictus cauta sunt aut ad faciendos parata: ita animus atque mens viri prudentis adversus vim et petulantias iniuriarum omni in loco atque in tempore prospiciens debet esse, erecta, ardua, saepta solide, expedita, numquam conivens, nusquam aciem suam flectens, consilia cogitationesque contra fortunae verbera contraque insidias iniquorum quasi brachia et manus protendens, ne qua in re adversa et repentina incursio inparatis inprotectisque nobis oboriatur."

1 The second book of the philosopher Panaetius' On Duties was being read to us, being one of those three celebrated books which Marcus Tullius emulated with great care and very great labour. 2 In it there was written, in addition to many other incentives to virtue, one especially which ought to be kept fixed in the mind. 3 And it is to this general purport: "The life of men," he says, "who pass their time in the midst of affairs, and who wish to be helpful to themselves and to others, is exposed to constant and almost daily troubles and sudden dangers. To guard against and avoid these one needs a mind that is always ready and alert, such as the athletes have who are called 'pancratists.' 4 For just as they, when called to the contest, stand with their arms raised and stretched out, and protect their head and face by opposing their hands as a rampart; and as all their limbs, before the battle has begun, are ready to avoid or to deal blows—so the spirit and mind of the wise man, on the watch everywhere and at all times against violence and wanton injuries, ought to be alert, ready, strongly protected, prepared in time of trouble, never flagging in attention, never relaxing its watchfulness, opposing judgment and forethought like arms and hands to the strokes of fortune and the snares of the wicked, lest in any way a hostile and sudden onslaught be made upon us when we are unprepared and unprotected.

Stilpo (Silphon), the Megarian philosopher, flourished at this time. They say that in his pursuits and wisdom he far excelled all others to such a degree, and that he lacked so little, that it was said that everything pleasing attached itself to that man when he crossed into Megara. Cicero says in his book On Fate that he was a sharp-witted man, and in his time extremely well liked. When his country was captured, he lost all his possessions and fled naked. When asked if he had lost everything he answered: I carry all my possessions with me. And these he said he carried in his heart, and not on his shoulders.

Posidonius (Possidonius), the stoic philosopher, a disciple of Panaetius (Panecius), was famous in the time of Scipio. He was, as Augustine says, a great astrologer. [Posidonius (c. 135-51 BCE) was a distinguished philosopher, and a native of Apamea, in Syria. He studied at Athens under Panaetius, after whose death Posidonius set out on his travels. He finally fixed his abode at Rhodes, where he became the president of the Stoic school. He also had a part in the political affairs of Rhodes and was sent as an ambassador to Rome in 86. Cicero, when he visited Rhodes, received instructions from Posidonius. Pompey also admired and visited him twice. In 51, he moved to Rome, and appears to have died soon after, at the age of 84. He was a man of extensive and varied acquirements in all departments of human knowledge. Cicero thought so highly of his powers that he requested him to write a history of his consulship. As a physical investigator he was greatly superior to the Stoics, generally attaching himself in this respect to Aristotle. His geographical and historical knowledge were very extensive. He cultivated astronomy with considerable diligence. He also constructed a planetary machine, or revolving sphere, to exhibit the daily motions of the sun, moon, and the planets. We have only fragments of his writings].

Erasistratus, an Athenian physician, according to Eusebius, who flourished at this time. He was of the family of Aristotle, and an excellent physician. For curing Antiochus the king of a very serious disease, he was rewarded by Ptolemy, the same king's son, with one hundred talents. This is testified to by Pliny in the twenty-ninth book of his Natural History. [Erasistratus, a celebrated physician and anatomist, was born at Iulus in the island of Ceos. He was a pupil of Chrysippus of Cnidos, Metrodorus, and apparently Theophrastus. He flourished from about 300 to 260 BCE. He lived for some time at the court of Seleucus Nicator, king of Syria, where he acquired a great reputation by discovering that the illness of Antiochus, the king's eldest son, was owing to his love for his mother-in-law, the young and beautiful daughter of Demetrius Policertes, whom Seleucus had lately married. Erasistratus afterward lived at Alexandria, which was then coming forward as a celebrated medical school. He gave up practice in his old age that he might pursue his anatomical studies without interruption. He is said to have dissected criminals alive. He had numerous pupils and followers and a medical school bearing his name continued to exist at Smyrna in Ionia about the beginning of the Christian era].

Lycon (Licon) of Troas, a philosopher, was considered to be a famous man, eloquent and especially good at the bringing up and education of children. He said that with children, as with horses, the spurs must be applied to their indiscretions and love of praise. During his life he was a man of pure conduct and unbelievable cleanliness and of good appearance in the matter of dress. As he was a man of physical strength, he also exercised himself in ball play. He was head of the school 44 years. He finally died of podagra in the 74th year of his life. [Lycon of Troas (c. 299-c. 225 BCE), was a distinguished Peripatetic philosopher, and the disciple of Straton, whom he succeeded as head of the school in 272 BCE. He wrote several works, one on the boundaries of good and evil (known by its Latin title as De bono et malo). Only fragments survive (helpfully collected together and translated in: Fortenbaugh, W., White, S., . Transaction Publishers. (2004).] Timon Appolloniates, the philosopher, also flourished at this time. In his youth he immersed himself in many disgusting activities. Afterwards, having become a man (although poor), having repudiated his vices, he moved to Calchedon. There he taught the art of philosophy and rhetoric, and he exercised. He wrote, moreover, various poems, tragedies, comedies, and satires.

Timon (c. 320-c. 230 BC), the son of Timarchus of Phlius, a philosopher of the Sceptic sect, flourished in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus about 279 BCE and onwards. He first studied philosophy at Megara, under Stilpo, and then returned home and married. He died at the age of 90. He appears to have been endowed with a powerful and active mind and with that quick perception of the follies of men which betrays its possessor into a spirit of universal distrust, so as to make him a sceptic in philosophy and a satirist in everything. He wrote numerous works both in prose and poetry.

Folio LXXXIII recto

While Lucius Caecilius Metellus and Gaius Furius Placidus were consuls, Metellus in Sicily defeated Hasdrubal, the general of the Africans, who came against him with 130 elephants and a large host. At Panormus he killed twenty thousand of the enemy and captured twenty-six elephants. And the rest, wandering among the Numidians, whom they were holding in reserve, he gathered together again and brought to Rome with great pomp. [Metellus (L. Caecilius) was consul in 251 BCE, and carried on the war in Sicily against the Carthaginians. In the following year he defeated Hasdrubal, the Carthaginian general. The elephants which he took in this battle were exhibited in his triumph at Rome. He was consul a second time in 249, and was elected pontifex maximus in 243, and held this dignity for 22 years. In 241 he rescued the Palladium when the temple of Vesta was on fire, but lost his sight in consequence. He was dictator in 224, for the purpose of holding the comitia. He died shortly before the commencement of the second Punic War. His colleague, C. Furius, is not mentioned in the text].

While Manlius (Mallio) Torquatus and Gaius Atilius (Attilio) were consuls, the Sardinians were defeated and peace was made in all regions; and so the Romans were no longer at war—a condition which after the founding of Rome happened but once before, namely during the time Numa Pompilius reigned. And the gate of Janus was closed for one year.

For Numa Pompilius see Folio LVI verso. Janus and Jana were a pair of Latin divinities who were worshipped as the sun and the moon.

The names Janus and Jana are only other forms of Dianus and Diana, which words contain the same root as 'dies,' day. Janus was worshipped by both the Etruscans and Romans, and occupied an important place in the Roman religion. He presided over the beginning of everything, and was therefore always invoked first on every undertaking, even before Jupiter. He opened the year and the seasons, and thus the first month of the year was named after him. On earth he was the guardian deity of the gates, and that is the reason he is commonly represented with two heads, because every door opens two ways. At Rome, Numa is said to have dedicated to Janus the covered passage bearing his name, which was opened in times of war and closed in times of peace. This passage is commonly but erroneously called a temple. It stood close by the forum. It appears to have been left open in war, to symbolize that the god had gone out to help Rome's soldiers, and to have been shut in time of peace that the god, the safeguard of the city, might not escape. On New Year's Day, which was the principal festival of the god, people gave presents to each other—sweetmeats and copper coins, showing on one side the double-headed Janus, on the other a ship. The sacrifices offered to Janus consisted of cakes, barley, incense and wine.

T. Manlius Torquatus (T. Mallius) was consul in 235 BCE, when he conquered the Sardinians, and consul a second time in 224. He possessed the hereditary sternness and severity of his family; and we accordingly find him opposing in the senate the ransom of those Romans who had been taken prisoners at the fatal battle of Cannae. In 217 he was sent into Sardinia, where he carried on the war with success against the Carthaginians and the Sardinians. He was dictator in 210. C. Atilius was his colleague while the Punic Wars raged.

During the consulship of Aemilius (Emilio) a mighty host of Gauls marched over the Alps; but all Italy sided with the Romans, and of the enemy 40,000 were made prisoners and seven thousand were slain. And Aemilius was decreed a triumph. Although the Gauls were of ferocious spirit and their bodies of super-human size, and although their strength at the first onslaught was more than a man's, their strength later was less than a woman's. They had Alpine [The adjective 'Alpine' probably here means little more than 'huge.'] bodies, reared under a moisture-laden sky, and were like the snow; but as soon as they experience the heat of battle they sweat, as though the sun heated them and relieved them of their strength. After the lapse of several years the Gauls again fought in Italy; and the war ended during the consulships of M. Claudius Marcellus and Gnaeus Cornelius Scipio. Afterwards that same Marcellus, together with his colleague Cornelius, slew a great horde of Gauls, attacked Milan (Mediolanum), and carried off the spoils of war to Rome. Marcellus, after placing the spoils of the Gauls onto a post, carried it on his shoulders during the celebration of his triumph.

M. Claudius Marcellus was consul five times, and distinguished as the conqueror of Syracuse. In his first consulship in 222 BCE, Marcellus and his colleague conquered the Insubrians in Cisalpine Gaul, and took their capital Mediolanum (Milan). Marcellus distinguished himself by slaying in battle with his own hand Britomartus, or Viridomarus, the king of the enemy, whose spoils he afterward dedicated as spolia opima (literally 'rich spoils' a technical phrase meaning 'arms wrested by a general from a general') in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius. This was the third and last instance in Roman history in which such an offering was made. After an extended military career he and his colleague were defeated by Hannibal near Venusia, and Marcellus himself was slain in battle. Marcellus appears to have been a stern soldier, brave and daring to excess, but harsh, unyielding and cruel. Cn. Cornelius Scipio Calvus was his colleague.

This entire paragraph is taken largely from Eutropius' Breviarum Historiae Romanae ('Abridgment of Roman History') 3.5-6.

In the same year the second Punic or African War was begun against the Romans by Hannibal (Annibalem), the general of the Carthaginians, son of Hamilcar (Amilcaris). And he, when only nine years of age, swore to his father upon the altar that as soon as he was able he would fight against the Romans. [See Hannibal, folio LXXXII recto, and note].

In the five hundred and fortieth year from the founding of the city, Lucius Aemilius (Emilius) Paulus and Publius Terrentius Varro were sent against Hannibal, but both were defeated. [Terentius Varro was consul in 216 BCE with Lucius Aemilius Paulus. Varro is said to have been the son of a butcher, to have carried on this business himself in his early years, and to have risen to eminence by pleading the causes of the lower classes in opposition to the opinions of the aristocratic elite. Over the opposition of the aristocracy, he was raised to the consulship by the people, who thought that it only required a man of energy at the head of an overwhelming force to bring the war against Hannibal to a close. His colleague belonged to the aristocratic party. The two consuls were defeated by Hannibal at the memorable battle of Cannae. The battle was fought by Varro against the advice of Paulus, and the Roman army was all but annihilated. Paulus and almost all the officers perished. Varro was one of the few who escaped and reached Venusia in safety with about seventy horsemen. His conduct after the battle seems to have been deserving of high praise. He proceeded to Canusium, where the remnant of the Roman army had taken refuge, and there adopted every precaution that the situation required. His conduct was appreciated by the senate and the people, and his defeat was forgotten in the services which he had lately rendered. He continued to be employed in Italy for several years in important military commands until the close of the Punic War].

At the conclusion of the Punic War the Macedonian War began against King Philip in the five hundred and fiftieth year from the founding of the city. T. Quintius Flamininus was sent against him. And he was successful; and peace was granted Philip on condition that he should not war against the Greek cities that the Romans had defended against him; that he release the prisoners and fugitives; that he should retain only fifty ships and give the remainder to the Romans; and in a course of years pay forty thousand measures of silver. And he was to give up his son Demetrius as a hostage. [As soon as the Romans had brought the second Punic War to an end, they again declared war against Philip (in 200 BCE). This war lasted three or four years and was brought to an end by the defeat of Philip by the consul Flamininus at the battle of Cynoscephalae in the autumn of 197. By the peace finally granted to Phillip (196), the king was compelled to abandon all his conquests, both in Europe and in Asia, surrender his whole fleet to the Romans, and limit his standing army to 5,000 men, besides paying a sum of 1,000 talents. The king here referred to is Philip V, who reigned 220-178].

Alexander, a son of Antiochus Epiphanes and eleventh king of Syria and Asia, reigned 9 years. He was always merciful to the Jews. He made an alliance with Jonathan Maccabeus; and with his help slew Demetrius Soter, and reigned in his stead. He betrothed himself to Cleopatra, daughter of king Ptolemy; but Ptolemy took her and gave her as wife to Alexander Demetrius, son of Demetrius Soter. Finally Alexander fled to the king of the Arabs; but the latter feared Ptolemy, and therefore slew Alexander and sent his head to Ptolemy. [Alexander Balas was a youth of non-aristocratic birth who lived in Smyrna. He was put forward by the enemies of Demetrius I Soter as a supposed son of Antiochus IV Epiphanes, king of Syria. In their struggle for the throne, the rivals sought the support of Jonathan Maccabeus, who elected to side with Alexander, and was appointed high priest by him (153 BCE). Jonathan defeated Apollonius, one of the generals of Demetrius, and received further honors (1 Maccabees 10). But Alexander Balas cared more for sensual pleasures than for kingly duties; his father-in-law Ptolemy turned against him, and Alexander, fleeing to Arabia, was assassinated there (1 Maccabees 11:17)].

This Demetrius reigned three years after Alexander. When his father's kingdom was recovered, the vices of youth led him into neglect and inattention. Finally he was taken prisoner at Hyrcania, and lived for nine years deprived of his kingdom. After that he was reinstated in his kingdom, and Philometor gave him as wife his daughter Cleopatra, who had been misled by Alexander. [Demetrius Nicator, son of Demetrius Soter, is probably here referred to. He reigned 146-142 BCE, and again 128-125 BCE. He had been sent to Cnidus by his father for safety, when Alexander Balas invaded Syria; and after the death of his father he continued in exile for several years. With the assistance of Ptolemy Philometer, he defeated Balas and recovered his kingdom; but having like his father rendered himself odious to his subjects by his vices and cruelties, he was driven out of Syria by Tryphon, who set up Antiochus, the infant son of Alexander Balas, as a pretender against him. Demetrius retired to Babylon, and from there marched against the Parthians, by whom he was defeated and taken prisoner in 138. He remained in captivity for ten years, but was kindly treated by the Parthian king Mithridates, who gave him his daughter Rhodogune in marriage. Meanwhile his brother Antiochus III Sidetes, having overthrown the usurper Tryphon, engaged in war with Parthia, in consequence of which Phraates, the successor of Mithridates, brought forth Demetrius, and sent him into Syria to operate a diversion against his brother. In the same year Antiochus fell in battle, and Demetrius again obtained possession of the Syrian throne (128). Having engaged in an expedition against Egypt, Ptolemy Physcon set up against him the pretender Alexander Zebrina, by whom he was defeated and compelled to fly. His wife, Cleopatra, who could not forgive him his marriage with Rhodogune, refused to afford him refuge at Ptolemais', and he fled to Tyre, where he was assassinated in 125].

Antiochus Sidetes (Sedetes), while still a child, on the advice of Tryphon (Triphone) attempted to recover the kingdom; but he accomplished little, for he was at once slain by him when they fought with one another. For a while one reigned, and then the other. [Antiochus VII Sidetes (137-128 BCE), so called from Side in Pamphylia, where he was brought up, was the younger son of Demetrius Soter and succeeded Tryphon. He married Cleopatra, wife of his dear brother Demetrius Nicator, who was a prisoner with the Parthians. He carried on war against the Parthians, at first with success, but was afterwards defeated and slain in battle in 128].

This John Hyrcanus (Hircanus), after the slaying of his father Simon (Symone) and his two sons, Judas and Mattathias by Ptolemy the general at a banquet, rightfully attained to the priesthood at Jericho. After having managed affairs very well for twenty-three years he died. He left behind Aristobulus, his first-born son, and Antigonus and two other small sons. But as none of them were as yet competent to rule over the people, he placed over his sons his wife, who was very smart. And she officiated for 26 years as a man worthy of the priesthood and vigorous in her governance. He sought and secured the right of friendship from the Romans. He suffered much opposition on the part of the Pharisees and Essenes, of whom he was finally relieved, and lived to a glorious old age. [John Hyrcanus I, prince and high priest of the Jews, was the son and successor of Simon Maccabaeus, the restorer of the independence of Judea. He succeeded to his father's power in 135 BCE. He was at first engaged in war with Antiochus VII Sidetes, who invaded Judea, and laid siege to Jerusalem. In 133 he concluded a peace with Antiochus, on the condition of paying an annual tribute. Owing to the civil wars in Syria between the several claimants to the throne, the power of Hyrcanus steadily increased; and at length he took Samaria, and razed it to the ground (109), notwithstanding the army which Antiochus IX Cyzicenus had sent to the assistance of the title of king, he may be regarded as the founder of the monarchy of Judea, which continued in his family till the accession of Herod].

Aristobulus, son of John Hyrcanus, imprisoned his mother and his two younger brothers. And first he took over the crown of the kingdom. He reigned for one year only. He was a king and a priest, and at the suggestion of his wife he killed his brother. And when 475 years had passed since Zedekiah, the last king of Judea, when the kingdom of Judea was divided and brought to an end, he died of a very severe disease that expelled blood from his ruined inner organs. [Aristobulus I, eldest son of Joannes Hyrcanus, assumed the title of king of Judea on the death of his father. He put to death his brother Antigonus, in order to secure his power, but died in the following year].

Tryphon (Triphon), after the treacherous imprisonment of Jonathan, began a war against his brother Simon; and he obtained from Simon one hundred talents of silver and the two sons of Jonathan as sureties. And he killed Jonathan and his two sons. Afterwards he also killed his lord Antiochus, a boy, and reigned in place of him. [Tryphon (Diodotus Tryphon) usurped the throne of Syria during the reign of Demetrius II Nicator. After the death of Alexander Balas in 146 BCE, Tryphon first set up Antiochus, the infant son of Balas, as a pretender against Demetrius; but in 142 he murdered Antiochus and reigned as king himself. He was defeated and put to death by Antiochus Sidetes, the brother of Demetrius, in 139, after a reign of three years].

This Alexander, the brother of Aristobulus, received the priesthood and kingdom at the hands of the Jews, and he reigned 27 years. The surviving widow of Aristobulus, who had born him no child, released him and two brothers from prison, and placed him, he being the oldest, on the throne as king of Judea. He put to death his brother, the next born after him, and placed the kingdom beyond the reach of the third brother by compelling him to live with him. He was so cruel that in one year he put to death a thousand old people, and hung up in the lanes and streets eight hundred married men who criticized his evil conduct, together with their wives and children. He died of the four-day fever in the 27th year of his reign; and he left two sons, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus; but he appointed his wife Alexandra to rule, for she had the good will of the people since, when her husband was still alive, she had comforted them with kindness.

Upon the death of Aristobulus I, his widow Alexandra released her brother-in-law Alexander Jannaeus from prison and offered him her hand and the throne, both of which he accepted. In his long and checkered reign he not only put down the rebellion of his turbulent subjects, but conquered and Judaized the old Israelite territory across the Jordan, so that under him the little Jewish community spread, by conquest and forcible conversion, from the narrow limits of the ancient territory of Israel. During the whole reign of Alexander, the opposition of the Pharisees to the dynasty and its policies was exceedingly bitter. As his end approached, Alexander committed the government to Alexandra, advising her to make her peace with the Pharisees. This she did, and for the next ten years the affairs of the kingdom were more pacific. She made her son, John Hyrcanus II, high priest. Upon her death she left the civil authority to Aristobulus II, the younger of the two sons. Each brother desired the office of the other, and a civil war followed. Aristobulus defeated his older brother and also assumed the priesthood.

The name Maccabees is commonly given to the Jewish family (otherwise known as Hasmonaeans) who led the revolt against Syria and Antiochus IV, and furnished the dynasty of leaders and rulers in the State thus formed. The chronology follows:

John Hyrcanus I	135-105
Aristobulus I	105-104
Alexander Jannaeus	104-79
Alexandra	79-69
John Hyrcanus II + Aristobulus II	69-63

This Alexander (referring to a portrait in the lineage of Syrian kings, following the portrait of Tryphon), a son of Antiochus, reigned after Tryphon (Triphonem). He was slain by the general Diodotus (Dyodatus).

The Alexander referenced here seems to be either:

1. Alexander I Balas, a Seleucid king who ruled from 152 to 145 BCE. However, he was not killed by Diodotus (in fact the opposite is true—Diodotus supported Alexander throughout his life), but by Nabataean Arabs. Nor did Alexander I Balas rule after Tryphon, but before him.

Or

1. Alexander II Zabinas (Zabinas is a derogative nickname meaning "the bought one" or "the purchased slave"), a Seleucid king who claimed to be an adoptive son of Antiochus VII, but in fact appears to have been the son of an Egyptian merchant. He was used by the Egyptian king Ptolemy VIII Tryphon as a means of getting to the legitimate Seleucid king Demetrius II, who supported his sister Cleopatra II against him in the complicated dynastic feuds of the latter Hellenistic dynasties. Zabinas managed to defeat Demetrius II and thereafter ruled parts of Syria (128-123 BCE), but soon ran out of Egyptian support and was in his turn defeated by Demetrius' son Antiochus VIII Grypus. As a last resort, Zabinas plundered the temples of the Seleucid capital Antioch. He is said to have joked about melting down a statuette of the goddess of victory Nike ('Victory') which was held in the hand of a Zeus statue, saying "Zeus has given me Victory." Enraged by his impiety the citizens of Antioch drove Zabinas out of their city. He was then captured by robbers who gave him to Antiochus. Shortly thereafter he was put to death.

The problem with this one-sentence paragraph is with the identity of Tryphon, who could be either the Egyptian king Ptolemy VIII Tryphon (but why mention Ptolemaic kings in a king list devoted to Seleucids?) or the Seleucid general and later king Diodotus Tryphon, the Seleucid king described two paragraphs earlier in the Chronicle, who did not put to death any Seleucid king named Alexander. The entire paragraph, however, may be translated "This Alexander, the son of Antiochus, reigned after Tryphon, whom the general Diodotus killed." This, of course, still doesn't solve anything, since Diodotus did not kill Tryphon (most likely the general Diodotus himself was Tryphon!).

Mantua is a celebrated city in the Gaul of the Cenomani, and (as some say) it was named after Manta, the daughter of Teiresias (Thiresie) the prophet, and was built after the destruction of Thebes by Alexander at that time. There are some who say that Teiresias lived in the time of Theseus, and became his servant. After the death of her father in Italy she came with many people, and with the help of the Greeks she built this city of Mantua. As Ocnus (Oenus) was born to Tiberinus, the Tuscan (Etruscan) king, in the meantime, and the Tuscans and Venetians gathered together in this same city, Ocnus surrounded the city with a wall, changed its form, and named the city Mantua after his mother, and so it is called in the 10th book of Virgil's Aeneid. Yet it is known that this very ancient city was built by the Etruscans, and it was, T. Livy the Paduan relates, one of the twelve colonies sent beyond the Apennines by that people. The famous poet Virgil, a citizen of that town, has made it especially well known to the world. And he told more fully his city's origin: Mantua, wealthy city; but no single race do all its citizens share. This (city) lies by the mountains that separate Gaul and Germany from Italy, and not far from Lake Benacus (Lake Guardia) out of which the Mincius flows to Mantua, and there itself became a sea. It runs about the city and at a short distance flows into the river Padus (Po). In earlier times Mantua suffered the greatest disasters besides those which are very well known in the Vergilian verse: Mantua, alas, too close to wretched Cremona! It was ravaged and plundered by Attila the Hun, by the Goths, the Lombards and the Bavarian kings at various times, and its walls breached and the city left unprotected. And for the rest the Hungarians (Ungari) raised the city to the ground. For this reason also the place where they were then, in memory of the deed, now is called Hungary (Ungaria). Mathilda, the noble countess, at one time possessed the city and wonderfully enlarged it. Pope Nicolas II held a council there. Many rulers possessed this city after Mathilda. There also once upon a time ruled the highly renowned houses of Rippa and Passerini. Finally, after various difficulties, the house of Gonzaga, having driven out the Passerini, possessed the city with great honor, and have had it up to this time. Through the industry and care of this house, and those who ruled there before it, the city was beautified by the erection of many bridges over the waters, and with tall churches, royal palaces and beautifully adorned private residences. And to this day Mantua is a large city, possessed of rich estates, productive of the necessities of life, and mightily esteemed. In the time of Charles the Great (Karoli Magni) there appeared at Mantua the miraculous blood of Christ, which Pope Leo II went there to see, and from there he journeyed to the same Charles in Germany. Charles the Bald, son of Charles the Great, died at Mantua from poison given him by a Hebrew physician, who was bribed. There also rests Anselm (Anshelmus) the Lucensian bishop, a holy man, well informed in folkways; also the blessed John the Good was for a time a citizen there and performed miracles. Albertinus, who wrote a book on the holy body of Christ, was a native of this city; also Matthew, a very famous physician, who wrote an extraordinary book on medicine for the king of Sicily.

Mantua, the Italian Mantova, is a fortified city of Lombardy, in Italy, twenty-five miles southwest of Verona. It is 88 feet above the level of the Adriatic on the almost insular site among swampy lagoons of the Mincio (formerly Mincius). Anciently Mantua was a town in Gallia Transpadana, and not a place of great importance. The account of its origin and the derivation of its name, as given in the Chronicle, are somewhat vague and confusing. In fact, the name may derive from the Etruscan god Manto, a god of the underworld.

Mantua owes some of its renown to the fact that Virgil (cf. especially Aeneid 10.201-3), who was born at the neighboring village of Andes, regarded Mantua as his birthplace.

Manto, whom the chronicler calls Manta, and describes as the daughter of "Teiresias the prophet," was according to tradition a daughter of Teiresias, a Theban soothsayer, the most renowned of antiquity; for in the mythical history of Greece there is scarcely any event, due to his long life, with which he is not connected in some way. During the war of the Epigoni, Teiresias fled with the Thebans; but according to others, he was carried to Delphi as a captive. It is also stated that on his flight he drank from the well of Tilphossa and died. His daughter Manto was sent by the victorious Argives to Delphi, as a present to Apollo. Manto herself was a renowned prophetess, first of the Ismenian Apollo at Thebes, where monuments of her existed, and subsequently of the Delphian and Clarian Apollo. Being a prophetess of Apollo, she is also called Daphne, that is, the laurel virgin.

Ocnus, to whom Virgil refers, was the son of Tiberinus (or Tiberis) and Manto, and is the reputed founder of the town of Mantua, which he named after his mother. William Smith, in his biographical dictionary, speaks of two other women of the same name—one the daughter of the soothsayer Polyeidus, and the other a daughter of Heracles, "the personage from whom the town of Mantua received its name."

Mantua was not a place of importance until the Middle Ages. In the conflicts of the Hohenstaufen period the town embraced the cause of the Guelphs. In 1328 the citizens elected Luigi, Lord of Gonzaga, as 'Capitano del Popolo,' and to his dynasty the town owed its prosperity. The Gonzagas fought successfully against Milan and Venice, and extended their territory, while they were liberal patrons of art and science. In 1627, when Charles de Nevers, a member of a French collateral line, ascended the throne, the Mantuan war of succession broke out, the Emperor Ferdinand III declared the fief forfeited. In 1630 Mantua was stormed and sacked by the Austrians. Though later compelled to surrender the rest of Lombardy to the French, the Austrians retained Mantua. In 1866 they were obliged to cede it to Italy.

Much of this passage on Mantua is taken from Biondo Flavio's Italia Illustrata ('Italy Illuminated') 360H-361B. Flavio's text, a breakthrough work in historical topography, was completed in 1453.

Folio LXXXIII verso

Naevius (Nevius), the comic poet, in the second year of the reign of Ptolemy, called Epiphanes, died at Utica (as Eusebius writes). He was expelled from Rome by a faction of nobles, particularly Metellus. He ranked third among the poets whose poems dealt with certain plebeian persons in a sweet and lovely way, as Vulcatius in his book On Poets states. Of renown in this class of poetry, Caecilius (Cecilius) was the first, Plautus as second easily surpasses the rest, Naevius third, Licinius fourth, Atilius fifth, Terence (Terencius) sixth, Turpilius seventh, Trabea eighth, Luscius (Lucrecius) ninth, and Ennius (Aennius) tenth.

Naevius, (Cn.) was an ancient Roman poet, of whose life few particulars have been recorded. He was probably a native of Campania, and was born somewhere between 274 and 264 BCE. He appears to have come to Rome early, and he produced his first play in 235. He was attached to the plebeian party; and, with the license of the old Attic comedy, he made the stage a vehicle for his attacks upon the aristocracy. He attacked Scipio and Metelli; but he was indicted by Q. Metellus and thrown into prison. While in prison he composed two plays, Hariolus and Leon, in which he recanted his previous imputations, and thereby obtained his release through the tribunes of the people. His repentance, however, did not last long, and he was soon compelled to expiate a new offense by exile. He retired to Utica; and it was here, probably, that he wrote his poem on the first Punic war; and here it is certain that he died, either in 204 or 202. He was both an epic and a dramatic poet. Of his epic poem on the first Punic war a few fragments remain. It was written in the old Saturnian metre; for Ennius, who introduced the hexameter among the Romans, was not brought to Rome till after the banishment of Naevius. The poem appears to have opened with Aeneas's flight from Troy, his visit to Carthage and amour with Dido, together with other legends connected with the early history of both Carthage and of Rome. It was extensively copied by Ennius and Virgil. Virgil took many passages from it, particularly the description of the storm in the first Aeneid, the speech with which Aeneas consuls his companions, and the address of Venus to Jupiter. He wrote both tragedies and comedies, most of which were taken from the Greek. Even in the Augustan age, Naevius was still a favorite with the admirers of the genuine old school of Roman poetry. Aulus Gellius, a Latin grammarian, has preserved some lines of Vulcatius Sedigitus, in which the Roman writers of comedy are arranged in order of merit—Caecilius, Plautus, Naevius, Licinius, Atilius, Terence, Turpilius, Trabea, Luscius, and lastly, added, causa antiquitatis, Ennius (except that the chronicler—or typesetter—forgot to include the word causa in the last phrase dealing with Ennius). This is the same group of ten that the chronicler follows in his text on Naevius. In fact, he follows it almost literally, as the text from Gellius's Noctae Atticae ('Attic Nights') 15.24 which follows makes clear:

Sedigitus in libro, quem scripsit de poetis, quid de his sentiat, qui comoedias fecerunt, et quem praestare ex omnibus ceteris putet ac deinceps, quo quemque in loco et honore ponat, his versibus suis demonstrat:

multos incertos certare hanc rem vidimus,
 palmam poetae comico cui deferant.
 eum meo iudicio errorem dissolvam tibi, ut, contra si quis sentiat, nihil sentiat.
 Caecilio palmam Statio do comico.
 Plautus secundus facile exsuperat ceteros.
 dein Naevius, qui fervet, pretio in tertio.
 si erit, quod quarto detur, dabitur Licinio.
 post insequi Licinium facio Atilium.
 in sexto consequetur hos Terentius,
 Turpilius septimum, Trabea octavum optinet, nono loco esse facile facio Luscium.
 decimum addo causa antiquitatis Ennium.

Sedigitus, in the book which he wrote On Poets, shows in the following verses of his what he thought of those who wrote comedies, which one he thinks surpasses all the rest, and then what rank and honour he gives to each of them:

This question many doubtfully dispute,
 Which comic poet they'd award the palm.
 This doubt my judgment shall for you resolve;
 If any differ from me, senseless he.
 First place I give Caecilius Statius.
 Plautus holds second rank without a peer;
 Then Naevius third, for passion and for fire.
 If fourth there be, be he Licinius
 I place Atilius next, after Licinius.
 These let Terentius follow, sixth in rank.
 Turpilius seventh, Trabea eighth place holds.
 Ninth palm I gladly give to Luscius,
 To Ennius tenth, as bard of long ago.

(J. C. Rolfe, The Attic Nights of Aulus Gellius, Vol. III; Loeb Classical Library, 1928; pp. 113, 115)

Plautus, the comic poet, was a father of the Latin tongue; and (as the same Eusebius writes) was from the Umbrian city of Arpina, others say Sarsina, and died at Rome. From his speech (as Varro said in the aphorism of Aelius Stilo [Epistolonis] [The word epistolonis is meaningless. The chronicler means Aelius Stilo (see next note), whose name in the genitive case would be Aeli Stilonis].), the Muses would have spoken, if they had wished to speak in Latin. [This citation (modified by the chronicler) of Varro (who is himself quoting Aelius Stilo) is found in Quintilian's 10.1.99 (Licet Varro Musas, Aeli Stilonis sententia, Plautino dicat sermone locuturas fuisse si Latine loqui vellent)]. He flourished in the theater in the fifteenth year after the beginning of the second Punic War; and although he translated into Latin stories taken from many Greek comic writers, yet in a statement of Horace (Oracii), Plautus is said to hasten to the model of the Sicilian Epicharmus. [Horace, 2.1.58 (Plautus ad exemplar Siculi properare Epicharmi). Epicharmus (c. 540-c. 450 BCE) was a Greek playwright and philosopher. His comedies, which now exist only in very small fragments, are perhaps the earliest ever composed]. This one, as Varro and many others have handed down to memory, when he had lost all the he had earned in jobs connected with the stage in business ventures, he came back to Rome a poor man. And to earn a livelihood had hired himself out to a baker, to turn a mill, of the kind that is called a "push-mill." And there, whenever he was free from his work, he occupied himself with writing fables for sale. He died around the 145th Olympiad. And he ordered that upon his grave there should be written an inscription, as Varro says in his On Poets: Since Plautus was taken by death comedy mourns, the stage is deserted; then laughter, mockery, and play, and countless rhythms all simultaneously at the same time [The verse is typically Plautine in its use of wordplay and repetition, but the citation in the 'one-ups' Plautus with its inclusion of an extra simul in the last verse]. weep together.

Plautus is the most celebrated comic poet of Rome. He was a native of Sarsina, a small village in Umbria. The date of his birth is placed at about 254 BCE. Probably all that we know of him is more fiction than fact. That said, tradition relates that he probably came to Rome at an early age, since he displayed such perfect knowledge of the Latin language, and an acquaintance with Greek literature, which he could hardly have acquired in a provincial town. When he arrived at Rome he was in needy circumstances and was first employed in the service of the actors. With the money he had saved in this inferior station he left Rome and set up in business; but his speculations failed. He returned to Rome and entered the service of a baker, who employed him in turning a hand mill. While in this occupation he wrote three plays, the sale of which to the managers of the public games enabled him to quit his day job and begin his literary career. He was then probably 30 years of age, and he commenced writing comedies a few years before the outbreak of the second Punic War. He continued his literary occupation for about 40 years, and died in 184, at the age of 70. During the long period that he had possession of the stage, he was always a great favorite of the people, and he expressed a bold consciousness of his own powers in the epitaph (in dactylic hexameters) which Varro in the first book of his On Poets (cited in Gellius, Noctes Atticae 1.21.3) says he wrote for his tomb (and, with the exception of a few misspellings and the inclusion of an additional word—a second simul in the third verse—Schedel cites this very epigram as the wonderfully apt conclusion to his paragraph on Plautus):

Plautus wrote many comedies, and in the last century of the Republic 130 plays bore his name. Most of these were not, however, considered genuine by the Roman critics. Several works were written upon the subject, and of these the most celebrated was a treatise by Varro, who limited the undoubted comedies of Plautus to 21. At present we possess only 20 comedies of Plautus. His comedies enjoyed popularity among the Romans, and continued to be presented down to the time of Diocletian. Though he founded his plays on Greek models, characters in them act, speak, and joke like Romans, and the Greek core of his plays is often buried so deeply under his wild imagination as to be all but invisible.

Ennius, a comic poet, was born at Tarentum, and was called Quintus Ennius; and (as Eusebius states) he flourished at this time. He was brought to Rome by Cato the quaestor. [Quaestors were originally appointed by the consuls to investigate criminal acts and determine if the consul needed to take public action. Quaestors eventually took on additional responsibilities, such as supervising the treasury (what they are best known for). Like consuls, praetors, and prefects they were of the magistrate class (i.e., high-level government administrators). Quaestors were the lowest level of this class and, though initially were appointed by the consuls, were later elected by the people]. He lived on the Aventine hill content with a lifestyle of little expense and with the services of a single maidservant. He was always persuading (people) that souls are immortal; and, therefore, at the end of his life he said, O citizens, look upon the image of old Ennius, who depicted the greatest deeds of your fathers. Let no one honor me with tears or make lamentation at my funeral. Why? I fly alive on the tongues of men. This same poet in praising modesty said that it is the beginning of vice when one goes naked amongst one's fellow citizens. This one, when he had written the best and most elegant comedies, died when he was older than seventy of a disease of the limbs in the 153rd Olympiad, and he was buried in the grave of Scipio on the Appian Way. [Ennius, the Roman poet, was born at Rudiae, in Calabria, c. 239 BCE. He was a Greek by birth, but a subject of Rome, and served in the Roman army. In 204 Cato, who was then quaestor, found Ennius in Sardinia, and brought him to Rome. When far advanced in life he obtained the rights of a Roman citizen. He dwelt in a humble house on the Aventine, and maintained himself by acting as a preceptor to the youths of the Roman nobles. He lived on terms of closest intimacy with Scipio Africanus. He died in 169 at the age of 80, and was buried in the sepulcher of the Scipios. Ennius was regarded by the Romans as the father of their poetry. Only a few, very interesting fragments of his works remain. Although he wrote in several genres (including comedy), his greatest work was the , an epic poem in fifteen books (later expanded to eighteen), covering Roman history from the fall of Troy in 1184 BCE down to the censorship of Cato the Elder in 184 BCE. It was the first Latin poem to employ the dactylic hexameter metre used in Greek epic and didactic instead of native Italic metres (such as Saturnian verse). It quickly became a standard text for Roman schoolchildren, only supplanted by Virgil's one and a half centuries later. About 600 lines survive].

Scipio Africanus, son of the other Scipio, was the most distinguished of all the Romans. At the age of 24 years, after two Scipios had been slain by Hasdrubal, the senate of Rome sent him to Spain. He was a student of Panaetius. He excelled all others in courage. When he learned that through fear of Hannibal the Roman senate was about to give up Italy, he turned the tide by drawing his sword, and saying that he alone wished to be the protector of his fatherland. He had flowing hair and was of manly disposition and bearing. As Eutropius states, he took seventy cities in Spain; and as he well managed this affair, he was elected consul against the Carthaginians. He proceeded to that place and subjugated the ruler of the Africans, together with Syphax (Stiphae), the king of Numidia. Not long afterwards he engaged Hannibal and defeated his forces, so that 20,000 were slain on Hannibal's side, and as many were taken prisoner in a single day; and Hannibal escaped with but a few of his men. With peace having been secured on land and sea, he proceeded to Sicily. Finally he arrived at Rome, entering in a very glorious triumph. He earned the right to be called Africanus. And thus ended the second Punic War which had endured for 18 years. He spoke against Cato because he did not wish that Carthage, a rival to Roman rule, be destroyed, lest the Romans should act decadently. His aphorisms were very famous. For he used to say that he was never less idle than when he was idle, and never more alone than when he was alone. And although a great father to his country, he was accused by those who envied him, was driven from his ungrateful fatherland, living in exile in the country in Liturnum. He died of an illness at the 52nd year of his life.

Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus Major, born in 234 BCE, was one of Rome's greatest men, and at an early age he acquired the confidence and admiration of his countrymen. He never engaged in any public or private business without first going to the Capitol to commune with the gods. At the battle of the Ticinus (218) he saved the life of his father; fought at Cannae (216) and was one of the few Roman officers who survived that fatal day.

In 210, after the death of his father and uncle in Spain, the Romans decided to increase their army there, and to place it under the command of a proconsul. Scipio, then barely 24, offered himself as a candidate and was chosen to take the command. His success in Spain was striking and rapid. Upon returning to Rome in 206, he was elected consul for the following year. He desired to cross to Africa and end the contest at the gates of Carthage, but was opposed by the oldest members of the senate. All he was able to obtain was the province of Sicily, with permission to cross to Africa. The senate having failed to vote him an army, he enlisted volunteers, invaded Africa, and defeated the Carthaginians and their ally Syphax with great slaughter. The long struggle was finally ended when on October 19, 202, near the city of Zama, Scipio gained a decisive and brilliant victory over Hannibal. He returned to Rome in triumph, was received with universal enthusiasm, and surnamed Africanus.

In 190 Africanus served as legate under his brother Incius in the war against Antiochus the Great. Shortly after his return he and his brother were accused of having received bribes to let that monarch off too leniently, and of having appropriated part of the money paid by Antiochus to the Roman state. L. Scipio accordingly prepared his accounts, but as he was in the act of delivering them up, the proud conqueror of Hannibal indignantly snatched them out of his hands, and tore them to bits before the senate. This produced an unfavorable impression, and when his brother was brought to trial in the same year, he was declared guilty and imprisoned until he should pay a heavy fine.

The contest would probably have been attended with fatal results had not Tiberius Gracchus, father of the celebrated tribune, and then tribune himself, had not prudence to release Lucius from the sentence. But the successful issue of the prosecution emboldened his enemies to bring Africanus himself to trial before the people. When the trial came on Africanus proudly reminded the people that this was the anniversary of Zama, and called upon them to follow him to the Capitol, in order there to return thanks to the immortal gods and to pray that they would grant the Roman state other citizens like himself. Crowds followed him, and having thus set all the laws at defiance, Scipio immediately left Rome and retired to his country estate at Liternum. He never returned, but passed his remaining days in the cultivation of his estate.

It is established that Philo, a Jew born of the priestly class and educated at Alexandria, flourished at this time. He translated the Book of Wisdom into the Greek tongue (in which he was highly learned) in an artistic manner; and this same book he called the Book of Wisdom, for in it, in particular, he mentioned the praise of our Lord Jesus Christ; also because wisdom is praised in it in many ways. He wrote many things, as Saint Jerome makes mention in his book On Illustrious Men. [Philo Judaeus, the Jew, was born at Alexandria, and was descended from a priestly family of distinction. He had already reached an advanced age when he went to Rome (40 CE) on an embassy to the emperor Caligula, in order to procure the revocation of a decree that exacted from the Jews divine homage to the statue of the emperor. We have no other particulars of the life of Philo worthy of record. His most important works treat of the Books of Moses, and are generally cited under different titles. His great object was to reconcile the Sacred Scriptures with the doctrines of Greek philosophy, and to point out the conformity between the two. He maintained that the fundamental truths of Greek philosophy were derived from the Mosaic revelations; and to make the latter agree more perfectly with the former, he had recourse to an allegorical interpretation of the books of Moses. He may therefore be regarded as a sort of precursor of the Neo-Platonism].

Cato (Cathon), the Stoic philosopher, was born in Egypt, and was for some time a student of Panaetius (Panecii). He left many writings, the majority of which are considered excellent. From these the following small number of well-known ones has been excerpted: When you stop hoping you will cease to fear. When you ask what advantages I have secured for myself, I answer, I have begun to be a friend to myself. If you wish to be loved, love. Once upon a time, when he was asked whether a servant might do his lord a favor, he answered, There are various kinds of favors, various duties and various services; What a stranger does, he said, is a favor, but he is a stranger who does not criticize. But duty belongs to a son, a wife, and other persons whom compulsion sets in motion and orders to endure the task. But service is for the servant, whose own condition has placed him in that position, and he should not find fault with what his master does. [Cato Dionysius, probably the man here referred to, was the author of a work consisting of a series of sententious moral precepts. Nothing is known of the author nor of the time when he lived, but many writers place him under the Antonines].

Cato (Catho), the first Roman philosopher and jurist, was at first a quaestor, and then was twice consul. And he distinguished himself among the Romans in the Greek and Latin languages. He first served in the military with Q. Fabius Maximus. Later, in the fifth year he went to Tarentum, and there, finding the poet Ennius, he brought him back with him to Rome. Afterwards he journeyed to Africa with that excellent man Scipio, and greatly helped the Roman cause. Then, from the office of aedile, he was made censor. And afterwards as praetor he acted best in everything. Even though he was twice consul, and after his consulship which he vigorously carried out in Spain, he was elected military tribune. Finally, late in his life at an advanced age, after he had learned Latin, he also decided to learn Greek. In consequence he became sufficiently learned that he treated of historical and military matters. And as he had obtained for himself certain glory on account of his clemency, he so conducted himself that the Romans regarded him as the best informed man in civil law; and he rose above all his father's contemporaries, in and out of the senate, in courage and in trustworthiness. He was called the Censor (Censorinus) because the office of censor had been especially intrusted to him. His marks of distinction were also the majesty of the senate and the continuation of his family, out of which indeed was born the greatest glory of the Romans, his descendant Cato, who afterwards made that most sacred name, Cato, immortal. [Cato, frequently surnamed Censorius or Censor, also Cato Major (to distinguish him from his great-grandson Cato Uticensis), was born at Tusculum in 234 BCE, and was brought up on his father's farm, situated in the Sabine territory. In 217 he served his first campaign at the age of 17, and during the remaining years of the second Punic War, he greatly distinguished himself by his courage and military abilities. In the intervals of war he returned to his Sabine farm, which he had inherited from his father, and there led the same simple and frugal life which characterized him to his last days. He went to Rome and became a candidate for office. He obtained the quaestorship in 204, and served under the proconsul Scipio Africanus in Sicily and Africa. But the habits and views of life of these two men were very different, and on his return to Rome he denounced the luxury and extravagance of his commander. On his voyage home he is said to have touched at Sardinia, and to have brought the poet Ennius from the island to Italy. He established a reputation for strict morality and virtue. In 195 he was consul with his old friend and patron L. Valerius Flaccus. He carried on war in Spain with greatest success, and on his return to Rome received the honor of a triumph in 194. In 191 he served in the campaign against Antiochus in Greece, and the decisive victory of Thermoplae was mainly due to him. But here his military career ended, and now he took an active part in civil affairs. He obtained the condemnation of L. Scipio, the conqueror of Antiochus, and compelled his brother P. Scipio to quit Rome in order to avoid the same fate. In 184 he was elected censor. His censorship was a great epoch in his life, but all his efforts to stem the luxury of the times proved unavailing. In his old age he applied himself to the study of Greek literature. He retained his physical and mental vigor in his old age. He died in 149 at the age of 85. His most important work entitled Origines, has come down to us in fragments. It contains the history of the Roman kings, and treats of the origin of Italian towns].

Scipio, grandson of Scipio the Great, was celebrated among the Romans for every virtue; and out of the regular order he was made a consul and given Africa. He proceeded against Carthage, and after storming it for six days and nights, he forced the Carthaginians to capitulate; and those who survived offered to submit. After that he first assembled the women, and later on the men. For (as Livy writes), he took as prisoners 25,000 women and 30,000 men. But Hasdrubal, their ruler, voluntarily fled, while his wife, with feminine madness, threw herself and her children into the flames. The city itself burned for sixteen successive days, so that even the victors looked on with compassion. This Scipio by reason of his very strong courage earned the illustrious surname of his ancestor, and was called Africanus the Younger. [P. Cornelius Aemilianus Africanus Minor was the younger son of L. Aemilius Paulus, the conqueror of Macedonia, and was adopted by P. Scipio, son of the conqueror of Hannibal. He was born about 185. On the outbreak of the third Punic War, he accompanied the Roman army to Africa, as a military tribune, and showed great personal bravery and military skill. The senate assigned Africa to him as his province, to which he immediately sailed. He prosecuted the siege of Carthage with the utmost vigor. The Carthaginians defended themselves with the courage of despair, but, by the spring of 146, the Romans forced their way into the city. The inhabitants fought from street to street, and from house to house, and the work of destruction and butchery went on for days. The fate of the once magnificent city moved Scipio to tears. After reducing Africa to a province, he returned to Rome in the same year, and celebrated a great triumph. The surname of Africanus, which he had inherited by adoption from the conqueror of Hannibal, had now been acquired by him by his own exploits].

Publius Terentius (Terence), an African born in Carthage, was a comic poet who, as some say, was taken as a slave from Africa by the aforesaid Scipio the Younger. Because of his great intelligence and his distinguished appearance, he was given his freedom. Some write that Terentius served Lucanus, the senator, at Rome, by whom, on account of his innate talent and beauty, he was not only liberally educated, but also in time manumitted. This Terentius lived in the service of many noble persons, particularly Scipio Africanus and Laelius. He wrote six comedies with studious elegance in which he observed the character of many people attempting to avoid troubles. Concerning his death Volcatius hands down the following story: After the African had written six comedies for the people, he then made a journey to Asia. As soon as he boarded his ship, he was never seen again. Others pass down the tradition that he died in Arcadia, in the town of Stymphalus in the Gulf of Leucadia during the consulships of Gn. Cor. Dolabella and Marcus Fulvius Nobilior. He was said to have been of medium stature, lean of body, and of dusky complexion. He left behind a daughter who married a Roman knight. Afranius preferred him to all comic playwrights. The following epitaph was inscribed on his tomb: Born in the lofty towers of high Carthage, I was a prize of war to Roman generals. I described the character of people, both of youths and of old men, and how slaves deceive their masters. What the courtesan and the greedy pimp devise with their tricks, these things, whenever someone reads them, thus I think he will be safe.

P. Terentius Afer, usually called Terence, the celebrated comic poet, was born at Carthage in 195 BCE. By birth or purchase he became the slave of P. Terentius Lucanus, a Roman senator. His handsome person and promising talents recommended Terence to his master, who afforded him the best education of the age, and finally manumitted him. On his manumission, according to the usual practice, Terence assumed his patron's nomen, Terentius, having been previously called Publius or Publilius. The Andria was the first play offered by Terence for representation. He was now in his 27th year. The play was successful. His chief patrons were Laelius and the younger Scipio, both of whom treated him as an equal, and are said even to have assisted him in the composition of his plays. After residing some years at Rome, Terence went to Greece, and while there he is said to have translated 108 of Menander's comedies. He never returned to Italy, and there are various accounts of his death. According to one story, after embarking at Brundisium, he was never heard of again. According to others, he died at Stymphalus in Arcadia, in Leucadia, or at Patrae in Achaia. One writer says he was drowned with all the fruits of his time in Greece, on his homeward passage. But the prevailing report was that his translations of Menander were lost at sea, and that grief for their loss caused his death. He died in 159 at the age of 36, leaving a daughter; but nothing is known of his family. Six comedies are all that remain to us, and they were probably all that Terence produced.

The sentence that begins "Afranius preferred..." to the end of this paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

In the six hundred and twenty-seventh year from the founding of the city these consuls (referring to the dual portrait of Caius Cassius Longinus and Sextus Domitius Calvinus opposite) made war against the Transalpine Gauls; and of the forces of their (i.e. the Gauls') king Viturtus they (i.e. Longinus and Calvinus) slew countless numbers by the Rhone (Rhodanus) River. And although Viturtus had 180,000 warriors, and boasted that the small body of Romans would hardly make food enough for the dogs in his army, yet he was defeated in battle by the Romans. From his army some died in war, others were submerged with the bridge that they had constructed over the Rhone by means of their ships being joined together. 150,000 died. And a large quantity of spoils of war, consisting of the necklaces of the Gauls, was carried off. And the two consuls triumphed in great glory. [The 627th year from the founding of the city corresponds to 127 BCE; but Caius Cassius Longinus and C. Sextius Calvinus (here called Sextus Domitius Calvinus) were consuls in 124 BCE. During their consulship the war in Transalpine Gaul continued, and Calvinus defeated the Allobroges and Arverni. In the year 123 Calvinus had the administration of Gaul, and carried on the war against the Saulluvii. After having conquered them he founded the colony of Aquae Sextia]. When M. Porcius Cato and Quintus Marcus were consuls, a colony was led out to Narbonne in Gaul, [This clause is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. while in that same year when Licinius Metellus and Quintus Lucius Scaevola (Scevola) were consuls there was a victory over Dalmatia. [P. Caecilius Metellus Diadematus (here called Lucinius Metellus) and Quintus Mucius Scaevola (here called Quintus Lucius Scevola) were consuls in 117 BCE, and during this consulship Metellus subdued the Dalmatians].

In the time of these two consuls (referring to the opposite dual portrait of Scipio Nasica and Calpurnius Bestia), [P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica (nasica = "pointed nose") and L. Calpurnius Bestia were consuls in 111 BCE, the first year of the Jugurthine War. L. Calpurnius Bestia was tribune of the plebs in 121 BCE, but became popular with the aristocratic party who then had the chief power in the state. He obtained the consulship in 111, and the war against Jugurtha was assigned to him. At first he prosecuted it with great vigor, but by the offer of large sums of money he was induced to make peace with the Numidian without consulting the senate. An investigation resulted. Bestia and many men of high rank were condemned in 110. The nature of Bestia's punishment is not mentioned; he was still living in Rome in 90, in which year he went into voluntary exile]. a war arose against Jugurtha, king of the Numidians, because he had slain Adherbal and Hiempsal, the sons of Micipsa, his own brothers, who were kings and were friends of the Roman people. Although Calpurnius (Calphurnius) Bestia was first sent against him, he was bribed by the money of the king and made a shameful peace with him that was rejected by the senate. Afterwards, in the following year, Spurius Albinus Postumus was sent against the same man; and he too, through his brother, fought ignominiously against the Numidians. The third consul to be sent was Quintus Caecilius (Cecilius) Metellus. He brought back the army, which he reformed with great severity and judgment, without exercising cruelty on any one, to Roman discipline. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. He defeated Jugurtha in various engagements, killed or captured his elephants, and took many cities. And when he was about to put an end to the war, Caius Marius succeeded him. He defeated at the same time both Jugurtha and Bocchus, king of Mauretania, who had begun to bring Jugurtha assistance, and slew 20,000 warriors. Jugurtha and his two sons were chained to the chariot of Marius and driven before it. Soon afterwards he was strangled in prison at the command of the consul. [Jugurtha, king of Numidia, was orphaned at an early age and was adopted by his uncle Micipsa, who brought him up with his own two sons, Hiempsal and Adherbal. Jugurtha quickly distinguished himself and rose to such popularity that he excited the jealousy of his uncle, who, to remove him, sent Jugurtha to assist Scipio against Numantia; but there his zeal and bravery gained him the favor of Scipio and the leaders in the Roman camp. In 118 BCE the uncle died, leaving the kingdom to Jugurtha, Hiempsal and Adherbal. Jugurtha, aspiring to sole rule, assassinated Hiempsal and defeated Adherbal, who fled to Rome for assistance, and the senate decreed that Numidia be equally divided between the two competitors. Jugurtha bribed the senators and thus succeeded in obtaining the western division of the kingdom, adjacent to Mauretania, by far the larger and richer portion. Still not content, Jugurtha invaded the territory of Adherbal, defeated and slew him. For this Rome declared war against Jugurtha, and sent L. Calpurnius Bestia, the consul, into Africa (111). Again Jugurtha purchased a favorable peace; but this aroused Roman indignation. The war was renewed; but the consul, Sp. Postumius Albinus, who conducted it, accomplished nothing. When he went to Rome to hold the comitia, he left his brother Aulus in command; but Aulus was defeated by Jugurtha. An ignominious peace made by Aulus was repudiated, and the consul Q. Caecilius Metellus was sent to Africa at the head of a new army (109). Metellus frequently defeated Jugurtha, and at length drove him to take refuge among the Gaetulians. In 107 Metellus was succeeded by Marius; but the cause of Jugurtha had meantime been espoused by his father-in-law Bocchus, king of Mauretania. Marius defeated the united forces, and Bocchus purchased the forgiveness of the Romans by surrendering his son-in-law to Sulla, the quaestor of M. Maurius (106). Jugurtha remained in captivity until the return of Marius to Rome, where, after adorning the triumph of his conqueror, he was starved to death].

After the the Jugurthine victory, Marius became consul a second time, and to him was assigned the war against the Cimbrians (Cymbros) and Teutons (Theutones); and as the Cimbrian war continued, he was elected consul a third and fourth time. But in his fifth consulship he had as his colleague Quintus Lutatius (Lucanum) Catulus.

Caius Marius and Quintus Lutatius Catulus were Roman consuls at this time. Marius had served with distinction at Numantia under the younger Scipio Africanus in 134 BCE, and in 119 he became tribune of the plebs. In 114 he went to Spain as propraetor. He served in Africa against Jugurtha, and when elected consul in 107, closed that campaign. Meanwhile the Cimbrians and Germans burst into Gaul, repeatedly defeating the Romans. Marius finally defeated them also and was declared the savior of State, the third founder of Rome. When Sulla as consul was entrusted with the Mithridatic War, Marius, jealous of his patrician rival, attempted to deprive him of the command, and civil war followed. Marius was forced to flee to Africa, where he remained until his friends rose under Cinna. He hurried back to Italy, and with Cinna he marched against Rome, compelling it to yield. Marius and Cinna were elected consuls for the year 86, but Marius died a fortnight later.

Catulus, associate of Marius in 102, was to attack the Cimbri while Marius opposed the Germans. Although Marius succeeded, Catulus failed, and the Cimbri poured over the mountains with such fury that Catulus fled in confusion. Marius, after his return to Rome, came to his assistance and defeated the Cimbri. Catulus served with distinction in the Social War, and having espoused the cause of Sulla, his name was included in the great proscription of 87. Escape impossible, he shut himself up in a newly plastered chamber, kindled a fire, and was suffocated.

When the former consuls had been defeated at the Rhone (Rhodanus) River by the Cimbrians, Teutons, and Ambroniens, which were nations of the Germans and Gauls, there was a great fear at Rome, the like of which had not been felt since the days of Hannibal during the Punic Wars. And now he fought against the Cimbrians, and in two battles he slew 200,000 of the enemy, and took 30,000 prisoners. Meanwhile the Cimbrians and Germans, of whom countless numbers remained, crossed into Italy. And once again Caius Marius and Quintus Catulus fought against them. Catulus was the more fortunate, for in the battle that soon followed, 140,000 of the enemy were slain in battle and during flight, and 40,000 were made prisoners. Of the two Roman armies both lost 300 men. And thirty-three standards of the Cimbrian army were carried off. Of these the army of Marius captured two, while the army of Catulus took 31. But the women gave the Romans a harder fight than the men had. With carts and chariots they made a wagon-fort, behind which they defended themselves for a long time. But they were now confronted with a new host that put them so in fear of death that they ceased fighting. For their hair was cut off, together with the posterior veins of the neck, presenting very gruesome wounds. The weapons that they had taken from the enemy, they turned upon themselves and upon their own. For although they sent their messengers to Marius, they could not obtain their freedom or anything approaching it. So they suffocated and strangled their children; and then they either wounded each other, having made cords of their hair, they hanged themselves from trees and from the yokes of their wagons.

In the 662nd year of the founding of the city, the first civil war occurred at Rome. And in that same year also was the Mithridatic (War). [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. Caius Marius, consul for a sixth time, was the cause of the civil war. For when Sulla (Silla), the consul, was sent to wage war against Mithridates (who had occupied Asia and Achaia), he kept his army in Campania a little while in order that the remains of the Social War, which had been carried on within the limits of Italy, might be extinguished. Marius desired that he himself be sent against Mithridates. This moved Sulla to first march to Rome with his army, and there give battle to Marius and Sulpicius. He was the first to enter the city in arms. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. He slew Sulpicius and drove Marius to flight. And after he had made Gnaeus (Gneo) Octavius and Cornelius Cinna consuls for the next year, he went to Asia. At this time foreboding omens were seen. For under the rising of the sun a fiery globe in the region of the northern sky shone forth with a very great roar of thunder from the sky. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. Among the Aretinians blood flowed from the bread at a feast; and animals of every kind that were accustomed to live with humans, with pitiable bleating, neighing, and howling they fled from their stables and pastures to the forests and mountains. And not long after these serious omens civil war followed. [L. Cornelius Cinna and Cn. Octavius were elected consuls in 87 BCE with the permission of Sulla when the latter was about to take the command against Mithridates, but upon condition that Cinna take an oath not to alter the constitution as then existing. But Cinna's first act as consul was to impeach Sulla; and as soon as the general had left Italy, Cinna sought to overpower the senate by forming a strong popular party of the new citizens, chiefly of the Italian states, who had lately been enrolled in the 35 old tribes, whereas they had previously voted separately as eight tribes; and by their aid it was proposed to recall Marius and his party. The other consul, Octavius, was ill fitted to oppose the popular leaders; yet Sulla had left the party of the senate so strong that Octavius was able to defeat his opponents in the forum, and Cinna fled the city. He was soon joined by Sertorius and others, who assisted in raising the Italians against the party in power at Rome. Cinna and his friends marched on Rome and invested it from the land, while Marius, having landed from Africa, blocked it by sea. The result has already been told in the previous note on Marius. Sulla threatened to return and take vengeance on his enemies. Cinna assembled an army at Brundisium to meet Sulla before he entered Italy; but when he ordered the rest to follow, a mutiny arose and Cinna was slain].

Folio LXXXVI recto

Sulla (Silla), a Roman patrician, after he had performed many deeds in the Jugurthine War, carried away from the Roman senate the glory that belongs to an emperor. Immediately sent against Mithridates, he was victorious in Achaia and Asia. He was of the ancient and highly renowned family of the Scipios; and all of his days since youth were addicted to shameful and licentious practices, until under Marius he was made quaestor and sent against Jugurtha. In the exercise of this function he changed the course of his life entirely. He put Jugurtha in chains, silenced Mithridates, suppressed the affliction of the Social War, destroyed the power of Cinna, and had Marius proscribed and forced into exile. He was well versed in Greek and Latin, eloquent, sharp, smart, and greedy for glory; he gave away many things, especially money. He had a great mind, so much so that one doubted whether to say he was braver or luckier. As he now attained to the position of dictator and head of the Roman government, he decreed that no man should continue to keep life, property, or fatherland against his (Sulla's) will. He finally died in isolation of an intestinal disorder. With his death ended the two very deadly wars, namely, the Italian War, which was called the Social War, and the Sullan Civil War, both of which had continued for ten years with a loss of more than 150,000 people, 23 consuls, and 300 senators, not including those who were destroyed everywhere throughout Italy.

L. Sulla, surnamed Felix, the dictator, was born in 138 BCE. He studied Greek and Roman literature with success at an early age. But he followed pleasure with equal ardor, and his youth and manhood were filled with the most sensual activities. Still his love of pleasure did not absorb all his time, nor enervate his mind, which was always clear and firm. He aspired to the honors of state and became quaestor in 107, when he served under Marius in Africa. Although previously known only for his profligacy, he now displayed zeal and ability, and soon gained the approbation of his commander and the affection of the soldiers. It was to him that Jugurtha was delivered by Bocchus; and the quaestor thus shared with the consul the glory of bringing this war to an end. Sulla continued to serve under Marius with great distinction in the campaigns against the Cimbri and Teutons; but because Marius was becoming jealous of his rising fame, Sulla left him in 102 and took a command under the colleague of Marius, one Q. Catulus, who entrusted the chief management of the war to Sulla. In the military campaigns assigned to him he was successful. But now the enmity between Marius and Sulla assumed deadly form. This was temporarily checked by the breaking out of the Social War, which hushed all private quarrels for the time. Marius and Sulla took an active part against the common foe. Marius was advanced in years and found himself thrown in the shade by the superior energy of his younger rival. Sulla gained brilliant victories, and was elected consul in 88, receiving from the senate the command of the Mithridatic war. But he was expelled from Rome by Marius. So Sulla, on his return to the city at the head of his legions, proscribed Marius and his leading adherents. Sulla then remained at Rome till the end of the year, and set out for Greece at the beginning of 87, in order to carry on the war against Mithridates. He defeated Archelaus, Mithridates' general, in Boeotia, and in the following year was victorious in another battle against the same foe. But Sulla's enemies were giving trouble at home. The consul Cinna, who had been driven out of Rome by his colleague Octavius, soon after Sulla's departure from Italy, entered it again with Marius at the close of the year. Both Cinna and Marius were appointed consuls in the year 86, and all the regulations of Sulla were swept away. Having brought the Mithridatic War to conclusion, Sulla returned to Italy. He landed at Brundisium in the spring of 83. After several engagements Sulla became complete master of Rome and Italy. He resolved to take great vengeance on his enemies, and to utterly destroy the popular party. For the first time a list of names of those to be put to death was prepared. All persons whose names appeared on the list were outlaws, to be killed by anyone with impunity. Their property was to be confiscated and sold at public auction; and their descendants were excluded from a voice in public offices. Terror reigned throughout Rome and Italy. Fresh proscriptions constantly appeared. No one was safe. The confiscated property was purchased at nominal prices by Sulla's friends. Thousands perished. At the commencement of these horrors, towards the close of 81, Sulla had been appointed dictator for as long as he judged necessary. His object in the dictatorship was to carry out in a legal manner the reforms in the constitution and the administration of justice. He did not intend to abolish the republic, and consequently caused consuls to be elected for the following year, and was himself elected to the office while he continued to hold the dictatorship. His object was to give back to the senate and aristocracy the powers they had lost. In 81 he celebrated a splendid triumph on account of his victory over Mithridates. He claimed for himself the surname of Felix ('happy' or 'lucky'), as he attributed his success to the gods. He established military colonies throughout Italy, taking lands away from those who opposed him and giving it to his soldiers. At Rome he created a kind of a bodyguard for his protection by giving citizenship to slaves who had belonged to persons proscribed by him. The slaves thus rewarded were said to have numbered 10,000. In 79, to the surprise of everyone, Sulla resigned and retired to his estate at Putoli, and there, surrounded by the beauties of nature and art, he passed the rest of his life in literary and sensual enjoyments. He died in 78, at the age of 60. He wrote his own epitaph, stating that none of his friends ever did him a kindness, and none of his enemies a wrong, without being fully repaid.

Now when Sulla had placed the republic under these consuls new wars arose—one in Spain (Hispania), another in Pamphilia and Sicily, a third in Macedonia, and a fourth in Dalmatia. For Sertorius, who was (a member) of the Marian Party, [The German edition of the mistranslates the Latin clause qui partium marianarum fuerat ("who was (a member) of the Marian Party"—i.e., a partisan of the political party of Marius) as "being present in the region of the seas."] moved the Spaniards to war. Against him were sent the generals Quintus Caecilius (Cecilius) and Metellus, his son, [Schedel is mistaken here. The two generals sent against Sertorius were Quintus Caecilius Metellus, the son of that Metellus who had subdued Jugurtha, and the praetor Lucius Domitius]. and the Spaniards were brought under the dominion of the Roman people. Appius Claudius was sent against Macedonia, and later Cn. Scribonius was sent. He conquered the Dardanians, and marched as far as the Danube River. And so at one and the same time many triumphs and victories were celebrated.

The First Servile War, at the beginnings of the city [The phrase "at the beginnings of the city" is rather vague. Perhaps the chronicler is referring to the lands surrounding (i.e., the suburbs of) the city], was incited in the city itself by Herdonius, the Sabine ruler. But this was more of an insurrection than a war. Soon afterwards, with the empire occupied throughout a variety of lands, who could believe that Sicily was being ravaged with far greater cruelty by the Servile War than during the Punic War? The land, rich in wheat, a province that, in its way, is a suburb of the city, was held by great estates of our citizens. At last Perperna (Perpenna) the general punished them. And he was content with an ovation (for his victory) over the slaves, so that he might not dishonor the dignity of his triumph with an inscription mentioning the slaves.

The Servile or Slave War occurred in Sicily in 133-131 BCE; a second in Sicily in 103 was ended by the proconsul Aquilius in 99.

In the 689th year from the founding of the city, in the time of these consuls (referring to the portraits of Marcus Tullius Cicero and Gneus Antonius)

Marcus Tullius Cicero and C. Antonius (here called Gneus Antonius) were colleagues in the consulship in the year 63 BCE. Cicero, the Roman orator and politician, was born in 106, and spent his boyhood partly in his native town of Arpinum and partly at Rome. He was a devoted pupil of Philo, the head of the Academic School, studied rhetoric under Molo of Rhodes, and law under Q. Mucius Scaevola, the augur and juris-consult. His forensic life began at twenty-five. He studied philosophy at Athens and under various masters in Asia. He returned to Rome in 77, engaging at once in forensic and political life. He held various political offices. He was elected the consulship in 63, and this was a year of amazing activity in his career, both administrative and oratorical. In the political dissensions of the times, Cicero found himself deserted, and on the advice of Cato went into exile at the end of March in the year 58 to avoid bloodshed. He was recalled the following year and was received at Rome with enthusiasm by all classes.

Under Caesar's dictatorship, Cicero abstained from politics. Domestic difficulties drove him to find comfort for his troubles in literature. His repose was broken by Caesar's murder in 44; but when it became apparent that the conspirators had removed the despot but not the despotism, he again devoted himself to philosophy. He returned to Rome at the end of the year and again became involved in Rome's political quarrels. He was included in the list of the proscribed and was slain on December 7th, 43 near Formiae. His head and hands were sent to Rome and nailed to the rostra after Fulvia, wife of Antony, and widow of Clodius, had thrust her hairpin through the tongue.

C. Antonius, according to most accounts, was one of Catiline's conspirators, and his well-known extravagance and rapacity seem to render this probable. Cicero gained him over to his side by promising him the rich province of Macedonia, in which he would have better opportunity of amassing wealth than in the other consular province of Gaul. At the conclusion of the war he went into this province and plundered it so shamefully that his recall was proposed in the senate. Cicero defended him. In 60 he was succeeded in the province by Octavius, father of Augustus, and on his return to Rome was convicted in his province. He retired to the island of Cephallenia, but was recalled by Caesar, whom he probably did not long survive.

, one L. Sergius Catilina, a man of very noble lineage, but of very depraved intelligence, conspired to destroy his fatherland. Together with some other famous, but reckless men, he was driven out of the city of Rome by Cicero. His accomplices, after being seized, were strangled in prison, and Catiline was defeated in battle and slain by the other consul, Antonius. [L. Sergius Catilina (Catiline) was a descendant of an impoverished ancient patrician family. His youth and early manhood were stained by every vice and crime. He first appears as a zealous partisan of Sulla, sharing personally in the horrors of Sulla's proscriptions. Notwithstanding his infamy he attained to the dignity of praetor in 68 BCE, was governor of Africa during the following year, and returned to Rome in 66 to sue for the consulship, but was disqualified by an impeachment for oppression in the province. Disappointed in the outcome, Catiline organized a conspiracy to murder the new consuls; but through his own hastiness the attempt failed. His subsequent attempts to upset the government are best read in Cicero. Catiline was slain in the year 62]. Then in the following year Metellus triumphed over the island of Crete when Junius Sillanus and L. Murena were consuls.

Pompeius Maximus, general of the Romans, was held in very great esteem by the Romans. After a speedy defeat of the pirates he was made a commander of the army and proceeded against twenty-two eastern kings. In Lesser Armenia he defeated Mithridates in a battle at night. Afterwards he made war against Tigranes the king, and the Albanians and Herod their king. He also wisely fought the king of Iberia, the Itureos and the Arabs. He then proceeded against Jerusalem, the capital city of Judea; and although at that time the city was not only well protected by nature, but by great walls and moats, he besieged it and captured it in barely three months' time. A thousand Jews were slain, and the remainder held as hostages. He ordered the walls of the city to be overturned. [This sentence is not found in the German edition]. Hycarnus was given the office of high priest. Aristobulus was carried to Rome as a prisoner. He then went to Asia, and from there he returned to Rome in great glory and triumph in the consulships of Junius Sullanus and L. Murena. [Cn. Pompeius Magnus, born September 30, 106 BCE, was a few months younger than Cicero, and six years older than Caesar. He was one of Sulla's most successful generals. When the war in Italy was brought to a close, Sulla sent Pompey against the Marian party in Sicily, of which he easily made himself master. He proceeded to Africa and gained further victories, returned to Rome in great triumph. He became consul, and openly breaking with the aristocracy, which was jealous of him, he became the great popular hero. A number of changes were now made in the laws, such as restoring to the tribunes the powers of which Sulla had deprived them. For the next two year Pompey remained in Rome. In 67 power was conferred upon him to make war against the pirates, which he did with great speed and success (though several modern scholars believe that the threat of piracy was intentionally overplayed by Pompey for political reasons). During the remainder of the year and the beginning of the following, he visited the cities of Cicilia and Pamphylia, and provided for the government of the newly conquered districts. He was then authorized to proceed against the Mithridates, who retreated to Armenia, but was there defeated by Pompey; and as Tigranes now refused to receive him into his dominions, Mithridates resolved to plunge into the heart of Colchis, and from there made his way to his own dominions in the Cimmerian Bosphorus. Pompey now turned against Tigranes, but the Armenian king submitted without a contest, and was allowed to conclude a peace with the republic. In 65, Pompey was sent out in pursuit of Mithridates, but met with much opposition from the Albanians and Iberians, so he resolved to leave these districts. In 64, he made Syria a Roman province. In 63, he advanced further south, in order to establish the Roman supremacy in Phoenicia, Coele-Syria, and Palestine. The Jews shut the gates of Jerusalem against him; but after a siege of three months the city gave up. During this war came news of the death of Mithridates. Settling his affairs in Asia, Pompey returned to Italy in 62. As soon as he landed at Brundisium he disbanded his army in order to allay the fear that he might seize the supreme power. He was now 45, and for the third time was accorded the honor of a triumph. And now he was called upon to take part in the problematic civil affairs of the commonwealth, and for this he was hardly fitted. The aristocracy still regarded him with jealousy and distrust; yet Pompey would not ally himself with the popular party over which Caesar held sway. The aristocracy refused to sanction the work of Pompey in Asia, and Caesar having agreed to use his influence to favor Pompey in securing this approval, Pompey joined Caesar, and Crassus with his immense wealth became the third party to the triumvirate. This union, for the time, crushed the aristocracy. Pompey's acts in Asia were ratified and the Agrarian laws espoused by Caesar were passed. Caesar gave Pompey his daughter Julia in marriage. Caesar then went to Gaul, but Pompey remained in Rome. Caesar gained in glory, but Pompey lost confidence at home. The senate feared Pompey and deserted him for their favorite Clodius. And so he decided to strengthen his connection with Caesar. Thus he became regarded as the second man in the state. But he aspired to the dictatorship of the Roman world, and to this he fomented internal strife. The story of the civil war that followed between himself and Caesar eventually ended, as far as the part he played in it, in his assassination on the shores of Egypt].

Caius Julius Caesar, who later became emperor, was, together with Lucius Bibulus, made consul in the 698th year from the founding of the city. [C. Julius Caesar and M. Calpurnius Bibulus were colleagues in the consulship in 59 BCE]. And to him were assigned Transalpine and Cisalpine Gaul. To this the Roman senate also added Illyricum and ten legions with which he fought heavy engagements for ten years. First he fought the Helvetians, and he marched as far as the English Sea. Then he put to flight Ariovistus (Ariovistum), the king, and the Aedui (Arudes), Marcomones, Tribeti, Vangiones, and Suevi; and later also the Belgae and others whom we collectively call the Germans. After that he built a bridge over the Rhine (Rhenum) and passed over it. In nine years he subdued all Gaul lying between the Alps and the Rhone (Rhodanus) River, and the Rhine (Rhenum) River and the sea. This was followed by a grievous domestic war. For when the victorious Caesar returned from Gaul and craved the honor of the office of consul a second time, this was denied him by Marcellus Bibulus, Pompey and Cato; and he was ordered to dismiss his army and return to the city; and Pompey was sent (against him?) with absolute authority; and on account of this insult a war arose. [Caius Julius Caesar was born July 12th, 100 BCE in the consulship of C. Marius and L. Valerius Flaccus. He was six years younger than Pompey and Cicero. He was killed when almost 56 years of age, March 15th, 44. At the age of 22 he obtained great renown as an orator and was elected to high offices. In 63 he was elected Pontifex Maximus. In 61 he went as proprætor into farther Spain, where he gained great victories over the Lusitanians. On his return he and Bibulus were elected consuls. After his election he formed the first triumvirate with Pompey and Crassus. Caesar's first popular measure was to divide the Campanian plain among the poorer citizens. By a vote of the people the provinces of Cisalpine Gaul and Illyria were granted to Caesar with three legions for five years; also Transalpine Gaul, with another legion for five years. For nine years Caesar was now occupied with the subjection of Gaul. He conquered Transalpine Gaul, twice crossed the Rhine, and twice landed in Britain, previously unknown to the Romans. He conquered the Helvetii, who had emigrated from Switzerland, to settle in Gaul. He next defeated Ariovistus, the German king, who had taken possession of part of the territories of the Aedui and Sequavi, and pursued him as far as the Rhine. In his second campaign Caesar made war on the Belgæ in northeastern Gaul, and subdued them. He crossed the Alps and made war against the Veneti and other states in northwestern Gaul. In three campaigns Caesar subdued the whole of Gaul. In his fourth campaign he crossed the Rhine in order to strike terror into the Germans, but he only remained 18 days on the further side of the river. He invaded Britain in the same year, but soon returned to Gaul and put down all the revolts that had occurred in the meantime (50). But his brilliant victories estranged Pompey, who joined the aristocratic party by the assistance of which alone he could hope to remain the chief man in the Roman state. The great object of this party was to deprive Caesar of his command, and to compel him to return to Rome as a private man to sue for the consulship. They would then have accused him, and as Pompey was in the neighborhood of the city with his army, the trial would have been a mockery, and condemnation certain. Caesar offered to compromise, and to resign his command if Pompey would do likewise. But the senate refused to listen. January 1st, 49 the senate decreed that Caesar disband his army, and refusing to do so, he should be regarded as an enemy of the state. Caesar crossed the Rubicon, which separated his province from Italy, and marched towards Rome. Pompey and some of the magistrates and senators fled to Capua, and from there to Greece, to which country Caesar was not able to follow on account of his lack of ships. In three months Caesar was master of all Italy, and later, crossing into Greece, completely defeated Pompey, who fled to Egypt. There Pompey was murdered before Caesar arrived. Caesar was now appointed dictator for a whole year and consul for five years. He accepted the dictatorship but declined the consulship. He made M. Antony his master of horse].

Folio LXXXVI verso

Florence (Florentia), the noblest and most distinguished city among the cities of Etruria (Ethrurie), is said to have had its origin with the coming of the soldiers of Sulla (to whom this land was assigned by Sulla). And because they took their first dwellings at the flowing waters of the Arno, from that, at first, they suppose the city was called Fluentia. And Pliny (who first makes mention of this region) says the Fluentini were located beside the flowing Arno. These soldiers came there six hundred and sixty-seven years after the founding of the city of Rome. Thus Florence seems to have had its beginning around eighty-three years before the advent of Christ our Lord. This city of Florence was founded by the Fiesoleans (Fesulanis) on the shores of the river Arno, and the ancients called the city Fluentia; but after the city became prosperous and had wonderfully increased in size, and excelled all other cities in the same neighborhood in power, strength and possessions, it was more appropriately called Florence (Florentia), rather than Fluentia. In the time of the Goths the city was powerfully attacked, for Totila overran and devastated it. But Charles the Great rebuilt it; and he increased it in size and surrounded it with fortifications, and endowed it with esteemed liberties and civic regulations. After Florence, by force, annexed the Fiesoleans in the year 1024, it greatly increased in riches and honor. In the same year Emperor Henry I built the Church of San Miniato, by the walls of Florence. From nearly that time the city began to be governed just as it is today by the Priors of the Guilds and by the Standard-bearers of Justice. In this city is found, among many other unbelievable adornments, the celebrated cathedral dedicated in honor of the glorious Virgin. In the fourth year after that was begun a palace, equally superb, which the Priors inhabit; and after that, in the fifth year (1071) an orchard was planted, and the walls were enlarged; while above the Church of St. Lawrence on the banks of the river, the city was permanently enclosed. Thirty-one years later a marble tower, a beauty among the bell-towers of the world, was erected. And there also the index finger of the forerunner (of Christ) is held in very great veneration; and in his honor a very famous building, in a rather crowded part of the city, was dedicated, which they call the Baptistery. The doors are made of solid bronze, and the histories of the New and Old Testament are engraved on them with indescribable art. [The Florence Baptistery (or Baptistry) of St John (Italian Battistero di San Giovanni) is a religious building in Florence believed to be the oldest building in the city. It is particularly famous for its three sets of artistically adorned bronze doors by two different artists. The South Doors were designed and created by Andrea Pisano in the years 1329-1336. The more celebrated North Doors, begun in 1401, took Lorenzo Ghiberti, the winner of a contest to see who would create the sculptures for these doors, 21 years to complete. Their success made Ghiberti the most celebrated artist in Italy, and secured him the commission to complete one further set of doors on the Baptistery, the East Doors (now known by Michelangelo having called them worthy of being "The Gates of Paradise"), which took 28 years to complete and contain what may be the greatest of all renaissance sculptures]. And although Florence was called the flower of all the cities of Italy, yet beside her beauty and the sophistication of her citizens, she also possessed more extraordinary men of every kind of virtue. She was graced by two poets, Dante Alighieri [Dante Alighieri (1265-1321) was Italy's greatest medieval writer. Although he wrote many works in Latin, his masterpiece, the (originally simply called the in Italian), was written in the vernacular language of his native Tuscany now known as Italian]. (Aldegerio), and Francesco Petrarch [Petrarch (1304-1374), called the 'father of humanism' and the 'father of the Renaissance', was an Italian scholar and poet. He perfected the sonnet form in poetry, and contributed significantly to the development of the study of ancient history and literature that would be the foundation of the Italian Renaissance. The is, in a certain sense, a descendant of Petrarch's humanistic legacy]. The former was born at Arezzo (Aretium) of a Florentine father in exile, died and was buried in Arquà (Arquade) in the Euganean hills. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. The latter was born in Florence of Florentine parents and died in exile from his fatherland in Ravenna. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. Not long after that she had the very famous painter Giotto [Giotto (c. 1267–1337), an Italian painter and architect from Florence, was the founding father of the artists of the Italian Renaissance. His most famous work, and the one that decisively broke with the medieval artistic traditions of the past, were the frescoes he painted for the Scrovegni Chapel between 1303 and 1310]. (Iotum), a highly celebrated artist and the equal of Apelles [Apelles of Kos (c. 352-308 BCE) was a celebrated painter of ancient Greece. Pliny the Elder, who discusses him in his (35.36.79-97 and passim), considered him the greatest painter of the ancient world. None of his paintings survive]. She also had Accursius, prince of legal scholars, and foremost interpreter of the civil law. And she gave (to the world) Tadeus, of all physicians most renowned. And she was graced by Cosimo de' Medici (Cosmo Mediceo), who in wealth, magnanimity and amiability excelled all the other citizens of Europe; and his sons and grandsons crown his good fortune, and added very many adornments to the city of Florence, particularly the monastery of San Marco, in which there are beautiful structures and a library which excels all others. These demonstrate the great man's magnificence. And his private residence built on the Via Larga (Lata) can be compared to the works of the Romans. Leonardo [Leonardo Bruni (c. 1369-1444) was a humanist, historian and chancellor of Florence. He was a pioneer in the development of a more modern understanding of history, in which secular events were divorced from religious ones, and where the Bible was just one source in the historian's toolbox. His greatest work, , applies these principals to the writing of history]. of Arezzo has given a detailed history of the origin and accomplishments of this most flourishing [Schedel—unusually—makes a pun here of the name of the city of Florence ('The Flourishing Place'). His source, Biondo Flavio, ('Italy Illuminated') 1.26, simply states: "The distinguished Leonardo of Arezzo has given a detailed account of the origin and accomplishments of the famous city of Florence in his ." city. Beside Florence is the ancient city of Fiesole (Fesula), a place celebrated by the writings of many, especially Sallust (Salustii) and Livy (Livii). It has perished, or, as mentioned above, moved its people and its wealth to Florence. From its mountains, which slope down to the east, arises the Mugnone (Munio) stream, which washes the walls of Florence. The Arno River, yoked by four great bridges, divides the city of Florence. They say that the upper Arno valley, which now, as far as the floodplain of the Arno encompasses, is the most productive of the best wine in the Florentine region, was once a swamp. The foresight of the Florentines is to be praised in many respects, particularly in the selection of their chancellors who examine the art of rhetoric and who welcome men experienced in the field of study they call humanism, such as Leonardo [See the note above on Leonardo Bruni]. and Carlo Aretino [Carlo Marsuppini (1399-1453), also known as Carlo Aretino (Carolus Arretinus in Latin), was a celebrated Renaissance humanist and chancellor of Florence]. and Poggio [Gian Francesco Poggio Bracciolini (1380-1459), Italian scholar of the Renaissance, was born in 1380 at Terranuova, a village in the territory of Florence. His abilities and his dexterity as a copyist of manuscripts brought him into early notice with the chief scholars of Florence. Coluccio Salutati and Niccolò de' Niccoli befriended him, and in the year 1402 he was received into the service of the Roman curia. His functions were those of secretary. He did not concern himself with the ecclesiastical controversies of the times, but devoted himself heart and soul to the resuscitation of classical studies. He unearthed many valuable manuscripts, copied them and communicated them to the learned. Wherever he went he carried on his researches. He distinguished himself as an orator and writer, and epistolographer and grave historian, and as a facetious complier of fabliaux in Latin. He also wrote a , written in avowed imitation of Livy's manner. His , a collection of humorous and indecent tales, is chiefly remarkable for its unsparing satires on the monastic orders and the secular clergy. A considerable portion of his extant works are invectives. About 1452, Poggio finally retired to Florence, and on the death of Carlo Aretino in 1453 he was appointed chancellor and historiographer to the republic. His declining days were spent in the discharge of his Florentine office and in the composition of his history].; and before these, Coluccio [Coluccio Salutati (1331-1406) was an Italian scholars and one of the most important political and cultural leaders of the Florentine Republic. The teacher of Leonardo Bruni, Coluccio wrote historical works linking Florence's origin to the Roman Republic. In his lifetime, although the study of ancient literature was generally frowned upon by the Roman Catholic Church, Coluccio both promoted the study of this literature and was instrumental in getting theologians and church officials to see the value of classical studies for current and future generations], men who have passed down most eloquently the art of writing and speaking.

Florence, also called Florentia, Fiorenza, and Firenze, is located in Etruria, on either side of the river Arno, and about three miles south of Fiesole (Faesulae). Though celebrated in modern times as the capital of Tuscany, and in the Middle Ages as an independent republic, it was not a place of much consequence in antiquity. It is probable that it derived its first origin as a town from the Roman colony, the date of the establishment of which is not clear. A colony was settled there by the triumvirs after the death of Caesar; but there seems some reason to believe that one had previously been established there by Sulla. There is no direct authority for this fact, any more than for that of the new town having been peopled by emigrants who descended from the rocky heights of Fiesole to the fertile banks of the Arno; but both circumstances are in themselves probable enough, and have a kind of traditionary authority which has been generally received by the Florentine historians. A passage of Florus also, in which he enumerates Florentia (or as some manuscripts give the name, Fluentia) among the towns sold by auction by order of Sulla, is only intelligible on the supposition that the lands were divided among new colonists. But he is certainly in error in reckoning Florentia as a flourishing municipium at this time. It is probable that its favorable position in the center of a beautiful and fertile plain on the banks of the Arno, and on the line of the great high road through the north of Tuscany, became the source of its prosperity; and it is clear that it rapidly came to surpass its more ancient neighbor of Fiesole.

Fiesole (Faesulae) is an ancient and important city of Etruria, situated on a hill rising above the valley of the Arno, about three miles from the modern city of Florence. It was taken and ravaged with fire and sword during the Social War. In the middle ages the city was reduced to insignificance by the growing power of the Florentines, and gradually fell into decay. According to the ordinary histories of Florence it was taken and destroyed by the Florentines in 1010 CE, but much doubt has been thrown on this statement by modern historians. Fiesole is now a mere village, though retaining its Episcopal rank and ancient cathedral. Edmund G. Gardner, in his Story of Florence, observes, "The truth appears to be that Florence was originally founded by Etruscans from Fiesole, who came down from their mountain to the plain of the Arno for commercial purposes. The Etruscan colony was probably destroyed during the wars between Marius and Sulla, and a Roman military colony established here—probably in the time of Sulla, and augmented later by Caesar and Augustus."

Christianity is said to have been first introduced at Florence in the days of Nero; the Decian persecution raged here as elsewhere, and here Miniatus suffered martyrdom. Christian worship is said to have been first offered up on the hill where a stately eleventh century basilica now bears his name. When persecutions came to an end under Constantine, a church dedicated to the Baptist on the site of the Marsian temple, and a basilica outside the walls, where San Lorenzo now stands, were among the earliest churches in Tuscany.

By the beginning of the 13th century Florence became one of the foremost cities of Italy. When the inability of the nobles to govern themselves was made manifest by ceaseless conflicts between Guelphs and Ghibellines, the guilds, in 1282, took the government in hand. But in time a new aristocracy arose against which the lower ranks rebelled in 1378. Three years of mob rule followed, and then came an aristocratic government headed by the Albizzi, who inaugurated the city's most brilliant history. Florence became the money market of Europe, and the chief cradle of modern culture. The wealthy Medici, aided by the democrats, next seized the government. Cosimo, pater patriae ('father of his fatherland'), while retaining the republican constitution, ruled the city from 1434 until his death in 1464. He was succeeded by his weak son, Piero, who was followed in 1469 by his son Lorenzo the Magnificent, a statesman, poet, and patron of arts and science, who died while the Chronicle was in the making. After his death the Florentine love of liberty was powerfully stimulated by the Dominican friar, Savonarola of Ferrara, and there followed a successful rebellion against the Medici rule. But Savonarola was burned at the stake in 1498, and in 1512 the Medici were reinstated with the aid of Spanish troops. In 1527 they were again expelled, but in 1530, after a heroic defense, during which Michelangelo had charge of the fortifications, Florence was captured by the army of Charles V, who installed Alessandro de Medici as hereditary duke. After him in 1537 came Cosimo I, who united the communities of Tuscany into a single state. On their extinction in 1737, Tuscany fell to the house of Lorraine. In 1860 Tuscany was united with the new kingdom of Italy by a plebiscite.

Florence is memorable in literature as the birthplace of Dante, who was born in 1265 and died in exile at Ravenna in 1321. Here also lived Giovanni Boccaccio, whose Decameron laid the foundation for modern Italian prose. Here Giotto, called the father of modern painting, began his work. The three greatest Italian masters, Leonardo da Vinci, Michelangelo, and Raphael, though not permanently attached to Florence, did some of their most important work here. Among the celebrated Florentine sculptors were Ghiberti, Luca della Robbia, and Donatello. Among its architectural monuments are the Palazzo Vecchio, with its tower 308 feet in height, built in 1298-1314, now the town hall; the great Cathedral, begun in 1296 and not completed until 1436, 185 yards long and 114 yards across the transepts, and with a dome 345 feet high; the Campanile, a square ball tower, begun by Giotto in 1334, and 275 feet high; and the Monastery of San Marco built in 1437-1443, which contains murals by Fra Angelico.

Nearly the entire paragraph devoted to Florence on folios LXXXVIv and LXXXVIIr was taken by Schedel from Biondo Flavio's Italia Illustrata ('Italy Illuminated') 1.26-34.

ILLUSTRATION FLORENCE

This special woodcut covers fully two-thirds of these two folios, and appears to have been based on other panoramic views of Florence of about the time of the Chronicle.

Let us enter the city by way of the Arno in the flat bottom boat that is being piloted without passengers or cargo at the river mouth. The Arno flows off to the right and is spanned by a number of bridges. The city lies on either side of the river and is fortified with walls and turrets. In the center of the town is the great cathedral church and before it the famous Campanile of Giotto. The church, called Santa Maria del Fiore (but more popularly known as the Duomo), is the largest and most important of the numerous Florentine churches. It was founded in 1298, but the façade was not finished until the nineteenth century. In actuality the famous Campanile of Giotto is close by; and the woodcutter has given us some suggestion at least of the Baptistry which was built in the thirteenth century, and adorned with the beautiful bronze doors of Ghiberti in the fifteenth century. The city is pictured as nestling at the foot of the Apennines, and in the distance to the left there is a suggestion of another city, probably Fiesole.

Folio LXXXVII verso

This Antiochus, being encouraged, pursued Triphon and caused him to flee. Triphon was at first on Alexander's side; and as he saw that the entire army was murmuring against Demetrius, he went to Arabia to bring back Antiochus. After that Triphon was determined to slay Antiochus, and to wear the crown himself; but he feared Jonathan, the formidable protector of Antiochus. Afterwards, Antiochus came to the soil of his fathers, and the whole army came to him, and only a few of the people remained with Triphon. Later he besieged and shut up Triphon. Finally Triphon was slain in Parthia. [Diodotus Triphon was a usurper of the throne of Syria during the reign of Demetrius II Nicator. After the death of Alexander Balas in 146 BCE, Triphon first set up Antiochus, the infant son of Balas, as a pretender against Demetrius; but in 142 he murdered Antiochus and reigned as king himself. Triphon was defeated and put to death by Antiochus Sidetes, the brother of Demetrius, in 139, after a reign of three years].

Antiochus Spondius was the son of Antiochus Pius who fled from the kingdom to Parthia.

Mithridates Pharnaces, son of the king of the Parthians, was a king of Pontus, born and reared at Sinope. While still a child his parents died. But as he grew up he subjugated the neighboring people and the Scythians. With the Romans he engaged in a very cruel war lasting forty years. He captured Bithynia and Cappadocia, and invaded Asia, Phrygia, Paphlagonia and Macedonia. Fighting many famous battles, he did not attack the Romans in a single way. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. They say that he knew twenty-two languages (for he ruled over that number of nations), so that in whatever language someone brought a case before him, he rendered judgment in that same language.

Schedel here employs Quintilian (Institutio Oratoria 11.2.50), but his cut and paste compilation technique conflates Mithridates with Crassus(!):

Ceterum quantum natura studioque valeat memoria vel Themistocles testis, quem unum intra annum optime locutum esse Persice constat, vel Mithridates, cui duas et viginti linguas, quot nationibus imperabat, traditur notas fuisse, vel Crassus ille dives, qui cum Asiae praeesset quinque Graeci sermonis differentias sic tenuit ut qua quisque apud eum lingua postulasset eadem ius sibi redditum ferret.... For the rest there are many historical examples of the power to which memory may be developed by natural aptitude and application. Themistocles is said to have spoken excellently in Persian after a year's study; Mithridates is recorded to have known twenty-two languages, that being the number of the different nations included in his empire; Crassus, surnamed the Rich, when commanding in Asia had such a complete mastery of five different Greek dialects, that he would give judgement in the dialect employed by the plaintiff in putting forward his suit....

H. E. Butler, Quintilian; Loeb Classical Library, 1922; pp. 241, 243

He was also versed in Greek literature, and he even studied music. He was a man of great soberness and industry. Cn. Pompeius finally defeated him in a night battle, destroyed his fort, and killed forty thousand of his men. Pharnaces, his son, after the slaying of the other sons, led an army against his father. And after Mithridates from a high wall pleaded at length, but in vain, with his son, he (Mithridates) came down to his wives, concubines and daughters, and administered to them, and finally to himself, the poison. But as he had beforehand provided himself with antidotes, he was not able to be affected by the poison; he asked a certain Gaul, Bituitus (Vitigis), who was a soldier of his, (to kill him), and offered him his neck;

The probable source of this section on Mithridates' death seems to be Orosius, Historiae Contra Paganos ('Histories Against the Pagans') 6.5.6:

Quod cum ipse nouissimus hausisset nec tamen propter remedia, quibus uitalia sua aduersus noxios sucos saepe obstruxerat, ueneno confici posset frustra spatia retur, siquo tandem modo infusa pestis per uenas uegetatione corporis acta discurreret, Gallum quendam militem iam fracto muro discurrentem inuitauit eique iugulum praeiuit.

But the name of the Gallic soldier, Bituitus (the only sense that can be derived from the vitigis of the Chronicle), seems to come from Appian, Roman History, 12.111: Seeing a certain Bituitus there, an officer of the Gauls, he said to him, "I have profited much from your right arm against my enemies. I shall profit from it most of all if you will kill me, and save from the danger of being led in a Roman triumph one who has been an autocrat so many years, and the ruler of so great a kingdom, but who is now unable to die by poison because, like a fool, he has fortified himself against the poison of others. Although I have kept watch and ward against all the poisons that one takes with his food, I have not provided against that domestic poison, always the most dangerous to kings, the treachery of army, children, and friends." Bituitus, thus appealed to, rendered the king the service that he desired.

Horace White, Appian; Loeb Classical Library, 1913 but he passed away at Bosphorus. He reigned 40 years, and with the consent of Pompey was placed in the royal sepulcher at Sinope. [Mithridates VI, King of Pontus (120-63 BCE), surnamed Eupator, also Dionysus, but more commonly called 'the Great,' was the son and successor of Mithridates V, King of Pontus, surnamed Euergetes, who was the son of Pharnaces I. He was eleven years of age upon his accession. We are told that immediately upon ascending to the throne, he was assailed by the designs of his guardians, but that he succeeded in eluding all their machinations, partly by displaying a courage in warlike exercises beyond his years, partly by the use of antidotes against poison, to which he began thus early to accustom himself. He attained to manhood, possessed of natural vigor of body and intellect. As a boy he had been brought up at Sinope, where he probably received his Greek education; and so powerful was his memory, that he is said to have learned not less than 22 languages, and to have been able in the days of the greatest power to transact business with the deputies of every tribe subject to his rule in their own particular dialect. He is said to have murdered his mother, to whom a share in the royal authority had been left by Mithridates Euergetes; and this was followed by the assassination of his brother. In the early part of his career he subdued the barbarian tribes between the Euxine and the confines of Armenia, including the whole of Colchis and the province called Lesser Armenia, and even extended his conquests beyond the Caucasus. He incorporated the kingdom of Bosphorus into his dominions, and now considered himself in possession of such great power, that he felt equal to a contest with Rome itself. Up to this point he had submitted to the mandates of Rome. Even after expelling Ariobarzanes from Cappadocia, and Nicomedes from Bithynia in 90, he offered no resistance to the Romans when they restored these monarchs to their kingdoms. But when Nicomedes, urged by the Roman legates, invaded the territories of Mithridates, the latter prepared for immediate hostilities. His success was rapid and striking. In 88, he drove Ariobarzanes out of Cappadocia, and Nicomedes out of Bithynia, defeated the Roman generals who had supported the latter, made himself master of Phrygia and Galatia, and at least of the Roman province of Asia. During the winter he issued the sanguinary order to all the cities of Asia to be put to death, on the same day, all the Romans and Italians who were to be found within their walls. These commands were obeyed by almost all the cities, and 80,000 are said to have perished in those massacres, so hateful had the Romans made themselves. In the meantime Sulla received the command to make war against Mithridates, who at once sent an army under his general Archelaus into Greece to meet Sulla. But Archelaus was twice defeated by Sulla, while about the same time the king himself was defeated in Asia by Fimbria. He sued for peace, which was granted upon condition that Mithridates abandon all his conquests in Asia, pay 2,000 talents and give up 70 ships. So ended the first Mithridatic War. A second war followed, but peace was again restored with Sulla, but not confirmed by the Roman senate. The death of the king of Bithynia brought on complications, for by his will that king gave his kingdom to the Roman people, and so it was declared a Roman province. But Mithridates espoused the cause of the king's son, which he prepared to support by his arms. He took the field with 120,000 footmen and 16,000 horses and a vast number of barbarian auxiliaries. And so commenced the third Mithridatic war. The Roman consuls Lucullus and Cotta were unable to oppose his first interruption. He traversed Bithynia without resistance, and when Cotta gave him battle, the consul was totally defeated. Mithridates now laid siege to Cyzicus, but Lucullus came to its relief and caused Mithridates to abandon the enterprise and force him to retreat with great loss. The king now took refuge in Pontus. There he was followed by Lucullus and again defeated. Whereupon the king took refuge with his son-in-law, Tigranes, king of Armenia, who became his ally. But Lucullus invaded Armenia and defeated the allied forces, then turned aside into Mesopotamia and laid siege to Nisibis. But now the tide turned, for the soldiers of Lucullus mutinied and demanded to be led home. Lucullus was obliged to give up the siege and returned to Asia Minor. Mithridates took advantage of this situation, raised an army and invaded the Pontus, and defeated Fabius and Triarius, to whom the defense of Pontus had been committed. Before the close of the year 67 Mithridates had regained possession of all his hereditary dominions. In the following year the conduct of the war was entrusted to Pompey, and the king was obliged to retreat before the Romans. With his small army he plunged into the heart of Colchis, and from there made his way to the Palus Maeotis and the Cimmerian Bosphorus. Unable to obtain peace from Pompey, he conceived the daring project of marching round the north and west coasts of the Euxine, through the wild tribes of the Sarmatians and Getae, and having gathered around his standard all these barbarian nations, to penetrate Italy itself. But his followers became disaffected. His son, Pharnaces, at length openly rebelled against him, and was joined by the whole army, who unanimously proclaimed him king. Mithridates took refuge in a strong tower, seeing that no choice remained to him but death or captivity. He took poison, but his constitution had been so long inured to antidotes that it did not take effect, and he was compelled to call in the assistance of one of the Gallic mercenaries to dispatch him with his sword. He died in 63. By the orders of Pompey his body was interred with regal honors in the sepulcher of his forefathers at Sinope].

This Demetrius was a brother of the aforesaid Antiochus, and was slain by Alexander the king of the Jews.

Philip, the last king of Syria and Asia, began to reign in the fourth (year?) of the kingdom of Alexander, and he reigned two years. During his reign Antiochus his uncle fled to the Parthians, and gave himself up to Pompey, after which Philip was immediately taken prisoner by Gabinus, the Roman consul, and his kingdom was made subject to the Romans. And the kingdom of Syria came to an end after having endured for two hundred and twenty years under 17 kings.

After the last king of Syria, Syria too was made tributary to the Romans. Pompey came to Jerusalem and took the city. He opened the Temple and went as far as the Holy of Holies. He endowed Hyrcanus with the high priesthood and took Aristobulus, his brother, away. At this time the Jews completely gave up their freedom and became subject to the Romans. And Pompey placed in the hands of Scaurus, the pro-consul, the management and care of the land, and left two legions with him. [M. Scaurus, eldest son of Aemilius Scaurus, and stepson of the dictator Sulla, whom his mother married after the death of his father, served in the third Mithridatic War under Pompey as quaestor. The latter sent him to Damascus with an army, and from there he marched into Judea to settle the disputes between Hyrcanus and Aristobulus. Pompey left him in the command of Syria with two legions. During the government of Syria he made a predatory incursion into Arabia Petraea, but withdrew with the payment of 300 talents by Aretas, the king of the country. He was made curule in 58, when he celebrated the games with extraordinary splendor. The temporary theatre which he built for the purpose, accommodated 80,000 spectators. In 56, he was praetor, and in the following year governed the province of Sardinia, which he plundered without mercy. He married Mucia, former wife of Pompey, and by her had one son of the same name].

Gabinus was sent to Syria to succeed Scaurus. He assigned the care of the Temple to Hyrcanus, and divided the Jewish people into five assemblies, in order to break up the pride of Judea. [Gabinus dissipated his fortune in youth by his profligate mode of life. He was tribune of the plebs in 66 BCE, when he proposed and carried a law conferring on Pompey command of the war against the pirates. He was praetor in 61 and consul in 58 with L. Piso. Both consuls supported Clodius in his measures against Cicero, resulting in the latter's banishment. In 57 he went to Syria as proconsul. His first attention was directed to the affairs of Judea. He restored Hyrcanus to the high priesthood, of which he had been dispossessed by Alexander, the son of Aristobulus. He next marched into Egypt and restored Ptolemy Auletes to the throne. The senate and Sibylline books had forbidden this; and he accordingly set at naught both senate and Sibyl. His government of the province was otherwise venal and oppressive, and when he returned to Rome in 54, he was accused of high treason for his restoration of Ptolemy. Contrary to his own wishes, Cicero defended him at the solicitation of Ptolemy; but he was condemned and exiled. In 49, Caesar recalled him, sending him with newly levied troops into Illyricum to reinforce Q. Cornificius, and there he died sometime near the end of 48].

Crassus, the Roman consul and colleague of Pompey, was by the Romans appointed proconsul of Syria upon the death of the aforesaid Gabinus, principally to quell the Parthians who bordered on Syria, and who were antagonistic to that country. He was a most miserly man of insatiable greed. When he heard of the riches of the Temple at Jerusalem, which Pompey had left unmolested, he came to Jerusalem, and went through the Temple and carried away from it treasures valued at two thousand talents. And he went through Mesopotamia in Parthia, and through the river Euphrates. When he reached the city of Caram the Parthians soon came to meet him and defeated the Romans with their arrows; and they rapidly pursued Crassus with their cavalry, and, once he had been surrounded, they shamefully killed him. Some write that he died of gold poured into his mouth. [M. Crassus, surnamed Dives ('Wealthy'), was a triumvir. His life was spared by Cinna, after the death of his father; but fearing Cinna, he escaped to Spain, where he concealed himself for 8 months. On the death of Cinna in 84 BCE, he collected some forces and crossed into Africa, from which he passed into Italy in 83 and joined Sulla, on whose side he fought against the Marian party. On the defeat of the latter he was rewarded by donations of confiscated property, and thus greatly increased his patrimony. His ruling passion was money, and he devoted all his energies to its accumulation. He was a keen speculator. He bought multitudes of slaves, and to increase their value had them instructed in the lucrative arts. He worked silver mines, cultivated farms, and built houses, which he let at high rents. In 71 he was appointed praetor to carry on the war against Spartacus and the gladiators. He defeated them and was honored with an ovation. In 70 he was consul with Pompey. He entertained the people with a banquet of 10,000 tables, and distributed enough wheat to supply the family of every citizen for 3 months. He was jealous of Pompey, but the two were reconciled by Caesar, and thus the triumvirate was formed. In 55 Crassus was again consul with Pompey, and received the province of Syria, where he hoped both to increase his wealth and acquire military glory by attacking the Parthians. He set out for his province. After crossing the Euphrates in 54, he did not follow up the attack on Parthia, but was misled by a crafty Arab chieftain to march into the plains of Mesopotamia, where he was attacked by the Parthians and defeated with great slaughter. The mutinous threats of his troops compelled him to accept a perfidious invitation from the Parthian general, who offered a pacific interview, at which Crassus was slain either by the enemy or by a friend who desired to save him from the disgrace of becoming a prisoner. His head was cut off and sent to the Parthian king, Orodes, who caused melted gold to be poured into the mouth of his fallen enemy, saying "Sate yourself now with that metal which you were so greedy for in life."]

This Cassius was a successor of Crassus as proconsul of Syria. He raised an army against Octavian. He took nine hundred talents of silver from the Jews. He was finally slain at Philippi. [C. Cassius Longinus was one of the conspirators against Caesar. He was quaestor to Crassus in the Parthian War (54 BCE), and saved the credit of the Roman arms after the commander's disastrous defeat and death, and as tribune of the people attached himself to Pompey in the year 49. After Pharsalia he was taken prisoner and pardoned by Caesar. In 44 as praetor he attached himself to the aristocrats who resented Caesar's supremacy, and won over M. Brutus; and in the same year participated in the assassination of Caesar. But popular feeling blazed out, and Mark Antony seized his opportunity. Cassius fled to the east, united his forces with those of Brutus, and being routed at Philippi, compelled his freedmen to slay him].

Lyons (Lugdunum), is a city of Transalpine Gaul near Vienne. According to Eusebius it was founded by Munatius (Numantius) Plancus [], a very famous student of the orator Cicero, during the time of Octavian Augustus on an elevation at the confluence of the Saone (Arar) and the Rhone (Rodanus). Franciscus Petrarch writes that it was a royal residence of the Romans and somewhat older than the city of Cologne (Agrippa). Here, the famous rivers Saone and Rhone come together and run into the Mediterranean Sea. The inhabitants call it Sona (Saone?). According to Strabo, for a long time this city excelled all other cities in Gaul with the exception of Narbonne in the number of very renowned and illustrious men. In time commerce developed, and this remains an important part of the city today. Its Roman leaders struck gold and silver coins at the command of Augustus. At public expense all Gaul erected a temple where these rivers meet in honor of the same emperor. Here also is a small temple of artistic workmanship with the names of 60 peoples inscribed on it, and a statue of each one of them. This city was once the capital of the Segusiani [The Segusiani were one of the most important peoples of Gallia Lugdunensis, bounded by the Allobroges on the south, by the Sequani on the east, by the Aedui on the north, and by the Averni on the west. In the time of Caesar they were dependent on the Aedui. In their territory was the town of Lugdunum, the capital of the province], whose territory was between the Rhone and the Dabudis. The other people in the direction of the Rhine are separated from them partly by the Dabudis and partly by the waters of the Saone. These same rivers after falling from the mountains unite and run into the Rhone. And the Rhone, again rising up, is carried to Vienne, chief city of the Allobroges. And it is established that these three rivers have their sources in the north, then flow to the west, and finally become one river that proceeds to the south and becomes predominant because of other rivers flowing into it. And from here it directed its remaining stream into the sea. But the temple and the entire region, as Seneca writes to Lucillus, were destroyed by a swift fire in his time. Some people include this city among the Celts. There Plotinus, who first taught Latin rhetoric at Rome, was born. It was from him that Cicero, with his brother Q. (Quintus), as a boy at Rome first learned his knowledge of Latin. There Saint Augendus was noted for his life and miracles. There Saint Desiderius was bishop, and Saint Baldomerius, whose many miracles make the city famous. There Romanus was abbot, who first lead the life of a hermit and became the father of many monks. The city was also graced by Saint Nicecius the bishop, and by Hyreneus, the bishop who was a disciple of Saint Polycarp (Policarpus) who was crowned there with martyrdom. In that city was Domicianus the abbot, Lupus the bishop and anchorite, and Antiochus the bishop, all of whom are now resting in the Lord. Justus, also, a man closest to the angels, concluded his life there. This famous city for a long time was subject to the kings of France, who established annual merchants' fairs there. To this place Pilate and Herod (so it is said) were banished by the rulers of Rome and ended their lives without honor. Lugdunum (as some maintain) is named for Caesar's lugda legion, for lugda in the Gallic language means the same thing as lightning. This legion was accustomed to stay in these regions throughout the winter. And so also, as Tacitus states, a certain Roman legion was quartered among the Spaniards, and it was called by those naming it the Violent One (Rapax), in order to frighten the people. For those are names that almost scare by their sound.

Lyons (Lugdunum) was the chief city of Gallia Lugdunensis, situated at the foot of a hill at the confluence of the Arar (Saone) and the Rhodanus (Rhone). It is said to have been founded by some fugitives from the town of Vienne, farther down the Rhone. In 43 BCE Lugdunum was made a Roman colony by L. Munatius Plancus, and became under Augustus the capital of the province and the residence of the Roman governor. Being situated on two navigable rivers, and being connected with the other parts of Gaul by roads, which met at this town as their central point, it soon became a wealthy and populous place, and is described by Strabo as the largest city in Gaul next to Narbo. It received many privileges from the emperor Claudius, but was burned down in the reign of Nero. It was, however, soon rebuilt, and continued to be a place of great importance until 197 CE, when it was plundered and the greater part of it destroyed by the soldiers of Septimius Severus, after his victory over his rival Albinus in the neighborhood of the town. From this blow it never recovered, and was more and more thrown into the shade by Vienne. Lugdunum possessed a vast aqueduct, of which the remains may still be traced for miles, a mint, and an imperial palace, in which Claudius was born, and in which many of the Roman emperors resided. At the tongue of land between the Rhone and the Saone stood an altar dedicated to Augustus by the different states of Gaul. Lugdunum is memorable in the history of the Christian church as the seat of the bishopric of Irenaeus, and on account of the persecutions which the Christians endured here in the second and third centuries.

The last sentence of the paragraph devoted to Lyons is not in the German edition of the chronicle. It is, in fact, a very slightly modified line of Ovidian verse (Heroides 13.54): nomina sunt ipso paene timenda sono.

Folio LXXXVIII verso

Alexandra, wife of Alexander, the king of Jews, reigned nine years. For when her husband died, he left behind his children Hyrcanus and Aristobulus. But he left the rule of his kingdom to this Alexandra, his wife; for Hyrcanus, ignoring the responsibility of being a ruler, had elected to lead an idle life, while Aristobulus was too impetuous and bold. She herself was loved by the people. When she entered upon her reign she immediately appointed Hyrcanus high priest on account of his age. The heresy of the Pharisees originated in Judea at this time. She made use of their advice in all matters, but she alone carried the royal name. With their advice she murdered the best of the Jews, or condemned them to exile; and so destroyed everything. Yet she handled many matters in the best interests of the kingdom, and she was wily in retaining it. However, as she did not keep in view either goodness or righteousness, she brought the affairs of her house into a state of great discord. Upon her death the kingdom suffered many miseries. Yet she kept her people at peace. When she finally became seriously ill, Aristobulus, with an assembly of very many people, declared he would reign after his mother; not long after that she died at the age of 73 years. [Alexandra died in the year 69 BCE. Hyrcanus succeeded to the sovereignty, but was soon attacked by his younger brother Aristobulus, who possessed more energy and ambition than he. In the following year Hyrcanus was driven from the throne of Judea and took refuge with Aretes, king of Arabia Petraea. That monarch assembled an army and invaded Judea to restore Hyrcanus. He defeated Aristobulus, and blockaded him in the Temple of Jerusalem. But by bribes and promises, Aristobulus won over M. Scaurus, Pompey's lieutenant, who had arrived at Damascus, and who now ordered Aretes and Hyrcanus to withdraw from Judea (64). The next year Pompey himself arrived in Syria, reversed the decision of Scaurus, carried away Aristobulus as a prisoner to Rome, and reinstated Hyrcanus in the high priesthood. But Hyrcanus did not enjoy his newly recovered sovereignty in peace for long; for Alexander, son of Aristobulus, and subsequently Aristobulus himself, escaped from Rome and incited dangerous revolts, which, however, were quelled with Roman assistance. The real government was now in the hands of Antipater, the father of Herod, who rendered such important services to Caesar in the Alexandrian War (47) that Caesar made him procurator of Judea, leaving to Hyrcanus the title of high priest. Although Antipater was poisoned by the contrivance of Hyrcanus (43), the latter was a man of such evil character that he allowed Herod to take vengeance on the murderer of his father, and to succeed to his father's power and influence. In their invasion of Syria, the Parthians carried Hyrcanus away as a prisoner to Babylon, but treated him with consideration. He was allowed to return to Jerusalem to the invitation of Herod, who treated him with respect until the battle of Actium; when Herod, fearing that Augustus might place Hyrcanus on the throne, accused him of treasonable correspondence with the Arabians, and on that pretext put him to death].

Jacob was Joseph's natural father; but Heli was his father according to the law. Matthew mentions one, Luke the other. [According to Matthew 1:16, "Jacob begat Joseph," the supposed father of Jesus; but according to Luke 3:23, Joseph "was the son of Heli."] Hyrcanus, son of Alexander, king of the Jews, by the aforementioned Alexandra, was the twenty-third high priest of the Jews, taking the chief office of the priesthood. He held office for 24 years, having been installed by his mother. After the death of his mother he suffered very severe investigations and controversies. His brother, Aristobulus, attacked him with an army. Now, as the same two brothers marched out into the field of Jericho, Hyrcanus was defeated and fled to Jerusalem. They finally came to an agreement by which it was provided that Aristobulus was to rule, and that Hyrcanus was to be subject to him and in honor bound to obey him. Not long afterwards Hyrcanus was not satisfied with the role assigned to him; and he fled in the night to Aretes, the Arabian king. He assembled an army and invaded Judea, laying siege to Jerusalem. But Scaurus, the Roman general, drove off the besiegers; and he now considered Jerusalem an easy prey for tribute. And while they thus quarreled and fought, they thereby gave the Romans an excuse to make war on them. So Pompey came to Jerusalem and besieged it. Discord arose in the city, those on the side of Aristobulus wishing to protect the city, but those on the side of Hyrcanus preferring to surrender to the Romans. Finally he (Pompey) came into the city; and he assaulted the Temple. And in the third month the Temple was broken into. Faustus Cornelius, the son of Sulla, first dared to enter it. [This sentence and the one preceding it are not in the German edition of the chronicle]. And the Romans desecrated the Temple. Nevertheless, from it he took nothing. He (Pompey) made Hyrcanus chief of the priesthood once again, and Judea was made a tribute-paying state. [See note on Alexandra, this folio. The last sentence and the one preceding it are not in the German edition of the chronicle].

Aristobulus, after Pompey's devastation of the city, was captured and, with his two sons Alexander and Antigonus, and as many daughters, was led off to Rome. And from that point in time the Jews completely surrendered their freedom and began to be subject to the Romans. The administration of Syria and Judea was entrusted to Scaurus Gabinius. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. After these things Aristobulus secretly left Rome and assembled a great army of Jews. Antonius was sent to wage war against him by Gabinius. Aristobulus was captured by Gabinius and led back to Rome again. During the quarrel between Pompey and Caesar he was sent to Syria with two cohorts. But the hope of Caesar was not realized, for the partisans of Pompey poisoned Aristobulus as he was attempting to bring Judea into the jurisdiction of Caesar. [Aristobulus was the younger son of Alexander Jannaeus and Alexandra. Upon the death of the latter, civil war broke out between Aristobulus and his brother Hyrcanus for the sovereignty. In 63 BCE he was deprived of the crown by Pompey, and sent as a prisoner to Rome. Six years later he escaped with his son Antigonus, returned to Judea and renewed the war. But he was taken prisoner by Gabinius and sent back to Rome. In 49, Julius Caesar released him, and sent him into Judea, but he was poisoned on the way by some of Pompey's party].

Alexander, the high priest, son of Aristobulus, escaped while being taken to Rome with his father. He gathered a great army and was laying waste to Judea. And he was plotting against his uncle Hyrcanus. He was occupying such well-fortified places as Alexandrium, Hyrcanium and Macheros. Later he was slain at Antioch by Scipio with an axe in accordance with the contents of Pompey's letters, and with the accusation first laid against him in his trial for the things that he had done to the Romans.

Antigonus, son of Aristobulus, king of the Jews, fled as the sole survivor with his two sisters after Alexander and Aristobulus were slain. Caesar, taking control of Syria and Judea, appointed Antipater Idumeum, a strict man, procurator of Judea. And, in turn, he offered the kingdom to Hyrcanus, the uncle of Antigonus; but he was not to be called king. Shortly after that Antigonus fled to Pacchorus, the Parthian king, and there he remained until the death of Caesar, immediately after which he stormed and attacked the city, took Hyrcanus and tore off his ears with his teeth. For this reason M. Antony, with the assistance of Octavian, declared Herod king of Judea. He violently entered the city, took Antigonus and sent him in chains to Antony at Antioch, who slew him with an axe. And this was the end of the race of the Hasmonaeans (Asamoneorum), for he was of the priestly family. And the kingdom of Judea ended. [Antigonus, son of Aristobulus II, was placed on the Judean throne by the Parthians in 40 BCE, but was taken prisoner by Sosius, lieutenant of Anthony, and put to death by the latter in the year 37].

Folio LXXXIX recto

In the first year of the reign of Cleopatra there arose between Caesar and Pompey a horrible civil war in which occurred not only the hardships that happen in battles, but the prosperity of the Roman people was changed. The cause of such calamity was due to the excessive good fortune of everyone; for when Caesar invaded Gaul, Crassus invaded Asia, and Pompey invaded Spain. There were three very great armies. Thus the rule of the world was occupied by the alliance of three rulers. This rule continued for ten years. After this each was afraid of the other. Upon the death of Crassus among the Parthians, and of Julia, the daughter of Julius Caesar, who had been married to Pompey to keep peace between the parties, discord immediately arose among them; for Pompey became jealous of the riches and power of Caesar, while the reputation of Pompey weighed upon Caesar. Now as Caesar was master of the peaceful empire of Europe, he crossed over into Greece and besieged Pompey and destroyed all his forces, though he himself escaped with the help of the arrival of night. Caesar swiftly marched on through Epirus in Thessaly. Pompey followed him with a very large force. They armed for the fight, and fought a mighty battle of doubtful fortune. Finally the forces of Pompey were scattered, and Pompey fled to Alexandria seeking the aid of Ptolemy (Ptholomeo). But he was unwilling (to assist him), killed Pompey, and sent his head and a small ring to Caesar. When Caesar saw this he immediately wept. After the death of Pompey, Caesar was subjected to the secret enmity of Ptolemy, the murderer, and after the capture of Alexandria, Caesar recalled Cleopatra from exile and conferred on her the kingdom. After this he swept over Syria for two years, and defeated Pharnaces, the son of Mithridates, in Pontus. When he returned to Rome he was made a dictator and consul, and crossed over to Africa. Then, with the wars completed, he celebrated a triumph. He returned to Rome, and caused himself to be named emperor; and so ended the rule of the people and of the consuls, which had endured for 464 years. [This text is continued from Folio LXXXVI recto, and this footnote is a continuation of the note there. On his arrival in Egypt Caesar became involved in a war, which gave the remnant of the Pompeian party time to rally. This war, usually called the Alexandrine War, arose from the determination of Caesar that Cleopatra, who had won his heart, should reign in common with her brother Ptolemy; but his decision was opposed by the guardians of the young king, and the war which thus broke out was not brought to a close until the end of March, 47. It was soon after this that Cleopatra had a son by Caesar. Caesar returned to Rome through Syria and Asia Minor and, on his march through Pontus attacked Pharnaces, the son of Mithridates the Great, who had assisted Pompey. He defeated Pharnaces near Zela with such ease that he informed the senate by the words, "Veni, vidi, vici." ("I came, I saw, I conquered.") He reached Rome in September (47), was appointed consul for the following year, and before the end of September set sail for Africa, where Scipio and Cato had collected a large army. The war was terminated by the defeat of the Pompeian army at the battle of Thapsus, on April 6th, 46. Cato, unable to defend Utica, put an end to his own life. Caesar returned to Rome in the latter part of July. He was now the undisputed master of the Roman world, but he used his victory with the greatest moderation. His clemency against his enemies was one of the brightest features of his character. All parties vied with each other in paying him honor. He was made dictator for ten years].

Tullius, surnamed Marcus and Cicero, was a very great philosopher and a prince of orators, and also a consul of the Romans. He was of the Tullian family, which had its origin in Arpinum (Arpinati) and traced its beginning to Tullius, the king of the Volsci. His father was Tullius, and his mother Helvia (Olbia). When he was first able to study, he excelled his fellow students in the greatness of his intelligence. He was first praised for his poetry, of which he wrote several books. With the passing years he fell in love with the art of rhetoric, which was better suited to his nature. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. After he had mastered the studies of his youth, he devoted himself to the study of philosophy and civil law. Then he fought under Sulla (Sylla) in the Marian War. Then he became a master builder; and afterwards, with the help of the Roman people, he was made praetor. Later still he was elected a consul with C. Antonius, son of the orator M. Antonius. He discharged his duties as consul so gloriously that he was called the father of his country. He explained the ideas of philosophy that previously were unknown to our books; and by virtue of the enlightened subtlety of his intelligence he wrote very many things. From his wife Terentia he had Tulliola (his daughter) and Marcus, his son. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. At last the famous orator was killed in the 64th year of his life by Antony through the agency of his supporters on the pretext of securing unity with Octavian; nevertheless, his enemies passed away disgracefully. [Marcus Tullius Cicero was born January 3rd, 106 BCE, of M. Tullius and his wife, Helvia, at the family residence in the vicinity of Arpinum. He and his brother Quintus displayed such aptitude for learning that his father sent them to Rome, where they received instruction from the best teachers in the capital. After receiving the manly gown (91), the young Marcus was placed under the care of Q. Mucius Scaevola, the augur, from whom he learned the principles of jurisprudence. In 89 he served his first and only campaign under Cn. Pompeius Strabo in the Social War. During the civil wars between Marius and Sulla, Cicero did not identify himself with either party, but devoted himself to the study of law, philosophy, and rhetoric. Having carefully cultivated his powers, Cicero came forward as a pleader in the forum, as soon as tranquility was restored in the final overthrow of the Marian party. He defended many notable causes, but fearing the resentment of Sulla, he retired to Greece, ostensibly for the improvement of his health, which was very delicate. From Athens he went to Asia Minor, receiving instruction from the most celebrated rhetoricians in the Greek cities of Asia. From there he went to Rhodes. After an absence of two years, he returned to Rome, his health improved, and his rhetorical powers greatly enhanced. He obtained great distinction in the forum as an orator, and thus he paved his way to the high offices of state. In 75, he was quaestor in Sicily; in 74 he returned to Rome, and for four years was engaged in pleading causes. In 69, he was praetor. Two years later he was elected consul with C. Antonius as a colleague. Although he favored the popular party up to this time, he now allied himself with the aristocracy. He crushed Cataline, the conspirator, and for this service received the highest honors, was addressed as "father of his country," and thanksgivings in his name were voted to the gods. When he laid down the consulship, the tide turned against him. The friends of the conspirators accused him of putting Roman citizens to death without the vote of the whole people assembled in the comitia. The people, whose cause he had deserted, showed signs of resentment. He mortally offended Clodius by bearing witness against him, and Clodius vowed vengeance. The triumvirs, Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus, left Cicero to his fate. Cicero retired from Rome into Greece. He gave himself over to despair. But his friends at Rome had not deserted him, and over the opposition of Clodius, he was recalled from banishment. In 57, Cicero returned to Rome and was received with honor. But he retired to a great extent from public life. He was sent to Cilicia as governor, returning to Rome in 49, just as the civil war between Caesar and Pompey broke out. He threw his lot with Pompey and crossed over to Greece. At the battle of Pharsalia (48), Cicero abandoned the Pompeian party and returned to Brundisium, where he lived in the greatest anxiety for many months, dreading Caesar; but when the latter landed at Brundisium he greeted Cicero with kindness and respect, and allowed him to return to Rome. Cicero now retired into privacy and composed the greater part of his philosophical and rhetorical works. The murder of Caesar in 44 again brought Cicero into public life. He put himself at the head of the republican party, and attacked M. Antony with unmeasured vehemence. On the formation of the triumvirate between Octavian, Antony and Lepidus in 43, Cicero's name was in the list of the proscribed. Cicero tried to escape but was overtaken, his head and hands cut off and taken to Rome, and by orders of Antony, were nailed to the Rostra. He perished December 7th, 43, in his 64th year].

Catiline, born of a noble family, was strong of mind and body, but had a depraved intelligence. From youth he loved civil wars, destruction, robbery and internal strife. And in those things he employed his youth; for in his mind he was bold, subtle, ever changing and a treacherous deceiver in all things. And inasmuch as he was a most evil and greedy man, and a leader of criminal activities, he sought to surround himself with companions of the same disposition. With the help and counsel of such associates, the disgraceful Catiline himself conceived a plan to overthrow the Republic. When it was his very great hope of obtaining the consulship, he attempted a dangerous conspiracy against the Republic when Marcus Tullius Cicero was consul. After the disclosure of this conspiracy and when the names of the conspirators were known, Lentulus, born of the very famous family of the Corneli, abdicated from the senate during his first magistracy. Then Cethegus, Statilius, Gabinius (Gabinus), and Coeparius (Ceparius), men of senatorial rank, were sent to prison by decree of the senate. And at once, with Lentulus himself, they were all strangled with a noose. [For this last sentence and the one that precedes it, the German edition of the simply states: "Some of them, who were members of the senate, were apprehended, taken to prison, and there strangled."] When the news reached Catiline, he decided to flee beyond the Alps. When this became known, and as Antonius was pursuing him with his legions, he stabbed himself in the midst of the battling legions; and thus the Republic was saved by Cicero's virtue from great disaster. [See Note on L. Sergius Catilina (Catiline) Folio LXXXVI recto].

Cato the Elder, the great-grandson of Cato the Former, shared his name. Marcus Porcius Cato was a Stoic philosopher whom some men call Uticensis because he died at Utica. He was a very highly educated man, and he was so fired by his zeal for learning that even in the senate house while the senate was in session he could not restrain from reading, but actually was reading eagerly Greek books. By such diligence he showed that some lack time, while others are superior to times.

Compare the chronicler's text to his source, Valerius Maximus (who gets his own mini-biography on Folio XCIII verso), Factorum et Dictorum Memorabilium Libri Novem ('Nine Books of Memorable Deeds and Sayings') VIII.7.2:

Cuius mirifica proles, propior aetati nostrae Cato, ita doctrinae cupiditate flagravat ut ne in curia quidem, dum senatus cogitur, temperaret sibi quo minus Graecos libros lectitaret. Qua quidem industria ostendit aliis tempora deesse, alios superesse temporibus. His (Cato the Elder's) marvelous progeny, a Cato nearer to our own time, was so aflame with desire for learning that even in the senate house, while the members were assembling, he did not refrain from reading Greek books. By such diligence he showed that some lack time, whereas others are superior to times.

D. R. Shackleton Bailey, Valerius Maximus, Vol. II; Loeb Classical Library, 2000; p. 225

Shackleton Bailey has a note on the last word, 'times' (tempora, temporibus), that reads (p. 224): "The text has been questioned. Is there a play on two senses of tempora, time and circumstances?"

He taught that the Republic was better guarded by virtue than by weapons, saying: Do not assume that our ancestors made their state from small to great by means of arms; for if that had been true, we would have a greater one; for we also aspire to greater power, and have more allies, citizens, weapons and horses than they had. The more he fled from human glory, the more glory pursued him. And among the other aspects of his virtue he composed a book with his own rational explanations as an ethical and moral guide for the instruction of human life, from which (as they say) is that little book in meter which has been excerpted and is read to children. Among his thoughts was this one worthy of memory: Human life is especially like iron; because if it is used it is worn out; but when not used it is consumed by rust. He killed himself (as Augustine says), because he could not endure the victory of Caesar, and did not wish to submit to him. [M. Cato, great grandson of Cato the Censor, and surnamed Uticensis, from Utica, the place of his death, was born in 95 BCE. In early childhood he lost both his parents and was brought up in the house of his mother's brother, M. Livius Drusus. In his youth he revealed a stern and unyielding character, and applied himself with great zeal to the study of oratory and philosophy, and became a devoted adherent of the Stoic school. He was conspicuous for his rigid morality. In 63, he was tribune of the plebs, and supported Cicero against Cataline. He became one of the chief leaders of the aristocratic party, and an opponent of the measures of Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus. But all his efforts were in vain, and he was rejected as a candidate for the praetorship. On the breaking out of civil war in 49, he was entrusted as propraetor with the defense of Sicily; but on the landing of Curio with an overwhelming force, he abandoned the island and joined Pompey in Greece. After Pompey's victory at Dyrrachium, Cato was left in charge of the camp, and thus was not present at the battle of Pharsalia in 48. After this battle he set sail for Corcyra, and from there crossed over to Africa, where he joined Metellus Scipio, after a terrible march across the desert. The army wished to be led by Cato, but he yielded to Scipio. In opposition to the advice of Cato, Scipio fought with Caesar at Thapsus, and was utterly defeated. All Africa now submitted to Caesar, except Utica, where Cato wanted the Romans to resist; but when he saw that they were inclined to submit, he resolved to die rather than fall into the hands of the conqueror. He stabbed himself and died at the age of 49].

Folio LXXXIX verso

Antipater, a son of Aristobulus, and Crispus his wife had four sons and a daughter. He was accused by Antigonos before Julius Caesar. Exposing his wounds that were covered by his clothes, he revealed that fidelity is not to be proven by words, but by scars. Immediately after that he was declared governor of Judea. After this he appointed his eldest son Phasael (Faselus) governor of Jerusalem under him; and Herod he appointed governor of Galilee. [Antipater was the son of a noble Idumaeon of the same name, although the chronicler calls him Aristobulus. He had a brother of the latter name against whom he espoused the cause of Hyrcanus. Antipater ingratiated himself with the Romans and in 47 BCE he was appointed procurator of Judea by Caesar; which appointment he held until 43, when he was killed by poison, which Malichus, whose life he had twice saved, bribed the cup-bearer of Hyrcanus to administer to him. Antipater's father was apparently the first governor of Idumaea (Greek for Edom), originally the territory east of the Jordan-Arabah valley, and south of the land of Moab. It was originally inhabited by the Horites. They were partly destroyed and partly absorbed by the Bedouin tribes, who claimed descent through Esau from Abraham, and whom the Israelites acknowledged as brethren. They were governed by sheiks. After the fall of Babylon the pressure of the desert Arabs forced the Edomites across the Jordan-Arabah valley, and the people and name were extended westward. Hebron was in Idumaea. Herod's family was by origin Idumaeon].

Ptolemy Dionysius, the 12th king of the Egyptians, reigned 30 years. Pompey went to him in order to get aid from him. Because of the tenderness of his age, the Roman senate had appointed him (Pompey) his (Ptolemy's) tutor, but being a very ungrateful man, he (Ptolemy) killed Pompey. After Pompey's death Caesar proceeded to Alexandria, where he was subjected to the enmity of Ptolemy the murderous traitor, who unexpectedly besieged him; but Caesar fled on a small vessel which, however, sank under the burden of his followers. With an upraised hand, in which he held a letter, he swam two hundred paces to a larger vessel. Not long after that he won a naval battle over the royal navy; but Ptolemy, who escaped, again waged war against Caesar; but his entire force was destroyed. The king had boarded a small vessel on which he had hoped to escape, but was drowned. His body, identified by his breastplate inlaid with gold, was found on the shore. And thus Caesar captured Alexandria. He recalled from exile Cleopatra, the sister of Ptolemy, and gave her the kingdom. She later came to the city (i.e. Rome) in the royal train. []

Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, was a daughter of Dionysius Auletes [Ptolemy XI. Philopater Philadelphus Neos Dionysus (80-51 BCE), nicknamed Auletes ('the flute-player'), was the illegitimate son of Soter II, and was chosen king by the Alexandrian people. The rights of these kings were doubtful, not only because of their illegitimacy, but because it was claimed in Rome that Alexander II had bequeathed his kingdom to the Roman people. Ptolemy Auletes was thus obliged to spend his reign in buying the support of the men in power in Rome. From 58 to 55, Auletes was in exile, driven out by popular hatred, and worked by bribery and murder in Rome to get himself restored to Roman power. His daughter Bernice meanwhile reigned in Alexandria, a husband being found for her in the Pontic prince Archelaus. In 55, Auletes was restored by Aulus Gabinus, proconsul of Syria. He killed Bernice and, dying in 51, bequeathed the kingdom to his eldest son, aged ten years, who was to take as wife his sister Cleopatra, aged seventeen], whom the Alexandrians expelled on account of his crimes. After the death of her brother, Caesar made her queen. After the death of Caesar and the events that took place at Philippi, Anthony proceeded to Asia, and he showed the queen the greatest honors so that he too her as his wife and had sons by her. Both were in the Attic War [There is no Attic War except in Greek mythology (where the Amazons do battle with Theseus and the Athenians in Attica, Greece). The chronicler is referring to the Battle of Actium (31 BCE)], and both fled. Finally they were defeated by Augustus. At the city of Nicopolis, Augustus forced Anthony to take his own life and ordered Cleopatra taken into custody. Not long afterwards she died in shackles in the sepulcher of her husband Antony from the bite of a serpent she had secretly gotten hold of. She was a very beautiful and eloquent woman, but greedy, cruel and and universally known for her licentiousness. And thus the Egyptian kingdom came to an end, having endured for 306 years under thirteen kings. And Augustus calmed raging Egypt. [Cleopatra VII (69-30 BCE) was the eldest daughter of Ptolemy Auletes. Her father died when she was seventeen, leaving the kingdom to her and her younger brother Ptolemy, whom she was to marry. She was expelled from the throne by his guardians and retreated into Syria, collecting an army with which she was preparing to enter Egypt when Caesar arrived there in pursuit of Pompey. Her charms gained her support of Caesar, who placed her on the throne with his brother. This led to the Alexandrine War in which Ptolemy perished. Although this left Cleopatra the sole ruler, Caesar associated her with another brother of the same name who was still a child and to whom she was nominally married. She had a son by Caesar and followed Caesar to Rome, where she appears to have been at the time of his death in 44. She returned to Egypt, and in the year 41 met Anthony who became her devoted lover and slave. She accompanied Anthony in the war with Octavian, and was present at the battle of Actium in which she retreated with her fleet, hastening Anthony's defeat. She then attempted to win over Augustus, but having failed, and seeing that he was about to carry her to Rome as a captive, she ended her life at the age of thirty-nine in the year 30 BCE].

Herod, son of Antipater, received the kingdom of Judea from the Romans, and he reigned 37 years. Antipater, during the time of Sabinus, the governor of Syria, was a man so renowned for his virtues that he merited a royal mate, and married a woman of royal Arabian blood. Of her there were born to him four sons, namely, Phasael (Phaselus), Herod, surnamed Ascalonitas, Joseph (Josippus) and Pheroras (Feroas); and a single daughter named Salome. Afterwards he was destroyed by poison and Phasael, his first born, was slain. But Herod fled to Antony, and was soon afterwards crowned king of Judea. In addition to this Augustus gave him Trachonitis [Trachonitis, or Trachon, is the northern district of Palestine beyond Jordan, and lies between Antilibanus and the mountains of Arabia. It was bounded on the north by the territory of Damascus, on the east by Aurenitis, and on the south by Ituraea. Gaulanitis lay to the west of it. Trachonitis was for the most part a sandy desert, intercepted by mountains where caves gave refuge to murderous bands of robbers]. (Traconitidem) and Ituraea [Ituraea, or Ityraea, is a district on the northeast borders of Palestine. It is bounded on the north by the plain of Damascus, on the southwest and south by Gaulantis, and on the east by Aurenitis and Trachonitis. It was inhabited by Arabian people of warlike and predatory habits, which they exercised upon the caravans from Arabia to Damascus, whose great road lay through this country. Augustus gave Ituraea, which had been hitherto ruled by native princes, to the family of Herod. It was a country of open villages and tents, set up according to the Arab fashion of living]. (Ituream), and the whole region by the sea. At Ascalon [Ascalon was one of the chief cities of the Philistines, and is situated on the coast of Palestine between Azotas and Gaza]. he built a royal residence; and after this he was called Ascalonitas. By birth through his father he was an Idumaeon, and by his mother, an Arabian. As the birth of Christ our Lord approached, the kingdom and the priesthood of Judea declined in the course of its passage from one heir to another; and so the prophecy of Moses was fulfilled, which was to the effect that there would be no end to the princes of Judea until he comes of whom it is beholden; and he will be the expectation of nations. [] Now when Herod had received the kingdom, he built Samaria from the ground up; and he called it Augusta in honor of Caesar Augustus. Against the wishes of the Jews, he placed a golden eagle over the gate of the Temple. And he also made the Herodion in which he is buried. The Temple he adorned most magnificently. Finally, in year 26 he slew Hyrcanus, the high priest, and his son who was to have succeeded him in the priesthood. And he did the same thing to his own sister, his wife and her two young sons, and his mother. He also murdered his sister Salome's husband, and married her to another. And him he also killed. And with a similar crime he murdered all the scribes and the interpreters of the divine law. And finally, when this most murderous man learned of the birth of Christ through the three kings, he caused all the boys at Bethlehem to be slain with swords. However, he was soon visited with a serious sickness, in consequence of which worms issued from his entire body; and thus he gave up his miserable soul. Five sons survived him, namely, Archelaus, Herod Antipas, Antipater, Lysanias, and Philip. Of these, four each, as the gospel says, received a share in the kingdom.

Antipater, the governor of Idumaea, was the father of this Antipater, the procurator of Judea, who married Cryspos (Cypros), an Arabian woman by whom he had four sons and a daughter: Phasael, Herod the Great, Joseph, Pheroras, and Salome. Phasael (Phaselus) died in captivity in 40 BCE. Herod the Great, second son, was married five times and there was issue of each marriage as follows:

1. Doris, by whom he begot Antipater, who was put to death in 4 BCE.
2. Mariamne (granddaughter of Hyrcanus II), by whom Herod the Great begot:
 1. Aristobulus, who married Bernice (daughter of Salome) and was put to death 6 BCE. Of this marriage were born:
 1. Herod Agrippa, who married Cypros, daughter of Phasael and Salampsio, and died in 44 CE. Of this marriage were born: (a) Herod Agrippa II, king of Chalcis, who died in 86 or 90 CE; (b) Mariamne; (c) Berenice, who married Herod, king of Chalcis, and later Polemon, king of Pontus; (d) Drusilla, wife, firstly of Azizus, king of Emesa, and secondly, Felix, by whom she bore Agrippa (who died in 79 CE); and (e) Drusus, who died young.
 2. Herodias, who married firstly Herod Philip, and secondly, Herod Antipas.
 3. Aristobulus, who married Jotape, princess of Emesa.
 4. Herod, king of Chalcis.
 2. Alexander, who married Glaphyra, daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, and was put to death in 6 BCE. Of this marriage were born:
 1. Alexander
 2. Tigranes, king of Armenia
 3. Salampsio, who married Phasael, her cousin.
 4. Cypros, who married Antipater, the son of Salome.
3. Mariamne (daughter of Simon the high-priest), of whose marriage to Herod the Great was born Herod Phillip, who married Herodias, but who divorced him. Of this latter marriage a Salome was born.
4. Malthace, a Samaritan who bore Herod the Great the following:
 1. Archelaus, king of Judea, deposed in 4 BCE and died in exile. He was married to Glaphyra, widow of Alexander.
 2. Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee and Persaea, who died in exile. He was married to Herodias, wife of Herod Philip.
5. Cleopatra (of Jerusalem), last wife of Herod the Great, who begot Phillip, tetrarch of Ituraea.

Folio LXXXIX verso and XC recto

THE GENEALOGY OF THE FAMILY OF HEROD

This woodcut covers the major portions of Folios LXXXIX verso and XC recto, and is one of the best woodcuts of its kind in the Chronicle. It may be analyzed as follows:

1. Antipater and his wife Cypros (Crispis), from whom emanate two main branches of descent.
2. The first or left main branch bears four of the five children of Antipater, namely: Pheroras (Feroas), Joseph (Josypus), Phasael (Phaselus), and Salome (Saloma), the only daughter. Antipater and these four children are confined to that portion of the woodcut which occupies Folio LXXXIX verso. And now we are to account for Antipater's second son, Herod the Great.
3. The second or right hand branch proceeds to Herod the Great (Herodes Ascalonita), who with drawn sword appears in medieval armor at the top of Folio XC recto, in the company of four of his five wives, namely Doris (Dosis), the first Mariamne (Mariane, granddaughter of Hyrcanus II); Malthace (Mathata), and Cleopatra. The second Mariamne (daughter of Simon the high priest) is not shown.
4. From each of the four wives of Herod shown in the woodcut issue proceeds as follows:
 1. From Doris (Dosis), a branch to her son Antipater.
 2. From Mariamne (Mariane), second wife of Herod, a branch proceeds to her her sons Alexander and Aristobulus (who is shown with his wife); but her two daughters Salampsio and Cypros are omitted. From this Aristobulus and wife a branch proceeds to their son Herod Agrippa (and his wife) and Herodias, wife of Philip. From Herod Agrippa and wife proceeds one son, Agrippa (II). In this branch Aristobulus (who married the princess of Emesa), and Herod, king of Chalcis (both children of Herod the Great by the first Mariamne), are not shown.
 3. The second Mariamne, Herod's third wife, is not shown, as already stated, nor is her son Herod Philip, who married Herodias.
 4. From Malthace (Mathata) a branch proceeds to Archelaus. Herod Antipas and Olympias, the remaining children of this marriage, are not shown on this branch.
 5. From Cleopatra, last wife of Herod the Great, a branch proceeds bearing her son Philip (Philippus), and Herod Antipas, the latter of whom should have been credited to Herod's fourth wife, Malthace.

Agrippa Colonia (Cologne), which is situated on the left bank of the Rhine, is highly renowned for its location, its river and its people. Some say it was called Agrippina, but now is called Colonia. It is a city of rich fields in Lower Germany situated next to the banks of the Rhine. According to Sicardus Cremonensis it was founded by and named after Colonus, a Trojan, in the time of the Trojan Aeneas. After the people called the Ubii [The Ubii were German people who originally dwelt on the right bank of the Rhine, but were transported across the river by Agrippa in 37 BCE, at their own request, to escape the hostilities of the Suevi. They took the name of Agrippensis, from their town Colonia Agrippina]. were driven out by the Suevi (Swabians), the city was built up and taxed by command of Claudius, the Roman emperor, who was the husband of Agrippina. He called the city Agrippa after his wife's family. And so the people called the Ubii began to live there. However, the real and creditable writers of history say that M. Agrippa was the founder of the city. And although he constructed many buildings in the city as well as on the outside, he regarded this city as the most worthy of them all, and gave it his name. He was considered an excellent and worthy master-builder and warrior. The emperor Augustus selected him from the entire world for his beloved, and only, and revered daughter. He set this very wealthy city against Trier with the intent to suppress and to eliminate the enmity and dissensions of the Gauls. Long afterwards Hilderic (probably Childeric), the king of the Franks, drove Egidius, the friend and ally of Rome, out of the city, and settled Frenchmen there. After this colonization he gave the city the Latin name of Colonia. Some say the city was a Roman colony. While it was an ally of Rome it was consumed by a destructive fire. It had a Capitol building and other structures, in the Roman manner, of which a few are still at hand. It had a Capitol of the same construction as that of the Romans, except that in place of the senate there (i.e. in Rome) that debates councils of peace and war, here (i.e. in Cologne) highly renowned youths and maidens, in eternal unity, sang nightly praises to God. There (Rome) is the shrieking sound of wheels and weapons and the groans of captive men. Here is quiet and the voices of those who are joyful and telling jokes. And, finally, in that place (Rome) marches war, and in this place (Cologne) marches the triumphant bringer of peace. [This sentence and the two that precede it are not in the German edition of the chronicle, and are only slightly modified versions of sentences from Petarch's 1333 letter to Cardinal John Columna in (see note on Colonia Agrippina below)]. In the midst of the city one sees the most beautiful, though incomplete, temple, which they called the Highest. Here lie also the bodies of the Three Holy Kings, brought there in three stages from east to west. And, as we read, they honored the Heavenly King in the manger with gifts. This is a free and archepiscopal capital city. The archbishop is an elector of the Holy Roman Empire, having a vote in the choice of the Roman emperor. Many persons flourished there in the arts and in holiness, such as Saint Severinus, himself a bishop there; and Albertus Magnus, whose body lies with the Order of the Preachers; also here ended their lives fifty of the host of Thebes; and Ursula with the 11,000 virgins, and various other persons there earned the crown of martyrdom. Also admirable is how much hope and civic-mindedness are there in that city; and how much seriousness the men possess, and how much elegance the women have. Franciscus Petrarch writes of an old custom of the people of Cologne that was especially observed by the common women. At sundown on the Eve of St. John the Baptist an incredible number of women assemble on the banks of the river; and with sleeves rolled up to their elbows, they immerse pleasant smelling herbs in the water, and put their snowy white hands and arms in it, at the same time throwing all the troubles of the year into the water, so that the river may wash them away and bring back happiness instead. Oh, you more than blessed inhabitants of the Rhine, which washes away and cleanses your shortcomings, something which neither the Danube (Hister) nor the Elbe (Albis) in Upper Germany, nor the Po (Padus) in Italy, nor the Tiber ever has the strength to do. These are rather lazy, sluggish rivers! Near Cologne is a city called Aachen (Aquisgranum) [Aachen (Aix-la-Chapelle)], seat of Charles the Great; and there in a marble temple is a tomb of that prince venerated by the barbarian nations. He ordained that his successors in the rule of the kingdom should accept the crown and sovereignty of the Roman Empire, as still happens today, and will continue to occur as long as the German (Theutonica) nation holds the reins of the Roman Empire.

Colonia Agrippina, or Agrippinensis, is the present site of Cologne (Köln in German), on the Rhine. It was so called after 50 CE, when a Roman colony was planted here by the emperor Claudius, at the request of his wife Agrippina, who was born in the place, and after whom the colony was named. Before this colonization the site was called Oppidum Ubiorum, 'the town of the Ubii.' It rose to be the chief town of Germania Secunda, and had the privilege of the Ius Italicum. About 330, the city was taken by the Franks, but was not permanently occupied by them until the fifth century, becoming in 475 the residence of the Frankish king Childeric. Counts of Cologne are mentioned in the ninth century. The city still contains remnants of Roman occupation, such as the wall, the ancient gate, etc. The great cathedral or Dom stands on the site of a church begun in the ninth century by Hildebold, metropolitan of Cologne, and finished under Willibert in 873. This structure was ruined by the Normans, was rebuilt, but destroyed by fire in 1248. The foundation of the present cathedral was then laid, and in 1322 the new choir was consecrated. After the death of Conrad of Hochstaden (archbishop from 1238 to 1261), who laid the foundation of the present cathedral, the work of building advanced but slowly, and the structure was not completed until the nineteenth century. It contains the shrine of the Magi. The greatness of Cologne was founded on her trade. Wine and herrings were the chief articles of her commerce; but her goldsmiths, armorers, and weavers were famous, and exports of cloth were large.

When, in 1201, Cologne joined the Hanseatic League, its power and repute were so great that it was made the chief place of a third of the confederation.

The expulsion of the Jews in 1414, and still more the exclusion of the Protestants from citizenship and magistracy, deeply affected the prosperity of Cologne. New trade routes, the decay of guilds, and many prolonged periods of warfare further contributed to its decay; and when, in 1794, Cologne was occupied by the French, it was a poor city of about 40,000 inhabitants, of whom only 6,000 possessed civic rights. With the assignment of the city to Prussia by the Congress of Vienna in 1815, a new era of prosperity began, and this rapidly increased.

The "bones of the Magi" are said to have been brought by the Empress Helena to Constantinople. They were afterwards taken to Milan, and in 1164 presented by Frederick Barbarossa to Archbishop Reinald von Dassel, by whom they were removed to Cologne. The golden reliquary in which they are preserved is now in the Cathedral Treasury. It is a costly specimen of Romanesque work, probably executed in the years 1190-1200. It was seriously damaged in 1794, when carried away for concealment from the French; but it was restored in 1807.

St. Severin, mentioned by the chronicler as bishop of Cologne, is commemorated by the church of his name which stands upon the site of a Christian church built as early as the 4th century. It contains the sarcophagus of St. Severin. The career of Albertus Magnus and the legend of Ursula and her 11,000 virgins are referred to elsewhere in the Chronicle.

Much of this paragraph on Cologne is taken by Schedel from a letter of Petrarch, "Franciscus Petrarca Iohanni Columnae Cardinali salutem plurimam dicit" (Epistolae familiares I, 5 Colonia Agrippina et Lugdunum (1333)).

L. Pomponius, historian and orator, and writer of attelane farce, was (according to Eusebius) held in high esteem at this time. He wrote a little book of geography in which he calculated the distances between cities. [Schedel has conflated two different men named Pomponius in this very short biography: (1) Lucius Pomponius Bononiensis, the most celebrated writer of attelane farce, who flourished in 91 BCE, and (2) Pomponius Mela, the first Roman author who composed a formal treatise on geography, and who probably flourished under the emperor Claudius (more than a century after Lucius Pomponius Bononiensis!). The German edition of the still (incorrectly) names our author L. Pomponius, but (correctly) removes the reference to him being a writer of attelane farce].

Lenaeus (Leoneus) was a highly educated grammarian and a freedman of Gn. Pompey. At the request of his master he translated into our language (Latin) a number of commentaries on medicine, which Pompey found in the possession of Mithridates after he had defeated him; for Mithridates was interested in medicine, and drew medical knowledge from all his subjects, leaving behind commentaries and examples of these in his own secrets.

Lenaeus, according to Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology (vol. 2, p. 728) was, a freedman of Pompey the Great, whence he is sometimes called Pompeius Lenaeus. He was a native of Athens, possessed great knowledge of natural history, and was acquainted with several languages, in consequence of which Pompey restored him to freedom. (Suetonius. De Illust. Grammat. 2,15; Pliny, H. N. xxv. 2, 3.) He accompanied his patron in nearly all his expeditions (Suet. l. c. 15), and by his command he translated into Latin the work of Mithridates on poisons. (Plin. l. c, comp. xv. 30, 39, xxiv. 9, 41, xxv. 6, 27, and Elench. lib. xiv. xv. xx. xxiii. xxvii.) After the death of Pompey and his sons, Lenaeus maintained himself by keeping a school at Rome, in the Carinae, near the temple of Tellus, the district in which the house of Pompey had been. This fact is a proof not only of his great attachment to the memory of his late master, but also of his not having made use of his friendship with Pompey for the purpose of enriching himself. His affection for Pompey also led him to write a very bitter satire against the historian Sallust, who had spoken of Pompey in an unjust and slanderous manner. Suetonius (l. c. 15) has preserved some of the opprobrious terms in which Lenaeus spoke of Sallust.

The last phrase, "in his own secrets" (in archanis suis) is not in the German edition of the chronicle, probably on account of its obscure meaning.

Agrippa, son-in-law of Octavian, was a builder of exceptional merit. During his career he erected many things at Rome. And, moreover, in his term as aedile, he added to these the Aqua Virgo, and with the channels of the others repaired, he made seven hundred basins. [This sentence, not found in the German edition of the , is taken from Pliny, 36.24.121: Agrippa vero in aedilitate sua, adiecta Virgine aqua, ceterisque conrivatis atque emendatis, lacus septingentos fecit. Pliny, however, is mistaken about the building of the Aqua Virgo aqueduct, which was completed not under the aedileship of Agrippa in 33 BCE, but in 19 BCE]. And the reason for that was, Suetonius writes, that Octavian Augustus, becoming somewhat angry at the Roman people's request for wine, responded: Agrippa, my son-in-law, has introduced so many sources of water and you ask for wine! [] He gave his name and his greatness to Cologne. [Marcus Vipsanius Agrippa (63-12 BCE), under whose protection the Ubii, who were on the east side of the Rhine in Caesar's time, removed to the opposite shore to escape the attacks of their neighbors, the Catti. Agrippa studied with the young Octavian (afterwards the Emperor Augustus) at Apollonia in Illyria; and upon the murder of Caesar in 44, was one of the friends of Octavian who advised him to proceed immediately to Rome. Agrippa took an active part in the civil wars which followed, and which gave Augustus the sovereignty of the Roman world. As a military commander he was successful, and in 37 was made consul. He expended vast sums of money on public works, such as aqueducts, and erected several public buildings. He continued to be employed in various military commands until his death in 12 BCE].

CITY OF COLOGNE

The City of Cologne (Colonia) is depicted by a woodcut that extends across folios XC verso and XCI recto. This woodcut has been specially designed for the Cologne, and appears nowhere else in the Chronicle to represent any other city. This is made certain by the coats of arms suspended from the tower of the fortress on the left. On each of these three shields are inscribed the three crowns, emblematic of the Three Kings of Cologne, and which appear in the arms of the city. Immediately before us swiftly flows the Rhine, upon which rides a medieval craft with a number of people aboard. They are waving farewell to a group of three persons who stand behind the seawall along the bank.

The city itself is represented as a walled town containing a number of churches. The tower of the great Cathedral, or Dom, is shown only to the third story, and the body of the edifice is still in course of construction, as stated in the text. The Cathedral was not completed until the 19th century. This structure became the symbol of the city, and is one of the greatest of all Gothic buildings. It stands on a slight eminence about 60 feet above the Rhine. Its towers, 512 feet in height, were for a long time the tallest structures in Europe.

Folio XCI verso

Augusta Vindelicorum (Augsburg) is a famous and ancient city in upper Germany. Some who believe this city was of ancient origin say that the Swabian people descended from Japheth [Japheth was the son of Noah], who first inhabited this region and there built this city, where one may easily enjoy an abundance of water, a wholesome climate, as well as other things of comfort and necessity. When the Swabians (Suevi) came there and saw that it was a desirable region due to the fact that two very swift rivers, the Wertach (Vinde) and the Lech (Lici) here came together, and that it was a natural stronghold, they first built the city there; and they named it Vindelicum for these two rivers. The same region, as far as the Alps, was formerly called Vindelica. All the mountains to the east and south were occupied by the Rhaeti (Rheti) and the Vindelici, as Strabo states. This same city, according to an ancient custom, they surrounded with a moat. Now since the warlike women, called the Amazons, afterwards entered Europe under their queen Marsepia, and with unusual weapons and implements of war drove the Swabians out of this city, and forced them into the mountains, and laid the city waste (which occurred before the destruction of Troy), it is reckoned that the city existed before Troy, and was built in the time of the exodus of the children of Israel from Egypt, and five hundred fifty years before Rome was built. Some say the city was built by the Trojans. And they chose for themselves the goddess Ziza, whom they believed to be Ceres. After the same goddess the city was named Zizaria. Her temple remained there intact until the time of the Romans, when it fell into ruin. And the city bore the name of a mountain that to this day the inhabitants of Augusta call the Eisenberg. The city was afterwards protected by the Rhaeti and the Vindelici with walls, turrets and other defenses; and it endured much war at the hands of the Romans. These people always loved freedom and therefore held themselves aloof from the Romans. At a later date the Divine Augustus Octavian sent Titus Ennius, the praetor, with the Marcian Legion, and other generals, against them. In this legion Avar Bogudis, the king's son, a youth trained in weapons among the Greeks and Latins, and Varus (Varro), a tribune of the soldiers, became famous. [It is ironic that nothing is known of Avar Bogudis, who became famous in this battle. But see further the note below]. These besieged the city in the late summer with a large force of Romans, and harassed it in many ways. In this storming Avar the Greek was slain, and he was buried in the village of Criechsaueron. The following inscription has been found indicating his origin and his end. The praetor also perished together with his Marcian legion so that few survived that battle who could tell what had taken place. And the destroyed legion gave to the region where the defeat occurred the name that now in the middle of the city is called Perleich. ["Destroyed legion" in Latin is perdita legio. The first two syllables of each Latin word, per and leg, were believed to be the components making up the name Perleich]. Thus it is written. The hill here indicates by its name the Roman disaster where the Marcan Legion at once utterly perished. [This sentence and the one that precedes it are not in the German edition of the chronicle]. Varus (Varro), whom they called Verres, fled over the water, hid himself in the marshes, and gave his name to Lake Vernensee. Afterwards, that consul died miserably. [The entire narrative on the battle of Augsburg by the Marcan Legion may be the most corrupt in the Chronicle (it certainly is in terms of the Fifth Age). The corruption is probably due to a medieval chronicler whose knowledge of the ancient world was, to say the least, shaky at best. Much of Schedel's text seems to follow that of the Auersberg chronicle. The names of the various individuals mentioned in the story (Avar Bogudis, Titus Ennius (or should it be Annius?), and Varus/Varro/Verres) have, at least in terms of the last two, common enough names, but no historical figure known by these names is associated with Augsburg. Although Titus and Ennius/Annius are individually well known, there is no Titus Ennius/Annius that I'm aware of. And despite the fact that there were many Romans named Varus/Varro/Verres, none fought at Augsburg. The only connection here might be the Battle of the Teutoburg Forest, in which the Roman general Varus suffered the complete elimination of three Roman legions under his command in 9 CE. This was possibly the worst defeat suffered by Rome at the height of its empire. Unfortunately, Augsburg and the Teutoburg Forest are in different parts of Germany (Bavaria and Lower Saxony, respectively)]. Suetonius records that Octavian Augustus suffered every serious disgrace and the two disasters, Loliana and Varriana, entirely in no other place than Germany. Varriana was almost a total annihilation, with three legions, the general, emissaries and common allies slain. But three years later after the Varriana disaster Augustus, through Tiberius Nero (while Drusus his brother advanced against the region of the Rhine), defeated the Lechs and destroyed their city. And as the words of Strabo in his fourth book indicate, Caesar Augustus sent three thousand Romans to occupy the city. But Claudius Drusus later built up the city, enlarging it with walls and towers. As the city was taken and enlarged through the initiative of Augustus, it was named Augusta in honor of Augustus Octavian. Horace (Oratius) in his odes makes mention of these wars: So the Vindelici saw Drusus waging war against the Rhaeti (Rethi) under the Alps, for whom it is the custom, descended through all time, to arm their right hands with the Amazonian axe, etc. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle. The citation is from the fourth book of Horace's , 4.17-21, a poem in the style of Pindar written in honor of Augustus' stepson Drusus, who at the age of 23 (in 15 BCE) had brought the eastern Alps under Roman control with the aid of his brother, the future emperor Tiberius. Suetonius states that this praise of his stepsons was the reason why Augustus wanted Horace to publish a fourth book of odes]. The Swabians, who then excelled all others in strength and people, had before that time selected this city as a most secure one, and it remained loyal and true to the Roman empire. Much evidence of its age remains. When the Hungarians (Ungari) swept over Germany and Swabia in the nine hundred and fifty-fourth year of salvation, they besieged Augusta and afflicted the Noricans, Rhaeti, and the Swabians with many disasters. Emperor Otto the first fought many days against them and finally defeated them near Augusta. Also, three princes of the Hungarians were captured by his soldiers and led to him. On account his clemency, he tried to make them slaves. [This sentence and the one preceding it are not in the German edition of the chronicle]. The Swabians, however, against his protestations, had them put to death by hanging. In the same battle died Count Diepolt (Diopoldus), brother of Saint Ulrich (Udalrici) , and Regnibaldus (Regniboldus), his sister's son. Afterwards Saint Ulrich, the bishop, made the city more famous and rebuilt the church of Saint Affra, which one before by Attila and now by the Hungarians (Huni) had been damaged. This city is adorned by a large Episcopal cathedral and by a church in honor of the Blessed Virgin; also with Saint Ulrich's Cloister, of the order of St. Benedict, in which lie the bodies of Saint Ulrich and Simprecht (Simperti), and of the blessed Affra, the martyr. There also many other holy men are held in esteem, whose martyrdom brought credit to Augusta.

Augusta is a name given to a number of towns founded or colonized by Augustus. Augusta Vindelicorum (Augsburg), capital of Vindelicia, or Rhaetia (also spelled Raetia) Secunda, on the Licus (Lech), was colonized by Drusus under Augustus, after the conquest of Rhaeti in 14 BCE. Vindelicia was a Roman province south of the Danube, which separated it from Germany. It was bounded on the west by the territory of the Helvetii in Gaul, on the south by Rhaetia, and on the east by the river Oenus (Inn), which separated it from Noricum, thus corresponding to the northeast part of Switzerland, the southeast of Baden, the south of Wuerttemberg and Bavaria, and the north part of the Tyrol. It was originally part of the province of Rhaetia, and was conquered by Tiberius in the reign of Augustus. Later Rhaetia was divided into two provinces: Rhaetia Prima and Rhaetia Secunda. The latter became Vindelicia. It was drained by the tributaries of the Danube, of which the most important were the Licus (Lech), with its tributaries, the Vindo or Vidro (Wertach), the Isarus (Isar) and Oenus (Inn). The greater part of the Vindelicia was a plain, but the south portion was occupied by the northern slopes of the Alpes Rhaeticae. It derived its name from its chief inhabitants, the Vindelici, a warlike people dwelling in the southern part of the country. Their name is said to have been formed from the two rivers, Vinda and Licus. The Vindelici were a Celtic people, and closely connected with the Rhaeti; with whom they are frequently spoken of by the ancient writers, and along with whom they were subdued by Tiberius. The other tribes in Vindelicia were the Brigantii on Lake Constance, the Licatti on the Lech, and the Breuni in the north of Tyrol, on the Brenner. Augusta Vindelicorum (Augsburg), as already stated, was the chief town of the province, and it was situated at the confluence of the Vindo and the Licus. It was made a Roman colony in 14 BCE, and was the residence of the governor. Together with other towns of Vindelicia, it fell into the hands of the Alemanni in the fourth century, and from this time the population of the country appears to have been entirely Germanized.

The Roman province of Rhaetia lay south of the Danube and was originally distinct from Vindelicia. Toward the end of the first century, however, Vindelicia was added to the province of Rhaetia. When Rhaetia was subdivided, Rhaetia Prima answered for the old province, and Rhaetia Secunda in time was named Vindelicia. They were separated from one another by Lake Constance (Brigantinus Lacus) and the river Oenus (Inn). Rhaetia was a very mountainous country, as the main chain of the Alps ran through the greater part of the province. The Rhaeti are first mentioned by Polybius. They were known as a brave and warlike people, and conducted marauding incursions into Gaul and northern Italy, and were not subdued by the Romans until the reign of Augustus. They offered a brave and desperate resistance against both Drusus and Tiberius, who finally conquered them. Rhaetia then became a Roman province, to which Vindelicia was later added.

The Augsburg of today is a city and Episcopal see in Bavaria, Germany, and chief town of the district of Swabia. It lies on the plateau 1500 feet above the sea, between the Wertach and Lech, which unite below the city. Since the time the Chronicle was written, namely, in 1632, it was besieged and taken by Gustavus Adolphus. The Augsburg Confession, the most important Protestant Statement of belief drawn up at the Reformation, was presented in Latin and German to the emperor Charles V at the Diet of Augsburg, June 25th 1530. It was compiled by Melancthon, but based on articles previously drawn up by Luther. Augsburg was the chief seat of the textile industry in southern Germany, and has bleaching and dye works, while its production of agricultural and industrial machinery and its chemical works are important. According to the chronicler there was a theory that this ancient city was built by the Trojans and that they chose for themselves a goddess named Ziza, as he designates her, and whom they believed to be the Roman goddess Ceres (the Greek goddess Demeter). Undoubtedly the deity to whom the chronicler refers is Cisa, the goddess of the ancient Germans, who, according to middle age tradition was worshipped in Augsburg (ancient Cisariss) and the surrounding country. The chronicler gives the old name of the city as "Zizaria," instead of Cisariss.

The reference to Perlech, and the origin of the name from perdita legio, the lost legion, are both rather indefinite. The chronicler states that Perlech is now in the middle of the city. In explanation it may be said that north of the courthouse in Augsburg rises the "Perlachturm," or "Perlach Tower," a portion of which has survived from the eleventh century. This, perhaps, marks the spot of the victory over the Romans. Its weather vane represents Cisa, the ancient pagan patron goddess of the city of Augsburg.

ILLUSTRATION CITY OF AUGSBURG

The city of Augsburg (Augusta) is depicted in a woodcut that extends over the greater part of two opposite pages. Although specially intended to represent the ancient city of Augsburg, the illustration contains nothing by which it may be identified. In the foreground, one proceeding from the left, the other from the right, are two little streams, creeks, or possibly only a moat, which may be intended for, but can hardly be dignified as the rivers Lech and Wertach, at whose confluence the city was built. The waterfront shows no signs of life, no development, commercial or otherwise. The waters are very shallow, and the shores covered with an abundance of vegetation, consisting chiefly of bulbous trees and shrubs, all of the same mold. The general terrain would seem to be correct, for Augsburg does lie on a hill. The city is surrounded by an unusually well fortified wall, which fairly bristles with towers and turrets; and there are large military towers within the city which vie with numerous church steeples, almost all of the same type. But how are we to identify the great cathedral, with its two Romanesque towers, dating from the tenth century? The woodcutters have often introduced church towers in pairs, but not so here. And which is the church of St. Affra founded by Ulrich (1474-1500), so finely proportioned, with its 300 ft. tower? And where are the broad streets of which this community has boasted for centuries. We look in vain! Just another stock medieval city!

Folio XCII verso

Three suns arose in the East on the second day after the death of Julius Caesar. From time to time these drew together into one body, indicating that the rule of Lucius Antonius, Mark Antony, and Augustus were about to be consolidated into a single sovereignty, or, which is more likely, that the future acknowledgement of the Trinity and of the one God of the entire world was imminent. At this time in a suburb of Rome an ox spoke to a ploughman, and told him that he labored in vain and to no purpose for shortly there would be fewer people than crops.

In Egypt the most celebrated library of any city on earth, containing 40,000 books, was destroyed by fire. There were the labors of the ancients in the collection of highly esteemed works. For Aristotle had left his library and the Academy to Theophrastus; and according to Strabo he was the first collector of books, and had taught the kings of Egypt the ordering of a library. Afterwards Theophrastus turned the library over to Neleus, who carried it to Scepsis, by whom it was turned over to unconcerned and ignorant people who kept it locked up. Ptolemy Philadelphus also collected a great number of books; and, as Seneca hands down: 40,000 volumes were burned at Alexandria, a very beautiful monument of royal opulence. So too Livy, who said that it was a work of elegant concern and of eminent kings. That was not elegant or a concern, but learned luxury. On the contrary, it was not learned luxury at all since they collected books not for study but for show. Just as many people, ignorant even of the texts of slaves, collect books not as tools for study but as ornaments of the dining room.

Under the care of the Ptolemies, Alexandria, as the capital of the great kingdom of Egypt and of the most fertile country on earth, and commanding by its position all the commerce of Europe with the East, became the most wealthy and splendid city of the known world. Greeks, Jews and other foreigners flocked to it, and its population probably amounted to three quarters of a million. But a still greater distinction was conferred upon it through the foundation by the first two Ptolemies of the Museum, an establishment in which men devoted to literature were maintained at the public cost, and of the Library which contained 90,000 distinct works and 400,000 volumes, and the increase of which made it necessary to establish another library in the Serapeum (Temple of Serapis) which reached 40,000 volumes, but which was destroyed by the bishop Theophilus at the time of the general overthrow of the pagan temples under Theodosius in 389 CE. The Great Library suffered severely by fire when Julius Caesar was besieged at Alexandria and was finally destroyed by Amrou, the lieutenant of the Caliph Omar in 651 CE. These institutions made Alexandria the chief center of literary activity.

Neleus of Scepsis was a disciple of Aristotle and Theophrastus, the latter of whom bequeathed to him his library and appointed him one of his executors. According to a story current in antiquity, Aristotle bequeathed his library and manuscripts to Theophrastus, his successor in the Academy. On the death of Theophrastus, the libraries and manuscripts are said to have come into the hands of his relative and disciple Neleus of Scepsis. Neleus sold both libraries to Ptolemy II, king of Egypt, for the Alexandrian library; but he retained for himself as an heirloom the original manuscripts of the works of these two philosophers. The descendants of Neleus, who were subjects of the king of Pergamum, knew of no other way of securing them from the search of the Attali, who wished to rival the Ptolemies in forming a large library, than concealing them in a cellar, where for a couple of centuries they were exposed to the ravages of damp and worms. Not until the beginning of the first century BCE did a wealthy book collector, the Athenian Apellicon of Teos, discover these valuable texts, bought them from the ignorant heirs, and prepared from them a new edition of Aristotle's works. After the capture of Athens, Sulla conveyed Apellicon's library to Rome in 64 BCE.

The last third of this paragraph, from 'So too Livy,....' to the end, are not in the German edition of the chronicle. They are a slightly abridged version of Seneca, De Tranquillitate Animi ('On the Tranquility of the Mind') 9.5:

Quadraginta milia librorum Alexandriae arserunt; pulcherrimum regiae opulentiae monimentum alius laudaverit, sicut T. Livius, qui elegantiae regum curaeque egregium id opus ait fuisse. Non fuit elegantia illud aut cura, sed studiosa luxuria, immo ne studiosa quidem, quoniam non in studium sed in spectaculum comparaverant, sicut plerisque ignaris etiam puerilium litterarum libri non studiorum instrumenta sed cenationum ornamenta sunt.

Forty thousand books were burned at Alexandria; let someone else praise this library as the most noble monument to the wealth of kings, as did Titus Livius, who says that it was the most distinguished achievement of the good taste and solicitude of kings. There was no 'good taste' or 'solicitude' about it, but only learned luxury -- nay, not even 'learned,' since they had collected the books, not for the sake of learning, but to make a show, just as many who lack even a child's knowledge of letters use books, not as the tools of learning, but as decorations for the dining-room.

Sallust (Sallustius), a Roman historian and philosopher, an imitator of Cicero, was famous at Rome; and in the nobility of truth he was a distinguished historian. He wrote celebrated books on the Catilinarian War and also on the Jugurthine War. He also wrote some letters. [Sallust (Sallustius Crispus, or Salustius), the Roman historian, was born in 86 BCE, at Amiternum, in the country of the Sabines. He held several public offices. In the year 50, Sallust was expelled from the senate by the censors, probably because he belonged to Caesar's party, though some give another reason. In the civil war he followed Caesar's fortune. In 47 we find him praetor elect, by obtaining which dignity he was restored to his rank. He accompanied Caesar in the African War, and was left by Caesar as the governor of Numidia, in which capacity it is said, he oppressed the people and enriched himself by unjust means. He retired to private life after his return from Africa, and passed quietly through the troublesome period of Caesar's death. He died in 34, about four years before the battle of Actium. It was probably not until his return from Africa that he wrote his historical works. His or is a history of the conspiracy of Catiline, during the consulship of Cicero, 63. The or contains the history of the war of the Romans against Jugurtha, king of Numidia. Sallust was a decided partisan of Caesar from the first, and it was to him that he owed such political advancement as he attained. His account of the Catiline conspiracy and of the Jugurthine War have come down to us complete, together with fragments of his larger and most important work (), a history of Rome from 78-67, intended as a continuation of the work of L. Cornelius Sisenna. In the Catiline conspiracy he adopts the usually accepted view of Catiline, describing him as the deliberate foe of law, order and morality. Catiline, it must be remembered, had supported the party of Sulla, to which Sallust was opposed. He is careful to clear Caesar of complicity and on the whole he is not unfair towards Cicero. His , though interesting, is not satisfactory, -- too much moralizing about the feebleness of the senate and aristocracy. As a military history it is unsatisfactory in geographical and chronological details, though vivid in the depicting of character and scenery].

Marcus Varro, a native of Atace in the province of Narbonensis, was held in great esteem at Rome; for he was a highly educated man of keen intellect and experience in all the ways of the world. At the age of 35 he studied Greek with great industry. He was a very learned man and wrote so much that we would hardly think it possible to read all he wrote. As Isidorus states, he wrote innumerable books of which 413 were venerated among the ancients, and which he divided into divine and human topics [This last phrase is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. In addition, he wrote a book about the Latin language, and a book about morality [The first two clauses of this sentence are replaced in the German edition of the with the phrase "and he also wrote many other books."], from which we find this thought: The friends of the rich are the chaff among the grain. He said, If you wish to test a friend, become utterly miserable. He also wrote a book about the veneration of the gods. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. He lived 90 years. [Varro was a celebrated writer, whose vast and varied erudition in almost every breath of literature, earned him the title of the "most learned of the Romans." He was born in 116 BCE. He held a high naval command in the wars against the pirates and Mithridates, and later served as the legatus of Pompey in Spain in the civil war, but was compelled to surrender his forces to Caesar. He then passed over into Greece and shared the fortunes of the Pompeian party till after the battle of Pharsalia, when he sued for and obtained the forgiveness of Caesar, who employed him in superintending the collection and arrangement of the great library designed for the public use. For some years Varro remained in literary seclusion, passing his time chiefly at his country seats in study and in composition. Upon the formation of the second triumvirate, his name appeared upon the list of the proscribed, but he managed to make his escape, and after a period of concealment, obtained the protection of Octavian. He spent the remainder of his days in tranquility, pursuing his favorite studies, although his magnificent library had been destroyed, a loss to him irreparable. He died in 28, at the age of 89. Varro was not only the most learned, but also the most prolific of Roman writers. He composed no less than 490 books, of which only two have come down to us].

Virgilius (Virgil) Maro, a prince of poets, a Mantuan by birth, was born of humble parents on the 15th day of October, under Cn. Pompeius Magnus, and M. Licinius Crassus, the Roman consuls, in a village called Andes (Pietola), which is not far from Mantua. His mother Maia dreamed that she bore a laurel branch, an absolutely clear expectation of a happy birth. He spent his younger days at Cremona. When he became of age he journeyed to Milan, and not long after that he went to Naples. After having seriously and industriously applied himself to the study of Greek and Latin, he eagerly studied medicine and mathematics. When he had become more knowledgeable and experienced in these matters than others, he journeyed to the city (i.e., Rome). There he was received by the emperor Augustus and recommended to Pollio.

C. Asinius Pollio was a distinguished orator, poet and historian of the Augustan age. On the breaking out of the civil war he joined Caesar, and in 49 accompanied Curio to Africa. After the latter's defeat and death, he crossed over to Greece, and fought on Caesar's side at Pharsalia in 48. He accompanied Caesar on his campaigns against the Pompeian party in Africa and Spain. He returned with Caesar to Rome, but was shortly afterward sent back to Spain to prosecute the war against Sex. Pompey. He was there at the time of Caesar's death. He took no part in the war between Antony and the senate; but when Antony was joined by Lepidus and Octavian in 43, Pollio espoused their cause, and persuaded L. Plancus in Gaul to follow his example. In the division of the provinces among the triumvirs, Antony received the Gauls. The administration of Transpadane Gaul was committed to Pollio by Antony. It was on this occasion that he saved the property of the poet Virgil at Mantua from confiscation, when he took him under his protection through his love of literature. In the year 40, Pollio took an active part in effecting a reconciliation between Antony and Octavian. After further military campaigns he withdrew from political life and devoted himself to literature. He died at his Tusculan villa in 4 CE, at the age of 80.

Pollio deserves a very distinguished place in the history of Roman literature, not so much on account of his works, which were marred by an affected archaism, as because of the encouragement and incentive that he gave to literature. He was not only a patron of Virgil, Horace, and other great writers and poets, but he has the honor of being the first person to establish a public library at Rome. He wrote tragedies which Virgil declared to be worthy of Sophocles, and a prose history of the civil wars of his time from the first triumvirate to the death of Caesar.

In body and stature he was large. He was of dark complexion and plain appearance, and of variable health, for he suffered much from stomach pains and throat pains and head pains. [The last clause of this sentence ("for he suffered much from stomach pains and throat pains and head pains") is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. Augustus granted him whatever he asked. For many years he sent liberal amounts of gold to his parents for their support. When he was grown up he lost them. [This last sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. He wrote many things: the Priapea, the Culex, and the Moretum; then the Bucolics; afterwards, the Georgics in honor of Maecenas (Mecenatis); and lastly, the Aeneid. [In place of this long list of specific works written by Virgil, the German edition of the simply states that "He wrote many works of poetry."] At the age of 52 he died at Brundisium. His remains were taken to Naples and buried there on the Via Puteolana under a stone on which is inscribed: Mantua gave birth to me, Calabria took me away (i.e., killed me). Now Parthenope holds me. I have sung of shepherds, fields, and leaders.

Virgil (Virgilius, or Maro P. Virgilius), the Roman poet, was born October 15th 70 BCE at Andes (Pietola) a small village near Mantua in Cisalpine Gaul. His father had a small estate that he cultivated; his mother's name was Maia. Virgil was educated at Cremona and Milan. It is said he later studied at Naples and learned Greek; also at Rome. His writings showed learning. His health was always feeble, and there is no evidence of an attempt to rise by those means through which a Roman gained distinction—public office and the military. Having completed his education he retired to his paternal farm.

He worked on his Aeneid for a long time, and it was still unfinished at the time of his death in the year 19; for which reason, in his last illness he wished to burn his manuscript, but his friends would not permit him to do so. He had been enriched by the liberality of his patrons, used his wealth liberally, and made his excellent library easy of access. He sent liberal sums to his parents every year. In his fortune and his friends Virgil was a happy man, and his learned poems gave employment to many commentators and critics; for Virgil is one of the most difficult of Latin authors, not so much because of his style, but from the great variety of knowledge required to attain his meaning in all its fullness.

The last sentence of this paragraph, which cites the inscription purportedly found on Virgil's gravestone, is not in the German edition of the chronicle. Instead, that translation simply reads: "and his grave was marked by a monument."

The entire paragraph on Virgil is, to a large extent, a very significant abridgment of Suetonius' Life of Virgil, a work attributed to Suetonius and found in Donatus' commentary.

Horace (Horacius), a very much-praised poet, was born at Venusia, of a father who was a freedman. He was a person of short stature, and learned in the liberal arts. Afterwards he became the most esteemed man in Athens. He attained the friendship of Marcus Brutus, who slew Caesar, and who made him a military tribune against M. Antony and Augustus; but when Brutus was defeated in battle, he fled from the disaster. Augustus later pardoned him at the instance of Maecenas. Having been freed, he then devoted himself to poetry, of which he wrote the Odes, the Ars Poetica (The Art of Poetry), and the Epistles. [The German edition of the does not list specific works by Horace, but simply states: "He wrote many works of poetry."] After acquiring great wealth by his highest learning he died at Rome, making Augustus his heir. And he died at the age of 63, and was buried with Maecenas. [Horace (Q. Horatio Flaccus), the poet, was born December 8th, 65 BCE, at Venusia, in Apulia. His father was a libertinus ('freedman'). He had received his manumission before the birth of the poet. When twelve years of age his father took him to Rome to receive the usual education of a knight's or senator's son, which he could not attain at home. He frequented the best schools in the capital and was instructed in Greek and Latin. At 18 he continued his studies at Athens, and when Brutus came there after the death of Caesar, Horace was given the rank of military tribune and command of a legion. He was present at the battle of Philippi, and shared in the flight of the republican army. Thereafter he devoted himself to more peaceful pursuits, and having been pardoned, he returned to Rome. His paternal estate had been swept away in the general forfeiture, but he was able to purchase a clerkship on the profits of which he was able to live in frugality. Meanwhile, however, some of his poems attracted Varius and Maecenas, and the friendship thus formed soon ripened into intimacy. In 34 Maecenas bestowed on Horace a Sabine farm, sufficient to maintain him in ease and contentment the rest of his life. Even Augustus favored him as a poet. Horace died November 17th, 8 BCE, at the age of 57. His death was so sudden that he had no time to make a will, but he left the administration of his affairs to Augustus, whom he made his heir. According to his own description, Horace was short of stature, eyes dark, hair dark but ringed with gray. In his youth he was tolerably robust, but suffered from an ailment of the eyes. In advanced years he became fat and Augustus teased him for his protuberant belly. He was rather careless in dress, frugal even after he became rich, though he seems to have indulged in conviviality].

Caius Julius Caesar, son of Lucius, at the age of sixteen years lost his father. As quaestor he pronounced funeral orations from the rostrum, according to custom, in praise of his aunt Julia, and his wife Cornelia. As aedile he adorned—in addition to the Comitium and the Forum and the Basilicas—the Capitol. After his praetorship he obtained by lot Spain (Hispania), and was made consul with Bibulus. At the beginning of this office the first thing he did was to order that the daily proceedings of the senate be made public to the people. [This sentence and the three that precede it are not in the German edition of the chronicle]. At the same time he married Calpurnia, the daughter of L. Piso, his successor in the consulship. And he gave his own daughter Julia to Gnaeus Pompey (Pompeius). After that he waged wars for nine years throughout nearly all of Gaul that is contained by the borders of the Pyrennes, the Alps, Mt. Gebenna, and the rivers Rhine (Rhenus) and Rhone (Rhodanus). In this same space of time he lost first his mother and then his daughter, and not much later his granddaughter. He was victorious in five campaigns. The first and most excellent was in Gaul; the next was in Alexandria; then in the Pontus; after that in Africa; and last in Spain; and he accomplished public shows of various kinds. He is said to have been a tall erect man, of light complexion, rounded limbs, a somewhat full mouth, black and lustrous eyes, and a strong body; but at the end of his life his health left him and he also was accustomed to being terrified in his sleep. He first lived in a small house in the Suburra [The Suburra lay between the Caelian and Esquiline hills. It was one of the most frequented quarters of Rome], but after he became chief priest he occupied a palace belonging to the state in the Via Sacra. There was a doubt whether in his military affairs he was more cautious or more daring. When he concluded the civil wars, he was the sole ruler of the city (i.e., Rome) and of the world. His rule over the Romans began in the 183rd Olympiad, and lasted 4 years and 7 months. After him the Roman rulers were called Caesars. But when, contrary to the custom and usages of freedom, he undertook to give himself honors and to distribute them, a conspiracy was formed against him of over sixty men, including Gaius Cassius (C. Cossio) and Marcus (M.) and Decimus Brutus. His future destruction, nevertheless, had been announced to him through clear omens. When he arrived at the Capitol the conspirators surrounded him in the guise of their offices, and he was stabbed by them with twenty-three wounds. And Caesar ended his life in the 56th year of his age. His body was burned before the rostrum in the Campus Martius. Scarcely any of those who were accessory to his murder survived him more than three years, or died a natural death.

For Caesar's earlier history see Folios LXXXVI recto and LXXXIX recto and notes. Caesar's power was not witnessed without envy, for the Roman aristocracy, who had been long accustomed to rule the Roman world, could hardly endure such a master, and resolved to remove him by assassination. Cassius set the conspiracy in motion, and there were more than sixty persons involved in it. Many of these Caesar had raised to wealth and honor; some, like Brutus, lived with him on terms of intimate friendship. The conspirators pretended solicitude for the republic, but for many (not all) their object was power for themselves and their party. Caesar had many warnings, but disregarded them all, and fell by the daggers of his assassins on the Ides (or 15th) of March 44 BCE. At an appointed signal the conspirators surrounded him. Casca dealt the first blow; others quickly followed. Caesar at first defended himself, but when he saw his friend and favorite, Brutus, also draw his knife, he pulled his toga over his face, and sank, pierced with many wounds.

Caesar was a truly remarkable figure. He was gifted by nature with the most various talents, and was distinguished by the most extraordinary attainments in the most diversified pursuits. He was at one and the same time a general, statesman, lawgiver, jurist, orator, poet, historian, philologist, mathematician and architect. In his busy career he found time for literature, and was the author of many works, the majority of which are lost. The purity of his Latin and the clearness of his style were celebrated by the ancients themselves, and are conspicuous in his Commentaries, his only works that have come down to us.

The paragraph devoted to Caesar in the Chronicle is a massive abridgment of Suetonius' Life of Caesar.

Octavian (Octavianus) Augustus was born to Octavius, a Roman consul, on the 9th of the Kalends of October, shortly before sunrise, during the time of Marcus Tullius Cicero and Antony, consuls. At the age of four he lost his father, and at twelve his grandmother Julia, whom he praised in a funeral oration before an assembly of the people. Four years after he attained manhood he received military honors at the African triumph of Caesar. He fought five battles of the civil war, namely, at Mutina, Philippi, Perusia, Sicily, and Actium; the first and last against Mark Antony; the second against Brutus and Cassius; the third against the triumvir Antony's brother, the fourth against Sextus, son of Pompey. The beginning and cause of these wars was the murder of his uncle Julius. He also subjugated Cantabria, Aquitania, Pannonia, Dalmatia, and all of Illyricum. Item, he subdued the Rhaeti, the Vindelici, and the Salassi, peoples of the Alps, and checked the inroads of the Dacii, of whom he slew a great number, together with three of their leaders. He also took the Germans beyond the river Elbe; and other restless people were by him brought to submission. He also erected many public buildings, and surpassed all his predecessors in the frequency, variety, and magnificence of his public shows. While young he took to wife the daughter of P. Servilius; and when he became reconciled to Antony, he took his stepdaughter Claudia to wife. He also married Scribonia, but divorced her. Afterwards he caused Livia Drusilla to become pregnant and her alone he loved steadfastly. By Scribonia he begot Julia, his daughter; but of Livia he begot no children. He gave Julia in marriage to Marcellus; and after the latter's death, to Marcus Agrippa. From Agrippa and Julia he had three grandsons and two granddaughters. He was a man of beautiful physique, and very handsome in all the stages of his life. He had clear and beautiful eyes; his hair was slightly wavy and almost golden; his eyebrows were drawn together; ears medium size; nose elevated above and longer below; complexion between light and dark. He was of short stature. From youth he studied oratory and the liberal arts eagerly with very great industry. He wrote numerous prose works of various kinds. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. When he returned victorious from the East he was first hailed as Augustus because he had increased the republic. And from that point on he held the highest power in the state—a thing which the Greeks call monarchy. From him the kings of the Romans were afterwards called Augusti. He also enlarged the city of Rome, and beautified it with many buildings, taking pride in that statement of his: I have found this a city of brick; I leave it one of marble. He reigned 56 years. The temple of Janus Quirinus, which had been closed only twice before his time since the founding of the city, he closed in a far shorter period, having won peace on land and sea. [For this sentence the German edition of the simply states: "He made peace on land and sea."] In these peaceful times our Savior Jesus is said to have been born. He (i.e., Augustus) finally succumbed to his bed at Nolae (Nole), and when everyone had been dismissed, he died while kissing Livia, saying to her: Live mindful of our marriage, Livia, and farewell. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. He obtained an easy death and such a one as he had always longed for at the age of his life of 78.

Augustus, the first Roman emperor, was born on the 23rd of September 63 BCE, the son of C. Octavius by Atia, a daughter of Julia, the sister of C. Julius Caesar Octavianus, but for the sake of brevity he is called Augustus, though this was only a title given him by the Senate and the people in 27, to express their veneration for him. He lost his father when he was 4 years of age, but his education was conducted with great care by his grandmother Julia, and by his mother and stepfather, L. Marcius Phillipus, whom his mother married soon after his father's death. C. Julius Caesar, who had no male issue, also watched over his education with solicitude. He joined his uncle in Spain in 45, in the campaign against the sons of Pompey, and in the course of the same year he was sent by Caesar to Apollonia in Illyricum, where some legions were stationed, that he might acquire more thorough practical training in military affairs, and at the same time prosecute his studies. While at Apollonia, he heard of his uncle's murder, and forthwith set out for Italy, accompanied by Agrippa and a few other friends. Caesar having adopted him in his testament and made him his heir, Augustus now assumed the name of Caesar, and was so saluted by the troops; but, on reaching Rome, he demanded nothing but the private property which Caesar had left him, declaring however his resolution to avenge the murder of his benefactor. He displayed extraordinary tact and prudence. He had to contend against the republican party as well as against Antony, who attempted to prevent his acceptance of the inheritance his uncle had left him. Resolved to first crush Antony, Augustus made overtures to the republican party, and these succeeded. The senate made him praetor and sent him with the two consuls of the year, C. Vibius Pansa and A. Hirtius to attack Antony, who was besieging D. Brutus in Mutina. Antony was defeated but the senate became alarmed, and determined to prevent Augustus from acquiring further power. Ignoring the senate, Augustus marched on Rome and compelled that terrified body to give him the consulship. The murderers of the dictator were outlawed. Later Augustus and Antony became reconciled, and agreed to divide the empire between the triumvirate of Augustus, Antony, and Lepidus. They proscribed their enemies, and a large number were put to death, including Cicero. Soon afterwards Augustus and Antony crossed over to Greece, defeating Brutus and Cassius at Philippi in 42, by which the hopes of the republican party were ruined. The triumvirs made a new division of the provinces. Lepidus obtained Africa, and Augustus returned to Italy to reward his veterans with the lands he had promised them. Here a new war awaited him, excited by Fulvia, wife of Antony. She was supported by L. Antonius, consul and brother of the triumvir, who threw himself into the fortified town of Perusia, which Augustus succeeded in taking in 40. Antony now made preparations for war, but the opportune death of Fulvia led to a reconciliation between the triumvirs, and a new division of the provinces was made. Antony married Octavia, sister of Augustus, in order to cement this alliance. In 39 Augustus made peace with Sextus Pompey, whose fleet gave him command of the sea, and thus enabled him to prevent corn from reaching Rome, but the peace was only transitory, and in a naval battle which followed, the fleet of Augustus gained a decisive victory over that of Pompey, who abandoned Sicily and fled to Asia. In 35 and 34 Augustus was engaged in war with the Illyrians and Dalmatians. Meanwhile, Antony had repudiated Octavia and had alienated the Roman people by his arrogant proceedings in the East. In 32 the senate declared war against Cleopatra, for by means of Augustus' propaganda machine, Antony was looked upon only as her infatuated slave. The fleet of Augustus gained a brilliant victory over Antony near the promontory of Actium. Antony and Cleopatra fled to Egypt, and being pursued by Augustus, committed suicide.

Augustus now became the ruler of the world, and though he had thus united in his own person all the power and the great offices of the state, he was too prudent to make any display of authority to indicate that he was the sole master. The people retained their republican privileges, though merely in form, for only such persons were elected as had been proposed or recommended by the emperor. Almost uninterrupted festivities, games, distributions of wheat, and the like, made the people forget the substance of their republican freedom, and obey contentedly their new ruler. The wars of Augustus were not aggressive, but chiefly undertaken to protect the frontiers of his dominions. Most of them were carried on by his relations and friends, but some he conducted in person, such as his attack on the warlike

Cantabri in Spain, whose subjection, however, was not completed until later by Agrippa. In 16 the Romans suffered a defeat on the Lower Rhine by some German tribes; whereupon Augustus went himself to Gaul, and spent four years there to regulate the government of that province and to make the necessary preparations for defense against the Germans. In the year 9 he went to Gaul, made peace with the German ambassadors he received there, and from this time he took no active part in the wars. He died at Nola in 14 CE, at the age of 76. He was first married, though nominally, to Clodia, daughter of Clodius and Fulvia; secondly to Scribonia, who bore him his only daughter Julia. His third wife was Livia Drusilla, the mother of Tiberius Nero by her first husband, Tiberius Claudius Nero.

The last sentence of this paragraph in the German edition of the Chronicle simply states: "He died a peaceful death at the age of 76 years."

The paragraph devoted to Augustus in the Chronicle is a massive abridgment of Suetonius' Life of Augustus.

Mark Antony (Marcus Antonius), the consul, was declared an enemy by the senate; whereupon Pansa and Hirtius, and also Octavian, then still a youth, were sent against him. Afterwards Caesar (i.e. Octavian) made peace with Antony, and the Roman Empire was divided between them; to Augustus (i.e. Octavian) was given Spain, Gaul and Italy; to Antony, Asia, Pontus, and the East. He (i.e. Antony) deserted the sister of Caesar Augustus Octavian, and married Cleopatra, the queen of Egypt. He brought on a civil war while he was hoping to rule the city with unmanly greed. He was defeated by Augustus in a naval battle at Actium (Accium), which is a place in Epirus. After that he fled to Egypt. And as every man now allied himself with Augustus, Antony despaired and took his own life. Thus the land of Egypt became part of the Empire through Octavian. [Marc Antony, son of M. Antony (surnamed Creticus) and Julia, the sister of L. Julius Caesar, consul in 64, was born in 83 BCE. His father died while Antony was still young, and Antony was brought up by Cornelius Lentulus, who married his mother Julia, and who was put to death by Cicero in 63 as one of Catiline's conspirators; for this reason he became a personal enemy of Cicero. In his early youth Antony indulged in every kind of dissipation, and his affairs soon became deeply involved. He took part in the campaigns against Syria, Aristobulus in Palestine, and the restoration of Ptolemy Auletes in Egypt. In 54 he went to Caesar in Gaul, and by his influence was elected quaestor. As such, he returned to Gaul and served under Caesar for two years, returning to Rome in 50, and becoming one of the active partisans of Caesar. He voted against the senate decree depriving Caesar of his command, and fled back to the latter in Cisalpine Gaul. He accompanied Caesar in his victorious march into Italy and was left in command of that country, while Caesar carried on the war in Spain. He commanded the left wing of Caesar's army at Pharsalia, and was again left in command of Italy while Caesar went to Africa. In 44 he was consul with Caesar, when he offered him the kingly diadem at the feast of the Lupercalia. After Caesar's murder, Antony attempted to succeed him in power, but found an unexpected rival in young Octavian, the adopted son and grandnephew of Caesar, who assumed the name of Caesar, and at first joined the senate to crush Antony. Towards the end of the year Antony proceeded to Cisalpine Gaul, which had been previously granted to him by the senate; but Dec. Brutus refused to surrender the province to him and threw himself into Mutina, where he was besieged by Antony. The senate supported Brutus, declared Antony a public enemy, and entrusted the conduct of the war against him to Octavianus. Antony was defeated at Mutina, and was obliged to cross the Alps. Both the consul, however, had fallen and the senate now began to show its jealousy of Octavian. But the latter became reconciled to Antony, and it was agreed that the government of the state should be vested in Antony, Octavian, and Lepidus. The mutual enemies of both were proscribed, and Cicero thus lost his life to Anthony, whom he had opposed. In 42, Antony and Octavian crushed the republican party at Philippi, in which battle Brutus and Cassius both fell. Antony then went to Asia, which he had received as his share of the Roman world, and here began his relationship with Cleopatra, whom he followed to Egypt. In 41 Fulvia, the wife of Antony, and his brother L. Antonius, made war upon Octavian in Italy. But the war was ended before Antony reached Italy. The opportune death of Fulvia resulted in the reconciliation of Antony and Octavian, which was cemented by the marriage of Antony to Octavia, the sister of Octavian. But he later sent her back to her brother and returned to Cleopatra. His conduct and the unbounded influence that Cleopatra had acquired over him, alienated many of his friends and supporters; and Octavian thought that the time had now come for crushing his rival. The contest was decided by the sea-battle-that-never-really-occurred off Actium, September 2nd, 31, in which Antony's fleet was completely defeated. Antony, accompanied by Cleopatra, fled to Alexandria, where he put an end to his own life in the following year (30)].

Folio XCIII verso

The Tiburtine Sibyl (Sibilla Tiburtina), the foremost seeress, also called Albunea, flourished in Italy and prophesied many things. She was revered as a goddess in the city of Tibur (Tiburre), on the banks of the river Anio (Amonis), and was therefore called Tiburtina. In the whirlpool of the same river was found her image with a book in her hand. Augustus Octavian (whom the Romans accorded divine honors) asked this sibyl for advice; and after she had fasted for three days, she spoke of the sign of judgment, and of the moistening of the earth with sweat, and of how the future king would come from heaven; and there are 27 verses, of which the last is: a downpour of fire and sulphur would fall from the sky. The capital letters of this verse express (by that same testimony) the meaning: Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior. When she thus spoke in the presence of Augustus the heavens opened, and a great light fell upon him; and he saw in the heavens a most beautiful virgin standing on an altar, and carrying a little child; and at the same time he heard a voice saying: This altar is that of the Son of God. And as Augustus saw and heard all this in his bedchamber, he fell upon the earth and prayed to God. Therefore Augustus refused to permit himself to be called a god afterwards. In commemoration of this event a temple was erected at this place, under the name of the Holy Virgin Mary in Aracoeli (Ara Celi); and there the Brothers of the Order of the Blessed Francis now live. Others describe her (Mary) as not old, and as wearing a red dress, a rough pelt upon her shoulders, with flowing tresses, and holding this script in her hand: Christ will be born at Bethlehem, and will be proclaimed in Nazareth, while Taurus, the founder of peace reigns. O happy is the mother whose breasts will nurse him. [Tibur (Tiburs, pl. Tiburtes, Tiburtinus), now Tivoli, is one of the most ancient towns in Latium, 16 miles northeast of Rome. It is situated on the slope of a hill (and so called by Horace supinum Tiber), on the left bank of the Anio, which here forms a magnificent waterfall. It was said to have been originally built by the Siculi, and to have afterwards passed into the possession of the Aborigines and Pelasgi. According to tradition, it derived its name from Tiburtus, son of Catillus, who emigrated from Greece with Evander. It was afterwards one of the chief towns of the Latin league, and became subject to Rome with the other Latin cities on the final subjugation of Latium in 338 BCE. Under the Romans Tibur continued to be a large and flourishing town, since the salubrity and beautiful scenery of the place led many of the most distinguished Roman nobles to build their magnificent villas here. Of these the most splendid was that of Hadrian. Horace had a country house in the neighborhood of Tibur. In the vicinity was also a grove with the fountain and temple of the Sibyl Albunea, whose oracles were consulted from the most ancient times. This fountain was the largest of the Albulae aquae, sulphurous springs, which flow into the Anio. Near it was the oracle of Faunus Fatidicus. The temple is still extant at Tivoli.]

Miraculous signs occurred at the birth of Christ. A fountain of oil (as Eutropius and others testify) from a reputable tavern at Rome in the Trastevere (Transtiberina) quarter flowed forth for an entire day, announcing the mercy of Christ given to all peoples. Also on that day a golden circle appeared about the sun; and the statue of Romulus and the temple of peace fell.

Publius Ovidius Naso (Ovid), from Sulmo, a highly renowned poet, flourished at Rome during this period, and he wrote many works. He was a native of Sulmo, a town of the Bruttii (Bruciorum), as he himself reports: Sulmo is my fatherland, so rich in icy rivers, 90 miles from the city. [Ovid, 4.10.3-4. This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. At Athens he first studied extremely well the field of poetry and then the field of philosophy. Coming to Rome he was very much valued by Augustus Caesar for his life and his poetry. But long afterwards, in his 50th year, by this same Augustus he was banished to the island of Pontus to dwell among the Samartians. Concerning this he says in his book On the Pontus: Master Naso, without much prudence, while he was passing on the art of loving, now has the prize for his sad teaching. [Ovid, 2.10.15. This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. His character was as good-natured as his poems. He died at the age of 54 in the 5th year of the emperor Tiberius Caesar. [Ovid (P. Ovidius Naso), the Roman poet, was born at Sulmo, in the country of the Peligni, on March 20th, 43 BCE. He was descended from an ancient equestrian family of only moderate wealth. He was destined to be a lawyer, and was carefully educated for that purpose. But the hours which should have been spent in the study of law were devoted to poetry. He completed his education at Athens, thoroughly mastering Greek. He married twice in early life at the desire of his parents, but speedily divorced each wife in turn. By a third wife a daughter was born to him, who grew up and was married at the time of his banishment. Until his 50th year Ovid resided at Rome. He not only enjoyed the friendship of a large circle of distinguished men, but was regarded with favor by Augustus and the imperial family. But in 9 CE Ovid was suddenly banished by an imperial edict to transport himself to Tomi on the Euxine (Black Sea), on the very border of the empire. He had no trial, and the sole reason given in the edict was his having published his poem on the and for his committing an error ('mistake' or 'error'); but the first reason must have been a mere pretext as the poem had appeared ten years before. According to some the real cause was his intrigue with Julia, the accomplished but sexually free daughter of Augustus. Yet this is refuted by the fact that she had been in exile since 2 BCE. Others supposed his offense to have been with the younger Julia, granddaughter of Augustus, who was banished in the same year with Ovid. Speaking of his exile, Ovid draws an affecting picture. He complains of the inhospitable soil, the severity of the climate, the perils to which he was exposed when barbarians plundered the surrounding country and assaulted the very walls of Tomi. Here he died in 18 CE at the age of 60].

Titus Livius (Livy) of Padua, a great prince of the Greek and Latin historians, was famous at Rome in the 16th year before the coming of Christ. Of him Saint Jerome, quoting the words of Pliny, writes: We read that certain noble persons came from the furthest ends of Spain and of Gaul to Titus Livius (whose eloquence was) flowing like a fountain of milk, and that Rome did not attract them to look upon itself, but the fame of one man led them there. That age had something unheard of to all other ages, something that was a very famous miracle: that people who had come to so great a city were looking for something that wasn't the city. [The citation from Jerome is taken from his ('Letter of Saint Jerome to Paulinus the Bishop') 1.2-4]. This man was honored with honors and with rich possessions by Augustus. A most diligent investigator of history, he wrote 110 books of history. The greatest part of his works (by the evil of the times) was lost. He lived 80 years, and died at Padua in the fourth year of the reign of Tiberius and was buried there. And his grave is still to be seen in the divine vestibule of Saint Justina the Virgin, and is adorned with these titles: Ti. Livius. Ti. fi. quartae legionis Aliis Concordialis Patavi sibi et suis omnibus.

The titles given in the Chronicle text are an abbreviated and nearly indecipherable mess of what we know the inscription actually says (but which took many years for scholars to understand). Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology (vol. 2, pp. 790-1) has many fascinating things to say on this matter:

The memoirs of most men terminate with their death; but this is by no means the case with our historian, since some circumstances closely connected with what may be fairly termed his personal history, excited no small commotion in his native city many centuries after his decease. About the year 1360 a tablet was dug up at Padua, within the monastery of St. Justina, which occupied the site of an ancient temple of Jupiter, or of Juno, or of Concordia, according to the conflicting hypotheses of local antiquaries. The stone bore the following inscription, V. F. T. LIVIUS. LIVIAE. T. F. QUARTAE. L. HALYS. CONCORDIALIS. PATAVI. SIBI. ET. SUIS. OMNIBUS, which was at first interpreted to mean Vivus fecit Titus Livius Liviae Titi filiae quartae, (sc. uxori) Lucii Halys Concordialis Patavi sibi et suis omnibus. Some imagined that QUARTAE. L. HALYS denoted Quartae legionis Halys, but this opinion was overthrown without difficulty, because even at that time it was well known that L. is seldom if ever used in inscriptions as an abbreviation of legio, and secondly because the fourth legion was entitled Scythica and not Halys. It was then decided that quartae must indicate the fourth daughter of Livius, and that L. Halys must be the name of her husband; and ingenious persons endeavoured to show that in all probability he was identical with the L. Magius mentioned by Seneca. They also persuaded themselves that Livy, upon his return home, had been installed by his countrymen in the dignified office of priest of the goddess Concord, and had erected this monument within the walls of her sanctuary, marking the place of sepulture of himself and his family. At all events, whatever difficulties might seem to embarrass the explanation of some of the words and abbreviations in the inscription, no doubt seems for a moment to have been entertained that it was a genuine memorial of the historian. Accordingly, the Benedictine fathers of the monastery transported the tablet to the vestibule of their chapel, and caused a portrait of Livy to be painted beside it. In 1413, about fifty years after the discovery just described, in digging the foundations for the erection of new buildings in connection with the monastery, the workmen reached an ancient pavement composed of square bricks cemented with lime. This having been broken through, a leaden coffin became visible, which was found to contain human bones. An old monk declared that this was the very spot above which the tablet had been found, when immediately the cry rose that the remains of Livy had been brought to light, a report which filled the whole city with extravagant joy. The newfound treasure was deposited in the town hall, and to the ancient tablet a modern epitaph was affixed. At a subsequent period a costly monument was added as a further tribute to his memory. Here, it might have been supposed, these weary bones would at length have been permitted to rest in peace. But in 1451, Alphonso of Arragon preferred a request to the Paduans, that they would be pleased to bestow upon him the bone of Livy's right arm, in order that he might possess the limb by which the immortal narrative had been actually penned. This petition was at last complied with; but just as the valuable relic reached Naples, Alphonso died, and the Sicilian fell heir to the prize. Eventually it passed into the hands of Joannes Jovianis Pontanus, by whom it was enshrined with an appropriate legend. So far all was well. In the lapse of time, however, it was perceived upon comparing the tablet dug up in the monastery of St. Justina with others of a similar description, that the contractions had been erroneously explained, and consequently the whole tenor of the words misunderstood. It was clearly proved that L. did not stand for Lucius but for libertus, and that the principal person named was Titus Livius Halys, freedman of Livia, the fourth daughter of a Titus Livius, that he had in accordance with the usual custom adopted the designation of his former master, that he had been a priest of Concord at Padua, an office which it appeared from other records had often been filled by persons in his station, and that he had set up this stone to mark the burying-ground of himself and his kindred. Now since the supposition that the skeleton in the leaden coffin was that of the historian rested solely upon the authority of the inscription, when this support was withdrawn, the whole fabric of conjecture fell to the ground, and it became evident the relics were those of an obscure freedman.

The German edition of the Chronicle does not cite the inscription.

And afterwards when his remains had been found, the Venetians, who had rebuilt the city's town hall that had been burned down, place them in the gable of it so as to be visible to all. [Livy (Titus Livius), Roman historian, was born at Patavium (Padua), Italy, in 59 BCE. The greater part of his life was spent in Rome, although he returned to his native city before his death, which occurred at the age of 76 in the fourth year of Tiberius, 17 CE. His literary talents secured the patronage and friendship of Augustus, and he became a person of consideration at court. His reputation rose so high that a Spaniard traveled from Cadiz to Rome just to behold him; and having gratified his curiosity, immediately returned home. The great and only extant work of Livy is a , which he calls (43.13), extending from the foundation of the city to the death of Drusus in 69 BCE, comprising 142 books. Of these only 35 have come down to us, but of the whole, with the exception of 2, we possess , drawn up by one who must have been well acquainted with the subject. The style of Livy is indeed like that of 'thick milk', for the narrative flows on strongly but calmly; rich, but not heavy, simple but not tame].

Valerius Maximus, a Roman natural philosopher and very distinguished orator, was famous at Rome in the 15th year before the coming of Christ, and was very dear to the emperor Augustus. Among other things he wrote nine books in a very clear and brilliant style consisting of memorable sayings and deeds of men that were esteemed among the Greeks and Romans, adding also his own thoughts pertaining to the commendation of the virtues and the condemnation of vices. From these we excerpt this memorable thought: Divine anger proceeds with a slow step to avenge itself, but it makes up for its tardiness by the severity of the punishment. [Valerius Maximus is known to us as the compiler of a large collection of historical anecdotes, ('Nine Books of Memorable Deeds and Sayings'), arranged under different headings. And again, under each heading the sayings and doings of celebrated Romans are kept distinct from those of foreigners. He lived in the reign of Tiberius, to whom he dedicated his work, which was very popular in the Middle Ages].

We gather from his books that Solinus flourished as a historian and very distinguished orator of that time; for he himself wrote a very good book of things he had brought together, and which he dedicated to Augustus Caesar at Rome. In it he maps out the world, gives the distances of cities, and measures many places. And he called that book The Collection, that is, On the Wonders of the World. [C. Julius Solinus, author of a geographical compendium, divided into 57 chapters, must have lived after the reign of Alexander Severus, and before that of Constantine. He may perhaps be placed about 238 CE. His compendium contains a brief sketch of the world as known to the ancients, diversified by historical notices, remarks on the origin, habits, religious rites and social condition of various nations enumerated. The arrangement, and frequently the very words, are derived from the of Pliny; but little knowledge, care, or judgment are displayed in the selection].

AUGUSTUS AND THE TIBURTINE SIBYL

This woodcut tells the legend of the Tiburtine Sibyl (Sibilla Thiburana) and Caesar Augustus (Octavianus). The prophetess holds the center of the stage, and behind her stands a lady, apparently her attendant or maid. The Sibyl has just made the pronouncement and conjured forth for the benefit of the emperor a vision of the Virgin Mary with the Christ-child in her arms, the mother and child being surrounded by a brilliant blaze, in the face of which Augustus (also accompanied by an attendant) has sunk to his knees in an attitude of adoration, and having removed his crown has set it on the ground before him. The miracle occurs in a hilly country and apparently beside a stream, which we may imagine to be the Anio on the left bank of which the city of Tibur was located.

Strabo, a historian, geographer and philosopher, and also interpreter of Homeric majesty, was (as some say) a native of Crete and, as we discover by his works, highly renowned at this time. And as he was very highly educated and regarded as the most informed man in great things, he wrote, as evidence of his merit, 17 beautiful books on the geography of the world. In it the regions of the earth, which had been neglected or forgotten by reason of their antiquity, were carefully recorded and indicated. He very clearly placed before our eyes races, nations, history, mountains, and seas, and their location. He traced his maternal ancestry to the blood of Mithridates, the king. Since his most famous work was for a long time unknown to readers of Latin, Pope Nicholas V wished it to be translated in part by Gregory Tiphernas (Typernatem). The rest of the work is defective, namely (the section devoted to) Europe, and was rendered complete by Gregory of Verona (Veronensis).

Strabo, the geographer, was a native of Amasia in Pontus. The date of his birth was about 54 BCE. He lived during the reign of Augustus and in the early years of that of Tiberius. He is supposed to have died in 24 CE. Strabo received a careful education, and he studied grammar and philosophy under noted men. He lived at Rome for a number of years, and traveled much in various countries. He wrote a historical work in 43 books, which is lost. He also wrote his celebrated Geography in 17 books, which has come down to us almost complete. As he himself states, his works were not intended for all persons, but for those of good education, and particularly for those in higher departments of administration. He is not given over to minute descriptions except when place or object is of great interest or importance. His descriptions are not limited to physical characteristics, but his work comprehends the important political events of which each country has been the theater, a notice of the chief cities, and the great men who have lived or worked there. It is a sort of historical geography intended for reading, and the language is generally clear. The first two books are introductory, containing Strabo's views on the form and magnitude of the earth, and other subjects connected with mathematical geography. In the third book, he begins his description. Eight books are devoted to Europe, 6 to Asia, and the 17th and last to Egypt and Libya. The work is in striking contrast to that of Ptolemy, and the dry list of names, occasionally enlivened by something added to them, in the geographical portion of the Natural History of Pliny. Although Strabo saw a comparatively small portion of the regions that he describes, he had traveled much. As he states himself: "Westward I have journeyed to the parts of Etruria opposite Sardinia; towards the south from the Euxine to the borders of Ethiopia." His geography is the most important work on that science which antiquity has left us.

The last two sentences of this paragraph are not in the German edition of the chronicle. Pope Nicholas V asked Guarino (Guarinus) of Verona in the middle of the 15th century to translate them from Greek into Latin. Guarino then translated the first ten books, while the remainder were translated by Gregory (Gregorius) Tiphernas (also known as Gregorio da Città di Castello). Guarino finished his translation in 1458 (two years before his death).

Anna, a Hebrew woman, daughter of Issachar (Isachar) the Jew, was given in marriage to Joachim, holiest of men and of her own tribe. After having been barren for a long time and without offspring, and having offered up many prayers and lamentations, Anna bore Mary, the future mother of God, according to angelic annunciation. Soon after the death of her husband Joachim, Anna married another man, named Cleophas, who betrothed Mary, his stepdaughter, to Joseph, and his own daughter Mary to Alpheus (Alveo); and out of her were born James Alpheus, Simon (Symon) the Canaanite (Chananeus), and Judas Thaddeus. After the death of her second husband, Cleophas, Anna was married a third time, according to the laws of Moses, to Salome. And by him she bore a third daughter, Mary Salome, who married Zebedee and by him begot James the Greater and John the Evangelist. Anna had a sister, named Ismeria, of whom was born Elizabeth, the mother of John the Baptist. Having walked in the commandments and ways of the Lord all her life, Anna, full of the days, now rested in the Lord.

Zacharias (Zaharias), Hebrew priest from the village (or course) of Abia [Zacharias was a priest of the course of Abia (alternative spelling: Abijah), the eighth of the twenty-four courses who ministered at the Temple in turn]. and prophet of the Lord, father of Saint John (Johannis) the Baptist, and a paragon of holiness, married Elizabeth, the sister of the mother of the Virgin Mary. Both women were very pious in their innocence, goodness and grace. They had been barren for a long time, and Elizabeth had reached old age, and her womanly potency had ended. But the Lord was moved by her prayers, and finally gave her a son, John the Baptist. While Zacharias was performing his priestly office, and had ignited the sacrifice, and was alone in the Temple, he perceived an angel at the right of the altar; and he was frightened. But the angel spoke: Fear not, your wife will bear you a son in the following year, and you will rejoice in his birth, and he shall be great before the Lord. Wine and all intoxicating liquor he will shun. Then Zacharias said, I am now old, and my wife is beyond her days. And the angel said this sign of disbelief, You shall not speak until all those things have been performed. When Zacharias left the Temple he was not able to speak to the people, and they perceived that he had seen a vision. He departed to his own house; and soon Elizabeth conceived, and for five months she hid herself for shame. In the sixth month Mary the Virgin and mother of the Lord, who had conceived by the Holy Ghost, went to Elizabeth to greet her. And when Elizabeth received Mary's greeting, the unborn child exulted for joy in its mother's womb. Afterwards Elizabeth bore a son, and her neighbors and relatives rejoiced with her. On the eighth day when the child was to be circumcised, they nodded to the father what he wanted him to be called. And he, taking up a reed pen, wrote, John is his name. And his mouth was opened, and he prophesied: Blessed is the Lord God of Israel, etc. Finally he died in all holiness as a prophet. [Luke 1:36-68].

Mary, most blessed and highly esteemed Mother of God, and Virgin everlasting, out of the root of Jesse, was born to Joachim and Anna, her father and mother, at Nazareth in Judea, in the 28th year of the reign of Augustus. She was a girl most refined, and in the eyes of all men worthy of admiration. After her mother had weaned her, and she had reached the age of three, she was given to the service of the Temple with other maidens according to a solemn vow. Contrary to the usual course of childhood she excelled her playmates in nobility and elegance, and from youth acquired a knowledge and understanding of religious life by example and study. In a brief while she exceeded all other pious virgins in holiness and in the practice of a spiritual life, as well as in humility in divine and human matters. For this reason God chose her to be the mother of his incarnate son. At the age of thirteen, through divine inspiration, she was married to Joseph, a man of her own family. Soon after the marriage the angel Gabriel came to her at Nazareth, and he appeared to her in her bedchamber, in a great light, and paid her homage, greeting her with these words: Hail, you that are highly favored, the Lord is with you. And he said further: You have found favor with God; truly you shall conceive, and bring forth a son, and shall call his name Jesus. And in response to these things Mary answered: Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it to me according to your word. And at once the word became flesh. And as soon as these things had been done, she went to visit Elizabeth at her home, where she stayed with her for three months. And Mary sang that wonderful song: My soul magnifies the Lord. [Luke 1:28-55]. After John was born, Mary, now pregnant, returned to her own house. And Joseph learned that she was with child, and decided to secretly leave her. But while he was thus thinking (as Matthew states), the angel admonished him in a dream that what she had conceived was of the Holy Ghost. [Matthew 1:18-24]. The rest of the events in the life of the most blessed Virgin Mary, up to the time of the sufferings of her son, can be gathered from the Gospels.

Folio XCIII verso

John the Baptist, forerunner of Jesus Christ, born of holy parents, Zacharias (Zaharia) and Elizabeth, was the most holy one who emerged from his mother's womb, and among the sons of women (as the Lord himself witnesses) the most outstanding. He was a prophet and more than a prophet when he pointed out Christ the redeemer with his finger, saying: Behold the Lamb of God, etc. After the years of his infancy had passed, he, although he was but a tender and only child of aged parents, became a hermit for the love of his heavenly fatherland. Afterwards, at the age of 30, it being the 12th year of the reign of the emperor Tiberius Caesar (while Pontius Pilate governed the land of Judea), the holy word of God came to John in the wilderness; and he came into all the regions of the Jordan preaching the baptism of repentance. For that reason he was giving fitting answers to each one of the many people running up to him and asking him questions. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. Sometime before the period of Christ's preaching, he was taken and imprisoned by Herod Antipas, whom he reproved, saying: It is not lawful for you to have the wife of your brother. At the instigation of this same woman John was imprisoned for one year and suffered for lack of food. [Luke 3:1-20]. At the end of the year, Herod, on the day of his birthday, invited all the princes and nobles to the festivities. And while those in the house were enjoying themselves, the daughter of his wife Herodias performed with her voice and danced before them, and she pleased the king. And he promised with an oath to give whatever she would ask. At the suggestion of her mother she asked for the head of John the Baptist on a platter. And although the king, by reason of his oath, was sorry, he sent the executioner and had him (John) decapitated. [Matthew 14:3-10].

(A) ANCESTRY OF JOHN THE BAPTIST

The Ancestry of John the Baptist is shown by a woodcut at the top of Folio XCIV verso. The genealogy begins with a dual portrait of Ismeria (sister of Anna) and her spouse—an elderly couple, she with a halo. From her a branch runs which divides and proceeds to Eliud (not mentioned in the text) on the left, and to Elizabeth, who is shown in a dual portrait with her husband, Zacharias. From them another branch proceeds to their son John the Baptist. The entire ensemble consists of a single woodcut. The portrait of John's parents is not the same as that shown on the recto of this folio, although the general characteristics of dress are the same. John the Baptist is shown as an elderly man, and in symbolism of his mission he holds in his left hand a large book, upon which rests a little lamb. In his right hand is the banner of the Resurrection. About his head is a simple halo. This genealogy accompanies the text as given in the third paragraph of Folio XCIII verso.

(B) THE DESCENDANTS OF ANNA

The Descendants of Anna are represented in a single woodcut on the recto of folio XCV, and which covers the greater portion of the page, on which begins the Sixth Age of the World. At the top of the woodcut appears Anna, who was married three times. Beside her and to the left is her first husband Joachim; to the right her second husband Cleophas, and third one Salome. Anna is shown in flowing robes, a halo about her head, her hands in an attitude of prayer.

From Joachim a single branch proceed to the Virgin Mary on the opposite folio.

From Cleophas a winding branch runs to his daughter Mary, who is shown in dual portrait with her husband Alpheus. From this couple a short branch proceeds to Joseph Justus (not mentioned in the text), and a longer one to the three sons, James Alphaeus the Lesser (Jacobus Minor), Simon Chananeus (Symon), and Judas Thaddeus (simply called Judas).

From Anna's third husband runs a long branch to the third Mary (Salome) portrayed with Zebedee. From her there is a branch to John the Evangelist and James the Greater (Jacobus Major).

The Lineage of Christ is here continued from Folio LXXXVIII verso, to which Joseph is now added.

(D) EVENTS IN THE DAILY LIFE OF MARY

Events in the Life of Mary are given in three woodcuts:

1. The Birth of the Virgin Mary. The mother, Anna, is shown in bed, attended by two women who are bringing her drink and food. Beside her bed is a small cradle out of which peeps the infant Mary.
2. The Espousal of the Virgin Mary. Joseph stands at the left, Mary at the right. A Catholic priest wearing a huge mitre stands between them and joins their hands in marriage.
3. The Annunciation. Mary appears at the right kneeling in prayer. The angel Gabriel, scepter in hand, has suddenly alighted at the left, and hails the surprised Mary as the future mother of Christ.

(E) HEROD'S BIRTHDAY – DECAPITATION OF JOHN THE BAPTIST

Herod's Birthday and the Decapitation of John the Baptist. Herod Antipas is celebrating his birthday. The celebrants are seated at the table. The king himself sits at the right, and oddly enough in a seemingly uncomfortable niche in the wall. Beside him sits his wife Herodias, and to her left is her daughter Salome. Attendants are busy about the table; a cupbearer brings in a large goblet; another attendant stirs the air with a besom of peacock feathers. We must assume that Salome has completed her dance, and that it has pleased the king, since he has clearly fulfilled his promise to give her whatever she should ask for. The executioner of John the Baptist has done his work and now stands against a wall to the left of the table, resting an elbow on his deadly tool, a huge sword, which one would hardly believe this diminutive officer able to wield. The head of John the Baptist rests on the platter in the center of the table, as though it were the pièce de résistance of the banquet. Why Salome should raise her index finger, or why her father should raise two, apparently in religious significance, is not understandable. The face and the attitude of the king indicate that the whole affair has left a bad taste in his mouth. His wife Herodias seems better pleased. Salome, the dominating figure in the woodcut, poises the sharp point of a knife on the forehead of the victim.

The Sixth Age of the World

Folio XCV recto

The Sixth Age of the world began with the birth of Christ Jesus Christ, being in the beginning of the forty-second year of the reign of Augustus Octavian; the thirty-first year of the reign of Herod the foreigner; in the third year of the one hundred and ninety-third Olympiad; from the founding of the city (i.e., Rome) 759 years; [Jesus was born in the year from the founding of the city of Rome 749 (not 759), that is, four years before the beginning of our era (i.e., 4 BCE). Herod the Great died in the same year, but after the birth of Jesus, for it was he who, according to Matthew 2.16-18, ordered the massacre of the innocents]. from the Captivity of the Jews 545 years; from the reign of David 1029; from the birth of Abraham 2,015 years; from the Flood of Noah 2957 years; from Adam 5,199 years; from the conception of John the Baptist, in the sixth month; and it continues through the entire period called grace, and extends from the sanctified birth of Jesus Christ to the present time, 1492; and it will take its course to the time of Anti-Christ, or the end of the world. Some (as already stated) take the incarnation of Christ as the beginning of this age; others calculate it from the baptism of Christ, because of the power given the waters; or from the time of the circumcision; some compute it from the suffering of Christ for then the gate of Paradise was opened, and the seventh age of the dead began. And so with this Sixth Age, the Christian Empire and the highest papal authority originated and became established.

Mariamne (Mariannes), a queen of the Hebrews and a daughter of Aristobulus, was slain through jealousy by Herod, her husband; for (as Josephus says) she was of such great and excelling beauty that she was taken for a celestial being, exceeding all other women of her time in personal stature. Finally she was accused before Herod by her mother and sister, of having sent Octavianus a portrait of herself to arouse in him a passion for her. This Herod believed and caused her to be slain.

Until this time the Jews did not lack for princes; but now they accepted this foreign Herod. For it was the time when he came who was promised, and who is praised in the new law as the expectation of the nations. [Cf. Genesis 49.10]. And so their anointing (that is, kingdom) deservedly came to an end; for according to the prophecies of Daniel there came the holiest of the holy.

Folio XCV verso

Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and our Savior and Redeemer, was born at Bethlehem, in Judea, in the forty-second year of the reign of Augustus and when Quirinius (Cirino) was governor, and the whole world was at peace. He was born of the Virgin Mary, who according to the annunciation of an angel, conceived him of the Holy Spirit, to redeem the human race from the fall which was due to the disobedience of the first pair. It was he who by his birth, by his life, by his death, by his resurrection, by his ascension to heaven, and by many unheard-of miracles gave testimony of his divinity. For, firstly, his birth was miraculous, and so the angels in heaven sang that he was God in the Highest; and they gave the shepherds great joy in announcing to them the birth of the Savior of the World. Afterwards, on the eighth day, he was carried to the temple to be circumcised; and he was called Jesus. Later, on the thirteenth day the Wise Men, guided by a star in Syria, came with three gifts to worship him. On the fourteenth day his mother brought him to the temple, and Simeon (Symon) the Just took him up in his arms and pronounced him the Savior, saying, Lord, now allow your servant to depart in peace, according to your word, etc. Afterwards, Joseph, according to a warning from the Lord, fled from Herod into Egypt, together with this child and its mother. There he remained until Herod's death. Then lived in the city of Nazareth, on account of which he was called a Nazarene. The rest (of the incidents in his life) are well known from the very familiar history of the gospel.

For the angelic annunciation to the shepherds, see Luke 2:8-14; the circumcision, Luke 2:21; the visit of the Magi, Matthew 2:1-11; the prophecy of Simeon, Luke 2:25-32; the flight to Egypt, Matthew 2:13-15; and the return to Nazareth, Matthew 2:19-23.

The last sentence of this paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Archelaus, son of Herod the Great, reigned 9 years after his father. Augustus, because of love for his father, held him and his brothers in high esteem. But later, on a certain charge, Augustus banished him to Vienna in the country of the Allobroges. [Archelaus, son of Herod the Great, was appointed by his father as his successor, and received from Augustus the provinces of Judea, Samaria and Idumea, with the title of Ethnarch. In consequence of his tyrannical rule, the Jews accused him before Augustus in the 10th year of his reign (6 CE), and Augustus banished him to Vienna, in Gaul, where he died. The Allobroges were a powerful people of Gaul, whose chief town was Vienna on the Rhone. They dwelt between that river and the Isara as far as Lake Geneva, consequently in the modern Dauphine and Savoy. They were first mentioned in Hannibal's Invasion 218 BCE, and were conquered by the Romans in 121 BCE; but they bore their yoke unwillingly and were always disposed to rebellion].

Jesus Christ at the age of twelve years went to the feast at Jerusalem with his parents; and there he went among the teachers of the Holy Scriptures, asking them questions and solving doubtful ones; for this reason they regarded him not as a god, but as a child of marvelous understanding. When his parents were returning to their home, and did not see the child following them, they returned to the temple with much anxiety; and they found the child in discussion with the learned; but at the request of his parents he went home and was obedient to them. [Luke 2:41-51].

Componius, who was the colleague of Quirinius [A clause not in the German edition of the chronicle], was sent to Judea to succeed

Archelaus as procurator.

After Judea became a Roman province, governors, proconsuls or procurators were sent there from Rome. This was the office held by Pilate at the time of Jesus' crucifixion. In the strict sense of the word a procurator was a Roman official in charge of the collection of the revenues in a province—a provincial administrator. A proconsul was usually an ex consul who exercised consular authority in one of the provinces or as commander of an army.

Unusually for the German edition of the Chronicle, it adds the following text to the single sentence of the Latin edition: "and during his rule, the Samaritans, on the day of the unleavened bread, secretly came to Jerusalem and threw out the bones of the dead. From this point on greater care was taken of the temple."

Marcus was the successor of Componius. During his rule, Salome, the sister of Herod died.

Annius Rufus followed Marcus. During his rule Augustus died in the 15th year of the Lord.

Jesus, our Lord, at the age of 30 years, in order to open the door to everlasting life, wished to be baptized in the Jordan by John. And a voice was heard from heaven: This is my beloved Son, etc. And the Holy Spirit, in the likeness of a dove, lighted upon him. [Matthew 3:13-17; Mark 1:9-11; Luke 3:21-22; Cf. John 1:31-4]. After that he fasted in the wilderness for forty days and nights; and he was hungry. After being tempted of the devil, [Matthew 4:1-11; Luke 4:1-13]. he returned to the temple and drove out from it the sellers and the buyers, etc. [Mark 11:15-17; Matthew 21:12-13; Luke 19:45; John 2:13-16].

Valerius the Roman, from the famous family of the Grati (Gracchorum) [This clause and the preceding word 'Roman' are not in the German edition of the chronicle], in the first year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar, was sent to Judea to succeed Annus as procurator. He ruled nine years, and was the first who dared sell the priestly office among the Jews.

Pilate, a native of Lyons, in Gaul, a sly and dangerous man, was in the 13th year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar (Ce) sent by Tiberius to Judea as procurator to succeed Valerius Gratus (Gracchus) who had been deposed. And he ruled 10 years. This Pilate, by crafty means, suppressed the turbulence of the Jews. Afterwards, at the instigation of the Jews, he nailed Jesus to the cross. Fearful of the consequences, he sent a report to Tiberius the emperor to acquaint him with the teachings and death of Christ. When this event was reported to Tiberius he decided to place Jesus in the list of the gods. But after Pilate had reported these things to Tiberius and then to the Senate at Rome, the senators would not permit this. Finally, on the complaint of the Jews, Pilate was deposed and banished to perpetual exile in his native town of Lyons, to the curse of his own people. He came to an evil end. [Pontius Pilatus (Pilate) was the sixth procurator of Judea and the successor of Valerius Gratus, and held the office for ten years in the reign of Tiberius, from 26 to 36 CE, and it was during his government that Jesus taught, suffered and died. By his tyrannical conduct he excited an insurrection at Jerusalem, and at a later period commotions in Samaria also, which were not put down without the loss of life. The Samaritans complained of his conduct to Vitellius, the governor of Syria, who deprived him of his office and sent him to Rome to answer before the emperor the accusations brought against him. Eusebius states that worn out by the many misfortunes he had experienced, Pilate put an end to his own life. The early Christian writers refer frequently to an official report, made by Pilate to Tiberius, of the condemnation and death of Christ; but it is very doubtful whether this document was genuine; and it is certain that the , as they are called, are the production of a later age].

EVENTS IN THE LIFE OF JESUS

Certain events in the life of Jesus are here portrayed in a vertical panel of four small woodcuts, which we may regard as a continuation of a like series of events in the life of Mary (Folio XCIV verso). The present woodcuts are as follows:

1. "The Birth of Christ, Year of the World 7200." Thus the first woodcut is entitled. The naked little child lies on its back on the ground in a blaze of light. Beside it, to the right, kneels Mary in an attitude of adoration, with hands clasped. Joseph, at the left, assumes a like attitude. Behind Mary, to the right, appears the ass, and between Mary and Joseph the ox looks out upon the scene. The background may be divided into two parts: (1) behind Mary is a base of a huge structure, apparently a church; (2) to the left, a valley, running off into the distance. During the Middle Ages the ass and ox were invariably introduced in these representations of the Nativity, not merely as natural accessories in a stable, but also for their symbolic significance; for ox and ass respectively symbolize the Jews and the Gentiles. In a general sense this presence of man and beast represents the homage due to God from all the creatures of his hand.
2. "In the Year of the World, 7211; Year of Christ, 12." So the second woodcut is entitled. It represents Jesus among the doctors in the temple. He is seated on a throne, apparently engaged in dispute with the doctors, seated or kneeling at his feet; and if gestures mean anything, all are talking at the same time. The anxious Mary peers in at a window to the left.
3. "In the Year of the World, 7229; Year of Christ, 30." In the waters of the river Jordan appears the naked figure of Jesus. He wears a loincloth, and the waters reach above his knees. His hands are clasped in devotion, an ornate halo about his head. To the right stands an angel holding his robe. At the left kneels John the Baptist performing the rite of baptism. The Holy Spirit, in likeness of a dove, is about to alight on the head of Jesus.
4. "In the Year of the World 7233; Year of Christ 34." This woodcut represents the crucifixion. It is the usual portrayal of Jesus nailed to the cross, in this case a low structure. At its foot lies a skull, emblematic of death. To the left of the cross stands Mary; to the right his disciple John.

Folio XCVI recto

Tiberius Claudius Nero, the third Roman emperor, reigned 23 years and some days. He was the son of Livia, the wife of Augustus, as well as the latter's stepson and heir. He was born of the aristocratic (patricia) Claudian family, and was surnamed Nero. In childhood he was precocious and crafty. He was nine years of age when his father died. On attaining manhood he married Agrippina, the daughter of Marcus Agrippus. Though not very much disposed to leave his wife (for she was pregnant), he was compelled to marry Julia, the daughter of Augustus. He lost his brother Drusus in Germany, and was given the power of tribune for five years in which he was to conquer that country. Believing that the defeat of Varus resulted from lack of forethought and through negligence, he did not act without counsel and consideration. After the expiration of two years Tiberius marched out of Germany to Rome, where he was given a triumph. Although for some time he refused the sovereignty, and sought to live an honest and industrious life, he finally accepted the office of emperor. When some of his officers advised him to burden the land and the people with tribute and taxes, he replied: It becomes a good shepherd to shear his sheep, but not to swallow them. He suppressed the customs and manners of the Egyptians and the Jews, expelled the sorcerers and soothsayers, and scrupulously did away with turmoil, murder and robbery. For a period of two years after assuming the rule he did not set foot beyond the gates, and in the following year, not beyond the suburbs. However, as he was afterwards deprived of his two sons, namely, Germanicus in Syria and Drusus at Rome, he went to Campania; and as he now embraced the freedom of private life and removed himself from the eyes of the city, he now poured forth his long concealed lust; and because of his excessive drinking of wine, he was considered a drunkard and an alcoholic by the masses. He was of an ungenerous and jealous disposition, and filled with excessive pride. He had no paternal love, either for his natural son Drusus, nor for Germanicus who had been adopted by him. Tiberius had a large strong body, not ill built; his chest and shoulders were broad, and his limbs down to his feet were regular, well proportioned, and white. His hair was long, reaching beyond the nape of his neck, which gave him a barbarian appearance. He had an earnest expression and large eyes, and carried his head erect as he walked. He was often calm and silent. He was very fond of the liberal arts and wrote several poems. At the end of a reign of 23 years, during which he was neither reckoned among the very good nor the very bad, he finally died in the village of Lucullus at the age of seventy-eight. Some say that he died of a mild and enervating poison administered by Caius. The people rejoiced in his death.

Tiberius Claudius Nero Caesar, son of T. Claudius Nero and Livia, was born 42 BCE, before his mother married Augustus. He was tall and strongly made, handsome, and had large eyes. He was carefully educated in Greek and Latin. Though not without military courage, he was timid of character, jealous and suspicious, and cruel in consequence after he acquired power. In later life he indulged his lust in every way imaginable, although he affected a regard to decency and externals. Much against his will Augustus compelled him to divorce Vipsania Agrippina, and to marry Julia, widow of Agrippa and daughter of the emperor. With her Tiberius did not, however, live long in harmony. Augustus employed him in various military campaigns. In 15 Drusus and his brother Tiberius engaged in warfare with Rhaeti. In 13 Tiberius was consul with P. Quinctilius. In 11, the same year in which he married Julia, and while his brother Drusus was fighting against the Germans, Tiberius was warring against the Dalmatians and Pannonians. In the year 9 Drusus was mortally wounded by a fall from his horse, and Augustus sent Tiberius to him. Tiberius returned to the war in Germany, and in the year 7 he was consul a second time. In the year 6 he obtained the tribunitia potestas for five years; but in this year he retired with the emperor's permission to Rhodes, where he spent 7 years. He returned to Rome in 2 CE, his troublesome wife Julia, who had been banished, dying in the meantime. After the death of his two sons, Augustus adopted Tiberius, with the view of leaving him the imperial power; but at the same time he required him to adopt Germanicus, the son of his brother Drusus, though Tiberius had a son Drusus by his wife Vipsania. From the year of his adoption to the death of Augustus, Tiberius was in command of the Roman armies, though he visited Rome occasionally. In the year 12 he was given a triumph at Rome for his German and Dalmatian victories. On the death of Augustus, Tiberius at once went to Rome, taking up the imperial power without opposition, though affecting some reluctance. The death of Germanicus in the east later relieved him of all fear of a rival claimant to the throne. Many believed that Germanicus was poisoned by his order. The tyranny of Tiberius increased, and many distinguished senators were put to death on charges of treason. He gave his complete confidence to Sejanus, who for many years possessed the real government of the state. In 26 Tiberius left Rome, never to return. He withdrew into Campania to escape criticism and to indulge his propensities in private. In order to give still greater secrecy to his conduct, he took up his residence in the island of Capri, a short distance from the Campanian coast. In the meantime his mother Livia died, leaving Tiberius almost entirely without restraint; but he finally turned on Sejanus, whom he caused to be executed and dragged about the streets. For the remainder of his reign, Rome continued to be the scene of tragic occurrences. Tiberius died on the 16th of March in the year 37 at the Villa of Lucallus, in Misenum. He was 78 years of age and had reigned 22 years. He was succeeded by Caius (Caligula), son of Germanicus. Tiberius wrote a brief commentary of his own life, the only book that the emperor Domitian studied; Suetonius made use of it for his life of Tiberius. Tiberius also wrote Greek poems, and a lyric poem on the death of L. Caesar. (The preceding note on Tiberius was excerpted by our translator and indefatigable note gatherer, Walter Schmauch, without attribution—it was a more innocent time—from Smith's 1870 Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities, Vol. 3, pp. 1116-1122 s.v. Tiberius).

Valerius, the Roman procurator sent to Judea by the emperor Tiberius, was the first to begin the sale of the high-priestly office. While procurator he appointed and deposed one high priest after another. First he deposed Annas (Amanum) and put Ismael (Hismaelis) the son of Jabus (Iabi) in his place; but not long afterwards he also deposed the latter, and appointed Eleazar, son of Annas the priest, as high priest. After the expiration of his year he deposed him also, and appointed Simon, son of Cemithis, to the position; but he also remained in office only one year. Having deposed him, Valerius finally appointed Caiaphas (Caypham), a haughty, proud, strange, fortunate and envious man. The evangelist has two of these bishops in mind when he says: Jesus was seized in the garden; and shortly the servants brought him before Annas, [Annas was a high priest of the Jews along with Caiaphas, his son-in-law. He was first appointed to that office by Cyrenius, proconsul of Syria, about 7 or 8 CE, but was afterwards deprived of it. After various changes the office was given to Joseph, also called Caiaphas, son-in-law of Annas, about 25 CE, who continued in office until 36 or 37 CE. But Annas, being his father-in-law, and having great influence and authority, could with propriety be still termed high priest along with Caiaphas. It was before him that Jesus was first taken on the night of the seizure]. the father-in-law of Caiaphas. And Annas sent Jesus to Caiaphas. And when Jesus testified that he was the same as God, Caiaphas said: He has blasphemed God. And to make this confession of Christ appear even more wicked, Caiaphas tore his own garments. Moreover, in order to arouse the people to condemn Jesus, Caiaphas cried, He is guilty of death! By his persuasive speaking (as the sacred history of the Gospel holds) Christ our Lord was condemned to death. [John 18:1; Matt. 26; Mark 24; Luke 22.]

Jesus Christ suffered in the 5230th year of the world and in the 18th year of the reign of Tiberius while two Roman consuls governed; being in the month which the Hebrews call Nisan, and we call April. To satisfy the envy of the priests, he was sold by Judas, one of his disciples; after which he was seized, accused, and, at the instance of the judge, was mocked and scourged. And they spit in his face and struck him; crowned him with thorns, and finally nailed him to a cross. And they reproached him with bitter words. And when he cried with a loud voice and willingly gave up the Spirit, the earth quaked, the sun darkened, and the veil of the temple was torn asunder. And when Longinus, the soldier, pierced the breast of the deceased with his spear, a mixture of blood and water flowed from the wound; from this the sacrament of the church in general had its beginning and origin. Christ was then taken from the cross and buried, and as Jonah came forth from the belly of the whale, so Jesus rose from the dead out of the bowels of the earth on the third day. He often appeared to his disciples, and in their midst and in their presence he ascended to heaven. And not without reason did Christ suffer at Jerusalem; for this was the city ordained for the sacrifice, in the center of the inhabited world; but he also suffered outside its walls, so that he made the sacrifice of his body not alone for his people, but for the pagans as well. [John 19:1-42].

Folio XCVI verso

Herod Antipas, son of Herod the Great, governed Galilee, after his brother Archelaus; and he ruled for 24 years. After the expulsion of Archelaus, the kingdom of the Jews was divided into four parts, and Galilee was given to Herod. He was a most unkind and cruel man, and showed a murderous disposition toward the citizens. He was a murderer of the nobility, and a savage toward his associates, a robber toward the inhabitants; and in the extermination of the people he spared neither his own children nor strangers, nor his own people. He ignored and dishonored everything; for he abolished the priesthood of the Jews and destroyed their laws and ordinances. And when he espoused the wife of his brother Philip, contrary to the law, and Saint John the Baptist reproached him for it, he wanted to kill him; but he feared the people, for John, as the evangelist states, was regarded by many as a true prophet. However, he caused him to be seized and imprisoned, and not long before the death of Christ he caused him to be beheaded. This is the Herod to whom Jesus was sent by Pilate, and by whom he was mocked and sent back to Pilate, because Jesus, as Luke writes, would not answer Herod's questions. Finally he was ordered to come to Rome by Caius the emperor, and was found guilty of many penal offenses, and was banished to Lyons, in Gaul. There he ended his life in misery; but his wife, who was a sister of Agrippa, and whom Caius loved very much, was given her freedom and was given permission to return home; but she followed her husband into exile, saying she did not want to leave her husband after having lived happily with him. And afterwards Caius gave the country of Galilee to Herod Agrippa, who from that time on held three fourths of the divided region. [Herodes Antipas, son of Herod the Great, by Malthace, a Samaritan, obtained the tetrarchy of Galilee and Perea, on his father's death, while the kingdom of Judea devolved upon his elder brother Archelaus. He married Herodias, the wife of his half-brother Herod Philip, after she had divorced her first husband. He had been previously married to a daughter of the Arabian prince Aretas, who left him in disgust at this new alliance. Aretas then immediately invaded the dominion of Antipas, and defeated the army that was opposed to him. In 38 CE, after the death of Tiberius, Antipas went to Rome to solicit from Caligula (Caius) the title of king, which had just been bestowed upon his nephew Herod Agrippa; but through the intrigues of Agrippa, who was high in the favor of the Roman emperor, Antipas was deprived of his dominions and sent into exile at Lyons in 39 CE. He was subsequently removed to Spain where he died. It was Antipas who imprisoned and put to death John the Baptist, who had reproached him for his (in John's opinion) unlawful connection with Herodias. It was before him also that Jesus was sent by Pontius Pilate at Jerusalem, as belonging to his jurisdiction, on account of his supposed Galilean origin].

In the land of Judea there were three sects of Jews, separated from the common life and thought of the others.

One of those sects was the Pharisees, which originated in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and which in these times (as we may infer from the Gospels) was, by reason of its profound sanctity, held in high esteem by the Jews at Jerusalem. They were called Pharisees, that is the 'separated' ones, because they were much more rigid than the rest in their spiritual practices and their diet. They wore parchment inscriptions on their foreheads, while on their left hands they wore the Ten Commandments, written in commemoration of the Law. They also wore a wide band of thorns, designed to prick them as a reminder of the divine commandments. They attributed God and his divine Providence to their forebears and ancestors, and acknowledged no contradictions. [That is, between the law itself and oral traditions. They devised ways to harmonize apparent inconsistencies between the Law and the Prophets, assigning to the oral traditions a place of authority side by side with the written law, regarding the former as an interpretation of the latter]. They believed in a future judgment (of reward or punishment), and in the immortality of the soul; hoped for, and predicted the resurrection of the dead. They were very much opposed to our Lord Christ, and were accessories in his death.

The Pharisees formed one of the most conspicuous and powerful sects among the Jews in the time of Jesus. Under foreign rule, and more especially under the Syrian (i.e, Macedonian) government, which left no means unemployed in order to effect an amalgamation of the different nationalities under its sway, it was natural that there should arise among the Jews a party which opposed this influence, and labored to preserve the national integrity. The Pharisees were this party, and as their name implies, separated themselves from the rest. Much of their influence with the people was no doubt due to their political position. On Herod's accession 6000 of them refused to take the oath of allegiance, and were consequently put down with a strong hand. It was the Pharisees who organized desperate resistance against the Romans, which finally led to the dispersion of the whole nation. As the Pharisees were national in politics, so they were orthodox in religion; and in opposition to the other two sects, the Sadducees and the Essenes, they stood among the people as the true expounders of the Law. In the time of Jesus, however, their orthodoxy was considered by some to have devolved into mere formalism.

The principal points of difference between the Pharisees and Sadducees were the doctrine of the immortality of the soul and the future reward or punishment; the doctrine of the divine Providence acting side by side with the free will of man; and the doctrine of an oral tradition descending from Moses and involving the same authority as the written law—all of which doctrines the Pharisees accepted and the Sadducees rejected. Teaching that God had given to Moses on Mount Sinai an oral explanation of the proper application of the written Law, and had commanded him to transmit this explanation by word of mouth, the Pharisees ended by placing the oral explanation above the written law. And thus they preferred the tradition to the law itself. They were also particular in avoiding anything that the law declared unclean.

The Sadducees were the second sect, but not of the same sanctity nor held in as high esteem as the Pharisees. They did not believe in divine Providence, but said that God is an observer of all things, and that it rested in the will of man to do good or evil. They denied the incarnation and the existence of angels, and believed that the soul died with the body. They accepted solely the five books of Moses. The Sadducees were serious and strict, but not spiritual among themselves. Because of their seriousness they were called Sadducees, that is, 'the just.' [The origin of the term Sadducees is obscure. The best theory is that the sect was derived from Zadok, the famous high priest whom Solomon appointed to succeed the deposed Abiathar. The Sadducees were a small party of limited influence, and a rationalistic turn of mind. They were men of position, and probably of wealth—world-minded, and with a superficial interest in religion. They were forerunners of the modern reform Jews. Their theology embraced four principal tenets: (1) Denial of the divinity, and consequent authority of the oral law; (2) acceptance of the teachings of Moses alone, and rejection of the later books of the Old Testament; (3) death of the soul with the body, in consequence of which they denied the resurrection, the doctrine of future rewards and punishments, and belief in angels or spirits; (4) that man had the most absolute moral freedom, for upon this was dependent the moral quality of his actions. They were also, according to the gospels, determined foes of Jesus. Annas and Caiaphas were Sadducees].

The Essenes were the third sect. In all respects they led the lives of monks or hermits; and avoided wedlock, not because they disapproved of it or attached no importance to childbearing, but to avoid the lasciviousness of women, believing that none of them are faithful to their husbands. They associated with each other in friendship, disparaging wealth and holding their possessions in common as brothers, as though they were sharers in one common patrimony. They did not respect anointing, considering it uncleanly; for they always wore clean white clothing. They had curators and stewards who administered their common property; but no certain abode, dwelling in any place. They did not change their clothes nor shoes until entirely torn or worn out by time. They were opposed to spiritual exercises and divine worship. They did not speak of profane matters before sunrise. At sunrise they prayed, and until the fifth hour they labored. After that they assembled in their white linen clothes, washed in cold water, and went to their meals, of which they did not partake without a prayer having been first offered to God. Grace was repeated after the meal. They operated their establishment with great industry, and no clamor, disturbance, or noise was heard while they worked, for they observed strict silence. They considered an oath perjury, and admitted no one to their sect except on one year's probation, when the applicant took an obligation of piety toward God, justice toward his fellow men, and obedience to the authorities; if placed in a superior position, he agreed never to employ his authority unjustly against those below him. Their court was attended by no less than 100 persons. Its judgment was final and conclusive. They held the day of rest inviolate; made no fire, nor cooked on that day, nor moved any vessel from its place; nor evacuated their digested food. On other days, when about to free themselves of digested food, they dug a hole into the earth with an axe, and covered themselves round about with their lowered garments so that they might not offend the divine rays of the sun with indecency. Having eased themselves, they filled the hole with the earth they had dug up. While he lived, Herod Antipas honored these Essenes or Essei.

This is an abridgment from the Works of Flavius Josephus, the historian of the Jews (See Vol. V, chap. VIII, pars. 2-13, pp. 75-84; translation of William Whiston; Thomas Tegg, London, 1825). The Essenes are not mentioned in the Old Testament, for they lived in isolated communities, and thus Jesus and his apostles did not encounter them. They represent the mystic and ascetic forms of Judaism, while the Pharisees represented the orthodox, and the Sadducees the rationalistic forms. Their name has never been satisfactorily explained. Some believe it means "the retiring," or "the Puritans;" others, "the healers." In Josephus's day they lived in small colonies or villages at long distances from the towns, principally in the neighborhood of the Dead Sea, although some lived in the cities. They believed in an unconditional Providence and the immortality of the soul, but not in the resurrection of the body; in future rewards to the righteous and the future punishment of the wicked. Their celibacy, sun-homage, and abstinence from sacrifice, were their non-Jewish qualities derived from the Zoroastrian religion; to these must be added their magical rites and intense striving after purity. In their life they were noted for their kindness to the sick and the poor. They opposed slavery; made medicines from herbs which were healing; and were modest and retiring in manner. According to Philo their general conduct was directed by three rules – "the love of God, the love of virtue, and the love of man." They disappear from history after the destruction of Jerusalem.

The last sentence of this paragraph is not found in the German edition of the Chronicle. In fact, it is followed by another sentence, also not found in the German edition, which the current editor cannot quite make sense of. It runs in Latin thus: nec inhonestus ?mo de eis in scripturis habetur. Hoc de prophetis Judeorum ('Nor is he considered (?mo) in the writings about them disgraceful. This thing concerning/from the prophets of the Jews.').

Veronica, a woman of Jerusalem, disciple of Christ, and esteemed for her piety and virtue, was at this time called to Rome with the handkerchief of Christ by Tiberius the emperor, through his strongest man, Volusianus. For this same emperor (as some relate) had been seized with a serious malady. As soon as he had received this holy woman and had touched the picture of Christ, he was cured of all illness. For this reason the emperor afterwards held this Veronica in great esteem, and she remained at Rome with the apostles Peter and Paul to her end. Pope Clement erected church to her. This is the woman who suffered with an issue of blood (as the Gospels state), and was cured of it by the Lord after touching the hem of his garment. At the time of his suffering she received from him as a token of his love this picture of his face. This same picture, impressed on cloth, Veronica bequeathed to Pope Clement and his successors in her will. To this day it is viewed with great devotion and contemplation at St. Peter's Church by people of the Christian faith, and much has been found written in praise of it. [It is an ancient tradition that when Jesus was on the way to Calvary, bearing the cross, he passed by the door of a compassionate woman, who, beholding the sweat of agony upon his brow, wiped his face with a napkin, or, as others say, with her veil, and the features of Jesus remained miraculously impressed upon the linen. To this image was given the name Vera Icon, 'the true image' (Latin vera = 'true' and Greek eikon = 'image'). The name of the image was insensibly transferred to the woman of whom the legend is related. According to the active imagination of the people, she was Veronica, or Berenice, the niece of King Herod, being the daughter of his sister Salome, who had been devoted to the pomps and vanities of the world, but on witnessing the sufferings and meekness of Jesus, was suddenly converted. The miraculous power of the sacred image impressed upon her napkin being universally recognized, she was sent for by the emperor Tiberius to cure him of a mortal malady; but since the emperor had already died by the time she arrived, she remained at Rome with Peter and Paul until she suffered martyrdom under Nero; or, according to another legend, she came to Europe in the same vessel with Lazarus and Mary Magdalene, and suffered martyrdom either in Provence or Aquitaine. According to Anna Jameson (from whose work the above is taken), these legends have been rejected by the Church since the eleventh century; but the memory of this compassionate woman, and the legend of the miraculous image, lingered on in the imagination of the people].

Xenarchus, a peripatetic philosopher, worthy of commemoration, and whom Strabo the historian heard in his youth, died at Seleucia in Cilicia during the time of the emperor Tiberius. And, as it is said, he did not reside there for long but went to Alexandria, Athens, or Rome to study. To old age he was always held in great esteem. Augustus the emperor favored him. But not long before this time and since his death, his works were lost. [Xenarchus of Seleucia in Cilicia (c. 50 BCE-c. 25 CE), was a Peripatetic philosopher and grammarian, in the time of Strabo, who heard him. He taught successively at Alexandria, Athens and Rome, where he enjoyed the friendship of Augustus].

Philo the Jew, a native of Alexandria, and a highly educated man, was held in great esteem during these times. He wrote many excellent and daring things, and with his skill and versatility he silenced the evil writings of Appianus (Appionis) against the Jews. Many have spoken of his versatility (in office)ility, saying that either Philo followed Plato, or Plato followed Philo. He finally came to Rome and had speech and dealings with Saint Peter. By him he was so well instructed in the faith that he afterward wrote much in praise of the Christian religion and practices; and these writings (as Jerome attests) are reckoned among the books called Ecclesiastes. And foremost of all he wrote enlightening interpretations upon the five books of Moses, and many other works. [Philo Judaeus, the Jew, was born in Alexandria, and was descended from a priestly family of distinction. He had already reached an advanced age when he went to Rome (40 CE) on an embassy to the emperor Caligula in order to procure the revocation of a decree that exacted from the Jews divine homage to the statue of the emperor. His most important works treat of the books of Moses, and are generally cited under different titles. His great object was to reconcile the Hebrew Scriptures with the doctrines of Greek philosophy, and to point out the conformity between the two. He maintained that the fundamental truths of the former were derived from the Mosaic revelation, and to work out an agreement, he had recourse to an allegorical interpretation of the books of Moses].

Agrippina was born to Marcus Agrippa by Julia, the daughter of the emperor Octavian. She was the mother of the emperor Caius Caligula and was esteemed among the intelligent and renowned women. She was, in those times, deliberately caused so much sorrow by the emperor Tiberius, that she starved herself to death. She was married in her youth to Germanicus, a handsome and virtuous youth, whom Tiberius had been obliged to adopt. She bore him three sons. One, called Caligula, afterward ruled over the Romans. She also bore him three daughters, one of whom was called Agrippina and was the mother of Nero. Her husband was done away with by poison through Tiberius; and because she mourned the death of her husband with great lamentations, as was the custom of women, Tiberius therefore hated her, and those of his people who held her by the arms increased her sorrow by mockery and unbecoming conduct. She determined to escape his haughtiness by starvation, and soon she refrained from eating her food. When Tiberius learned of this, being accustomed to compel women to eat by threats and beatings, he caused her to be fed by force. But being still more embittered against Tiberius in consequence, she gradually accomplished her own death by this means. And as by her death she earned much praise on the part of her own people, so she at the same time caused Tiberius much harm and ill repute. [Agrippina, daughter of M. Vipsanius Agrippa and of Julia, the daughter of Augustus, married Germanicus, by whom she had nine children, among whom was the emperor Caligula, and Agrippina, the mother of Nero. She was distinguished by her virtues and heroism, and shared all the dangers of her husband's campaigns. On his death in 17 CE she returned to Italy; but the favor in which she was received by the people increased the hatred and jealousy which Tiberius and his mother Livia had long entertained toward her. For some years Tiberius disguised his hatred, but at length under the pretext that she was forming ambitious plans, he banished her to the island of Pandataria (30 CE), where she died three years later, probably by voluntary starvation].

Agrippa the Great, son of king Aristobulus, succeeded his father and ruled over the Jews for seven years. He was by nature a good man, and he adorned the city of Jerusalem at his own expense. But the son of Aristobulus, whom the father of Herod killed, came to Tiberius;

but as the latter would not entertain his complaint, he stayed at Rome to secure assistance by various means. Now Agrippa was very friendly with Caius (Caligula), the son of Germanicus, and after he said that Germanicus should be emperor, he was accused before Tiberius, and by him imprisoned and held in severe confinement for six months, until the death of Tiberius, when he was liberated by Caius, who gave him the region called Philippi, and so made him a king. In lieu of the iron chain that he wore in prison, Caius gave him a golden one. When he left Rome and came to Jerusalem, he went into the temple and made a sacrifice, and there hung up the same chain as a perpetual memorial. But as he finally went to Caesarea, and permitted himself to be called a god, he was slain by an angel, and with a bloated body he said: I was formerly called a god, so now here I lie in the bondage of death. He died at the age of 57 years, and left a seventeen-year-old son Agrippa, and three daughters, Berenice, Maria, and Drusilla. He had a brother named Herod, king of Chalcis, who acted as regent for the young king. [Agrippa Herodes, called "Agrippa the Great," son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and grandson of Herod the Great, was educated at Rome with the future emperor Claudius, and Drusus the son of Tiberius. Having given offense to Tiberius, he was imprisoned; but Caligula, on his accession, released him, and gave him the tetrarchies of Abilene, Batanaea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis. On the death of Caligula, Agrippa, who was at the time in Rome, assisted Claudius in gaining possession of the empire. As a reward for his services Judea and Samaria were annexed to his dominions. His government was mild and gentle, and he was exceedingly popular among the Jews. It was probably to increase his popularity with them that he caused the apostle James to be beheaded, and Peter to be cast into prison. The manner of his death that took place in the same year at Caesarea (44 CE) is related in Acts 12. By his wife Cypros he had a son, Agrippa, and three daughters, Berenice, Mariamne (called Maria in the), and Drusilla. According to Acts 12:21-23 "upon a certain day Herod, arrayed in royal apparel, sat upon his throne, and made an oration to them. And the people gave a shout, saying, It is the voice of a god and not of a man. And immediately the angel of the Lord struck him, because he gave not God the glory; and he was eaten by worms, and gave up the Spirit."]

Regensburg (Ratisbona), the celebrated and memorable free city on the Danube, was built by Tiberius Nero in the year Jesus Christ suffered for the salvation of the human race; and at one time it was the capital city of Bavaria. In ancient times this region was occupied by the Norici, for which reason a portion of it is still called Norica to this day. After the Norici came the Baioaria; and it is now called Bavaria. This same Bavarian name originated from the Boii, [Boii, one of the most powerful of the Celtic people, said to have originally dwelt in Gaul (Transalpine), but in what part of the country is uncertain. At an early time they migrated in two great swarms, one of which crossed the Alps and settled in the country between the Po and the Apennines; the other crossed the Rhine and settled in that part of Germany called Boihemum (Bohemia) after them, and between the Danube and the Tyrol. The Boii in Germany were subdued by the Marcomanni, and expelled from the country. We find 32,000 Boii taking part in the Helvetian migration; and after the defeat of the Halvetians (58 BCE) Caesar allowed these Boii to dwell among the Aedui, a powerful people in Gaul, who lived between the Liger (Loire) and the Arar (Saone)]. a Gallic people who (as Strabo states), having been driven out of their country by the Romans, migrated to the Danube and lived with the Taurisci. [The Taurisci were a Celtic people of Noricum, and this was probably the old Celtic name of the entire population of the country. They were subsequently called Norici by the Romans after their capital Noreia]. They also lived in Pannonia, from whence they probably extended themselves into the neighboring region of Norica. Although, according to Strabo, this region was at one time a wilderness, it is now built up, and has renowned cities and noble fortifications. But of these Regensburg excels all others in beauty. In Bavaria there are five episcopal cities. The capital is the archi-episcopal city of Salzburg, so called from the river on which it lies. The ancients called it Juvanum (or Juvavia), that is, Helffenburg. The bishopric of Regensburg was very celebrated, and all of Bohemia was subject to it. The city has seven names: Firstly, it is named Tiberina, or Tiburina, after its builder; for Tiberius, son of Livia, the wife of Augustus, and step-son of Augustus, was sent by Augustus with a great army against the Norici, or Bavarians, and against the Vindelici. He subdued them; and he built the city; and after him it was called Tiberina. Secondly, for some time the city was called Quadrata, the square city; for it was built in that form and was surrounded by a wall of large square stones, of which remains may be seen behind St. Paul's Church. Thirdly, it was called Hyatopolis or Hyaspolis, because of the coarse rustic speech of the people in the neighborhood, who pronounced their words with wide-open mouths; [After 'hiatus,' a 'gap' or 'opening' in Greek; grammatically the strained pronunciation arising when one vowel immediately follows another without being combined with it, as if we should say "a apple"; a hiatus within a word being called internal, between words external]. but also because of the manner in which the rivers here spread out and flow together again. The Danube, Nab, and Regen flow into one another toward the north. Fourthly, it was called Germansheim, after the German people who frequented the city; or after Germanicus, who ruled over the city. Fifthly, Reginopolis, or Koenigsburg, because kings and princes assembled there, as the palatial towers and tall buildings of the lords indicate. Sixthly, it was named after the river Imber (in German, Regen); [Imber, the Latin for rainwater; water or liquid in general; a rain cloud or storm cloud. The German regen means rain]. that is, Imbriopolis, or Regensburg; for the river Regen flows into the Danube to the north of the city, and there the city was begun. For it the city was named Regensburg, which name has remained to this day. Seventhly, it is called Ratisbona, after the small merchant vessels or boats that came there, and the vessels that during the war laid about it for protection in the time of Charlemagne. And the city was strengthened with fortifications, and is to this day is called Ratisbona in the Latin. The Danube, the great river of Germany, originates in the German mountains, and sixty navigable rivers flow into it. It flows by this renowned city, and over it is a very strong bridge with many arches built in the year of the Lord one thousand one hundred and fifteen. The most Christian emperor, Charlemagne (Karolus Magnus), subjugated the whole of Bavaria by force of arms; but Taxillo (Taxilo), the Duke of Bavaria, together with his neighbors, the Huns, made war against Charlemagne. Before long he made peace with them, receiving a number of hostages. And he turned against the city of Regensburg and the unbelievers in it, capturing the city and compelling them to accept the Christian faith. In the same war a great number of unbelievers and Huns were slain before Regensburg. Charlemagne lost a number of men there, who lie buried in the Basilica of St. Peter outside the city. Afterwards this city greatly prospered and increased, and was thereafter adorned with an episcopal church dedicated to St. Peter. Before that time it was called the church of St. Remigius. [Remigius, also called Remi or Remy (c. 437-533), was bishop of Reims and the friend of Clovis, whom he converted to Christianity. According to Gregory of Tours, 3,000 Franks were baptized with Clovis by Remigius on Christmas Day, 496, after the defeat of the Alamanni. Many fictions have grown up around his name; for example, that he anointed Clovis with oil from the sacred ampulla, and that Pope Hormisdas had recognized him as primate of France]. This celebrated structure has not yet been completed. The city is also adorned with a large cloister, that of St. Emmeran, of the Benedictine Order. Here also are two abbeys to Our Lady, an upper and a lower, and in the lower, Bishop Erhard lies at rest. Many houses in this city have consecrated churches and their own priests. Emperor Arnolfus, out of particular affection for this city above all other cities of the realm, enlarged it with a wall, comprehending the cloister of St. Emmeran, which he beautified. Then, as he returned from battle between the Normans and the Bavarians, he gave the relics of St. Dionysius the Areopagite to this cloister in his old age, together with a beautiful book of Gospels written in letters of gold; and finally he was buried there. This city is glorified by the esteemed martyr St. Emmeran, the bishop, and with St. Wolfgang, the eleventh bishop of the city, who worked wonders there and built St. Paul's Cloister. So also Albertus Magnus, a man highly informed in learning and all the arts, officiated here as bishop.

Rejoice, Regensburg (Ratisbona), for your excellent gifts:
 You enclose four bodies of saints in yourself,
 Bodies that are most pleasing to us. There is the holy Dionysius,
 First in the number of these; Emmeran (Emerammus) praise no less;
 Wolfgang and Erhard, neither of whom is slow in providing a cure.
 With the prayers of these four and of others
 We are led from here to the stars of the happy heavens.

Regensburg, or Ratisbona, a very ancient city in that part of Bavaria, formerly called Rhaetia secunda, is a city and Episcopal see of Germany, and the capital of the government district of the Upper Palatinate. It is situated on the right bank of the Danube, opposite the influx of the Regen, 86 miles northeast of Munich, and 60 miles southeast of Nuremberg. The pre-Roman settlement of Radespona was chosen by the Romans, who named it Castra Regina, as the center of their power on the upper Danube. It was made an Episcopal see in the eighth century by Boniface, and from the eleventh to the fourteenth century it was one of the most flourishing and populous cities of Germany. It became the seat of the dukes of Bavaria and was the focus from which Christianity spread over southern Germany. Emmeran founded an abbey here in the seventh century. Regensburg acquired the freedom of the empire in the thirteenth century. It became the chief seat of the trade with India and the Levant, and the boatmen of Regensburg are frequently heard of expediting the journeys of the Crusaders. Numerous imperial diets were held here in the Middle Ages, and from 1663 to 1806 it was the permanent seat of the Imperial Diet. The Reformation found only temporary acceptance at Regensburg, and was met by a counterreformation inspired by the Jesuits. Before this time the city had almost wholly lost its commercial importance owing to changes in the great highways of trade. Regensburg is said to have suffered in all no fewer than 17 sieges. By the peace of Luneville it was adjudged to the primate Dalberg, and in 1810 the town and bishopric were ceded to Bavaria, after the disastrous defeat of the Austrians beneath its walls the preceding year, when part of the town had been reduced to ashes.

St. Peter's Cathedral at Regensburg is one of the principal Gothic edifices in Bavaria. Its foundations were laid in 1275, but the building was not completed until 1524. The two towers, each 303 feet high, according to the woodcut, were in course of construction when the Chronicle was issued and were not completed until 1869. The structural arrangement of the interior resembles that of the Strasbourg Minster. The sumptuous high altar is entirely covered with silver. In the cloisters, adorned with ornate windows, are the tombs of cannons and wealthy citizens.

The oldest Christian structures date back to the Carolingian period, and for the student of the art history of the early Middle Ages Regensburg is almost as important as Nuremberg is for the subsequent centuries. Some of the numerous ancient owners, and the mansions of the old patrician families, with their towers of defense, dating from the 13th century, are a reminiscence of early German civic.

On the north side of the cathedral is the Bishop's Palace, built about 975 by Wolfgang, eleventh bishop of the city, of whom the Chronicle makes mention as having worked wonders here and as the builder of St. Paul's cathedral.

The Dominican Church, begun in 1273 and completed in 1400, is a well-proportioned early Gothic edifice; while the former old Benedictine Abbey of St. Emmeran is one of the oldest in Germany. Built in the 13th century, and remarkable as one of the few German churches with a detached belfry, the beautiful cloisters of the ancient abbey, one of the oldest in Germany, are still in fair preservation. In 1809 its conventual buildings were converted into a palace for the prince of Thurn and Taxis, hereditary postmaster-general of the Holy Roman Empire. Next to it is the Church of St. Emmeran, with the tombs of the martyr St. Emmeran (c. 700 CE), Emperor Henry the Wrangler, who died in 995, and the Blessed Aurelia.

In place of the seven-line poem that concludes the description of Regensburg in the Latin text of the Chronicle, the German edition offers the following sentences (in prose): "As the holy relics of four saints—St. Dionysius, St. Emmeran, St. Wolfgang and St. Erhard, are here treasured up. Thus this city may indeed be deservedly happy in its possession of these holy patrons and fathers before the Almighty God."

CITY OF REGENSBURG (RATISBONA)

A large two-page woodcut. In the foreground is the Danube, on which the city is located at the influx of the Regen. It is a well-fortified place. Shipping is indicated by a number of flat-bottom boats loaded with merchandise in barrels. Two bridges mentioned in the text. To defend the Danube the Romans extened a line of fortifications—the limes, as they were called, which began at Regensburg, and keeping well to the north of the river, were carried to the neighborhood of Stuttgart. A circular stonewall on this side of the river contains a drawbridge which leads to a gate, above which are the armorial bearings of the city—keys crossed in a field of red. The unfinished church of St. Peter appears in the center of the city. From one point of the wall chains extend to a peculiar side-wheeler, apparently used for stretching these chains across the river for defense.

Vienna of Pannonia is a widely celebrated city in Austria, and is situated on the river Danube. This same river divides Bavaria, Austria and Hungary. It passes through Rascia [Raška (alternative spellings have included Raschka, Rascia and Rassa) was the central and most successful medieval Serbian state that unified neighboring Serbian tribes into a main medieval Serbian state in the Balkans]. and Bulgaria, has sixty navigable tributaries, and terminates in the Euxine after touching many distinguished cities. Among these cities none are as wealthy, well populated or ancient as Vienna, the principal city and capital of the country. The city was formerly (as one discovers in the ancient ducal privileges) called Flavianum, after Flavius, the prefect who governed this region and began the city; or, after Flavius, the emperor, who proceeded to the Danube to establish the boundaries of the Roman Empire; and, in part the city is said to have received its name from him. Now when the Germans speak of Flavianum, they use the abbreviated form, Flavienn. And so, not without reason, the first syllable Fla (as otherwise often written), was discarded, and so Vienn (Wienn) remained. For that reason this city was accordingly called Vienna. But some are of the opinion that the city was named after the little river Vienna which flows between it and the suburbs. This great and mighty city, according to the circuit of its walls, has a circumference of two thousand paces, and has large and spacious suburbs, protected by moat and mound. The city has tall stout battlements and is provided with many towers and defenses against war. Here are also large and beautiful residences of its citizens, secure, strong and tall; but many of the houses are roofed with unsightly shingles, and but few with tiles. The other buildings are of stone masonry. Some are painted, so that they shine inside and out. Every house as you enter it gives the impression of a princely residence. The houses of the nobles and the church officials are public. Here also are to be seen large and illustrious buildings of stone erected to the honor of the Almighty God and the saints; and wonderful consecrated church edifices containing statuary. Many costly relics are covered with gold, silver and precious stones; and there are highly ornate churches. The city is located in the bishopric of Pataviensis; [The German edition of the says Passau]. and the daughter is greater than her mother. Here also are the four orders of the Mendicants; also the Scottish brothers and St. Augustine's Regular Canons, who are greatly respected. Also the Cloister of the Virgin, and that of St. Jerome, in which are received common sinful women who have been converted, and who day and night sing the praises of God in the German tongue. Those who relapse into sin are thrown into the Danube. But here they lead a virtuous and holy life, so that evil report or slander is seldom heard against them. In this city there is also a university of the liberal arts; and for the study of the Holy Scriptures and the canon law, newly established by Pope Urban VI. Here assemble a remarkable number of students from Hungary and Upper Germany. It is estimated that about fifty thousand attend Holy Communion. Eighteen men are elected to the Council; also a judge to preside over court matters and legal transactions, and a mayor who assumes civic responsibility. There are no other officials, except those who collect the tax on wine. They are consulted in all matters, and their tenure is from year to year. An incredible variety of things necessary to human sustenance are brought to this city daily. Many wagons and carts arrive with eggs and crabs; baked bread, meats, fish and fowl, without number, are brought there; but by vespers the supply is exhausted. The grape harvest extends over a period of forty days. Two or three times daily at least three hundred wagons loaded with grapes are on their way, and about twelve hundred horses are employed in the grape harvest daily. An incredible amount of wine is brought to this city daily, and either consumed or shipped with great care and labor up the Danube, against the current of the river. The wine cellars are so large and deep that it is believed the buildings at Vienna are more underground than above it. The streets and avenues are paved with hard stones, and the pavement is not easily injured by the wheels of the heavily loaded wagons. In the homes clean household utensils are found in great number. Here also are large stables for horses and all kinds of animals; arcades and vaultings everywhere, and large quarters and rooms where one may be secure against the inclemency of winter; everywhere there are transparent windows. The doors are generally of iron. The songs of many birds are heard. Old families are seldom found among the Viennese; for most of them immigrated here, or are foreigners. While in his younger days the Emperor Frederick III was at enmity and war with Matthias (Mathia), the king of the Hungarians, the city of Vienna, the emperor's most distinguished inheritance, suffered great harm and injury at the hands of the said Hungarian king; for he subjected the Viennese to much damage, caused the emperor embarrassment, and finally deprived him of the city. But after King Matthias died, the emperor Frederick, now well along in years, recovered Vienna through his son, King Maximilian.

Vienna was originally the ancient town of Vindobona, or Vendobona, located on the Danube in Upper Pannonia. Although originally a Celtic place, it afterward became a Roman municipum, as we learn from inscriptions. According to Ptolemy, for some time the town bore the name of Juliobona. It was situated at the foot of Mount Cetius, on the road running along the right bank of the river, and in the course of time became one of the most important military stations on the Danube; for after the decay of Carnuntum it was not only the station of the principal part of the Danubian fleet, but also of the Legio X Gemina (the twin legion, was one of the four legions used by Julius Caesar in 58 BCE, for his invasion of Gaul) in the 2nd century CE. The emperor Marcus Aurelius died at Vendobona 180 CE.

During the period of the Great Migrations and the succeeding centuries the traces of Vienna are lost; but tradition ascribes the foundation of St. Peter's Church to Charlemagne (800 CE), the Church of St. Rupprecht being older still. After the establishment of the Ostmark (Austria) it revived. In 1137 "Wienne" is mentioned as a "small civitas." In the same year the cathedral of St. Stephen (Stephansdom) was founded, and a commercial town grew up about it. Later, under the Babenberger, Vienna became an important trading center, as well as the center of a brilliant court life and an important school of lyric poetry. The great epics of the Niebelungen and Gudrun were composed near its walls. Many monastic orders were established and many churches built.

Albert, the first Habsburg to enter Vienna, came into immediate conflict with the city, which he invested and forced to capitulate, annulling many of its privileges. The era of the earlier Habsburgs was generally unfortunate; the plague, the visitations of robbers and mercenary soldiers, the financial crisis and monetary depreciation, and the ceaseless internecine wars of the Habsburgs, hit the city very hard; yet it remained a wealthy and important center, and some of the Habsburgs were its generous patrons, notably Rudolph IV who founded the university in 1356, and did much toward the reconstruction of the cathedral of St. Stephen. Under Frederick IV Vienna at first preserved neutrality; but it was the center of the movement against Frederick led by Eiczing, and after Archduke Albrecht had twice stormed the city in 1458, a radical opposition was formed, and Frederick was besieged in the Hofburg (1462). Matthias Corvinus of Hungary, after taking Vienna, made it his residence. In 1529 Vienna had to stand a siege from the Turkish troops. The suburbs were deserted, and more and more of the inhabitants crowded into the old town.

The second siege of Vienna by the Turks, in 1683, was the indirect cause of the appearance of the characteristic Viennese coffee houses or cafes, almost simultaneously with another less characteristically Viennese product of the Orient – the lilac, planted in Vienna, to spread from there over western Europe. The disappearance of the Turkish danger ushered in a time of rapid expansion. The Hofburg was rebuilt, its library and stables constructed, together with a number of buildings in sumptuous baroque style. The architecture of the later 18th century is by comparison sober and practical.

The reign of Francis I created the typical Viennese of tradition: frivolous, non-political, discontented, easy-going ("Alt-Wien" with its waltzes). Then came the Revolution of 1848. Again Vienna suffered a siege; this time from the troops of its own emperor, by whom it was quickly reduced. The modern period under Franz Joseph saw another transformation. The old ramparts were leveled, the great Ringstrasse built in their place. A great number of new buildings were erected. In the latter half of the 19th century the population increased rapidly. The municipality again became a powerful political and cultural force.

ILLUSTRATION CITY OF VIENNA

The city is represented by a large two-page woodcut extending over Folio XCVIII verso and XCIV recto. In the foreground is the Danube, not depicted as a great river, but as a sluggish little creek, in which two geese are disporting themselves. The water cannot be very deep, for their entire bodies appear above the surface of the water. They look stolid enough to be wooden decoys. Beyond a wild scrubby shore is the city wall, rather shy of turrets and towers. The houses are closely set together, and beyond it appears the open country, hilly and rocky. A tall church steeple appears at the right, surmounted by a sketchy figure resembling an eagle with outspread wings. To the right is a church, whose steeple is surmounted with a nondescript figure. Except for the churches, the architecture is decidedly monotonous. Of the vineyards, concerning which the text has so much to say, there is not a sign, and there is no commerce on the meager river. The vegetation along the river is sparse and blasted, and most of the trees about the landscape resemble puffballs.

Folio XCIX verso and C recto

ILLUSTRATION CITY OF NUREMBERG (NUREMBERGA)

We have before us one of the most important woodcuts in the entire Chronicle. It covers two full pages, verso and recto. And here, of course, we have a right to expect the designer to be perfectly at ease in his own hometown. In the lower right hand corner, on the banks of the river Pegnitz, is Ulman Stromer's paper mill. Stromer was Germany's first paper-maker, and it is at this mill that the paper for the Chronicle was made. As we proceed to the left we meet a pedestrian, staff in hand, and burdened with a large basket that is strapped to his back, such as was used in those days and for centuries later in the delivery of wares or merchandise. He is approaching three wayside crosses—the central one representing the cross upon which Jesus was crucified, as is indicated by the symbolical spear and sponge. The circle in the center of the cross no doubt represents the crown of thorns, and above it is the board upon which the inscription was placed. On either side is a T-shaped cross upon which Jesus' two fellow crucified victims suffered, and hanging from each of these is a cudgel representing the instrument with which their bones were broken. Beyond this is a wayside shrine—a stone monument inscribed with a suggestion of the crucifixion. Further on we meet a man in armor whose steed prances along in the direction of the city gate, probably bound for the Castle. As we anticipate his course, we come upon a bent old lady, hobbling along by the aid of a walking stick, under her heavily loaded basket. As we approach the city gate, we note the coat of arms of the city of Nuremberg above it. This portal is reached by means of the rather flimsy wooden bridge over the moat that surrounds the walled city. Looking closely, we note that there are two walls, both bristling with towers, bastions and other defenses. We may not be able to count 365 towers with which the Chronicle credits the city, but the woodcutter has given us the idea that there must have been a great number of these, many square, some round.

To the right the river Pegnitz enters through another gate, which is protected by a portcullis. As we gaze upon the city we see that it is built upon a slope, in fact a series of slopes, in the midst of a sandy plain, which is some 900 feet above the sea. The moat that we must cross was originally 100 feet wide and 50 feet deep. As we pass through the gate we come upon numerous steeply gabled buildings, most of which are covered with red tile. We enter a labyrinth of crooked narrow streets, and feel an ambition to climb the hill that culminates in a varied group of buildings on the Castle rock. We regret that we are not able to identify the Albrecht Dürer house, nor the Koberger establishment in which the Chronicle itself was printed. But we are certain of the old Castle on the summit of the hill, with its formidable outbuildings and towers. To the left, silhouetted against the horizon, are the twin spires of the churches of St. Lorenz and St. Sebald, of which something is said in the succeeding text and the accompanying notes.

At the inception of their career as city builders the Germans settled about isolated strongholds, or fastnesses. Until the Carolingian period agriculture and the chase sustained them and sat (in office)isfied their needs. They had little or no trade, nor were they much interested in commerce. Even much later than the Roman incursions they were rather averse to living in walled-up towns. Although they had before them the Roman colonies and their foundations, such as Cologne (Colonia), Mainz (Maguncia), Metz (Metis), Augsburg (Augusta), and Regensburg (Ratisbona), only few of the inhabitants in earlier times decided to stay or live there. They called the inhabitants of these towns burghers, and the place a burg: And the former is even today the German word for 'citizen'; while the word burg has attached itself to the names of many places, such as Hamburg, Regensburg, Salzburg, etc. The word stadt (city) would appear to have been used for the first time in the Niebelungen, Germany's great national epic.

The 500-year period from the 10th to the 14th century was one of great civic activity for German-speaking lands. No less than 2000 cities sprang up within that time. Many castles had been built by the nobility, and in the wake of Christianity came bishoprics, monasteries, churches and shrines, all of which attracted multitudes and stimulated the creation and growth of communities about them.

The development of the medieval city was not according to any fixed plan. Although in the 18th century and later it was considered preferable to locate towns in level country, the medieval builder preferred a rugged and picturesque topography, showing a decided preference for elevated ground. No doubt greater security was also a factor in this choice. The old city of Nuremberg slopes up to considerable heights on either side of the river.

These cities were often massively circumscribed with their walls and fortifications. The residences and places of business are closely crowded together about the public buildings and churches—a point emphasized by our woodcut.

Folio C verso

Nuremberg is a city very much celebrated throughout Germany, as well as among foreign people; and it is extensively visited. It is a celebrated manufacturing center of Germany, and is adorned with beautiful public and private buildings. A very old royal castle, located on a hill (or mount) dominates the city, and from it one has a view of the city and beyond. Some are of the opinion that the city has its name from this castle. [Castle in German is 'burg.'] Some say that the city was built by Tiberius Nero, the emperor, after Regensburg was built; or that it was called Neronenberg after Drusus Nero, his brother, who fought the Germans; for Tiberius the emperor's paternal line, is from the family of Tiberius Nero.

The origin and name of Nuremberg are both involved in obscurity. The forms of the name – Nourenberg, Nourimperc, Nuernberg, Nuremberc, etc. – have resulted in many speculations as to origin and history. Our author has drawn upon the name of Drusus Nero (Neronenberg); and, enlarging upon the probable origin of the city, states that it has been attributed to a camp or citadel established there by Tiberius Claudius Nero (Neronenberg), and named for himself. However, there is no evidence of Roman colonization. The Nero's castle (or Norix Tower) theory is but another speculation. The Heidenturm – the Pagan Tower of the Castle – is so called from some carvings on its walls, which were once called idols. One writer maintains that this was an ancient temple to Diana, insisting that the carvings are figures of dogs and two male figures with clubs, who must be Hercules and his son Noricus—hence Norixberg. However, the figures are not dogs but lions, and the male figures are saints or Israelite kings, and not pagan images. Others suggest that Noriker, driven out by the Huns, settled here and laid the foundation of the city. There is no authority to support these speculations, many of which are forced and unnatural. Chroniclers seem to have proceeded on the theory that origins must be accounted for in some manner, though the question may be of little consequence and the facts of history offer no solution.

As Cecil Headlam, in The Story of Nuremberg, observes, the history of the city begins in the year 1050, the silence regarding the place indicating that the castle did not exist until 1025 and was probably built between that year and 1050. On the latter date Henry III called a council of Bavarian nobles "in fundo suo Nourinberc."

As Suetonius Tranquillus writes, Livia was pregnant by Tiberius, and had also born him a son before that, when he was obliged to give her up at the request of Octavian. He died soon thereafter. Two sons survived him, namely Tiberius and Drusus, surnamed Nero after him. [Livia Drusilla, daughter of Livius Drusus Claudianus, was married first to Tiberius Claudius Nero and afterwards to Augustus, who compelled her husband to divorce her in 38 BCE. She had already born her husband one son, the future emperor Tiberius, and at the time of her marriage with Augustus she was six months pregnant with another child, Drusus. She had no children by Augustus, but retained his affections until her death. It is believed she caused the two grandsons of Augustus to be poisoned to secure the succession for her own children. She was even suspected of having hastened the death of Augustus. When her son Tiberius took the throne she attempted to secure an equal share in the government, but this he would not brook. He commanded her to retire from public affairs, and soon even displayed hatred toward her. She died in 29 CE]. According to the Sabine tongue, Nero means strong or strenuous. Afterwards Tiberius conducted successive wars against Burgundy and France, which had become restless through the incursions of the barbarians and the dissensions among their own rulers, and against the Rhaetians (Rheticum) and the Vindelici, and in Pannonia and in Germany. In the same wars he defeated the Alpine nations of the Rhaetians and the Vindelici, and in Pannonia the Brenni and the Dalmatians. In the German wars he carried off into Gaul forty thousand who had surrendered, settling them permanently on the shores of the Rhine. For these achievements he joyfully returned to Rome to celebrate his triumph with all the evidences of victory. His glory and might were thus greatly enhanced. He subjugated all Greece, the interior of Italy, the kingdoms of Noricum, Thrace, and Macedonia, and the lands lying between the Danube and the Adriatic. Claudius Tiberius Nero (as Eutropius [Eutropius, the Roman historian, held the office of secretary under Constantine the Great. He was patronized by Julian the Apostate, whom he accompanied in the Persian expedition. He is the author of a brief compendium of Roman history in ten books, from the foundation of the city to the accession of Valens in 364 CE. He appears to have drawn on the best authorities, and he executed his task with care. His work was much used by medieval historians and compilers (e.g. our chronicler, Hartmann Schedel)]. states) was a man of ability in the art of war, and was fortunate before he assumed the throne. He contrived to have the cities named after himself. [For Tiberius Claudius Nero see Folio XCVI recto]. The most ancient books of history call this citadel a Norican castle. The Romans, in order to avoid being overrun by their enemies, who maintained themselves in the mountains, built citadels and castles on the mountains in Noricum and in many regions of Germany. The city has a single elevation, upon which the castle was built for its protection. And although (as the highly celebrated Pope Pius II writes of the city), there is a doubt whether it is Franconian or Bavarian, yet its name indicates that it belongs to Bavaria, for it is called Noremburg, the equivalent of Norixborg, and the region between the Danube and Nuremberg is called the "Norckaw." However, the city lies in the bishopric of Bamberg, which belongs to Franconia. Nevertheless the Nurembergers neither wished to be considered Bavarians nor Franconians, but a distinct people. The city is divided into two parts by a river called the Pegnitz. We pass from one part to the other by beautiful stone bridges erected over the river. The city is built on sandy arid soil, and in consequence its people are industrious craftsmen. All are either ingenious workmen, inventors, and masters of various wonderful and subtle arts and crafts, useful and ornamental, or are enterprising merchants and manufacturers. The city is by some regarded as modern, for little is found about it in the writings of the ancients, and no manner of foot prints or indications of age appear in it except the aforesaid citadel and some houses, which are not a matter of wonder to anyone. This is also true of many other cities, not only in Germany but in Italy and other countries, and of Rome, the most celebrated city in the world, of whose origin, age and founders much of a doubtful nature appears to have been written by the historians. However, it is known that Nuremberg flourished in the time of Charlemagne. For later Charlemagne, king of the Franks, determined to elevate and increase the churches, and to enlarge the Roman Empire. And he subdued the Saxons, brought the Britons and Gauls into alliance, and made peace with Tassilo, the Bavarian duke, according to the wishes of Pope Adrian. But as Tassilo would not appear in person, nor send citizens as sureties, Charles declared war against him, leading his forces into Bavaria, and dividing the people into three regions; and he ordered the Austrians (Austrasios), Thuringians (Turingos), and Saxons to encamp on the Danube, while his son Pepin (Pipinus) remained with the Italian forces at Trient (Tridentum). But Charles kept ward with one-third of the forces at Nuremberg and the vicinity; and he built a small chapel, which Pope Leo III (who followed him to Paderborn (Paderborn) in Saxony), on his return to Rome, dedicated in honor of Saint Catherine the virgin and martyr; and it is now called after the old prince. [Charlemagne (724-814), was king of the Franks from 800-814 CE, and so we must regard the statement that Nuremberg flourished in his time as merely legendary. There is a story that he visited Nuremberg, but as suggested by Cecil Headlam, "He, you may be sure, was lost in the woods while hunting near Nuremberg, and passed all night alone, unhurt by wild beasts. As a token of gratitude for God's manifest favor, he caused a chapel to be built on the spot. The chapel stands to this day – a twelfth-century building – but no matter! For did not Otto I, as our chroniclers tell us, attend mass in St. Sebald's Church in 970, although St. Sebald's Church cannot have been build till a century later?"] Some say that once upon a time this city was under the power of the noble lord, Albrecht, a count of the Francks, and that after his death (for he was slain by the emperor Ludwig (Ludovico) pursuant to the treachery of Hatto, bishop of Mainz) it became subject to Rome. Since that time it remained attached to the Roman Empire with great fidelity and without dissension; and it served the Roman kings with a high degree of faith and loyalty. The city suffered heavy oppression and damage during the quarrels of the Roman emperors, particularly in the reign of Henry (Heinrico) the Fourth, whose son through divine vengeance (as one says), persecuted him with war. As the Nurembergers remained loyal to the father,

Folio CI recto

they were besieged and taken by the son with the help of his supporters, as the trustworthy historians Otto Friesingen and Gotfried Viterbius write. The same King Henry marched against Würzburg (Herbipolim), deposed the bishop Erlongus and installed Robert. Afterwards he permitted the Saxons to return home, and with the Bavarians he captured the citadel at Nuremberg. After besieging it two months or more, he proceeded against Regensburg (Ratisbonam), the capital city of the dukedom of Noricum. He was followed by his father, who drove out the bishop Robert, and reinstated Erlongus. And he proceeded to Regensburg, and with assistance, drove his son out of that city, and installed Bishop Ulrich. With the Bohemians he destroyed the march of Theobaldus. [Henry IV frequently honored Nuremberg with his presence. This is the sovereign, who as emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, waited three days in the snow to kiss the excommunicative Gregory's foot. On his last visit to Nuremberg Henry found his son in rebellion; and here the old king stopped to gather his forces. Nuremberg remained loyal to him and took his part, and for that reason the city was oppressed with a siege by the younger Henry in 1105. The citizens held out for two months; then came orders from the old emperor to capitulate. He had given up the struggle, and his son, as Henry V, succeeded to the Holy Roman Empire and to the possession of Nuremberg]. King Conrad the Swabian, who after the death of Lothair (Lothario) was declared Roman emperor, and who upon the advice of Saint Bernhard (Bernardi) undertook a campaign against the unbelievers, again built up the city; and he erected the estimable monastery and abbey of Saint Aegidius (Egidium), order of Saint Benedict, in one of the suburbs of the city. And through the subsequent help, revenues, and privileges of King Conrad and other Roman emperors the city again prospered. [With the death of Henry V in 1125 the Frankish line ended, for the Empire, though elective, always had a tendency to become hereditary. But now Lothair, Duke of Saxony, of another family, was chosen. He in turn was succeeded by Conrad in 1138. It is to the latter that the chroniclers attribute the foundation of the monastery of St. Aegidius on the site of the chapel said to have been built by Charlemagne]. But it is not to be understood that when first rebuilt, it was as large and beautiful as now; for later, in the time of Charles the Fourth, Roman Emperor and King of Bohemia, it was surrounded with more expansive walls, now battlements, and a deep moat; and three hundred and sixty-five towers, together with bastions and additional defenses, were added to the two inner walls. The city was also adorned with substantial residences. Nuremberg is in the heart of Germany. Under imperial laws it has the benefit of a council and a mayor, distinguished from the commons; for citizens of ancient and honorable ancestry have the care of civic matters, and the community awaits their judgment. It has large and elegant church edifices; two parish churches, St. Sebald [Sebald's history and even his name are unfamiliar except to Nurembergers, of whose city he is the patron saint. Legend relates that he was born in the beginning of the eighth century, a son of an unnamed Christian king. In his youth he learned to love and fear Jesus, and at 15 enrolled at Paris as a student of theology, there eclipsing his older classmates. He returned home full of wisdom and honors, and was betrothed to a beautiful and virtuous maiden. But he left her and his parents for the life of a hermit. Fifteen years passed and he went to Rome from where the pope dispatched him to preach the gospel with Saints Willibald and Wunibald. And it came to pass that they were hungry and weary, exhausted by storm and wind. But on the prayers of Sebald an angel brought them bread. They journeyed to Vicenta, when Sebald, moved by the Holy Spirit, would go no farther, but abode as a hermit in the wood. His fame spread and people flocked to hear the Word of God from his lips. When an unbeliever scoffed at him, Sebald prayed for a sign, and the earth opened and the scoffer sank up to his neck. The hermit interceded for him and he was delivered, he and many other unbelievers immediately afterwards embracing the faith. Sebald left Italy for Ratisbona (Regensburg), bringing the gospel into the wilds of Germany; and there he stayed for a short time. As last he came to Nuremberg and settled there in the forest, in the heart of the Franconian people, teaching the Word of God and working miracles. At one time he sought shelter in the house of a poor but churlish craftsman. It was winter and the wind howled over the frozen marshes of the Pegnitz. He asked the man's wife to bring in more wood for the fire, but she refused. Finally he asked her to bring the cluster of icicles that hung from the roof and to put them on the fire, if she would not bring the bundle of twigs to start the fire. This she did, and in answer to Sebald's prayer, the whole bundle of ice was quickly ablaze. In the sight of this miracle the host gave the hermit a warmer welcome, and to make amends, left and bought some fish in the market, contrary to the regulations of the authorities, and, being caught, was blinded; but the hermit restored his sight. Many other miracles were attributed to the ashes and relics of this saint, which lie in the beautiful shrine of St. Sebald's church. As Mr. Headlam in his observes, "Nothing in the Middle Ages was more conducive to the prosperity of a town than the reputation of having a holy man within its borders, the possession of miracle working relics of a saint. Just as St. Elizabeth made Marburg, so St. Sebald proved a potent attraction at Nuremberg . . . As early as 1070 and 1080 we hear of pilgrimages to Nuremberg in honor of her patron saint."] and St. Lorenz (Laurentio), [St. Lorenzkirche (Church of Saint Lawrence), according to tradition, stands on the site of an older Romanesque chapel that bore the name of Holy Sepulchre. It was erected for the spiritual needs of the inhabitants whose houses first began to be built on this side of the Pegnitz. As it now stands, the church dates almost entirely from the latter part of the Middle Ages. It was begun in 1278 but not completed until 1477. Its two towers are 250 feet in height and terminate in octagonal stories and spires. As the top of the square portions of the towers are wide openings, divided by many mullions, suggesting the gridiron on which Lawrence was roasted. It is not clear why this church was dedicated to a Spanish saint]. as well as four well built monasteries of the order of the Mendicants, erected by the citizens at various times. The pious virgins have two cloisters here, dedicated to Saint Catherine and to Saint Clara. The German lords also have a large area in this city. Here is also a Carthusian monastery, large and magnificent; also a regal well-adorned structure to the most Holy Virgin Mary; and there is a beautiful spring in the marketplace. The city enjoys the patronage of St. Sebald, who in his lifetime brightened the city with his miracles. It is also fortunate in its possession of the royal robe, swords, scepter, and orb, and crown of Charlemagne, and which having been used in the crowning of a Roman emperor, inspire faith through their holiness and because of their antiquity. The city is also particularly fortunate in its possession of the unreplaceable divine spear with which the side of Jesus Christ was opened while on the cross; also with a remarkable piece of the cross, and with other relics esteemed by the entire world, and which, on the thirteenth day after the joys of Easter, have been seen for so many years by crowds of people from various provinces with the highest devotion. And so in its praise are added:

O extraordinary glory of Noricum [Noricum is the Roman name of the province in which Nuremberg is located. It is, of course, northeast of Italy], peaceful Nuremberg,
 As a city you are excessively celebrated, royal, and heavenly.
 You are populated with men; you are the fairest of all things
 And the parent of the virtues; you are a lover of religion.
 You draw near to justice, sacred faith, and peace.
 You guard before everything else the ancient laws of your fathers.

Nuremberg (Nürnberg) is today the second town in Bavaria in size, and the first in commercial importance. It lies in the district of Middle Franconia in a sandy, well-cultivated plain, 124 miles by rail northwest from Munich. The city stands on the river Pegnitz, which is here crossed by 14 bridges. The first authentic mention of Nuremberg, which seems to have been called into existence by the foundation of the castle, occurs in a document of 1050; and about the same period it received from the emperor Henry III permission to establish a mint and a market. It is said to have been destroyed by the emperor Henry V in 1105, but in 1127 the emperor Lothair took it from the duke of Swabia and assigned it to the duke of Bavaria. An imperial officer, styled the burggrave of Nuremberg, became prominent in the 12th century. The town was ruled by patrician families. German monarchs frequently resided and held diets here, and in 1219 Frederick II conferred upon it the rights of a free imperial town.

Like Augsburg, Nuremberg attained great wealth as an intermediary between Italy and the East on the one hand, and Italy and northern Europe on the other. Its manufacturers were well known. The town gradually extended its sway over a territory nearly 500 sq. miles in extent, and was able to furnish the emperor Maximilian with a contingent of 6,000 troops. But perhaps the great glory of Nuremberg lies in its claim to be the principal fount of German art. Adam Krafft, Veit Stoss and Peter Vischer are famed as sculptors. In painting Nuremberg claims Wohlgemuth and Dürer. A large proportion of the old German furniture, silver-plate, stoves and the like was made in Nuremberg workshops. Its place in literary history it owes to Hans Sachs and the other meistersänger (master singers). The inventions of its inhabitants include watches, the air gun, gunlocks, the terrestrial and celestial globes and the art of wiredrawing.

Nuremberg was the first imperial town to embrace Protestantism (about 1525). The first blow to its prosperity was the discovery of the sea-route to India in 1497; the second was inflicted by the Thirty Years' War, during which Gustavus Adolphus was besieged here for ten weeks by Wallenstein. The downfall of the town was accelerated by the illiberal policy of its Patrician rulers. In 1803 the city was allowed to maintain its nominal position as a free city, but in 1806 it was annexed to Bavaria.

A considerable section of the ancient walls and moat still remain; of the 365 bastions which formerly strengthened the walls, nearly 100 are still in situ, and a few of the old gateways have also been preserved. The general type of architecture in the city is Gothic. Most of the private dwellings date from the 16th century, and there are practically none of earlier date than the 15th century. The roofs are of red tile. The old castle is on the rock on the north side of the town and it dates probably from the early part of the 11th century.

The German edition of the Chronicle replaces everything from the phrase "on the thirteenth day..." until the end of the six-line poem in praise of Nuremberg with the following text: "and which are publicly exhibited at Easter time with great solemnity."

The foundation of the holy militant Church upon which the entire superstructure securely rests consists of the holy apostles, whom God chose as the first sacrifice for the salvation of all the people. They are the basic pillars of the Church, upon which rests that foundation of which Christ is the chief corner-stone; and without these no one can lay any other foundation. Thus the truth, formerly proclaimed by the law and the prophets, was now apostolically trumpeted forth for the salvation of the entire world. For it is written: Their voices have gone forth to all the world. From them the Church sprang and has been proclaimed to the ends of the earth in the words of the annunciation. By their teachings, miracles, examples, and by their blood they have established the church. For this reason they are deservedly called fathers, founders, builders, ordainers, shepherds, bishops, and pathfinders of the Catholic Church. And although the Lord intended to bestow the sacrament of this gift on all the apostles, he singled out the blessed Peter, and poured forth his bounty upon him as upon a single body; for Peter understood the secret intentions of God, who had revealed to him the indivisible unity. And so the Lord said, You are Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church. And so the building of the eternal temple, with its wonderful endowments and the grace of God, rested upon the blessings bestowed upon Peter. With this sanction he so enlarged the church that no human folly or daring has been able to circumvent it; and the gates of hell have not been able to prevail against it.

He (Jesus) said to them, But who do you say I am? And Simon Peter answered and said, You are the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said to him, Blessed are you, Simon Bar-jona: for flesh and blood have not revealed it to you, but my Father who is in heaven. And I say also to you, that you are Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give to you the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and whatsoever you shall bind on earth shall be loosed in heaven.

(Matthew 16:15-19)

With this new apostleship Jesus gave him a new name – Peter, Greek for ‘stone’ or ‘rock.’

The expression "upon this rock I will build my church," has received many contradictory interpretations through the ages. The Church of Rome has made these words the basis of its claim that Peter was the first pope, and that the long line of popes created by it were his direct successors. It affirms that the rock is Peter individually; that the commission made him supreme apostle, with authority inherited from him by the bishops of Rome. But this is answered by the contention that each apostle was a rock and a recipient of the keys, and that all were co-equal in power; that were the authority given Peter alone, it must still be shown that this personal prerogative was among the successional attributes conferred upon him. Of course, there is no historical foundation for the claim that Peter was ever a bishop of Rome, and the pretense of a succession from him is mythical.

Folio CI verso

ILLUSTRATION CHRIST AND HIS APOSTLES

This woodcut covers an entire page. In the upper center sits Jesus in a robe of ample folds, with the orb (surmounted by a cross) held on his left knee. His head is encircled by a cruciferous nimbus, that is, one inscribed with a cross, which is a form especially devoted to Christ. Examples where he is without it, or others are with it, are comparatively few. Jesus is at once distinguished from his disciples by its presence. In the illustration before us the cross within the nimbus is floral in detail, the terminals being in the form of lilies, which may have been introduced as symbols of the resurrection. Note that the nimbi about the heads of the apostles are plain, except that their names are inscribed in them as a convenient form of identification. During the fourteenth century the custom arose of thus placing the name of the wearer within the edge of the nimbus. This practice continued for about 200 years, and may be seen alike in Greek, Italian and German art, except that in the Greek examples the monogram of the person, or some other abbreviated form of his name, is used.

The orb, surmounted with the cross, is introduced as a symbol of spiritual sovereignty. The globe and cross were first introduced as ensigns of authority in Western Europe by Pope Benedict VIII. Almost all the English kings, from Edward the Confessor, have the globe in their left hand on their coinage or great seals.

The apostles are seated about their Master in a circular group. To his right is Peter, whose name in the Greek (Petros) signifies 'rock.' He is portrayed, according to iconographic tradition, with bald head and short rounded beard. To the left of Jesus sits Peter's brother Andrew, portrayed (also according to iconographic tradition) with a long flowing beard. It was the custom to thus bestow a certain personality upon such of the apostles. Thus Philip was portrayed as a man of advanced years, John as a youth. But it was no doubt found impossible by such means to clearly distinguish one from another among twelve or more distinct persons; for which reason symbols were assigned to them. These symbols were often the instruments by the use of which the saint suffered martyrdom. No attempt is made by the woodcutter to distinguish any other persons in the picture than Jesus, Peter and Andrew. And so we must rely upon the inscribed nimbi for the identification of the rest of the apostles. Proceeding downward from St. Peter on the left are John, unbearded, but not as young as he might have been; Thomas, with tousled head and forked beard; Philip, correctly represented as fairly aged; Matthew, a rather stern and haughty looking man; and Jude, designated "S. Judas," who appears rather elated in his devotions. We know that this is not Judas Iscariot for a number of reasons. In the first place the latter was not a saint. Secondly, because Judas Iscariot, after betraying Jesus, hanged himself, thus eliminating himself from the present occasion. Thirdly, because Matthias was chosen in his place (Acts 1:15-26), and we find Matthias seated at the right. Had Judas Iscariot been introduced there would have been thirteen disciples present. Jude's surname was Thaddeus (Mark 3:18). In the Revised Version only the name Thaddeus is retained; but Luke calls him Judas (Luke 6:16; Acts 1:13).

Proceeding downward from Andrew on the right are James (Jacobus) the Greater (Major) and James (Jacobus) the Lesser (Minor), Bartholomew, Simon, and Matthias.

The four corners of the woodcuts are filled in with the symbols of the Evangelists—the angel for Matthew, the lion for mark, the ox for Luke, and the eagle for John.

At the head of the page on a broad scroll is the inscription:

Data est mihi potestas in caelo et in terra: Salvator:
"Power is given to me in heaven and on earth." Savior

The complete verse according to the Latin Vulgate is:

Et accedens Iesus locutus est eis dicens data est mihi omnis potestas in caelo et in terra.

And Jesus, coming, spoke to them, saying:

All power is given to me, in heaven and on earth. (Matthew 28:18).

The inscriptions on the scrolls that circle and wave round about the head of Jesus and the heads of the apostles contain the following Latin version of the Apostolic Creed:

Credo in Deum Patrem Omnipotentem, Creatorem caeli et terre. Et in Ihesum Xpm, Filius ejus unicum dominum nostrum; qui conceptus est de Spiritu Sancto, natus ex Maria Virgine. Passus sub Pontio Pilato, crucifixus, (mortuus et sepultus, omitted); descendit ad inferna (inferos), tertia die resurrexit a mortuis; ascendit ad caelos; sedet ad dexteram Dei Patris omnipotentis; inde venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos. Credo in Spiritum Sanctum, Sanctam ecclesiam Catholicam, sanctorum communionem, remissionem peccatorum, carnis resurrectionem, et vitam aeternam. Amen.

I believe in God the Father Almighty, Creator of heaven and earth. And in Jesus Christ, his only begotten son, our Lord, conceived of the Holy Spirit, and born out of Mary the Virgin; he suffered under Pontius Pilate, and was crucified, (dead and buried); descended into hell; on the third day he rose from the dead, ascended into heaven, and sits at the right hand of God the Father, from where he shall come to judge the living and the dead. I believe in the Holy Spirit, the holy Catholic Church, the communion of saints, the remission of sins, the resurrection of the flesh, and in life everlasting. Amen.

It is a tradition that before the apostles dispersed to preach the Gospel in all lands, they assembled to compose this declaration of faith, and that each of them furnished one of the twelve propositions contained in it, in the following order:

- St. Peter: Credo in Deum Patrem omnipotentem creatorem caeli et terrae.
- St. Andrew: Et in Jesum Christum Filium ejus unicum, Dominum nostrum.
- St. James Major: Qui conceptus est de Spiritu Sancto, natus ex Maria Virgine.
- St. John: Passus sub Pontio Pilato, crucifixus, mortuus et sepultus.
- St. Philip: Descendit ad inferos, tertia die resurrexit a mortuis.
- St. James Minor: Ascendit ad caelos, sedet ad dexteram Dei Patris omnipotentis.
- St. Thomas: Inde venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos.
- St. Bartholomew: Credo in Spiritum Sanctum.
- St. Matthew: Sanctam ecclesiam Catholicam.
- St. Simon: Sanctorum communionem.

- St. Simon: Remissionem peccatorum.
- St. Matthies: Carnis resurrectionem.
- St. Thaddeus: Et vitam aeternam.

In the illustration the twelve propositions of the Creed are not attributed in the same order to the various apostles.

Folio CII recto

The highest God and Parent of all things gave a new law to the new believers, and sent a teacher of righteousness from heaven. This new teacher (as has already been stated) allowed himself to be nailed to the cross, and there he gave up the spirit. But as he had prophesied that on the third day he would arise from the dead, the Jews feared that the disciples might secretly remove the body and give currency to the belief that Christ had arisen. Therefore they took him from the cross, sealed him in a sepulchre and guarded it securely with soldiers. [Matthew 27:62-66]. But on the third day before dawn, after an earthquake, the sepulcher opened, and a great fear took hold of the guards; [Matthew 28:2-4]. and the Lord came forth from the grave, living and entire. And he wandered into Galilee and revealed the letter of the Holy Scriptures and the secrets of the prophets, which were before that time not understood by his disciples. [Matthew 16:20]. And so they proclaimed him and his sufferings. Now after the Lord had given them the gospels, and had ordered the same to be taught in his name, he was surrounded by a cloud that lifted him up into heaven on the fortieth day after his suffering. [Acts 1:9]. By divine omnipotence the Temple of God, which had been released from the ill will of the Jews in three days, was now continued in the flesh for forty days as a sign, and to make the belief in the Resurrection secure. Now as the apostles and disciples, after the ascension (as Luke relates of the apostles) came down from the Mount of Olives and arrived at Jerusalem, they went up into an upper room, and there remained in prayer and supplication with the women and Mary, the mother of Jesus, and with his brethren; and day and night they pondered the laws of the Lord and his commandments until they were invested with virtue from on high. [Acts 1:12-14]. In these days, between the time when the Lord arose from the dead and his ascension, the motive of his bitter death, and the immortality of not only the soul but also of the body was revealed; and the Lord breathed the Holy Spirit into his apostles; [John 20:22]. And to the apostle Peter were given the keys of the kingdom [Matthew 16:19]. and he was charged with the care of the sheepfold of the Lord. During all this time the eyes and hearts of the Lord's own were opened by divine foresight, so that it should be acknowledged that the Lord who was born, martyred and died, had really arisen. But ten days after his ascension (which was the fiftieth day after he arose from the dead), when the disciples were gathered together, they received the blessed gift of the Holy Spirit, which they craved; and soon a voice came from heaven and filled the entire room in which they sat; and cloven tongues "like as of fire" appeared to them, and all were filled with the Holy Spirit; and they began to speak in various tongues. [] And just as the Israelites (following their release from bondage) were given the law on Mount Sinai fifty days after the sacrifice of a lamb, so (after the suffering and slaying of the Lamb of God) the Holy Spirit was poured forth upon the apostles and believers fifty days after he arose from the dead. By virtue of the gift thus received, the apostles fully understood all the things which the prophets had written of Christ, and by common counsel formulated the articles and foundations of our faith. And Peter, the prince of the apostles, spoke according to the prophecies of Jeremiah, Isaiah and David: I believe in one God, Father Almighty, Creator of heaven and earth. (Andrew and Habakuk). And in Jesus Christ, his only begotten son, our Lord, (John) who was conceived of the Holy Spirit out of Mary the Virgin (as Isaiah prophesied: Truly, a virgin will bear a son. James confirmed the prophecy of Isaiah); suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified and buried (Thomas attested the prophecy of Hosea); descended into hell; on the third day he rose from the dead; (James the Greater) ascended into heaven, and sits on the right hand of God, the Father Almighty; (Philip) from where he shall come to judge the living and the dead. (Bartholomew) I believe in the Holy Spirit, (Matthew) the holy Christian Church, (Simon, Jude and Matthias) the communion of saints, the remission of sins, resurrection of the flesh, and life everlasting. Amen. Afterwards the apostles ordained many things in all churches, and made James, the brother of the Lord, a bishop at Jerusalem; for he was a holy man from birth. He began by celebrating mass in a simple manner by saying the "Our Father," etc. (Lord's Prayer). Christian life increased among men and women, and St. Peter chose seven deacons, that is, servants of the Faith—Stephen, Philip, Prochorus (Procorus), Nicanor, Timon (Tymon), Parmenas, and Nicholas Antiochus—who undertook the tasks assigned to the servants of the church. [Acts 1:1-5]. After that the apostles dispersed into all parts of the world. Thomas went among the Parthians, Medes, Persians, Hircanians, Bactrians, and into India interior; Matthew went into Macedonia and Ethiopia; Bartholomew into Liconia and India exterior; Andrew into Achaia and Scythia; John, after the death of the Virgin Mary, into Asia; Peter into Pontus and Galatia, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and finally to Rome; James the Greater into Spain; Judas into Mesopotamia; Simon into Egypt; and Philip into Gaul; just as was later written of the apostles. And so they dispersed themselves into these countries, and laid the foundation of the church. In the name of God, their Master, they performed great and incredible miracles. And he strengthened them in virtue and power in order to augment the establishment and promulgation of the new faith.

MARY AND THE APOSTLES

The Virgin Mary is seated on a throne surrounded by the apostles, among whom we are able to identify Peter, with rounded beard and bald head, on her left, and possibly Andrew with flowing and divided beard, on her right. The smooth-shaven man in the right foreground is probably the youthful John. Mary appears to be reading and interpreting the Scriptures to the apostles who listen in an attitude of reverence. The Holy Spirit, symbolized by a dove with outspread wings, appears above the head of the Virgin and immediately below the canopy of the throne. According to the Bible (Acts 1: 12-14), the apostles left the scene of the Lord's ascension, and coming down from the Mount of Olives to Jerusalem, they put up in an upper chamber, and "all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication with the women and Mary, the Mother of Jesus, and with his brethren."

Whether or not the artist here intended to comprehend the subject known as the Descent of the Holy Spirit is not clear. The latter event is recorded in Acts 2:1-4, and the Bible does not state that Mary was present, nor that the Holy Spirit descended in the form of a dove, but in cloven tongues of fire which set upon each of the apostles. Nor is the interpretation of the Scriptures by Mary born out by the text. The designer was of course influenced by the Maryology of the Middle Ages. In the Venice Academy is a 14th-century work of art depicting the apostles and the Virgin seated in an enclosure, tongues of fire descending from heaven. A painting in the Vatican attributed to Raphael also shows the Virgin and the apostles seated, with flames of fire standing on their heads.

Folio CII verso

Mary, most glorious and eternal virgin and chaste Mother of God, after the ascension of the Lord Jesus (as Luke states in the Gospels), lived a human life in communion with the apostles until they were filled with the spirit of the Holy Spirit. But after the descent of the Holy Spirit and the dispersion of the apostles (as St. Jerome says), the archangel Gabriel, as a celestial emissary, preserved this Holy Virgin untouched in mind and body; while John the Evangelist (commended to her by her Son from the cross), [I] was kind to her and dutifully protected this Virgin, the patroness of all virgins, to the end of her life, as her adopted son; and thus she was given an opportunity of seeing all the places where her Son had suffered. On Mount Zion is shown a cave where she lived and where John read the Mass. Although Christ is to be loved by all the people, he was more intensely loved by her whose Lord and Son he was. She was downcast with much sorrow; and after his ascension, as she quietly and alone contemplated what she had heard, seen and experienced, the intensity of her love for her Son increased. Finally, full of grace, and enlightened by all the virtues, she went to rest in peace in the sixty-third year of her age, and forty-nine years after the birth of Jesus Christ her Son. She had abundantly earned for herself the grace of eternal purity; and this was fully bestowed upon her by her Son, Jesus Christ. According to the pious writers, all the apostles were present at her burial, according to the will of God; and it is to be believed that our Lord Jesus Christ, together with the entire heavenly host, came forth in jubilation to meet her, and with joy of soul and body took her up into heaven and seated her beside his throne. She lived sixteen years after her Son's death, at which time she was forty-seven years of age. No one should doubt that the entire heavenly Jerusalem exulted in unspeakable joy and with immeasurable love upon her worthy reception and coronation. This should not be a matter of amazement, for out of her was born the one whom all the orders in heaven honor and worship. And she was elevated above them into the seat of the majesty of the Lord. Thus the chaste Mother and Virgin was led forth to the throne on high, and with sublime glory was seated next to Christ on the throne of the kingdom.

Peter, the first pope, prince of the apostles, by birth a Galilean of Bethsaida, a son of John, [John, or Jonas, a fisherman], and a brother of Andrew the apostle, occupied the bishop's chair in the city of Antioch for the first time seven years after the Lord's ascension. This is the Peter to whom the Lord said: Blessed are you, Simon Bar-jona; for flesh and blood have not revealed it to you, but my Father who is in heaven. And you are Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church. And I will give to you the keys to the kingdom of heaven, and also the power to bind and to loose. [Matthew 16:17-19]. Now after Peter with all zeal had sufficiently established the church in Asia, and had overcome the errors of those who held to the rite of circumcision, and had preached the abolition of the rite in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia, and was released from Herod's prison, he came to Italy and established and held the first see in the second year of Claudius at Rome, taking into consideration that Rome was the capital city of the world, and as such would also be suitable as the proper place for the bishop's chair; and on it he sat for 25 years and 7 months. [This is the assertion of papal writers, but the evidence is strongly against this assertion. There is no evidence in the Bible that Peter had any supremacy over the other apostles, or any successor in that influence naturally accorded to him as one of the oldest, most active, and most faithful of those who "had seen the Lord."] Now Peter at that time came to Rome, because he understood that Simon the sorcerer, a Samaritan, was there, and with his sorceries was now leading the Roman people into error; for they believed him to be a god; for at Rome a memorial plaque was dedicated to him and placed between two bridges, on which was written in Latin letters 'Simon the Holy God.' While in Samaria, Simon maintained his faith in Christ until he was baptized by Philip the deacon; but afterwards he made misuse of his baptism, causing much heresy in conjunction with Helena (Selene), an unchaste woman who was associated with him in evil. This evil man confronted Peter by a miracle, causing a dead child to appear to move as a consequence of his sorceries; but the child nevertheless remained dead until, at the command of Peter, in the name of Jesus, it arose. This enraged Simon and he promised the people that in their presence he would fly from the Capitoline to the Aventine Hill; and when Simon thus flew, he fell down, in accordance with Peter's prayers, and broke a leg; and of this injury he died at Arezzo not long afterwards. From him came the Simonian heretics who pretended to purchase and sell the gift of the Holy Spirit, etc.

Cf. Acts 8:9-20: And there was a certain man called Simon, who formerly in the same city used sorcery and bewitched the people of Samaria, giving out that he himself was some great one. To him they all gave heed, from the least to the greatest, saying, This man is the great power of God. And to him they had regard because for a long time he had bewitched them with sorceries. But when they believed Philip preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized, both men and women. Then Simon himself believed as well; and when he was baptized he continued with Philip, and wondered, beholding the miracles and signs that were done. Now when the apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent to them Peter and John, who, when they had come down, prayed for them in order that they might receive the Holy Spirit. (For as yet he had fallen upon none of them—they were only baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.) Then they laid their hands on them and they received the Holy Spirit. And when Simon saw that through laying on of the apostles' hands the Holy Spirit was given, he offered them money, saying, Give me also this power, that on whomever I lay hands, he may receive the Holy Spirit. But Peter said to him, Let your money perish with you, because you have thought the gift of God may be purchased with money.

Simon Magus holds the unique position of being branded the one outstanding heretic in the New Testament. Later centuries used the word simony to indicate the crime of procuring a spiritual office by purchase. Justin Martyr states that Gitta, a village in Samaria, was his birthplace, and speaks of him as visiting Rome and being so successful in his impostures as to have secured for himself worship as God, and to have been honored with a statue inscribed Simoni Deo Sancto ('to Simon the Holy God'). He also adds that Helena, a fallen woman who accompanied him, was 'the first idea generated by him.' The story that he broke a leg during flight, pursuant to the prayers of Peter, is purely traditional, and is not the only tradition as to how he met death.

After that Peter instituted the fast of forty days, and wrote two epistles called Canonicas. And as there were many things to which he could not attend, confining himself to prayers and sermons, he ordained two bishops, Linus and Cletus, who performed the priestly office among the Romans and other people.

ILLUSTRATIONS

This series of woodcuts would appear to be a continuation of those found at Folio XCV verso:

(A) ASCENSION OF MARY

Mary reclines on a bed, propped up against a pillow. Her head is surrounded by a simple nimbus, and she already holds a sceptre in anticipation of her reception in heaven. The hard square bed would appear to be out in the open. The apostles are gathered about Mary according to the text of the Chronicle. One of them, a rather diminutive figure, is seated on the floor in the foreground, with book in hand and apparently meditating on the Scriptures. The youthful figure beside Mary is probably John; next is Andrew, of the long flowing beard; then Peter, with rounded beard and bald except for the usual forelock. The woodcut is inscribed, "The Assumption of Mary, Mother of God."

(B) CORONATION OF THE VIRGIN MARY

The crowning of Mary is in progress. The Lord is seated on his throne, and Mary kneels beside him, about to receive the crown upon her head. Above and between them is the symbolic dove, with wings outspread, attesting the presence of the Holy Spirit. The woodcut is inscribed, "The Coronation of the Glorious Virgin Mary in Heaven."

(C) ST. PETER AS THE FIRST POPE

Peter, in full pontificals, as Rome's first pope, is seated in a narrow gothic chamber. He wears the triple crown and holds a crozier in his right hand. On his lap is an open book, and his look is one of meditation. The woodcut is inscribed, "In the year of the World 7223," and "In the Year of Christ, 34."

Folio CIII recto

Caius, surnamed Caligula, son of Drusus Augustus, stepson of the emperor and grandson of Tiberius, was the fourth Roman emperor. At the age of twenty he was sent to Capri in Cantania, where he was invested with the robe of peace by Tiberius for several days. He served in the senate four times, completed the half-finished buildings begun under Tiberius, namely the Temple of Augustus and the Market of Pompey. He also started the aqueducts of Tiburti, and built many cities in his name. He was tall, pale of complexion, ungainly in body, had thin legs and neck, hollow eyes and temples, broad forehead, little hair, and none at all where the hair parts. His look was dark and terrifying, an appearance he deliberately maintained. He wore neither the dress nor the footwear of his ancestors, nor that of the citizenry, but dressed in clothes embroidered with pearls and gems. His bitter, cruel words resulted in tragedies, and he was considered a most outrageous man. He did nothing praiseworthy or chivalrous at home or abroad, but destroyed all things in a spirit of avarice. He was so sexually debased that he took advantage of his own sisters, and so gruesome that he is often said to have remarked, "I wish that the Roman people had but one neck." He was so envious of persons of renown that he caused their writings and images to be removed from the libraries. He appointed Agrippa king of Judea and exiled Herod to Lyons. Caligula was slain by his own people in the tenth month of the third year of his reign, at the age of 29 years. His body was secretly carried off, burned, and buried. [Caligula, Roman emperor, 37-41 CE, was the son of Germanicus and Agrippina. He was born in 12 CE and brought up among the legions in Germany. His real name was Caius Caesar, and he was always called Caius, Caligula being a nickname given him by the soldiers because as a small boy he wore little caligae, or soldiers' boots. He gained the favor of Tiberius, who raised him to offices of honor and held out hopes to him of his succession. On the death of Tiberius he succeeded to the throne. His first acts promised a just and beneficent rule. He pardoned those who had appeared against his family, released state prisoners, restored the power of the magistrates and promised to govern according to law. He behaved with generosity toward foreign princes and restored them to their thrones. But after a serious illness that probably weakened his mental powers, he appears in the literary record as a madman. He put to death Tiberius, grandson of his predecessor, compelled his grandmother and other members of his family to do away with themselves, often causing persons of both sexes and of all ages to be tortured to death for his amusement at meals. On one occasion he ordered a great number of spectators at the circus to be thrown to the wild beasts. Suetonius relates his famous wish that the Roman people had but one head, that he might cut it off at one blow. His marriages were disgracefully contracted and speedily dissolved. He considered himself a god, built a temple for himself, and appointed priests to attend to his worship. Sometimes he officiated as his own priest, making his horse, Incitatus, which he afterward raised to the consulship, his colleague. He exhausted the state treasury with fantastic projects. He built a bridge on which he gave a splendid banquet, concluding the entertainment by throwing a number of guests into the sea. The Roman world at length grew tired of this madman, and four months after his return to the city he was murdered].

Claudius, cousin of Caius Caligula, was the fifth Roman emperor, receiving the office (as Josephus states) through the help and zeal of Agrippa, king of Judea, Claudius was born at Lyons on the day that a temple was there dedicated to the emperor Augustus; and he was called Tiberius Claudius Drusus. From early age until he became fifty he was zealously devoted to the liberal arts. In perception and judgment, he showed an uncertain disposition. He subjugated Britain, a feat that no one had attempted either before or after Julius Caesar. He also subjugated the Orkneys to the Roman emperor. He constructed buildings larger than necessary. Through a mountain he built a canal three thousand feet in length; and in the course of eleven years, by the employment of thirty thousand men without interruption, built the port of Ostia on either side of the inlet as a protection to Rome. He espoused Aelia Paetina (Eliam Petinam), but divorced her on trivial grounds. Later he married Messalina, who had been previously engaged to another. For this and other misdeeds he caused her to be executed. Then he married Agrippina who enticed him by her studied affections. Claudius was well formed in body, long but not thin, and his hair was white. He was thick-necked, and a glutton for food and wine. He was finally poisoned by Agrippina at the age of sixty-four, in the 14th year of his reign. A comet foretold his death. [Claudius I, Roman emperor 41-54 CE, (whose full name was Tiberius Claudius Drusus Nero Germanicus) was the younger son of Drusus, the brother of the emperor Tiberius and Antonia, and was born 10 BCE at Lyons in Gaul. In youth he was weak and sickly, and was neglected and despised by his relatives. When he grew up he devoted the greater part of his time to literary pursuits, but was not allowed to take any part in public affairs. He had reached the age of fifty when he was suddenly raised by the soldiers to the imperial throne after the murder of Caligula. He was married four times. At the time of his accession he was married to his third wife, the notorious Messalina, who governed him for some years, together with the freedmen Narcissus, Pallus, and others. After the execution of Messalina in the year 48, Claudius was still more unfortunate in choosing for his wife his niece, Agrippina. She prevailed upon him to set aside his own son, Britannicus, and to adopt her son Nero, that she might secure the succession for the latter. He soon after regretted this step, and was in consequence most likely poisoned by Agrippina in the year 54].

Nero, stepson of Claudius, and a legitimate son of Agrippina and Gnaeus Domitius, her husband, was the sixth emperor of the Romans, and was born nine months before Tiberius died. His own name was Domitius, as was that of his father. But when the emperor Claudius gave him his own daughter Octavia in marriage, he called him Nero. From youth he loved horses. From time to time he secretly indulged in youthful errors, wantonness, selfishness, and cruelty; but as his vices increased in course of time, he openly committed great evils. He indulged in gluttony from noon to midnight, and in all things became more evil and wanton than the above named Caligula. He caused a great number of the senators to be slain, and proved a wreckless squanderer of wealth. He caused himself to be anointed with cold creams, and went fishing with golden nets with purple cords. These vices he concealed at the beginning of his reign, thus making all men hopeful as to his future conduct. He was a man of medium stature, bodily odors, yellow hair, a beautiful countenance, but more devoted to his body than to customs and manners. His eyes were dark, his neck thick; he had a protruding belly and thin legs, and his body was probably in good health. In his time a fire occurred at Rome which lasted for six days, and for which he was blamed. However, to avoid responsibility, he suborned witnesses to say that the Christians were the cause. And so a great number of Christians were made prisoners and were slain. Some say that Nero burned the city in order to see a fire like that which destroyed Troy. He employed his raging cruelties against Seneca, Lucan, his own mother, his wife, and all persons who were held in esteem at Rome. At last he succumbed to the hatred of the Roman people, and being sought for punishment, he fled and killed himself at the age of 30, in the fourteenth year of his reign.

Nero (Claudius Caesar Augustus Germanicus), emperor of Rome from 54 to 68 CE, was the son of Gnaeus Domitius Ahenobarbus and Agrippina the younger, and his name was originally L. Domitius Ahenobarbus. His father died when he was scarcely three, and in the previous year his mother had been banished by order of her brother Caligula. Nero early found shelter in the house of his aunt Domitia. The emperor Claudius recalled Agrippina, who spent the next thirteen years in a struggle to obtain the succession of the throne for Nero. She married Claudius in 49, and in 50 he adopted Nero as his son, recalling Seneca from exile to be his tutor. On his fourteenth birthday he assumed the toga virilis (A plain white toga worn on formal occasions by most Roman men of legal age, generally about 14 to 18 years) and was introduced to the Senate by Claudius with the title of princeps iuventutis ('leader of the youth'). This made his succession almost certain, Britannicus, the son of Claudius by Messalina notwithstanding. In 54 Claudius died, most likely poisoned by Agrippina's orders, and Nero took the throne, only a few voices being raised for Britannicus, whom Agrippina, by playing on Nero's fears, induced him to poison at a banquet. It is this Britannicus who is the subject of a tragedy by Racine.

Agrippina's maneuvering was a complete success, and Rome welcomed the new emperor with enthusiasm, as his prestige and good qualities, carefully fostered by Seneca, had made him popular, while his darker passions were as yet unsuspected. But Seneca saw from the first that the real danger with Nero lay in his savage temper and passions, which he made it his chief aim to stave off by every means in his power. During the first five years little occurred to dampen the popular enthusiasm. Nero's promises were fulfilled and the Senate found itself free to discuss and decide important administrative questions. Even the murder of Britannicus was accepted as a measure of self-defense.

In 58 Nero was enslaved by Poppaea Sabina, a woman of a very different stamp from her predecessor. By rousing Nero's jealousy she induced him to seek the death of Agrippina. Accordingly, she was invited to Baiae, where, after an affectionate reception, she was but on a vessel constructed to fall apart at a given signal. Agrippina saved herself by swimming, but later her villa was surrounded by soldiers who murdered her in her own chamber. The public was made to believe the murder justified because of treacherous designs on the part of the victim. On Agrippina's death Nero's advisers Burrus and Seneca were replaced by Poppaea and the infamous Tigellinus. Her triumph now complete, Poppaea became the wife of Nero.

A number of disasters occurred in Nero's reign, but none produced a greater impression than the burning of Rome in 64. After six days it was finally quenched, but only a few sections of the city remained untouched. Nero is (probably unjustly) blamed for having deliberately caused it, and this undoubtedly told against him. The disaster was widely regarded as evidence of the wrath of the gods. The cost of reconstruction was enormous and the tax burden in consequence extremely oppressive. Poppaea died in 65, and the general gloom of the times was increased by a pestilence that followed the fire. Revolts occurred in Spain and Germany. When the palace guards finally left their post Nero fled for shelter to a freedman's villa some four miles out of Rome. There he heard the senate's proclamation of Galba as emperor, and of the death sentence passed on himself. On the approach of his executioners he mustered up sufficient courage to commit suicide. He died in the year 68 CE, at the age of 31, and in the 14th year of his reign.

Folio CIII verso

Stephen, the first martyr, and a native of Jerusalem, was the first of the seven deacons. He was elected to the office of deacon and servant of the Faith by the Apostles because of his piousness and virtue. He began to strengthen the Christian religion (as Luke writes) among the Jewish people by many signs and miracles. Although many Jews opposed him, they were unable to withstand his wisdom and spirit; for his face appeared unto them as that of an angel. [Acts 7:15]. After he triumphed over their errors they cast him out of the city and stoned him to death. To prevent hindrance in their work they laid their outer garments down at the feet of a young man whose name was Saul. While being stoned Stephen kneeled down and looked into heaven, and he saw Jesus, and zealously pleaded to him on behalf of those who were doing the stoning. [Acts 7:57-60]. And while this Stephen, a living image of virtue, was being crushed with stones, and the stones were whizzing about his head, he remained steadfast and calm in the hope of setting an example of patience for the future. When his prayer was ended he fell asleep in peace. He was stoned in the month of August of the year in which Christ was crucified. His body was found by Saint Lucian, the priest, in the time of Honorius, the pope, in the Year of the Lord 407. At this same time (as Augustine states) six persons awoke from the dead, and seventy were cured of various maladies. The body was taken to Constantinople, and from there to Rome, where it was buried in a more dignified place.

With Stephen we enter upon the martyrologies. With very few exceptions nearly all of the material concerning these individuals is legendary.

Stephen, generally known as the first martyr, was one of the seven of honest reputation elected at the suggestion of the apostles to relieve them of certain labors. He was a forerunner of the apostle Paul and argued for the new faith. He was arrested and brought before the Sanhedrin. As he made his defense he awed his judges. He was calm and his proofs were: (1) God had not limited his favor to the Holy Land or to the Temple; (2) The Jews had always opposed to this free spirit of their God a narrow bigoted spirit. The manner in which Stephen's quiet words were received caused him to break off abruptly into fiery reproach; but so direct was its appeal to the conscience of the people that they were excited to madness (Acts 7:54), and they fell upon Stephen like wild beasts, shouting and stopping their ears. After they had forced Stephen beyond the walls of the city they stoned him to death, Saul being present and conspicuous in this tumultuous transaction. The last breath of Stephen was spent in prayer for the forgiveness of his murderers. His death occurred about 37 CE.

Philip, the second deacon, after preaching in Samaria, came to Caesarea (Cesarea) and there became known for his virtues and miracles. He had three daughters who were filled with the spirit of prophecy and who were buried in his grave. He died in the time of Nero, and was esteemed a saint by many. [Philip, the evangelist, was one of the seven deacons of the primitive church at Jerusalem (Acts 6:3-5). He went down to Samaria and preached Christ. The people gave heed to those things that Philip spoke, hearing and seeing the miracles he did. "For unclean spirits, crying with loud voice, came out of many that were possessed with them: And many taken with palsies, and that were lame, were healed." (Acts 8:5-8). At Samaria Philip received divine intimation to go to Gaza. He is next found at Azotus, 40 miles away, in Caesarea. He had four daughters, reputedly endowed with the gifts of prophecy (Acts 21:8-9)]. Prochorus (Procorus), the third deacon, zealously multiplied the churches begun at Antioch by the Apostles; and there he received the martyr's crown. Nicanor, the fourth deacon, flourished in grace of faith and virtue at Jerusalem to the time of Vespasian and was martyred there. Timon (Tymon), the fifth deacon, first officiated at Beroaz, and later proclaimed the word of the Lord at Corinth, where he was thrown into a fire that failed to consume him. He was finally crucified. Parmenas, the sixth deacon, fulfilled his office in the completeness of his faith, and was martyred in the time of Trajan. Nicholas, the seventh deacon, did not remain in the faith; but from him the heresy of the Nicolaitanes originated. []

Paul, one of the most worthy apostles of Jesus Christ, was of the tribe of Benjamin, of the city of Giscalis. While a child he was taken prisoner by the Romans, and emigrated with his parents to the city of Tarsus [Tarsus was the capital of Cilicia in Asia Minor. It lay in the center of a fertile plain twelve miles north from the Mediterranean and about the same distance south from the Taurus range. The city stood on both banks of the Cydnus, which has since changed its course. At the mouth of the river were docks, and the port of Tarsus was a place of much commerce. It suffered severely during the civil wars following the death of Caesar. Augustus made it a free city and it became famous as the seat of one of the three great universities of the pagan world, ranking next to Athens and Alexandria]. in Cilicia. There his father received Roman citizenship; for this was the Roman custom as they brought the whole world under their dominion: Those people who came to the Romans in peace acquired Roman citizenship, and the Romans called them brothers. Now, when the Romans with their forces marched into Cilicia, the father of Paul, together with other notable men of Tarsus, went forth in peace to meet them. And by that action he earned the official toga, so that he was accounted a Roman citizen. In consequence Paul was also a Roman citizen. But when the Christian faith began to grow throughout the land of Judea, Paul, while still a youth, carried letters from the Temple priests for the persecution of the Christians. But he had been present at the stoning of Stephen, where he had taken charge of the clothing of all those who stoned him; and Stephen had prayed for him and had raised him from the earth. And not long after that when Paul went to Damascus (as Luke states) he was touched by the Holy Spirit and impelled to the Christian faith and chosen as one of its vessels; and this all happened in the year in which Christ suffered. Soon afterwards Paul was called and the Gospel of Christ was revealed to him; and he was commended to the highly learned Gamaliel at Jerusalem. [Gamaliel, a distinguished Rabbi, was a prominent member of the Sanhedrin, and for thirty-two years its president. We come upon him in the earlier attempts made at Jerusalem, in 33 CE, to intercept the progress of the gospel. On one occasion, when the apostles aroused the feelings of the Sanhedrin to a high pitch and that body discussed measures for putting them to death, Gamaliel counseled more moderate and prudent action. His words on this occasion are among the most famous that the opponents of Christianity uttered in the early church: "And now I say to you, Refrain from these men, and let them alone; for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought: But if it be of God, you cannot overthrow it; unless by chance you are found even to fight against God" (Acts 5:38-39). Gamaliel was Paul's teacher at Jerusalem]. After his conversion he, together with the Apostles, wandered through many cities. Returning to Jerusalem with Peter, John and James, he collected the Gospels of Christ. And he was pronounced an apostle to the pagans (Gentiles). He sailed to Spain in order to preach there; and he made many converts at Narbonne. He returned to Jerusalem a second time, and was sent to Rome as a prisoner. There he remained under free parole for two years, daily disputing with the Jews. After Nero released him he preached many sermons and wrote much.

Paul, "the Apostle of the Gentiles," was the first Christian missionary and theologian, and holds second place in Christianity (behind Jesus). Paul was born and bred a strict Jew. In course of time he came to distinguish clearly between Judaism and the gospel of Christ, and presented Christianity as the universal religion for man as man, not merely a sect of Judaism with proselytes of its own. This was the issue between Christianity and the Jewish Law, and Paul settled it for all time. With him it was Pharisaism or Jesus—law or love, as the ultimate revelation of God. As Saul the Pharisee, he had taken the Mosaic Law in the strict sense, as one demanding perfect obedience; and he had relied on it utterly for the righteousness it was held able to confer.

"Saul, who is also Paul," was reared amid the Diaspora, at Tarsus in Cilicia, the son of a Roman citizen named Paulus. His original Hebrew name was Saul, but in his intercourse with the Gentiles he later changed it for the Hellenistic or Latin form, 'Paul.' He had knowledge of the Greek language and literature. Indeed, Greek may have been his first language, and he probably studied at a Greek (Cynic?) school. As a Jew, born in the city of Tarsus, and a Roman citizen, he combined three of the more prominent nationalities of the Roman Empire, and was eminently prepared for his apostolic mission among the Jews and Gentiles, Greeks and foreigners. He mastered Jewish law, and, according to the custom of the Rabbis, was taught a useful trade. His residence at Jerusalem commenced at an early period, and he was probably twenty when Christ entered upon his public ministry. In the beginning he was a strict Pharisee. He was present as a spectator and promoter of the stoning of Stephen, and his fanatical temperament fitted him to become a leader in the persecution of the Christians. He even sought authority to go to Damascus, to which many of the disciples fled after Stephen's death, in order to bind and drag to Jerusalem such followers of Christ as he might discover. Just before reaching Damascus he was, according to the Bible, arrested by a miraculous light, intense enough to blind him (Acts 9:8-9), in which Jesus revealed himself as the real object of the persecution (Acts 26:15). From this point on Paul became a different man, having believed that he received from the lips of Jesus himself his commission as an apostle of the Gentiles (Acts 26:16). The miraculous restoration of his sight, his baptism, and the gift of the Holy Spirit followed in quick succession, and we soon find him zealously preaching the New Faith. To this he devoted the remainder of his life with energy and fanatic devotion.

Acts trace his career to the time of his first imprisonment at Rome, which lasted for two years, and left him free to labor for his new religion. After this we are left in the dark. Some say he suffered martyrdom in the persecutions of Nero in 64 CE; others, that he was freed from the first Roman imprisonment, made new missionary tours in the East, and possibly also in the West as far as Spain, was taken prisoner to Rome a second time, and suffered martyrdom in 67 or 68 CE.

ILLUSTRATIONS

We enter upon the martyrology:

(A) STONING OF STEPHEN

The Stoning of Stephen is based on Acts 7:57-60. The first martyr is shown in priestly garb, his head encircled by a nimbus. Stephen has been dragged to a place outside the city walls, and his execution is in progress. He has fallen upon his knees in an attitude of prayer as the stones fly about him. Saul (Paul) clad in a flowing robe and wearing an oriental headdress, stands at the right, abetting the conduct of the mob by holding the outer garments and weapons of the participants, in order that they may be more free and effective in their deadly business. Only two of these, one of whom is 'crying out with a loud voice,' are comprehended in the woodcut. They are vigorous and vicious in their work, while their victim remains calm and resigned. At the left stands an old patriarch, staff in hand, looking on. Is he the high priest of the Sanhedrin before whom Stephen made his defense, or merely an idle bystander? The inscription over the woodcut reads: "The Stoning of Saint Stephen."

(B) CONVERSION OF SAUL

The Conversion of Saul (later called Paul), former persecutor of the Christians, is a woodcut of what happened on his punitive expedition to Damascus. A burst of blazing light strikes him from the heavens at the right. He and his steed are sinking to the ground as he tries to shield his eyes. "And he fell to the earth, and heard a voice saying unto him, Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? And he said, Who are you, Lord? And the Lord said, I am Jesus whom you persecute. . . And he, trembling and astonished, said, Lord, what should I do? And the Lord said to him, Arise, and go into the city, and it shall be told to you what you must do. And the men who journeyed with him stood speechless, hearing a voice, but seeing no man. And Saul arose from the earth. And when his eyes were opened he saw no man. But they led him by the hand, and brought him into Damascus. And he was three days without sight, and neither did he eat nor drink. . . . And when he had received food, he was strengthened. Then was Saul certain days with the disciples who were at Damascus. And immediately he preached Christ in the synagogues, that he is the Son of God." (Acts 9:1-8 and 19-20). The inscription over the woodcut reads: "The Conversion and Life of the Apostle Paul."

Mark, the evangelist, born of the tribe of Levi, and a priest, went from Antioch to Rome with Peter, his master, to spread the word of the Lord. There he heard Peter, and at the request of his brethren he wrote a short gospel. When Peter heard it, he authorized it to be read in the churches. When Peter noted this man's qualifications, he sent him to Alexandria. Before that time Mark, by his preaching, had converted the people of Aquileia to the Christian faith, and more particularly, one Hermagoras, a highly learned man and citizen there. With him Mark returned to Peter, who made him an Aquileian bishop. From there Mark went to Alexandria and proclaimed Christ, and there he founded the first church with such learning and moderation of conduct that he drew all the followers of Christ to him. He was so humble that he cut off his own thumb in order to disqualify himself for the priesthood. After he had held the congregation together for a long time by his learning and writings, he was made prisoner by the priests of the temple in the eighth year of Nero, while he was performing the mass at Easter time. With a rope about his neck he was dragged through the streets and finally put to death. He was buried at Alexandria. Amanus became his successor. In the Year of the Lord 829, when Justianus Patricius was Duke of Venice, the remains of Mark were brought to Venice. In the following year, which was 471 years after Venice was built, the church of St. Mark, which may now be soon there, was begun, and Saint Mark was made the patron of the city. His image is in its coat of arms, and the book of his Gospel was procured from Aquileia with other costly gifts, and was deposited in this same church.

The founding of the church by Mark at Alexandria is traditional, as is also the securing of his remains by the Venetians by a pious stratagem. In fact, nearly everything (all?) the stories told about Mark are legendary. Venice claims him as its patron saint. Mark is believed to have been born of Jewish parents, deriving their origin from the tribe of Levi, and of the line of the priesthood. His name, Roman in form, was probably assumed by him according to the usual custom of the Jews on moving to Italy, as in the case of Paul. He was perhaps converted by Peter whom he constantly attended in his travels, acting as his secretary and interpreter. He is said to have founded the church in Aquileia, and there to have written the Gospel which bears his name (the author of the Gospel of Mark, like all four gospel texts in the Bible, is anonymous, and it is only later Christian tradition that assigns the Mark referenced here in the Chronicle to the actual biblical text that currently bears his name). From Aquileia he sent Hermagoras, its first bishop, to be ordained by Peter.

Tradition then states that Mark was sent into Egypt to plant Christianity there, and fixed his main residence at Alexandria. From there he moved westward toward Libya where he made many converts among various people.

Returning to Alexandria, he preached freely, and wisely provided for the perpetuation of the church by appointing governors and pastors. And the season of Easter came, at which the great solemnities of Serapis were celebrated, when the minds of the people being excited to a passionate vindication of the honor of their idol, the mob broke in upon Mark, then engaged in the solemn celebration of divine worship, and binding his with cords, dragged him through the streets until his blood ran out, his spirit failed and he died. Then they burned his body; but the Christians collected his bones and ashes and buried them near the place where he was accustomed to preach. His relics were removed with great pomp from Alexandria, in the beginning of the 9th century, to Venice, where they are greatly venerated, and where the saint is adopted as the patron of the state, and where one of the richest and stateliest churches in the world was erected in his honor.

Mark is symbolized by the Lion, because he has set forth the royal dignity of Christ; or, according to others, because he begins with the mission of John the Baptist, "the voice of one crying in the wilderness," which is figured by the lion; or, according to a third interpretation, because of a popular belief in the Middle Ages that the young of the lion were born dead, and after three days were awakened by the breath of their sire. Some authors, however, represent the lion as vivifying his young by his roar. The revival of the young lions was considered symbolic of the Resurrection, and Mark was commonly called the "Historian of the Resurrection" (which is ironic, since in this gospel alone there is no resurrection actually depicted; Mark 16:9-20 are a later addition that attempt to supply a resurrection narrative.).

The phoenix, the most noble and singular bird in all the world (as Cornelius Valerianus writes) and which flew in Egypt, was brought to Rome during the consulship of Q. Plautius and Sex. Papinius in the 800th year of the city. Before that time this bird is said to have been seen in Arabia. It was as large as an eagle, golden about its neck, and otherwise purple. Its tail was dark green interspersed with red feathers containing eyes. Upon its head was a crest or crown of feathers. Manilius, the Roman consul, states that although no one ever saw this bird eat, it lived six hundred and sixty years. When it became old, it built a nest of aromatic branches, filling it with incense; and in that nest it died. Afterwards a small worm or grub issued from the ashes, which later became a small bird.

This account of the Phoenix would appear to be based on Pliny (Natural History 10.2):

Ethiopia and India, especially, produce birds of diversified plumage, and such as quite surpass all description. In the front rank of these is the phoenix, that famous bird of Arabia; though I am not quite sure that its existence is not all a fable. It is said that there is only one in existence in the whole world, and that that one has not been seen very often. We are told that this bird is of the size of an eagle, and has a brilliant golden plumage around the neck, while the rest of the bird is of a purple color; except the tail, which is azure with long feathers intermingled of a roseate hue; the throat is adorned with a crest, and the head with a tuft of feathers. The first Roman who described this bird, and who has done so with the greatest exactness, was the senator Manilius. He tells us that no person has ever seen this bird eat, that in Arabia it is looked upon as sacred to the sun, that it lives five hundred and forty years, that when it becomes old it builds a nest of cassia and sprigs of incense which it fills with perfumes, and then lays its body down upon them to die; and from its bones and marrow there springs at first a sort of small worm, which in time changes into a little bird. That the first thing it does is to perform the obsequies of its predecessor, and to carry the nest in fire to the city of the Sun near Panchaia, and there deposit it upon the altar of that divinity; that the revolution of the great year is completed with the life of this bird, and that then a new cycle comes round again with the same characteristics as the former one, in the season and the appearance of the stars; and he says that this begins about midday of the day on which the sun enters the sign of Aries . . . Cornelius Valerianus says that the phoenix took its flight from Arabia into Egypt in the consulship of Q. Plaudius and Sextus Papinius. This bird was brought to Rome in the censorship of the Emperor Claudius, being the year from the building of the City, 800, and it was exposed to public view in the comitium. This fact is attested by the public Annals, but there is no one that doubts that it was a fictitious phoenix only.

According to Egyptian mythology the phoenix came every five hundred years out of Arabia to Heliopolis, where it burned itself on the altar and rose again from its ashes, young and beautiful. The myth was firmly believed in by the ancients, and Ovid and many other writers besides Pliny give full details of its mysterious existence. The ancients believed that the phoenix after attaining the age of five hundred years committed itself to the flames that burst at the fanning of its wings, from the funeral pyre of costly spices that it had itself constructed, and that from its ashes a new phoenix arose to life. Tertullian, one of the earliest writers of the Christian church, in all good faith accepts it as a most marked symbol of the resurrection and of eternity. The phoenix is represented in some of the earliest Christian mosaics, and often has a star-shaped nimbus.

James the Greater (Iacobus Maior), an apostle of the Lord, son of Zebedee by Mary Salome, and a brother of John the Evangelist, is called the greater because he was selected as an apostle before James the Lesser, and was martyred and attained to the kingdom of heaven first. The Lord selected him with John, saying, Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men. And they abandoned their nets and followed him. After the advent of the Holy Spirit James went to Spain to preach. Having wandered all over Spain preaching, and only making nine new disciples, and having noted the coarseness of the people, he returned to Judea. There he was beheaded by Herod, brother and governor of the king, and thus he attained the crown of martyrdom; and this just one year after Christ was martyred. And while he was being led to his death by Josias, a very learned man, and on his way cured a sick man, Josias believed also, and being first baptized, was beheaded with James. But his disciples took his sacred body away by night, and brought it from Jerusalem to Spain, into the place called Galicia Compostella, in the furthestmost regions of Spain. And there he is constantly held in great veneration by the inhabitants and by strangers from all over, for the extent that Christians make pilgrimages there is really wonderful; and because of the love of making these pilgrimages there it is not necessary for the Papal See to grant dispensation on that condition. And so what this apostle, as compared with other apostles, lost in honor and esteem by reason of the shortness of his life, was made up to him in an abundance of veneration accorded him after his death. [James the Greater, or Elder, was closely related to Jesus, and with his brother John (the evangelist) and Peter, he seems to have been admitted to particular favor, traveled with Jesus, and was present at most of the events recorded in the gospels. He was one of the three who were permitted to witness the glorification of Jesus on Mount Tabor, and was one of those who slept during the agony in the garden. After the ascension nothing is recorded concerning him except the fact that Herod killed him with the sword. The Middle Ages, however, have added many legends. According to these, James, after the Jesus' ascension, preached the gospel in Judea, then traveled over the whole world, at last coming to Spain, where he made very few converts by reason of the moral and intellectual ignorance of the people. The Virgin appeared to him and directed him to build a chapel to her; and this he did. He then founded the Christian faith in Spain, and returned to Judea, where he preached for many years and performed many miracles. But the Jews, being more and more incensed, found James and arrested him; and they brought him before the tribunal of Herod Agrippa; and one of those who dragged him along, touched by the gentleness of his demeanor, and by his miracles of mercy, was converted, and supplicated to die with him. Then the apostle gave him the kiss of peace, after which they were both beheaded. The disciples of James came and took away his body, and for fear of the Jews, carried it to Joppa; and they place it on board a ship which angels conducted to the coast of Spain; and sailing through the straits, called the Pillars of Hercules, they landed at length in Galicia, at a port called Ira Flavia, now Padron. But in later days the body of the saint was lost; and it was not recovered till the year 800, when it was transported to Compostella, as a place of pilgrimage that is renowned throughout Europe].

The first persecution of the Christians began in the thirteenth year of the reign of Nero, when various persons at Rome and elsewhere, other than Peter and Paul, mentioned hereafter, were martyred, among them forty-seven who were baptized by Peter while in prison, and then died by the sword of Nero, after confessing their faith.

(A) SAINT MARK

St. Mark is portrayed in medieval cap and gown, seated in a chair. He is pointing to a passage in a book that he has in hand, probably his own Gospel. To the right is his symbol, the winged lion, which is looking out over a wall in the foreground. Both saint and lion are shown with a nimbus. The use of the lion as an emblem of strength, majesty and fortitude, naturally arises from many passages in the Scriptures. By medieval writers it was believed always to sleep with its eyes open; hence the idea of watchfulness. Durand in his Rationale Divinorum Officiorum [The is arguably the most important medieval treatise on the symbolism of church architecture and rituals of worship. Written by the French bishop William Durand of Mende (1230-1296), the treatise is ranked with the Bible as one of the most frequently copied and disseminated texts in all of medieval Christianity. It served as an encyclopedic compendium and textbook for liturgists and remains an indispensable guide for understanding the significance of medieval ecclesiastical art and worship ceremonies], has a rubric on the Evangelists, in which he states that Mark's type is the roaring lion, "because his aim is chiefly to give a description of the resurrection of Christ, and for this reason his Gospel is read at Easter. For it is stated that the lion by its tremendous roar calls to life its whelps on the third day, and thus God the Father, by his immense power, called to life his Son on the third day." (E. P. Evans, Animal Symbolism, p. 85). The inscription over the woodcut reads: "Saint Mark, the Evangelist."

(B) THE PHOENIX

The Phoenix, a fabulous bird, has gathered together for a nest branches of aromatic wood, upon which it is angrily striding. With its outspread wings it is fanning the nest into flames, for this is its own funeral pyre. Here it will be reduced to ashes, and from the ashes will spring another phoenix, to repeat the same scene in another 500 years. The phoenix has been introduced at this point of the text, probably in relation to St. Mark, the Evangelist of the Resurrection. The inscription over the woodcut reads: "Phoenix (Fenix), a Unique

(C) MARTYRDOM OF JAMES THE GREATER

St. James the Greater is undergoing martyrdom. He is kneeling in an attitude of devotion, praying for his persecutors as long as life lasts. Behind him stands the strident medieval executioner, about to decapitate him with a huge sword. To the right are two men, one no doubt representing Herod, or Herod's brother (as the text states), who ordered the execution. The second man I am unable to identify. The sentence is being carried out in the open country. The victim wears a peculiar felt hat, covering the nape of his neck, and rakishly turned up on the forehead to accommodate the shining star that the artist has inscribed on it. The inscription over the woodcut reads: "The Apostle James (Jacobus) the Greater."

Folio CIIII verso

James (Iacobus), the apostle, surnamed the Just, and called the Less in deference to the Greater, (not on the score of piety, but because of his call as an apostle), was a brother of the Lord, having been born of the sister of the Lord's mother. After the ascension of the Lord he was appointed the first bishop of the Church at Jerusalem; and he was in office for 30 years and until the seventh year of Nero. This James was holy by the body of his mother. He did not drink wine, or intoxicating drink, nor did he eat meat. Metal never came upon his head, nor was he ever anointed with ointment. He did not bathe, and he wore linen raiment. He entered the sanctum sanctorum ('holy of holies') alone, and constantly and industriously prayed for the welfare of the people on bonded knee. Therefore he was called the Just; and (as Ignatius states), in countenance and demeanor he was so much like the Lord as though they were twins. He was taken prisoner by Annas (Annanus), the priest of the Jews, and he was asked to deny the Lord. He was taken to the highest point of the Temple, and thrown down from there and stoned. Yet he raised his hands toward heaven as much as he could and prayed for his persecutors. While still conscious he was struck upon the head with a fuller's club, and died. The Lord appeared to him after his ascension, and he blessed his bread, saying: My brother, eat your bread, for the Son of Man is risen from the dead; for he did not like to eat bread until he had first seen him. He was so holy, as Josephus states, that it was believed Jerusalem was destroyed because of his death. [James the Less, also called the Just, was a brother of Christ, being the son of Mary, for which reason he is styled the "Lord's brother." Nothing in particular is related of him until after the ascension. Some regard him as the first bishop of Jerusalem, and he is venerated for his piety, wisdom and charity. These qualities are conspicuous in the pseudonymous epistle bearing his name. By the fervor of his teaching he excited the fury of the Scribes and Pharisees, and particularly the enmity of Annas, the high priest. They flung him down from the terrace of the Temple, one of the populace beating out his brains with a fuller's club, which later became his symbol. According to tradition he closely resembled Christ in appearance and conduct. Legend says "The Holy Virgin herself, had she been capable of error, might have mistaken one for the other." This exact resemblance, it has been suggested, may have rendered necessary the kiss of Judas in order to identify the victim to the soldiers].

Now when Peter, the holiest of men, had made a name for himself among all the people, and was highly regarded, Nero became angry and sought to slay him. Having been warned of Nero's wrath by his friends, Peter fled from Rome; and he met Christ, whom he worshipped; and he asked him, Where are you going? And Christ answered, To Rome, to be again crucified. Therefore Peter also returned to the city, and appointed Clement as bishop. Not long after that, upon the orders of Nero, Peter and Paul were slain, after much torture. For Peter (as he wished) was nailed to a cross with his head to the earth and his feet upward. He was buried in the Vatican. He held his office for twenty-five years. Paul was beheaded on the same day and buried near the Ostian Gate thirty-seven years after the death of Christ. And when they were about to part Paul said to Peter, Peace be with you, you rock of the Church and shepherd of all the lambs of Christ. And Peter said, Go forth in peace, you preacher of the good, you intermediary and sufferer for the salvation of the righteous. Marcellus and Apuleius, their disciples, anointed them with well smelling herbs and buried them. Even today the heads of Peter and Paul are ornamented with gold, silver, and precious stones, and are shown to the people in the Church of St. John Lateran.

(A) MARTYRDOM OF JAMES THE LESS

The Martyrdom of James the Less, as based on the traditional account, shows James in the act of falling, or being thrown from the parapet of the Temple—although he has not fallen very far! A man leaning over the parapet has just released his hold on the apostle's garments. Another, who contrary to the traditional account is wielding an implement resembling a mace instead of a fuller's club, is about to give the victim the deathblow. Below the parapet a number of people, apparently the Temple congregation, are seated and looking on in astonishment. And thus we see what is going on within the temple as well as without. The inscription over the woodcut reads: "The Apostle James the Just (and) Lesser."

(B) MARTYRDOM OF PETER

Peter is being martyred by crucifixion, his head downward, as he himself desired it, so that his death might be even more painful and ignominious than that of his Divine Master. The cross has been erected beside a brick or stone wall, beyond which is seen the open country. Peter has been placed upon the cross in a long shirt or robe modestly fastened about his ankles. Two executioners are busily engaged tightening his bonds. The inscription over the woodcut reads: "The Crucifixion of the Apostle Peter."

(C) MARTYRDOM OF PAUL

The third woodcut shows the execution of Paul completed. His body is still in a kneeling posture before the block. His head lies on the other side, looking (perhaps) slightly peeved. A medieval executioner is deftly wiping the blood from his sword with a cloth resembling a napkin. Apparently the execution has taken place at the foot of a hill in the open country. The inscription over the woodcut reads: "The Beheading of Paul."

Although accurate portraiture is a matter of indifference to the artist of the Chronicle, we may here note an observance, though slight, of the traditions. Peter is represented as bald on the top of his head (except for the forelock), the hair growing thick about his ears and in a circle somewhat resembling 'priestly features,' and an open undaunted countenance. His beard is short and curly; and so tradition has learned to picture him. Paul was a man of short and meager statue, high forehead, aquiline nose, and sparkling eyes. In his case the artist has not done so well.

According to tradition Peter suffered martyrdom in the Circus of Caligula, at the foot of the Vatican, and was crucified between two goals or terminals, around which the chariots turned in the races. According to another tradition his death occurred in the courtyard or military station on the summit of Mons Janicula, the eminence above the site of the Circus.

Folio CV recto

Seneca, also called Lucius Annaeus, a Stoic philosopher, born in Cordoba, was the tutor of Nero the emperor. He was held in esteem at Rome, and was an uncle of Lucan the poet. Of him the pious Jerome writes that he led a most temperate life; and he placed him in the book of the saints because of the numerous epistles that Paul wrote to Seneca, and Seneca to Paul. Among his other virtues God blessed him with such a memory that he was able to repeat two thousand names in proper order as soon as they were pronounced, and could repeat two hundred verses spoken by two hundred students, beginning with the last and ending with the first. It is said that two years before the slaying of Peter and Paul, Seneca was put to death by Nero, his very savage, for having opposed him. For when Seneca was well along in years he was suspected of being a party to the Pisan conspiracy; or, as some say, Nero, recalling the discipline to which he was subjected in his youth, and being born with a hatred of virtue, ordered Seneca to choose the manner of his own death. When Seneca learned of this, he asked to be placed in lukewarm water and all his veins opened until he gave up the spirit, believing this to be an easy manner of death. And so he ended his life. Being a highly learned man, he wrote many works, both human and divine. [Seneca (L. Annaeus), son of the rhetorician, M. Annaeus Seneca, was a philosopher. He was born at Cordoba, probably around 4 BCE, and was brought to Rome by his parents when a child. From his youth he ardently devoted himself to rhetoric and philosophy. He was made the tutor of Nero, and when the latter ascended the throne upon the death of Claudius, Seneca became his chief adviser. He exerted his influence to check the young emperor's vicious propensities, but at the same time enriched himself through his position. He supported Nero in his conflicts with his mother Agrippina, and was a party to her death. After that Nero completely abandoned himself to his vicious propensities, and the presence of Seneca became irksome to him, while his wealth excited his greed. Seneca's exclusive claim to eloquence, and his disparagement of Nero's skill in driving and singing, were urged against him by Nero's favorites. Seneca heard of the charges. He was rich and knew that Nero wanted money. Offering to surrender his fortune, he asked permission to retire. Nero affected to be grateful for his services, refused the proffered gift, and sent him away with perfidious assurances of his respect and affection. But the conspiracy of Piso gave Nero a pretext for putting his old tutor to death. Although there was no conclusive evidence that Seneca was implicated, Nero sent a tribune to him with an order of death. Without showing any signs of alarm Seneca cheered his friends by reminding them of the lessons of philosophy. His wife chose to die with him, and the same blow opened the veins of both. Seneca died with the courage of a Stoic. His fame rests on his numerous writings, both philosophical and literary (his tragedies in particular had a significant impact on the young Shakespeare)].

Lucan (Lucanus) Annaeus, son of the brother of the aforesaid Seneca, was a highly celebrated orator, poet and historian. Although younger than his uncle, he was his equal in intelligence and moderation. He first studied at Rome under Cornutus, and at the same time Persius and Bassus were his colleagues. And although, by reason of his talents, he was called to court by Nero and was in favor with him for a long time, and for that reason attained to the office of revenue collector and priest, he was accused of conspiracy as Seneca had been, and was put to death, according to his own choice, by the opening of his veins. [M. Annaeus Lucanus (usually called Lucan), the Roman poet, was born at Cordoba in Spain in 39 CE. His father, L. Annaeus Mella, was a brother of Seneca, the philosopher. At an early age he was brought to Rome, and his education was superintended by the most eminent teachers of the day. His talents aroused the jealousy of Nero, who, unable to endure competition, forbade him to recite in public. This injustice caused Lucan to join the famous conspiracy of Piso. But he was betrayed, and on the promise of pardon, he turned informer. After the more important victims, whose names he had disclosed, were dispatched, he also received an order of death, and he chose his veins to be opened. Lucan wrote various poems, the titles of which have been preserved, but the only extant production is his great epic poem ('The Civil War'; aka), a work that blends fact and fiction in ten books depicting the struggle between Julius Caesar and Pompey the Great for possession of the Roman world].

Persius Flaccus Aulus—his father was Flaccus, his mother Fulvia—a native of Volaterrana in Etruria, was a person of medium stature, pleasing appearance, good habits, and exceptional intelligence and learning. He first studied grammar, then rhetoric, and finally philosophy under Cornutus. [L. Annaeus Cornutus, a distinguished Stoic philosopher, was born at Leptia in Libya. He came to Rome, probably as a slave, and was emancipated by Annaei. He was the teacher and friend of Persius, the poet, and left him his library. He was banished by Nero for having too freely criticized the latter's literary attempts. He wrote a large number of works, all of which are lost]. He died of a disease of the stomach at the age of twenty-nine years, while Nero still reigned. He was buried on his estate at Rome. At this time Cornutus, the philosopher and poet, was also sent into exile by Nero on various accusations. Because of his devotion to his disciple Persius, he collected a library. He left his earnings to his sisters as an inheritance. [A. Persius Flaccus, the poet, was a Roman knight, connected by blood and marriage with persons of the highest rank. He was born at Volaterrana in Etruria on December 4, 34 CE. He received his early education in his native town. At the age of twelve he was sent to Rome, where he studied grammar and rhetoric under celebrated masters. He was afterwards the pupil of Cornutus the Stoic, who became his guide, philosopher and friend, and to whom he firmly attached himself. He died of a stomach ailment on November 24, 62 CE, before he had completed his twenty-eighth year. He wrote seldom, and then slowly. His extant works consist of six short satires, and these were left in an unfinished state].

Philip was one of the twelve apostles of the Lord Jesus Christ, who called upon Philip to follow him. Philip enlisted his brother Nathanael, a doctor of law, in whom there was no guile in favor of anyone not called as an apostle, so that the conversion of the people to the faith should not be subordinated to human wisdom. Now after the apostle had preached for twenty years through the land of Scythia, and had converted all the Scythians to faith in Christ, he came to Hierapolis, [Hierapolis, a city of Great Phrygia, near the Maeander River. Like the neighboring cities of Colossae and Laodicea, it was an early seat of Christianity, and is mentioned in Paul's Epistle to the Colossians (4:13)]. in Asia. There he extinguished the heresy of the Ebionites, [The Ebionites were an ultra-Jewish party in the early Christian Church, between the second and the fourth century, chiefly made up of Pharisees and Essenes, and characterized by a denial of the divinity of Christ and rejection of the Pauline epistles. While they admitted the world to have been made by the true God, they held that Christ was a miraculously endowed man, and rejected Paul as an apostle from the Mosaic Law to the customs and ordinances of which, including circumcision, they steadily adhered. Origen divides the Ebionites into two classes in accordance to their acceptance or rejection of the virgin birth of Jesus, but says that all alike reject the Pauline epistles. Eusebius is of the same opinion. They kept both the Jewish Sabbath and the Christian Lord's Day. The names Ebionites and Nazarenes both refer to the Jewish Christians of Syria, whose origin is obscure]. who did not believe in the divinity of Christ. Afterwards he was taken prisoner and was led to a statue of Mars, an idolatrous god, to worship it. But a dragon came out from under the image and slew the son of the high priest who attended the altar fire, as well as two tribunes whose servants held the apostle. And the dragon made many people ill. Yet after the apostle's prayers, the dragon disappeared, and the people became well again. In the seventy-eighth year of his age, because of his preaching, he was nailed to a cross by the unbelievers, like his master was; and so he was made a martyr to Christ. This Philip left two daughters, who were virgins and who were buried beside him, one to his right and one to his left.

Philip the Apostle, was a native of Bethsaida, the city of Peter and Paul (John 1:44), and apparently was among the Galilean peasants of that district who came to hear the preaching of John the Baptist. To him first, in the whole circle of disciples, did Jesus speak the words, "Follow me." (John 1:43). And as soon as he had learned to know his master, he was eager to communicate his discovery to another who had also shared the same expectations. "Philip finds Nathanael, and says to him, We have found him of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets, did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph. And Nathanael said to him, Can any good thing come out of Nazareth? Philip says to him, Come and see. Jesus saw Nathanael coming to him, and says of him, Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile!" (John 1:45-47). Philip apparently went with the first company of disciples who accompanied Jesus on his ministry, and he is with the company of disciples at Jerusalem after the Ascension (Acts 1:13) and on the day of Pentecost. After this all is uncertain and apocryphal. He is mentioned by Clement of Alexandria as having had a wife and children.

The apocryphal Acta Philippi ('Acts of Philip') are utterly wild and fantastic, and if there is any truth in them, it is probably the bare fact that the Apostle or the Evangelist labored in Phrygia and died at Hieropolis. He drew the people there away from the worship of a great serpent. The priest and the proconsul seized on the apostles and tortured them. John suddenly appeared with words of counsel and encouragement. The tortures that Philip had suffered ended in his death. Another tradition represents Scythia as the scene of his labors, and places the guilt for his death on the Ebionites.

Barnabas, one of the seventy-two disciples, and a native of Cyprus, was given to Paul as an associate to preach to the pagans, and at Peter's command he wandered through the entire Longobardian country, preaching and teaching. He and his disciples converted all Cisalpine Gaul to the Christian faith. He erected the first cathedral at Milan (Mediolanum) and left a bishop there. He returned to Cyprus with the Gospel of Matthew and there he healed many. He earned the crown of martyrdom at Salamina not long before Peter was martyred. [Barnabas was a Levite of Cyprus. He sold his property and placed the proceeds at the disposal of the apostles (Acts 4:36-37). When Paul came to Jerusalem after his conversion, Barnabas introduced him to the other apostles (Acts 9:26-27). Five years afterward the church at Jerusalem, being informed of the progress of the Gospel at Antioch, sent Barnabas there (Acts 11:20-24). He later went to Tarsus to seek Paul and bring him to Antioch where they lived together for two years and made many converts. They left in 45 to convey alms from this church to Jerusalem, but soon returned bringing John and Mark (Acts 11:28-30). They then separated for the labors to which they had been appointed—the planting of new churches among the Gentiles, and thus the missionary cause was instituted. They visited Cyprus and some cities of Asia Minor (Acts 13:2-14). After another three years they returned to Antioch, gathered the church and rehearsed all that God had done by them. They again separated, Paul going to Asia, and Barnabas with Mark to Cyprus. Nothing is known of his subsequent career].

Linus succeeded St. Peter in the pontificate in the last year of Nero, and held office to the time of Vespasian. Some assign this position to Pope Clement, foregoing Linus and Cletus. However, history, as well as the writings of Jerome, are to the contrary. Jerome states that Clement was the fourth bishop of Rome after Peter, while Linus was the second, and Cletus the third. Some Latin writers place Clement immediately after Peter, but it is known that Clement compelled Linus and Cletus to precede him in the papal office; for succession to this coveted princely position was not a matter of consequence to him. Linus was a Tuscan by birth. He was a man of good morals and piety, and at the command of Peter ordered that no woman should enter church with uncovered head. Twice he consecrated eighteen priests and eleven bishops in this city. He described the works of Peter, particularly his contest with Simon the Magician. After having driven the devils out of the people and brought the dead back to life, he was slain by Saturninus, then consul, whose daughter he relieved of the devil. He was buried in the Vatican beside the body of Peter on September 21. St. Gregory, bishop of Hostia (Ostiensem), as it is said, removed his remains to that city, interring them in the Church of St. Lawrence. Linus occupied the papal see eleven years three months and twelve days. [Linus, a Christian at Rome, known to Paul and Timothy (2 Tim. 4:24), is said by Irenaeus to have been the first bishop of Rome. He is corroborated by Eusebius and Theodoret, and all ancient writers agree that the first bishop of Rome after the Apostles was named Linus. The date of his appointment, duration of his episcopate, and extent of his Episcopal jurisdiction are unsettled. Eusebius and Theodoret state that he became bishop of Rome after the death of Peter. Eusebius gives the duration of his episcopate as 68-80. According to the , Linus suffered martyrdom, and was buried in the Vatican].

Cletus, a pope, by birth a Roman, reluctantly accepted the pontificate at the request of Clement. He was highly respected as a good and holy man on account of his learning, behavior and worthiness. He left nothing undone that might promote or augment the Church of God. After he had well ordered the churches and had consecrated twenty-five priests at the command of Peter, he received the crown of martyrdom under Emperor Domitian and was buried in the Vatican beside the remains of St. Peter on the 27th day of April. He was the first, as they say, to incorporate salvation and papal blessing in the apostolic letters. He held office during the times of Vespasian and Titus, and until the time of the consuls Domitian and Rufus, as Damasus writes. He occupied the papal see 11 years, 1 month and 11 days. The office was vacant for 20 days after his death. [Cletus, Anecletus, or Anacletus, appears as the second bishop of Rome, occupying the see for twelve years (c. 77-88). It is uncertain that Linus, Cletus and Clement were the first three bishops of Rome. Cletus and Anecletus/Anacletus are identical; the former was the Greek, the latter the Latin form of the same name, signifying 'the blameless.' The body of Cletus is said to be preserved in the Vatican Chapel].

Bartholomew, the apostle, and such by the advice of heaven, after the descent of the Holy Spirit, and after he had preached the gospel of Christ in Lycaonia and India, came to the city of Albana [Albana, or Albanopolis, is probably the modern Derbend, on the shores of the Caspian, north of the Caucasus. Martyrologists believe that this is the site of Bartholomew's martyrdom]. in Greater Armenia. And he entered the temple in which Ashtaroth (Ascaroth), the pagan god, was worshipped, and so contrived that the devil made no response to his worshippers. On account of that they went to a city nearby, where another idolatrous god told them that their own god had been enslaved by the presence of Bartholomew; and he identified Bartholomew by describing him as having black curly hair, a fair body, large eyes, regular nose, long beard, and a few gray locks, a smooth person, wearing a white robe without sleeves, and a cloak with jewels at all the corners, and that he was accustomed to pray one hundred times daily on bended knees, etc. And there Bartholomew preached the Gospel, converted Polymius (Polemium), the king, and his queen, and twelve cities, to Christ, and exposed the devil. For that reason the priests of the temple became angry; and they caused Astyages, brother of Polymius, to beat Bartholomew, to torture him, and finally to behead him; and thus he attained heavenly bliss. He was buried at the same place by the faithful with every honor. From there his body was removed to Lipari, later to Beneventum, and finally, as some say, to Rome. Bartholomew was born of noble parents, and came to Jerusalem where he became attached to Christ after witnessing his divine works and miracles. [Bartholomew, one of the twelve Apostles, is mentioned only in the catalogues of Apostles (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14, and Acts 1:13). According to Jerome, he wrote a Gospel, preached in India, and died at Albanopolis, in Armenia. He was the son of Talmai, and Bartholomew is really a patronymic – Bar Talmai, that is, 'son of Talmai.' He is named in connection with Philip, and seems to have been the same person whom John calls Nathanael (John 1:45-51). His correct title would appear to be Nathanael bar Talmai. He is said to have been flayed alive by Polymius, the Armenian prince, or by Astyages, the brother of Polymius. When flayed, Bartholomew was suspended on a cross, and left to die in agony, exposed to the flies. Tradition has it that the king at Derbend, in order to make sure that the Christians would not recover the body, enclosed it in a leaden coffin and threw it into the Caspian Sea; but the coffin floated like wood all the way to the island of Lipari, near Sicily. From there in 839 CE the body was brought to Beneventum, which was elevated into an archbishopric in 969 by John XIII, in honor of the sacred body it contained; and indulgences were granted to those visiting and venerating the relics. But another body of the same saint was found by Pope Paul IV, in 1560, in the church of that dedication in Rome, which had been ruined by a flood in 1557. The church of Beneventum, however, produces bulls from five popes confirming their claim to the true body. The Romans produced two. Bartholomew's peculiar emblem is the butcher's flaying knife, which he holds in his hands; sometimes he carries on his arm the skin of a man with the face attached to it, and frequently he has in one hand the Gospel of Matthew].

Apollinaris, bishop of Ravenna, and a very pious man, was consecrated by St. Peter and sent to Ravenna. He was frequently punished with cruel lashes and his old body torn by gruesome tortures. However, in order that the faithful would not fear his hardships, he worked apostolic miracles, raising a girl from the dead, making the blind to see, the dumb to speak, and finally casting down an idol and its temple. After suffering torture he went to glorious martyrdom in the same city on the 23rd day of July. [Apollinaris (c. 75 CE) was the first bishop of Ravenna, sent there by Peter, according to the apocryphal . He has been styled a martyr, not because he died for Christ, but because on several occasions he shed his blood in testimony of his faith. It is said that on the feast of Apollinaris such swarms of ravens arrived at Ravenna that the people kill and throw out a horse to feed these black pilgrims. This saint is usually represented as a bishop holding a club or sword; and in Germany, with a raven at his side, though not so portrayed in the].

Galba, a man of ancient noble lineage, was the seventh Roman emperor. Although the royal line ended with Nero, and this Galba was in no degree related to the imperial family, nevertheless he was chosen emperor by the army in Iberia. When he learned of Nero's death he journeyed to Rome. In the beginning he was assiduous in the study of the liberal arts and the furtherance of justice. During his singular career he was esteemed for his knowledge of military and home affairs. He was often in the consulship, and many times a leader in the weightiest engagements. He was erect in stature, bald headed, had dark green eyes and a curved nose. He was awkward in hands and feet, and could not endure any footwear, nor turn over the pages of a small book, nor hold it. A hump grew out of his right side. He was accustomed to eat much food, and in the wintertime ate before daybreak. He was inclined to licentiousness. He offended everyone by his avarice and lack of consideration. He was secretly ambushed by Otho (Ottonis) at Rome, and together with his adopted son Piso, a noble youth, was strangled near the Lacus Curtius, in the seventy-third year of his age and the seventh month of his reign. It was Galba who brought Marcus Fabius Quintilianus, the celebrated rhetorician, from Spain to Rome. [Ser. Sulpicius Galba was Roman emperor from June 68 to January 69 CE. He was born near Terracina on December 24, 3 BCE. Both Augustus and Tiberius are said to have told him that some day he would be at the head of the Roman world; from which we must infer that he was a young man of more than ordinary talents. From his parents he inherited great wealth. He was invested with the curule offices before attaining the legitimate age. He was praetor in 20 CE and consul in 33. After his consulship he had the government of Gaul, where he carried on a successful war against the Germans, and restored discipline among the troops. On the death of Caligula many of his friends urged him to seize the empire, but he preferred to live in private station. In 45 Claudius entrusted him with the administration of Africa, which he governed with wisdom and integrity. In the reign of Nero he lived in retirement for several years through fear of being the victim of the tyrant's suspicion; but in 61 Nero gave him the government of Hispania Terraconensis, where he remained for eight years. In 68 Vindex rebelled in Gaul. About the same time Galba was informed that Nero had sent secret orders for his assassination. For that reason he at once resolved to follow the example of Vindex; but he did not assume the imperial title, and professed to act only as the legate of the Roman senate and people. Shortly afterwards Nero was murdered. Shortly after that Galba proceeded to Rome, where he was acknowledged as emperor. But his severity and avarice soon made him unpopular with his new subjects, and especially with the soldiers. His power had also become enfeebled by age, and he was completely under the sway of favorites, who perpetrated many enormities in his name. Perceiving the weakness of his government, he adopted Piso Licinianus, a noble young Roman, as his successor. But this only hastened his ruin. Otho, who had hoped to be adopted by Galba, formed a conspiracy among the soldiers, who rose in rebellion. Galba was murdered and Otho was proclaimed].

Otho, the eighth Roman emperor, was born of a noble father and a lowly mother. Yet by his mother he was nobler than through his father. From youth he was of profligate and immoderate ways. By the grace of Livia Augustus, in whose house he grew up, he was made a consul. He was a relative of Nero and participated in his councils; and so in the course of revolts and dissensions he secretly aspired to the empire. And although in three engagements he was victor over Vitellius, who in Germany had been proclaimed emperor, he was defeated in the fourth. In despair he laid hands upon himself. He wounded himself below the nipple of his left breast, and died. In accordance with his wishes he was buried in Volaterrana, in Etruria, in the thirty-eighth year of his age and the ninety-fifth day of his reign. He was (as one finds) a small person, deformed in his legs, bald, and of feminine fastidiousness; but others write that he was a strong man and a singular ruler in military affairs. [M. Otho was Roman emperor from January 15th to April 16th 69 CE. He was the younger son of L. Otho and was born in the early part of 32. He was one of the companions of Nero in his debaucheries; but when the emperor took possession of his wife, the beautiful but profligate Poppaea Sabina, Otho was sent as governor to Lusitania, which he administered with credit during the last ten years of Nero's life. Otho attracted hope of being adopted by him and succeeding to the empire. But when Galba adopted L. Piso, Otho formed a conspiracy against Galba, and was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers at Rome, who put Galba to death. Meanwhile Vitellius had been proclaimed emperor at Cologne by the German troops, and his generals immediately set out for Italy to place their master on the throne. When the news reached Otho, he marched into the north of Italy to oppose the generals of Vitellius. The fortunes of war were at first in his favor, but his army was subsequently defeated in a decisive battle. For that reason Otho put an end to his own life at the age of thirty-seven].

Vitellius, the ninth Roman emperor, of honorable rather than noble offspring, came to Rome, where he spent his childhood and early youth among the unchaste Tiberine women, marring his subsequent years with every vice. He was a favorite of Caius as a result of prophecy, of Claudius as a devotee of the gaming board, and to some extent of Nero. Through the graces of these three princes he attained to great honors, to the consulship of Africa and the office of public works. Galba afterwards sent him into Lower Germany; and there, in civilian garb, he was greeted as an emperor because he denied no one in the encampment anything. When he became emperor he sank into all manner of wantonness, cruelty and gluttony, for he was such a gourmand that he frequently ate during the day. At one evening meal two thousand fish and seven thousand birds were served up at his command. They say he had a very florid face and a fat belly. He burned Sabinus, the brother of Vespasian in the capitol at Rome with the Flavians. Therefore Vespasian ordered Vitellius to be cut up into small pieces and thrown into the Tiber, and he, together with his brother, passed away in the fifty-seventh year of his age. [A. Vitellius, the ninth Roman emperor, of honorable rather than noble lineage, held office from January 2, to December 22, 69 CE. He was the son of L. Vitellius, and was consul during the first six months of 48. He had some knowledge of letters and possessed some eloquence. His vices made him a favorite of Tiberius, Caius Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, who loaded him with favors. People were much surprised when Galba chose such a man to command the legions in Lower Germany, for he had no military experience. His great accomplishments were eating and drinking. The soldiers proclaimed him emperor at Colonia Agrippinensis (Cologne) on January 2, 69. His generals marched into Italy, defeated Otho's troops at the decisive battle of Bedriacum, and thus secured for Vitellius the undisputed command of Italy. Vitellius reached Rome in July. Though he showed moderation toward his enemies, he showed none in his expenses. He was a glutton and an epicure, and his chief amusement was the table, on which he spent enormous sums. Meantime Vespasian, who had at first taken the oath of allegiance to Vitellius, was proclaimed emperor at Alexandria. He was speedily recognized by the entire

East; and the legions of Illyricum entered northern Italy and declared for Vespasian. Vitellius dispatched powerful forces under his generals, one of whom proved unfaithful. The Vitellians were defeated in two battles, and Primus at the head of the troops of Vespasian marched into Rome. Vitellius was seized, led through the streets, and dragged to the Gemoniae Scalae, where he was killed with repeated blows. A few days before his death, the Capitol had been burnt by his soldiers, and it was there that Flavius Sabinus, Vespasian's brother, had taken refuge].

Vespasian Flavius was the tenth Roman emperor. Although the empire, in consequence of dissension and war between the three princes, was in a doubtful and uncertain state, it was finally reestablished by the Flavians. Vespasian married Flavia Domitilla, and of her were born to him Titus and Domitian. Before he became emperor, Claudius sent him into Germany and Britain. Two years before his (Nero's) death he was sent forth by Nero to conquer the land of Judea. There he conducted many battles; and, therefore, on the death of Nero the army proclaimed him emperor. He ordered his son Titus to continue the war, while by way of Alexandria he returned to Rome. And this same city of Rome (whose customs, laws and public works he found in disorder), he embellished. He was a mild and gifted man, and when he received the empire, which had declined in public welfare, he again restored it. He was cherry-red in complexion, strong and pronounced in limb, and of a smooth and shining countenance, thoughtful not to give offense, but too assiduous in the accumulation of money. Although he did not take it from strangers, yet he used it liberally and generously. Finally he died of diarrhea of the stomach. He said that it becomes an emperor to die standing. And as he stood up he died in the hands of those who held him, at the age of fifty-nine years, being the tenth year of his reign. [T. Flavius Sabinus Vespasianus, Roman emperor, 70-79 CE, was born in the Sabine country on the 17th of November 9 CE. His father came from Reate, in the country of Sabini. His mother, Vespasia Polla, was the daughter of a praefectus castrorum ('camp prefect,' the rank above a centurion) and the sister of a Roman senator. She was left a widow with two sons, Flavius Sabinus and Vespasian. Vespasian served as tribunus militum ('tribune of the soldiers,' a senior legionary officer) in Thrace, and was quaestor in Crete and Cyrene. He was afterwards aedile and praetor. About this time he married Flavia Domitilla, the daughter of a Roman eques, by whom he had two sons, both of whom succeeded him. In the reign of Claudius he was sent into Germany as legatus legionis ('general of the legion,' an ex-praetor given command of one of Rome's elite legions); and in 43 he held the same command in Britain, and reduced the Isle of Wight. He was consul in 51, and proconsul of Africa under Nero. He was at this time very poor, and was accused of getting money by dishonorable means. But he had a great military reputation, and he was liked by the soldiers. Nero afterwards sent him to the East to conduct the war against the Jews. His conduct of the Jewish war had raised his reputation when the war broke out between Otho and Vitellius after the death of Galba. He was proclaimed emperor at Alexandria on the 1st of July 69, and soon after all through the East. Vespasian came to Rome in the following year, leaving his son Titus to continue the war against the Jews. Titus took Jerusalem after a siege of five months; and a formidable insurrection of the Batavi, headed by Civilis, was put down about the same period. Vespasian, on his arrival at Rome, worked with great industry to restore order in the city and in the empire. He disbanded some of the mutinous soldiers of Vitellius, and maintained discipline among his own. He cooperated in a friendly manner with the senate in the public administration. The simplicity and frugality of his mode of life formed a striking contrast with the profusion and luxury of some of his predecessors, and his example is said to have done more to reform the morals of Rome than all the laws that had ever been enacted. He lived more like a private person than a man who possessed supreme power: he was affable and easy of access to all persons. The personal anecdotes of such a man are some of the most instructive records of his reign. He was never ashamed of the meanness of his origin, and ridiculed all attempts to make out for him a distinguished genealogy. When Vologeses, the Parthian king, addressed to him a letter commencing in these terms, "Arsaces, king of kings, to Flavius Vespasianus," the answer began, "Flavius Vespasianus to Arsaces, king of kings." If it be true, as it is recorded, that he was not annoyed at satire or ridicule, he exhibited an elevation of character almost unparalleled in one who occupied such a position. He knew the bad character of his son Domitian, and as long as he lived he kept him under restraint. The stories that are told of his avarice and of his modes of raising money, if true, detract from the dignity of his character; and it seems that he had a taste for little savings, and for coarse humor. Yet it is admitted that he was liberal in all his expenditure for purposes of public utility. In 71 Titus returned to Rome, and both father and son triumphed together on account of the conquest of the Jews. The reign of Vespasian was marked by few striking events. The most important was the conquest of North Wales and the island of Anglesey by Agricola, who was sent into Britain in 78. The next summer Vespasian, whose health was failing, went to spend some time at his paternal house in the mountains of Sabini. By drinking cold water excessively, he damaged his stomach, which was already disordered. But he still attended to business, just as if he had been in perfect health; and on feeling the approach of death, he said that an emperor should die standing; and in fact he did die standing in this attitude, on the 24th of June 79, being 69 years of age. According to Suetonius (23.4), his last words were: Vae, puto, deus fio ('Dammit – I think I'm becoming a god.').]

Folio CVI verso

Andrew (Andreas), a brother and associate of Simon (Symonis) Peter in suffering on the cross, was at first a disciple of John the Baptist, and later a follower of Jesus. Pointing to him, John said, Behold the Lamb of God. After the descent of the Holy Spirit, and while Vespasian still reigned, and after Andrew had preached the Gospel to the Scythians, he traveled in Achaia, a region of Greece. And there he converted many people to the faith, particularly Maximilla, the wife of Aegeus. After a lengthy disputation concerning the faith, Aegeus (Egee) imprisoned him at Patras in Achaia. Later he was severely beaten by twenty youths of the court, and finally was tied to a cross with cords. And when the people murmured against Aegeus, the proconsul, Andrew earnestly urged them not to prevent his martyrdom, for Jesus, his Master, had also shown patience while suffering. When Andrew beheld the cross, he saluted it, saying, "Hail, precious Cross, that has been consecrated by the body of my Lord, and adorned with his limbs as with rich jewels." He lived on the cross for two days. Finally a glory appeared about him, and he fulfilled his martyrdom on the last day of November. Maximilla took his body and interred it with aromatic herbs. In the twenty-first year of the reign of Constantius, the emperor, the remains of Andrew, together with those of St. Luke, were taken from the aforesaid city to Constantinople. Afterwards Pope Pius II brought the head of Andrew from the Peloponnesus to Rome, placing it in St. Peter's Church. [Andrew, brother of Simon Peter, was the first to be called to the apostleship.

The Bible says little about him. Legendary history tells us that after Jesus' ascension he traveled in Scythia, Cappadocia, and Bithynia, everywhere converting multitudes. The Russians believed that he was the first to preach to the Muscovites in Sarmatia, and from there he has been honored as titular saint of Russia. After many sufferings he returned to Jerusalem, and from there traveled in Greece, coming to Patras, a city of Achaia. There he converted Maximilla, wife of the proconsul Aegeus. The proconsul commanded him to be seized, scourged and crucified. This was done on a peculiar form of cross resembling the letter X, on which he was fastened with cords in order to make his suffering longer. His address to the cross, as given in the , is of course also legendary. Andrew is also the patron of Hungary, Burgundy and Scotland].

Quintilian, celebrated orator and philosopher, a native of Spain, was held in high regard at this time. He was brought to Rome by the emperor Galba, and there established a school. He was a very learned and courageous man. He wrote eight books on the art of oratory; also another on useful matters, containing this excellent and memorable saying: God willed that we do not neglect the teachings of our books. We easily proceed from infancy to pleasures, and a weak or neglectful rearing breaks up the arterial system of mind and body. The book on oratory, lost for nearly six hundred years, was discovered in its entirety about the Year of the Lord 1414 (during the Concilium at Constance) in a monastery by Poggio Florentino, a very learned man, and was transcribed by him and brought into Italy. [M. Fabius Quintilianus, the most celebrated of Roman rhetoricians, was born at Calagurris (Calahorra), in Spain, in 40 CE. If not raised at Rome, he must at least have completed his education there, for he himself informs us that, while yet a very young man, he attended the lectures of Domitius Afer, who died in 59. Having revisited Spain, he returned from there in the year 68 in the train of Galba, and immediately began to practice the law, where he acquired considerable reputation. But he was chiefly distinguished as a teacher of eloquence, bearing away the palm in this department from all his rivals, and associating his name, even to a proverb, with pre-eminence in the art. Among his pupils was Pliny the younger. He was invested with the insignia and title of consul (consularia ornamenta) and is, moreover, celebrated as the first public instructor, who, in virtue of the endowment by Vespasian, received a regular salary from the imperial government. After having devoted twenty years to his profession, he retired to private life, and is supposed to have died about 118. The work of Quintilian is a complete system of rhetoric in twelve books, entitled , or sometimes , dedicated to his friend Marcellus Victorius, himself a celebrated orator, and a favorite at court. It was written during the reign of Domitian, while the author was discharging his duties as teacher to the sons of the emperor's niece. There are also extant 164 declamations under the name of Quintilian, but no one believes these to be the works of this great orator].

Thomas Didymus, also called Geminus, one of the twelve apostles, was he who doubted the ascension of Christ; and, more than the Magdalene, he confirmed us in our faith, for he was a witness of the ascension, not only by seeing and hearing but also through touch. He preached the gospel to the Parthians, Medes, Persians, Hyrcanians and Brachmanians, [Hyrcania, a province of the ancient Persian Empire on the shores of the Caspian or Hyrcanian Sea, and separated by mountains from Media, Parthia, and Margiana. It flourished most under the Parthians, whose kings often resided there during the summer months. The Brachmanae is a name used by the ancient geographers, sometimes for a caste of priests in India (the Brahmins), sometimes, apparently, for all the people whose religion was Brahminism, and sometimes for a particular tribe]. and he converted many people in Upper and Lower India. He baptized Migdonia Carithius, a friend of the king's wife, and he founded many churches that are still to be seen. From there, as Chrysostom says, he went to the country of the three kings who came to worship Christ; and he brought them to baptism and took them on as associates to assist in the Christian faith. And at last he was cast into a burning oven by the unbelievers, but he emerged from it unscathed. He was then led forth to worship the idol of the sun; at which the apostle, on bended knee, said: I pray to my Lord Jesus Christ. I pray to you who here lies hidden to destroy this idol. And when that happened the priest of the devil was very angry and he stabbed the apostle with a spear. Before long his body was taken to the city of Edessa. It is thought that Thomas was not present at the death of Mary, and he doubted the ascension of her soul and body. Therefore the Blessed Virgin Mary appeared to him and gave him her girdle as evidence. Of this there is no credible writing at hand. [Thomas was one of the twelve apostles. He was also called "Didymus" ("the twin"). We know little of his history. He seems to have been of singular temperament, cautious, skeptical, thoughtful, and gloomy, yet holding fast what he once believed (John 11:16; 14:5; 20:20-29). He represents the honest, truth-loving skepticism among the apostles. He would not believe in the resurrection until he had tangible evidence of it—until he was allowed to touch Jesus' pierced hands and side. There are various traditions in regard to his history after the ascension of Jesus. The earliest represent him as preaching in Persia; the later, in India. Legend reports that he suffered martyrdom].

Matthew, a highly renowned apostle and evangelist, was called by Christ from the sinful occupation of a tax-gatherer. After the Lord's ascension he preached the Gospel of Christ in Judea. Contemplating a sojourn with the foreign nations of Ethiopia, land of the Moors, he first wrote a Gospel in the Hebrew tongue for the converted Jews, and left it as a memorial with his fellow-disciples, particularly Barnabas. In the beginning of this Gospel he treats of the incarnation; in the middle, of the ministry; and at the end, of the Passion of Christ. This Gospel the apostle Barnabas used and carried about with him in his ministry in a number of places; and he placed it on the sick, and with it he healed them. Matthew wandered through all of Ethiopia, preaching and converting countless Ethiopians to Christian submission; and he washed them in the font of baptism, turning them from dark into a very beautiful people. And he dedicated churches to Christ. But when he consecrated to Christ the Lord the noble virgin Epigenia, with two hundred other maidens, the king sent to the Apostle of God an executioner, who, while Matthew was holding mass with hands uplifted to God at the altar, ran him through with a sword, and killed him on the 21st day of September. And immediately afterwards the king was plagued with a leprous disease, which made him despondent and caused him to kill himself. By means of an apparition the Apostle admonished the people to set up as king the brother of Epigenia; and he reigned 70 years afterwards, establishing many churches and making Ethiopia a Christian country. Eunuchus, whom Philip had baptized, then undertook the rule of Ethiopia.

Matthew, the apostle and evangelist, is the same as Levi, the Publican (Luke 5:27-29), the son of a certain Alphaeus (Mark 2:14). He was a publican and was 'sitting at the place of toll,' near Capernaum, which lay on the road from Damascus to the Mediterranean. Here he collected dues for Herod the tetrarch. The publicans, properly so called, were persons who farmed the Roman taxes, and they were usually, in later times, Roman knights, and persons of wealth. They employed under them lower-ranking officials, natives of the provinces where the taxes were collected, called portitores, to which class Matthew belonged. Nevertheless, he must have been rich and had much to give up in following Jesus. The call is followed by a great feast given to Jesus himself, which roused the anger of the 'scribes of the Pharisees.' We have no trustworthy information as to his later career. Eusebius says that after Jesus' ascension Matthew preached in Judea, and then went to foreign nations. Socrates Scholasticus says that it fell to the lot of Matthew to go into Ethiopia. Heracleon, disciple of Valentine, living in the second century, and the earliest and most trustworthy authority, says that Matthew died a natural death. The story of his martyrdom originated much later. The gospel traditionally ascribed to Matthew is, in fact, anonymous. In art he is usually portrayed as an old man with a long beard, holding his gospel in his hand. He is also represented with a purse or moneybox, in allusion to his worldly calling.

The last sentence in this paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Processus and Martinian, Roman soldiers, were baptized in prison by the divine Peter. At the command of Nero they were tortured with thorns, fire, clubs, and scorpions [Scorpions: Not only with smooth rods were the ancients accustomed to punish offenders, and the Christians among the rest, but likewise with knotty and prickly ones, which they appropriately named "scorpions."], and finally received the crown of martyrdom. [Processus and Martinian were guards in the days of Nero, deputed to watch over the imprisoned Christians. Peter and Paul were thrown into the Maritime prison by order of Paulinus, a magistrate, and by them Processus and Martinian were converted to the Christian faith. The guards in turn released Peter and Paul. Paulinus having learned that these guards were Christians, called upon them to give up the new faith, and refusing to do so, they were tortured, and finally beheaded. The two saints are usually represented in Roman armor, with swords and palms]. The brothers Nereus and Achilles (Archelaus), [Nereus and Achilles, according to the Acts, are said to have been eunuchs; but eunuchs were not introduced into Roman families until later. The festival of Nereus and Achilles was kept at Rome with great solemnity in the sixth century, and their relics are preserved in the church of their names at Rome. Garraye, anciently Numantia, in Spain, also claims to possess their bodies, while the heads are pretended to be shown at Ariano, near Benevento]. during the persecution at Rome suffered martyrdom there; likewise did Torpetus, Torquatus, and Cecilius Euphrasius, among the Spaniards. [In the German edition, the order of this paragraph and the next (on Thecla) are switched].

Thecla (Tecla), a highly renowned virgin and disciple of Saint Paul, was cruelly tortured with clubs, wild beasts and fire, because she confessed the Christian faith. She was born at Iconium, and came to rest in the Lord at Seleucia on the 23rd day of the month of September. [Thecla, according to her acts, composed by a priest in Asia Minor to do honor to Paul, but not at all reliable, was the daughter of pagan parents in Iconium. She heard Paul preach as she sat at her chamber window, and afterwards refused to listen to the advances of her betrothed, Thamyris. She ran away from home and followed Paul to Seleucia. A native of that place tried to kiss her in the street, and she tore the clothes off his back. The man accused her before the governor, and she was exposed to wild beasts, which however, would not touch her. She then jumped into a pond filled with seals and porpoises, and baptized herself. All the sea-monsters in the pond died when she jumped in. After that she escaped, and, dressed in boy's clothes, followed Paul everywhere. When he left for Rome, a shining cloud led her to a cave, where she spent seventy years].

Judas Thaddaeus (Thadeus), a brother of Simon (Symonis) the Canaanite and James (Iacobi) the Less, and a son of Mary Cleophas and Alphaeus, first preached the Gospel in Mesopotamia and the lower regions of the Pontus, after the descent of the Holy Spirit; and he pacified the barbarous people by his pious teachings. Later, with Simon (Symone) the Apostle, he sojourned in Persia. According to ecclesiastical history he came to King Abagarus, in the city of Edessa, who then wrote a letter to Christ before he suffered; and Christ answered it in writing. Abagarus was suffering from an incurable disease of the stomach, and Judas Thaddaeus cured him of it. Afterwards Judas Thaddaeus, together with Simon, was martyred, and they were buried in the city of Netruo (Netri), in Armenia. Their day is observed as the 28th day of October. [Judas Thaddaeus, surname of the Apostle Jude (Mark 3:18)].

Dioscorides (Diascorides), a Greek physician and a military man, skilled in the knowledge and use of herbs, was greatly renowned at this time. With much industry he wrote upon the power, effect, and virtues of herbs, trees and stones. Concerning himself he said, What I have stated, I have not discovered by mere good luck, but have learned through research and experience. He is also mentioned by Pliny. [Dioscorides (Pedacius or Pedanius), of Anazarba, in Cicilia, a Greek physician, pharmacologist, and botanist, who probably lived c. 40-c. 90 CE. His masterpiece, , in five books, was a work of great labor and research, which for nearly 15 centuries was considered standard. It is a precursor to all modern pharmacopeias, and is one of the most influential herbal books in history].

Matthew the Apostle, who according to tradition was martyred at the altar, here appears as being done to death in the open country—surprised not by one, but by two henchmen of the king. One has already forced his sword into the apostle's side, while the other is about to run him through the back.

(B)

Processus and Martinian are presented in a dual portrait, each subject carrying a palm as a symbol of martyrdom.

Thecla, the Virgin Martyr, is portrayed in medieval costume, and carrying a palm. The palm, symbol of victory, is one of the earliest Christian symbols, and commemorates, times without number, in the Catacombs, the triumph of the martyrs for the faith. In the darkness of the subterranean vaults, to the survivors it bore testimony of conflict past and death vanquished. It was an ancient belief that the palm tree would always grow erect, no matter how it might be weighted or pulled aside; hence it was a favorite emblem in the Middle Ages of triumph over adversity.

(D)

Judas Thaddaeus (Jude) is being clubbed to death by two vicious executioners. As he sinks to his knees, a column surmounted by a devil is being shattered and falling to the ground, no doubt through Jude's influence; for by his prayers he has caused Christ to destroy the idol—a feat often credited to the saints.

Folio CVII verso

Simon (Symon), son of Cleophas, was an apostle of Christ Jesus Christ, and was his cousin. He was called "the Canaanite" and was said to have been a brother of Judas Thaddaeus. Because of his zeal for the Lord he was surnamed Peter. In the division of the ministry Egypt fell to his lot. As he preached the Gospel of Christ everywhere, so upon the martyrdom of James the apostle he ruled the church at Jerusalem with the consent of the apostles. And when he attained the age of one hundred twenty years, he, together with Judas (Jude) the apostle, was brought before the image of the sun-god to worship it; but they showed that the idol was full of devils; and they ordered the devils to break up the idol; immediately after which black Ethiopians [The German edition replaces 'black Ethiopians' with 'black Moors.'] came out of it and broke it up. Then the high priests immediately fell upon the apostles and punished them. Some hold that this Simon was accused of heresy by Atticus, the consul, and was brought to his death by means of many cruel tortures such as Christ suffered. And all the people were astounded that so old a man could endure such suffering. Others said that Simon was the son of Cleophas, and a bishop of Jerusalem. His day is the 28th of October, on which Saint Jude is also honored. [Simon: There appears to be some confusion in this text. Of the original twelve apostles one was originally called Simon, and later Peter (the rock), or Simon Peter. He has already been spoken of in the martyrology at Folio CIV verso, and there disposed of by crucifixion with his head downward. The present Simon was no doubt the other apostle of that name. He is to be distinguished as "the Canaanite" (Matt.10:4) or "zealot" (Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13). The "zealotes" of Luke is the Greek equivalent for the Chaldee term used by Matthew and Mark, which has no reference to Canaan, or Cana, but is as a member of the faction of Zealots, fierce defenders of the Mosaic law and ritual].

Petronilla (Petronella), that holiest of virgins and daughter of St. Peter, was a beautiful woman. By the volition of Peter she was troubled with a languishing illness or cold fever. And when the disciples asked him why he did not cure his sick daughter, although he had healed many other persons, he answered it was good for her. Yet he asked her to serve him and then return to her sick bed. And when she began to acquire a fear of God, she received healing medicine from her father. But now, against her inclinations, a count named Flaccus, desired her for wife. She asked three days grace in which to think about it. These three days she spent in fasting and prayer, and on the third day she died, as soon as she had received the last sacrament of Christ our Lord from Nicodemus. So Flaccus, seeing that he would be instantly mocked, took her companion, Felicola, (as his wife), and caused Nicodemus to be put to death with various tortures. Her body was buried at Rome, and her day is the last of May. [Petronilla is said (according to legend) to have been a daughter of Peter the apostle. He took her with him to Rome, where she became paralyzed; but Peter restored her to full health. A certain officer, named Flaccus, having greatly admired her beauty, sent soldiers to her to ask her to become his wife; but she replied, "If he wants me to marry him, let him not send rough soldiers to woo me, but respectable matrons, and give me time to make up my mind." At this response the soldiers immediately withdrew abashed. But before Flaccus had obtained matrons to convey his offer, Petronilla had starved herself to death. At Rome is a catacomb named after her, a church, and an altar in the Vatican that enshrines her body. According to some she was only the spiritual child of Peter].

Lazarus, brother of the two sisters, Martha and Magdalen, was a bishop at Massilia. [Massilia, an ancient city, now Marseilles]. He was raised from the dead by our Lord Jesus Christ in the thirteenth year of the reign of Claudius. His sister Martha, according to the Lord's prophecy, lived a whole year with a cold fever, and then rested in peace. Saint Frontinus buried her body. In memory of brother and sister a church was later built not far from Bethany. Marcella, her next of kin (as it is said), described her life, and afterwards converted to the faith many people in Sclavonia. [Slavonia (Sclavonia) ('land of the Slavs') is a historic region, part of modern Croatia, was in the ancient world part of the Roman province of Pannonia. The German edition translates Slavonia as 'land of the Wends,' who were one of the Lusatian branches of the Slavic race dwelling in Saxony and Prussia. Wend is an early German name for any Slav]. Ten years after the death of Martha, she too rested in peace in the Lord. The relics of this man Lazarus and his sister are held in particular veneration in the city of Massilia. [Lazarus was a citizen of Bethany residing with his two sisters, Mary and Martha. Of this household Jesus seemed to have been a friend. Lazarus was raised from the grave by Jesus in the presence of the family and a number of Jews after he had been dead four days; and so incensed were the Jews at this that they sought to kill not only Jesus, but even Lazarus. The story of this greatest of miracles performed by Jesus is recorded in John 11; 12:1-11. "Jesus therefore again groaning to himself comes to the grave. It was a cave, and a stone lay upon it. Jesus said, Take away the stone. Martha, the sister of the one that was dead, says to him, Lord, by this time he stinks: for he has been dead four days. Jesus says to her, Didn't I tell you that if you would believe, you should see the glory of God? Then they took away the stone from the place where the dead was laid. And Jesus lifted up his eyes, and said, Father, I thank you for hearing me And when he thus had spoken, he cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth. And he that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with graveclothes," etc. (John 11:38-44)].

Matthias, the apostle from Bethlehem and born out of the tribe of Judah, was, after the Lord's ascension, chosen by lot by the apostles to become one of their number (as Luke testifies). After the descent of the Holy Spirit, it fell to his lot to preach in the land of Judea. Some say, according to his history that is said to be at Trier [Trier, the German for Treves], that he was highly educated in the law of the Lord, pure of body, intelligent in mind, a circumspect counsellor, and of understanding speech. The Jews charged him with blasphemy and ordered two men to stone him. Within the course of his martyrdom he was slain with an axe, and with uplifted hands he gave up the Spirit. Some say his body was brought to Rome, some to Padua, some to Trier. His day is celebrated on the 24th of February. Although various opinions are held as to the time of his martyrdom, yet it is known that by divine direction the apostles elected him to succeed Judas Iscariot the betrayer. [Matthias, a disciple of Christ, and a constant attendant on his travels and ministry from their commencement until his ascension, was appointed by lot to supply the vacancy in the company of the twelve apostles occasioned by the apostasy of Judas (Acts 1:21ff.). Of his after life and ministry nothing is known with certainty. According to one tradition, he preached in Ethiopia and suffered martyrdom there; according to another, he labored in Judea and was stoned by the Jews].

(A) MARTYRDOM OF SIMON THE APOSTLE

Martyrdom of Simon (Symon) the Apostle: A hillside. In the foreground kneels Simon in an attitude of prayer. On his right an energetic executioner holds him by the hair and is about to give him a blow with a cudgel. Behind him is another with a huge sword (a scimitar) raised over his head with both hands, and which is about to descend upon the apostle's head. Stones lie about to indicate that operations began with stoning. In the background is the usual broken column, surmounted by a dancing demon—no doubt one of the "black Ethiopians" whom Simon conjured out of the image in order to destroy it. The artists (perhaps following the peculiar use of the word "column" in the German translation [šaule]), have represented every pagan image or idol as a "column," from which a devil emerges or upon which he dances.

(B) MARTYRDOM OF MATTHIAS THE APOSTLE

Martyrdom of Matthias the Apostle: We seem to be on the roof or upper story of a medieval structure, where we note an altar built adjacent to the parapet. The altar is surmounted by a "column," from which a horned devil with cloven hoof, and spear in hand, is falling to the ground. In the foreground kneels the martyr in an attitude of prayer. Behind him stands the executioner with a huge axe uplifted and ready to descend upon the head of Matthias. Another man, apparently intended for a high priest, kneels beside the idol (a column) and observes the fall of the devil.

Folio CVIII recto

Luke, the evangelist and a disciple of Christ, and a native of the city of Antioch, in Syria, was a physician, and not unfamiliar with the Greek tongue. He was a follower of Paul the apostle, and his inseparable companion during all his pilgrimages. Having learned that two gospels were available through Matthew in Judea, and through Mark in Italy, Luke, through the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, wrote a gospel in Achaia according to what he had learned from St. Paul. And of him St. Paul said, We have sent with him (i.e. Titus) the brother, whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches. [II Cor. 8:18]. At another place St. Paul says, Luke the physician, my most beloved, greets you. But Luke did not derive his gospel from St. Paul alone, but, as he himself states, from other apostles, just as those taught us who were in the service of the ministry and had seen it from the beginning. They say that he was also instructed in it by the Blessed Mother Mary, of whose friendship he availed himself; and that later he was also instructed in the art of painting. And as he had many dealings with the Virgin Mary, and lived there, therefore (as Damascenus states) he often painted her portrait. Of these same portraits there are two at hand in Rome. One of these, at St. Mary of the People [The church of St. Mary of the People (Santa Maria del Popolo) was built in 1099, at the very northern edge of the city center, on a site of a grove of walnut trees said to be haunted by the ghost of Nero], is preserved with great veneration. After having lived his life without a wife for seventy-four years, Luke died at Bithynia on the 18th day of October. In the twentieth year of the reign of Constantius his remains were brought to Constantinople. They now rest in the Basilica of St. Justina at Padua. [Luke was not an apostle, and like Mark, appears to have been converted after the death of Jesus. According to tradition he was the beloved disciple of Paul. Legend relates that after the martyrdom of Peter and Paul he preached the gospel in Greece and Egypt; but whether he died a natural death, or suffered martyrdom, is not clear. The gospel (actually a two-volume work, Luke-Acts) ascribed to his authorship is, like the other gospels of the New Testament, written anonymously (it was only later Christian tradition that assigned the four authors' names to the gospels). Some say he was crucified with Andrew at Patras. There is some ground for the supposition that he was a physician. Thus Paul, in his Epistle to the Colossians, states, "Luke, the beloved physician, and Demas, greet you" (Col. 4:14), which may be the remark to which the chronicler refers in the text. But the legend that makes Luke a painter, and represents him as painting the portrait of the Virgin, is unsupported by any of the earlier traditions. It is of Greek origin and still universally received by the Eastern Orthodox Church. It was introduced by Greek painters who claim that Luke painted many portraits of the Virgin, finding delight in the repetition of this subject].

Evax, king of Arabia, a celebrated philosopher, physician and rhetorician, was in renown at this time. Among other works of his art he wrote a very good book on medicine and sent it to Nero. In it he not only described all the species and colors of medicinal herbs, but also the minerals, and in what regions they are to be found. [Evax is said to have been a king of Arabia. He is mentioned in some editions of Pliny (25.4) as having written a work, addressed to Nero, that is, the emperor Tiberius 14-37 CE; but this reference has been omitted in most modern editions of Pliny. He is said by Marbodius, in the prologue to his poem on precious stones, to have written a work on this subject addressed to Tiberius, from which his own is partly taken. The work of Marbodius has been published and quoted under the name of Evax]. Vectius, a Greek physician, after the civil wars in Rome, set up a new system, opposing both the ancients and the moderns by frivolous aspirations, claiming that it had supplanted the system of Hippocrates. But Galen (Galenius) exposed his ignorance. [Vectius Valens remains a bit of a mystery.]

Mary Magdalene, the most distinguished apostle of Christ, was from youth (as the sacred history of her records) the most beautiful among all maidens. By the wishes of Martha, her sister, and Lazarus, her brother, she was given a husband at the castle of Magdala, but soon afterwards she was misled by wantonness and empty happiness. This Magdalene, being unmindful of her family, became a sinner; but through the sermons and teachings of Christ she was reformed. At the house of Simon (Symonis) the leper she fell at His feet. Weeping, she washed His feet and dried them with the hair of her head, and she kissed them, and anointed them with costly ointment. [Matthew 26:6-13; Mark 14:3-9; John 12:1-8]. And the Lord said, O woman, your many sins are forgiven. Go forth in peace. Afterwards, during all her life, she was zealously attached to Christ, and because of her devotion her brother Lazarus was raised from the dead; and she chose the best part. After the ascension of the Lord, she became a strict hermit at Marseilles (Massilia), and without the knowledge of the people she lived in one spot for thirty years. Every day of the week she was raised up into the air by angels, and her earthly ears were restored by the pleasant song of the celestial choir; and for that reason she was sat (in office)iated to such an extent that she required no bodily nourishment. Finally, through a hermit, she was revealed to the bishop Maximinus. He looked for her at sunrise on the Sunday morning she was to die; and she appeared two cubits above the earth in the midst of angels surrounded by a great light, and fortified with the Holy Sacrament in tears she gave up the Spirit to God the 22nd day of the month of July.

Mary Magdalene is, in Christian tradition, the paradigmatic example of the penitent sinner absolved through faith and love. According to legend (nearly everything about her is legendary) she was of the district of Magdala, on the shores of the Sea of Galilee, where stood her castle, called Magdalon. In some traditions she is equated with the sister of Lazarus and Martha, and they were children of parents reported to be noble, or, in some way, of royal race. On the death of her father, Syrus, they inherited vast riches, equally divided between them. Lazarus took up a career in the military. Martha managed her possessions with discretion, and was a model of virtue and propriety, though a little too much addicted to worldly cares. Mary abandoned herself to luxurious pleasures and fell into a dissolute life, becoming known throughout the country as "The Sinner." At Martha's request she listened to the exhortations of Jesus, through which her heart was touched and converted. When he supped at the house of Simon the Pharisee, she followed him there, "and she brought an alabaster box of ointment, and began to wash his feet with tears, and wiped them with the hair of her head, and kissed his feet, and anointed them with ointment; and He said to her, Your sins are forgiven." She afterward became the most devoted of his followers; "ministered to him of her substance;" attended him to Calvary, and stood weeping at the foot of the cross. The old Provençal legend then continues the story.

After the ascension Lazarus with his two sisters, Mary and Martha, together with Maximin, one of the seventy-two disciples, from whom they had received baptism, and Cedon, the blind man whom Jesus had restored to sight, and Marcella the handmaiden, who attended on the two sisters, were sent by the pagans adrift in a vessel without sails, oars, or rudder; but guided by Providence, they were safely born over the sea and landed at Marseilles, in the country now called France. The people of the land were pagans, but were converted by the preachings and miracles of the Magdalene and her sister. After the death of Maximin, Lazarus became the first bishop of Marseilles.

These things accomplished, Mary Madgalene retired to a desert not far from the city; and here for thirty years she devoted herself to a life of solitary penance. During her long seclusion she was never seen nor heard of, and she was supposed to be dead. She fasted so vigorously that if it were not for the occasional visits of the angels, and the comfort bestowed by celestial visions, she would have perished. Every day during the last years of her penance the angels came down from heaven and carried her up in their arms into regions where she was ravished by the sounds of unearthly harmony, and beheld the glory of joy prepared for the sinner that repents. One day a certain hermit who lived in a cave in one of the mountains, having wandered farther than usual from his dwelling, beheld this wondrous vision – the Magdalene in the arms of ascending angels, who were singing songs of triumph as they bore her upwards. The hermit returned to the city of Marseilles, and reported what he had seen. (Jameson, Sacred and Legendary Art, I, 4th edition; London 1863; pp. 339-76.)

(A) SAINT LUKE

Saint Luke is portrayed in the garb of a monk. He is seated at his easel, painting a portrait of the Virgin and Child. The winged ox, emblem of St. Luke, is also introduced, and the animal looks out at us, with forefeet over a ledge. Both saint and ox are given a nimbus.

(B) MARY MAGDALENE

The Assumption of Mary Magdalene is represented by a large woodcut. In the foreground is a cluster of buildings, probably Marseilles. In the desolate background is Mount Pilon, above the summit of which the Magdalen is born upward by four angels. Her hands are in an attitude of prayer, and there is a nimbus about her head. She has no other veil than her redundant hair, flowing over her person, exposing nothing but her face, breasts, hands and feet. We miss the alabaster box of ointment, often placed in the hands of one of the angels as her symbol; also missing is the hermit who is sometimes shown as looking up at the vision. This was a very popular theme even in the earlier days, and there was little variety in its treatment.

In a hymn to the Magdalene, by an old Provençal poet (Valthazar de la Burle), there is a passage describing her ascent in the arms of angels, which to some extent fits this woodcut: "The day came when the angels bore her far above the rock-cave. Through storm and cold, she had no other clothing than her hair, which covered her from head to feet like a mantle, it was so beautiful and blonde."

Clement, a Roman by birth, lived in the time of the Emperor Domitian (Domiciani), and occupied the papal chair after Pope Cletus, for 9 years and 10 days. He was the fourth Pope of Rome after Peter, although others say he was the second. He was a most kind and gentle man, and voluntarily requested that the two popes Linus and Cletus should precede him in the work. However, he was held in esteem for his spiritual learning and virtue; and he wrote several epistles in the name of the church, and ordered that a single bishop should not hold mass without the deacons; nor a layman lay charges against a cleric; and he appointed seven notaries to industriously write the complete history of the martyrs. This Clement daily converted many people to the Christian faith by his spiritual learning and virtue. On that account P. Tarquinius and Mamertinus, the Romans, incited the Emperor Trajan against the Christians. At his command Clement was taken to an island, where he found two thousand Christians hewing marble. And the people there were ill and in need of water, which they had to bring there from a distance of six miles. So Clement was moved by the wants of the people; and he went to a hill not far off, and there he saw a lamb under whose right foot was a miraculous spring giving forth an abundance of water. With this all the people were refreshed and many were converted to the faith. This enraged Trajan and he sent one of his officers, who tied an anchor about his neck and threw him into the sea on the 23rd day of the month of November. Before long his body was washed ashore, and was finally buried, and in that place a spring came up. After death the chair was vacant for 22 days. [Clement I, generally known as Clement of Rome, or Clemens Romanus (fl. c. 96 CE), was one of the "Apostolic Fathers," and in the list of bishops of Rome is given the third or fourth place – Peter, Linus (Anacletus), Clement. He is commemorated on November 23rd. The writings attributed to him are generally given the name Clementine Literature. Eusebius states, "In the twelfth year of the same reign (Domitian's), after Anencletus (Anacletus) had been bishop of Rome twelve years, he was succeeded by Clement, who, the apostle, in his Epistle to the Philippians, shows, had been his fellow laborer, in these words: 'With Clement and the rest of my fellow laborers, whose names are in the book of life.' Of this Clement there is an epistle extant, acknowledged as genuine, of considerable length and of great merit, which he wrote in the name of the church at Rome to that of Corinth, at the time when there was a dissension in the latter. This we know to have been publicly read for common benefit, in most of the churches, both in former times and in our own; and that at the time mentioned a sedition did take place at Corinth, is abundantly attested by Hegesippus." Anacletus was by birth a Greek of Athens, and a successor of Clement in the papacy in the time of Nerva and Trajan. Eusebius foregoes this Anacletus and says he was Cletus, but there is a difference between the dates of birth and death of these two; for Cletus, a Roman, died under Domitian (Domiciano), while Anacletus of Athens died under Trajan. He collected the reminiscences of Peter; and he also assigned certain places for the burial of the martyrs. And once, in the month of December, he consecrated five priests, three deacons, and in various places six bishops. And he decreed that a bishop was not to be consecrated by less than three bishops; but a bad priest by one bishop; and that a bishop should not undertake to consecrate foreign subjects. Finally he was slain under Trajan; and the chair was vacant for 13 days. He sat 9 years, two months and 10 days. [Anacletus (rarely Anencletus), ranks as the second bishop of Rome. About the fourth century he is treated in the catalogue as two persons – Anacletus and Cletus. According to these same catalogues he occupied the papal chair for twelve years (c. 77-88). Of him Eusebius writes: "After Vespasian had reigned about ten years, he was succeeded by his son Titus, in the second year of whose reign Linus, bishop of the church at Rome, who had held the office about twelve years, transferred it to Anencletus. But Titus was succeeded by Domitian, his brother, after he had reigned two years and as many months." (13)]

Evaristus, the pope, by birth a Greek, was born of a Jew named Judas, a native of Bethlehem. He was a just and fall man. He was the first to assign titles to the clergy at Rome. He appointed seven deacons to hold the preaching bishops to the faith. He also ordered that the charges of the people against a bishop should not be recognized. He forbade secret marriages, and decreed that bride and groom should be blessed by a priest. He held three consecrations in December, and consecrated six priests, two deacons, and in various places five bishops. As some say, he was martyred in the last year of Trajan the Emperor; but it is likely that he was martyred under Hadrian (as others say), while that emperor was not yet reconciled to the Christians. For he sat nine years, ten months and two days, and was buried beside the body of St. Peter; and at that time the chair was vacant for 19 days. [Evaristus, fourth pope (c. 98-105) was the immediate successor of Clement I, as bishop of Rome].

The second persecution of the Christians after Nero was put into effect by the Emperor Domitian (Domicianus) in the 12th year of his reign. In the course of these persecutions John the apostle and evangelist was brought to Rome by Domitian the Emperor and placed into a kettle of boiling oil, but from which he came out unharmed. Therefore he was sent to the island of Patmos; but after the death of Domitian he was released from exile, and went to Ephesus. Domitilla (Domicilla), a very holy virgin, was in the course of this persecution brought to the island of Pontia, and after enduring much suffering, was, together with Euphrosina, Theodora, and other virgins, burned in her bedchamber by a tyrant. Nicomedes, a Roman priest, Hermocoras, the Aquilaeen archbishop, a disciple of Mark, together with Fortunatus, his archdeacon, earned the crown of martyrdom in this persecution. And so Cletus and Anacletus, the popes, and also many others suffered. [According to Eusebius, Domitian having exercised his cruelty against many, at length established himself as the successor of Nero in his hatred and hostility to God. "He was the second that raised a persecution against us, although his father Vespasian had attempted nothing to our prejudice." According to tradition, the apostle and evangelist John, who was yet living, in consequence of his testimony to the divine word, was condemned to dwell on the island of Patmos. At the same time, for professing Christ, Flavia Domitilla, the niece of Flavius Clemens, one of the consuls of Rome at that time, was transported with many others by way of punishment, to the island of Pontia. (17-18)]

In the foreground are two caldrons of oil, each upon a fire. The martyr kneels in one, in prayer. The executioner is pouring the heated oil over the victim. According to legend this was the evangelist's fate as decreed by Domitian. It is said to have taken place outside the Latin gate at Rome. In Dürer's famous woodcut John sits in the boiling oil, while one executioner blows the fire and the other pours the oil over John's head. According to Greek legend John died without pain or change, and immediately rose again in bodily form, and ascended into heaven.
